In the wars of Francis I. and Charles V., in the early part of the sixteenth century, the north of Italy, and especially the whole country of the Milanese, was devastated by the contending armies; yet still more by those troops of Condottieri, which hired themselves to either sovereign alike, and, without regarding the laws of war, lived at free quarters. They were chiefly formed of deserters from both armies, and, of course, abounded in desperate and reckless spirits; but their leaders were often men of brilliant abilities, possessing a wild but high sense of chivalric honour, and, if fierce in the field, yet ostentatiously courtly and magnificent in their castles.

One of the most memorable of those captains of Condottieri, was Stefano Diamanti, whose first appearance in Italy instantly concentered all eyes upon him. He had led his troop across the lower Alps from Provence, by routes which had been thought impassable for even the goatherds; and had fallen upon the Piedmontaise posted in the defiles with such extraordinary vigour and success, that several thousand men were scattered before an almost invisible enemy, and fled to the gates of Turin, exclaiming that they owed their defeat to magic. Every day brought some new account of defeat or devastation; and in quarters so remote from each other, that the first report of the Piedmontaise fugitives began to be seriously believed; and, in an age of Italian superstition, when mental darkness, military horror, and the general tumult and disturbance of society, made men willing to take refuge in the belief, that the evil agencies of another world were busy in adding to the natural calamities of kingdoms, Diamanti was but another name for the spirit of darkness; and his gallant freebooters were speedily invested with the wings, talons, and tails of a legion of Lucifers on a smaller scale. But there was nothing imaginary in their effect; for, since the first French soldier that trod the snows of the Alps, nothing had ever equalled the devastations of Diamanti, wherever any thing in the interest of Charles was to be attacked. Woe be to the village that had ever quartered the German Lanzknechts![*] the last company of the corps was not out of the village, before it was in flames over their heads. Woe be to the Grand Convent that had sent its wine and fruits to the Imperialist general! the night was not over, before the roofs were in a blaze, the cells stript, and the high-born lord abbot and his fat community of monks were flying, half naked, through the country, and rejoiced to escape with their lives. Woe be to the stately chateau, where the black adler[] had ever displayed its wings over the gates! the dawn saw it sending up volumes of smoke from its piles of gilded furniture, pictures, and family pomp; and nothing but the massive walls left to shew what it had been.

The results of this singular activity were among the most memorable of a war abounding in extraordinary changes and brilliant exploits. They entirely renovated, within a few months, the face of French affairs, which had been hitherto in a desponding state through the rashness and violence of Lautrec, the commandant of the troops of Francis in the Milanese. His celebrated defeat by Gonsalvo, named the Great Captain, and his subsequent pursuit by D'Alviano, had totally broken up his army, and driven him to take refuge in Milan. But Diomanti, the chivalric leader of the Condottieri, effected what had defied the sword and the dexterity of the French generals.

---

[*] A famous body of spearmen in the Imperial service.

[] The standard of the Imperial Eagle.

The Imperial officers were perpetually baffled, and their partisans visited with a sudden and sweeping vengeance, whose invisible agency rendered it still more terrible: until their troops, already weary of disaster, and rejoiced at an opportunity of escape, flung away their arms at the very rumour of the Condottieri's approach, and declared that though they were willing to face men, they were not enlisted to fight against Satan and his crew. The Imperialists rapidly withdrew from the Milanese, and, throwing their best troops into Mantua and some of the other fortresses in their line of march to the Tyrol, moved towards the frontier.

This calm lasted a few weeks; when a strange rumour rose in Milan of an insurrection in the Bolognese, of the burning of the villages along the Adige, and of the seizure of the French Envoy on his way to France. The narrative was attended with so many singular circumstances of dexterity, bold enterprise, and rapid execution, that all tongues at once pronounced the name of Stefano Diomanti. But all these attacks had been made on the French, his former friends: the Bolognese were notoriously in the French interest, the villages on the Adige were filled with French pensioners and colonists, and the seizure of the Envoy was, in itself, an act of the most contemptuous and inveterate hostility.

The cause was not explained till long after. Diomanti was the son of one of the impoverished nobles of Verona, whom the German Emperors had driven into Lombardy. Thus born in exile, and with an hereditary hostility to the Imperial influence, his first use of the sword had been to fight the battles of France; but his genius was too keen not to perceive the errors of the French generals, his spirit too bold to relish being directed by their commands, and his passion for independent enterprise too ardent to be contented with the tardy movements of regular troops. After a few campaigns in the Royal Guard, he threw his French commission at the head of the hoary [illegible] who commanded his regiment, flung his embroidered coat into the Adige, and, adopting the iron helmet, scarlet cloak, and Ferrarese falchion of the Condottieri, summoned to his retreat in the Lower Alps all the daring spirits of his time.

His successes in the late campaign had attracted the notice of Francis, who invited him to his court, then held at Fontainebleau. Francis, the most sumptuous and chivalric monarch of Christendom, loved a soldier, and loved him the better for being bold even to wildness. It was he who had written to his great antagonist, Charles, in a strain worthy of an ancient knight: — “You and I are rivals; but we are not therefore enemies. We are in love with the same mistress whom we must seek with ardour, but with respect: no hatred needs mingle in our passion.”

The celebrated Marquis de Fleuranges, whose name makes so conspicuous a figure in the annals of the French court, was his introducer; and Diomanti's gallant form, animation of manner, and heroic fame, did the rest. The king was lavish of his opulence and honours upon this restorer of his cause. Of three Arab horses, of the choicest breed of the desert, sent to him by the Emperor of Morocco, he gave the Italian two; and a leash of falcons trained for the Sultan, and sent by him as the highest present of honour to his ally, Francis, were transferred by him to Diomanti, with a message, in the allegorical language of the time, intimating that their flight, strength of wing, and courage, rendered them fit emblems of a warrior „for whom nothing was too high and nothing too hazardous.“

(To be concluded in our next.)

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Abonnements-Preis für das Vierteljahr 16 gGr. oder 1 fl. 12 kr. rhein., wofür es sämmtliche Buchhandlungen des In- und Auslandes und alle Postämter liefern.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1837. №. 52.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Victoria Colonna.

A Story of the Milanese.

(Concluded from our last.)

But the tide of royal favour was to turn. At one of the court balls, Dimanoli saw the lady Vittoria Colonna, the niece of Cardinal Jeronimo, of that illustrious family. She was seventeen, in the bloom of life, — a magnificent Italian beauty. Dimanoli felt that his conqueror was come. The fiery spirit of the soldier was now converted into the ardour of the lover; and it flamed with more than its old intensity. The lovely Colonna was not insensible to the delight of being worshipped by a young hero, who was one of the handsomest men of his time, and whose exploits threw all others into the shade. But the Cardinal judged differently: he haughtily reproved the lover's presumption, and, to make his reproof effectual, demanded the interference of the king. Francis had his weak side, and it was the pride of birth. He was, besides, naturally capricious in his attachments, and he had already grown weary of paying honour to a brilliancy of mind and fame which, he now began to think, might, even in the eyes of his courtiers, eclipse his own. He availed himself of the Cardinal's demand, to indulge in his own discontents; and, in a formal interview with the Italian, gave his opinion directly against favouring his suit. Dimanoli retired in dismay; but, on that evening, a secret conference with „his lady-love," at a masquerade, decided him on a second trial. It was worse than ineffectual: the king was now irritable, and he haughtily let drop hints of the obscurity of his birth, who pretended to the hand of the noblest daughter of Italy.

This was agony to the proud spirit of the adventurer. Even in the royal presence he half unsheathed his sword; but, recollecting himself, he plunged it again into the scabbard, and, bowing to the monarch, with a bitter smile, said, in a low tone, „that he hoped the time would come when even his blood might be worth the notice of majesty."

Francis answered only by a smile and a wave of the hand, as the suitor retired; but the fiery glance, and the deep tone, rested on his mind: he saw vengeance there, and suddenly ordered that the Italian should be forbidden to quit the palace; but the order came too late. Dimanoli, on quitting the royal presence, had instantly taken horse, and galloped into the forest: the royal troopers were out before nightfall in all directions; but their pursuit was fruitless. The first intelligence of the Captain of Condottieri was the stirring up of hostilities in the east, middle, and north of Italy, at the same moment. He had offered his services to the Imperialists; and Francis, in the bitterness of remorse, cried out that „Germany had gained one soldier who was worth an army of twenty thousand men."

---

1 Jubelsang

But the French king was himself a knight, and not untouched with the romantic valour that once sent the Paladins and Cœur-de-Lions, sword in hand, through the world. Every hour brought accounts of disaster from Italy. Pescara, the most famous officer of the Emperor's service, had descended from the Tyrol with a powerful army; and the French supremacy beyond the Alps seemed near its close. The king assembled, with extraordinary rapidity, a force of forty thousand men, passed the Alps, and plunged into Lombardy. Pescara, startled by this sudden arrival, left the Milanese open, and slowly retired to Pavia. Francis exultingly followed, fell into the snare laid for him by his more sagacious adversary, fought the battle of Pavia, and in one day was a king and a captive, the most splendid sovereign of Europe and a powerless and ruined dependent on the will of his rival and conqueror. Diamanti had there enjoyed his full revenge. When the German spearmen, appalled by the desperate valour of the Guards that fought round the royal person, were shrinking from the attack, the Captain of the Condottieri solicited leave from Pescara to try the lances of his followers on the enemy. The request was joyfully granted. Diamanti rode at the head of his column, and burst upon the gallant but wearied Guard with irresistible force: the struggle was desperate, but it was soon over. Francis, covered with blood and dust, was on the point of being cast down by the broadsword of one of the Condottieri, when Diamanti, springing from his horse, saved the king; and, taking off his helmet, made his obeisance, uttering the words: „Your Majesty sees that obscure blood may still serve a monarch.“ Francis was silent; but with a dejected brow, and a compressed lip, he suffered a soldier's cloak to be thrown across his shoulders; and, escorted by a company of the Condottieri, walked across the field to the tent of the Imperial general.

Yet the war was unfinished, while Milan remained the refuge of the French interest. Numbers of the fugitives from the battle had escaped thither; and now was the time to exterminate the power of France in Italy.

Diamanti, inveterate against every thing that bore the name of France, rushed to the city with his troop, now augmented by a crowd of the noblest soldiers of Italy, proud of serving under his banner. He swept the country of all the stragglers, and instantly commenced a rigorous blockade of Milan. In an age when sieges were but little understood; to reduce a populous city, famine was the established tactique: — the smaller towns were stormed. In a few weeks Milan was reduced to extremity; but the authorities, overawed by the French garrison, dared not propose a surrender. At length, one evening, as Diamanti sat at supper, an arrow fell at his feet, with a note containing these words:

„You love, and are beloved. Will you see her whom you love dying in agony? How can you answer to yourself, your mistress, or Heaven, for the multitude whom a few days more must see perish within these walls? Be merciful, if you would receive mercy at your dying hour.“

Diamanti knew the hand; and his mind underwent a sudden revolution. „Victoria was within the walls.“ He felt that he was persecuting her, — that every moment was reducing her to the grave. He imaged her drooping before him, the colour leaving her cheek, her brilliant eyes lustreless, her noble spirit passing away in misery, her last words charging him with her death. He grew gloomy and wretched at the conception. That night he spent wandering round the walls, and regretting the desperate duties of a soldier's career.

At morn he had flung himself down in his tent, overpowered by the fatigues of the night, when he was awakened by the entrance of the captain of the trenches, to tell him that the citizens, unable any longer to provide for their women and children, had sent them outside the gates: the officer was come for orders to drive them in, as was usual in blockades, to augment the consumption of the remaining provisions. But that night's thoughts had changed the temper of Diamanti's mind. He rode to the trenches, and ordered the melancholy multitude to advance: they came in slow and sad procession, mothers leading their children, elder sisters their younger: — age, youth, and infancy, pale and thin, and coming as from the tomb. Many of them, to conciliate the favour of the rude soldiery, had brought little presents of embroidery, money, fruit, and the other gifts that they could save from the wreck of war.

The Condottieri, wild as they were, were melted by the spectacle; and, with Italian sensibility, grieved over the fortunes of the field. But there was one among the exiles who attracted every eye: she was a peasant bearing a basket of fruit, and leading an infant, her sister, by the hand. The bystanders were so struck with her beauty, even in its dejection, that the rumour drew out the whole camp; and, as she slowly passed along with her countrywomen, the murmur of admiration was universal. It reached their commander's ears; and, unwilling as he was to witness the sight, which reminded him so deeply of the misfortunes of her whom he loved, and who was destined to perish by the obstinacy of the city; he returned from his tent to see the new wonder. The peasant approached: the Condottieri saw, with surprise, her cheek, which had been pale as death, suddenly suffused with the richest colour of the rose. Their wonder was still greater, when they saw their captain, the man of desperate valour and avowed revenge, rush forward and kneel at the peasant's feet.

The story is told: — Victoria, believing that she must die, whether within the walls of the famishing city, or by the swords of the Condottieri, whom rumour had charged with a remorseless rage of massacre, determined to see her lover once before she died. She saw him, and found his proud heart devoted to her with the faith of inextinguishable passion. He was now determined that neither King nor Cardinal should divide them more. In his camp he was both King and Cardinal: the marriage was celebrated in the midst of shouts of the Condottieri, and prayers and blessings of the multitude whom he had saved. Victoria's first request was the safety of Milan, and her next, to be the bearer of Diamanti's proposals for the surrender. They were singularly mild, and were accepted by the citizens with acclamation. The French garrison marched out, with a safe conduct to the Alps; Diamanti and his bride were received with the honours of a triumph. The Condottieri were taken into the service of the city; and Diamanti, appointed the general of the troops of Milan long sustained the fortunes of the state with distinguished honour, and finally founded the most illustrious family of the Milanese.

The Private Doctor.

I had been but a few days in Napoli di Romania, the capital of Greece, when I was ordered to embark for Damala, a small village opposite the island of Poros, to join the regular troops under Colonel Fabvier, to which corps I was attached. My arrangements for travel being very speedily completed, I paid mine host of the Locanda, and with all my worldly possessions contained in the knapsack at my back, I went down to the quay in search of a caique, gladly bidding adieu to the dirty narrow streets, pestilential atmosphere, and motley population, of the first of Greek cities. I luckily met with a lerouken, who, plying for passengers as he pronounced it „dia ton Poro,“ and wanting only one of his complement, readily agreed to take me for two piastres, (about eight pence.) I stepped on board his caique, an odd Greek-looking kind of craft, with a mast raking forward at an angle of 45°. I found myself in company with six or seven individuals of different nations, calling themselves Philhellenes, but being in reality adventurers like myself, and having as much affection for the Greek cause as I have for the reigning prince of Timbuctoo.

There was an old drunken Gascon whom I shall call Garelle; he lay upon the shingle which served to ballast the boat, as I thought in a state of stupid intoxication. I remarked to one who sat next me, „qu'il était soûl comme un cochon,“ to which Garelle, who, I suppose, had detected my island accent, replied, „Mille pardons, Monsieur, je suis seul comme un Anglais."

When the laugh occasioned by this repartee had subsided, I was addressed by a strange looking being, whose operations I had been watching with considerable interest for some time. He had been sitting cross-legged on the half-deck making his toilet: his age was about sixty; his head, as carefully divested of hair as though it had belonged to the most rigid of the disciples of Mahomet, was covered with a folded napkin, which he occasionally dipped in the water; he had been carefully plucking from his mustachios all straggling irregular-growing hairs, till he succeeded in making the upper edge as sharp and defined as though it had been cut upon copper by the burin of an engraver. The finishing touch was then given to them by means of a ball of dark wax, with which they were blackened, and made to turn up at the corners, imparting to them an aspect „più feroce," as the armourer of Constantinople said to Byron, when endeavouring to sell him a flame-fashioned Damascus. The eyebrows having been carefully coloured to match, the napkin was superseded by a luxuriant juvenile jet wig, shining as brightly as olive oil could make it. Although I could not but feel a contempt for the frivolity of his occupations, there was nevertheless an air of „bonhommie" about him which delighted me exceedingly. He extended to me the right hand of fellowship, saying, „Sare, how do you do; Sare, je suis charmé to make do you connoissance." I expressed my satisfaction at meeting one who spoke my language — a white fib which won the old man's heart, — and we became excellent friends. Papa Clement — for Clement was his name, the Papa being invariably affixed by his comrades — then told me that he had been for some years a prisoner of war at Stapleton, near Bristol, and dwelt with particular unction on the manifold kindnesses he had received at the hands of von Mr. Alderman Jon-Brown, Mrs. Alderman Jon-Brown, and Miss Alderman Jon-Brown, magnates of the aforementioned city of Bristol. To the urbanity of Papa Clement was added a more sterling quality. He was an excellent cook, a vocation in the exercise of which Papa Clement never had an equal, for cooks in general will draw largely upon the commissariat, whereas Papa Clement, like the monk who made stone broth, went to work upon nothing, and nevertheless produced invariably a good repast. He had followed the steps of Napoleon to Moscow and back, and had fought in his last field. Such had been his lot after the restoration, that he found the nominal pay of forty piastres a month, as captain in the 2nd battalion of the regulars, and the real Yemeklik of seventeen paras per diem, (about three-halfpence,) a considerable improvement in his circumstances.

The next in order was a light-haired, blue-eyed, broad-faced, ruddy-cheeked, Bavarian. His dress was that of an officer of the Tacticoi, but he had laid aside the cumbrous chacot for the light crimson Barbary cap, always worn by the Greeks. On either thigh was suspended one of his national weapons; on the left the schlæger; and on the right the formidable boar-knife, with a buck-horn haft that would have fitted the fist of a giant. There were two Portuguese, an Italian, a Pole, and a Corsican, none of whom were particularised by any marked peculiarities, beyond those of their respective nations.

The hot sun beat fiercely down upon us as we lay becalmed for several hours in the beautiful Gulph of Napoli; even old Taygetus seemed to drop a portion of his snowy mantle as the day advanced. At length came the short-lived twilight of the east, and with it the off-shore breeze bearing on its wings the aroma of a thousand herbs. Who that has not visited an Eastern clime can tell the delight with which this portion of the day is welcomed. The moody Mussulman takes his solitary walk where the melancholy cypress throws its dark mantle over the ashes of his fathers; there, on some turban stone, he sits enjoying bright visions of his promised paradise, till the loud „Allah akbar," of the Muezzin from the neighbouring mosque reminds him of the hour of prayer. The light-hearted Greek flings his capote across his shoulder, and with a gay elastic step he seeks the most public promenade of the city. He hears and tells the news; he exchanges his own inventions of the day for those of others.

We arrived at Poros too late to continue our journey thence to Damala the same evening, and were consequently obliged to take up our abode in a Kaphéné. The ground-floor consisted of a single room, one end of which was occupied by hogsheads of wine, faggots, charcoal, and all the „matériel" of a Greek coffee-house keeper; round the other end ran a low wooden bench, whereon were seated two or three grave looking elderly Greeks, smoking their arquilas or water pipes, and sipping their coffee in silence. The revolution has not yet effected any change in the olden Greeks, whose habits and manners are formed on those of the Turks. In the centre of the room on a pillar of sun-baked clay, about three feet high, stood a well polished Mangal — a brazier, containing ignited charcoal, at which the coffee is made, and other culinary operations performed. The floor was of mud, the ceiling of dried myrtle bushes, laid thickly over rafters of roughly torn pine, and on the bushes again a layer of mud, forming the floor of an upper apartment, which was only half the size of the lower one, the remainder of the roof being dignified with the name of a terrace, on which in the summer heats the natives are accustomed to sleep. The ascent to this upper story was of the rudest description, being the trunk of an unsquared pine tree, with some of the smaller branches nailed transversely to it. The only eatables with which our host could furnish us, were eggs, salted curds, made of goat's milk, and kept in bags made of the skin of the same animal, with the hair inside, black olives, and oil, but these incongruous materials were, by the art of Papa Clement, so harmoniously blended together as to produce a savoury and delicious omelette. We were supplied from an enormous wooden hooped bicker with a diluent called crasse — I am unwilling to translate it wine, although it is made from the juice of the grape — a beverage having a most iniquitous twang of resin, highly lauded by our host, pronounced by the initiated palates of my comrades to be excellent, but which I was only enabled to swallow by the most powerful efforts.

Our meal being ended we retired to rest; I, Kleber, and the Italian, preferring the open terrace, and leaving the upper apartment to be occupied by the rest of our party. I, a soldier of three days standing, indignantly refused the share of his mattrass, which Kleber offered me, and lay down in my capote on the mud roof of the Kaphé. I was surprised to see the phlegmatic German, who was an old campaigner, making his night toilet. After divesting himself of his heavier articles of wearing apparel, he produced a large linen bag, having two smaller ones stitched to its upper corners, very like an ordinary night-gown, „parvis componere magna," except in having no outlet for hands or feet, and in being drawn tightly round the neck by a string. The utility of this garment consisted in its affording an effectual barrier to the inroads of musquitoes, and other annoying insects, but too common in those countries. Having most dexterously sacked himself he lay down with his beloved bear-knife by his side, and in a short time gave utterance to sounds that spoke very intelligibly both of the potency of the crasse and the soundness of his repose. Kleber had foolishly suspended his wearing apparel upon some pegs in the outer wall of the adjacent apartment. The ludicrous appearance of my German friend had so forcibly recalled to my imagination the apparition in Tom Thumb, and all its concomitant addition, that sleep for a time was out of the question. I was just thinking of

„Here we go up, up, up,
And here we go down, down, down,"

when a slight noise at my side caused me to open my eyes, and there I beheld, not certainly a disembodied spirit, but Vlacopolo, the son of Barba Nicola, our host, with his ear carefully turned towards my face, endeavouring to ascertain if I slept, and I began immediately to imitate, but at a long distance, the dulcet strains produced by Kleber. His scrutiny was continued for some time, and then I heard him steal cautiously to the side of the Italian, who was submitted to the same examination as myself. I placed one hand on my pistols, which I had retained in my belt, and endeavoured to watch his motions as well as the obscurity occasioned by a clouded moon would permit. He left the Italian, and once more approached me; as I was satisfied that his object was robbing, and not personal violence, I felt no fears either for myself or friends; he again stooped down to listen to my breathing; I suddenly made a clutch at him and shouted aloud to my comrades: the miscreant slipped from my grasp like a lump of wet soap, and jumped from the terrace into the street. I started to my feet and followed him as fast as I could, but the darkness of the night, my ignorance of the localities, and, perhaps, his superior agility, favoured his escape.

I returned discomfited to my terrace. The moon burst forth, and there I beheld Kleber in his bag, flourishing his bear knife and swearing most eloquently in High Dutch; Papa Clement, without his wig, was standing by his side marvelling what had become of Monsieur L'Anglais; and Garelle, who had gone to his couch as drunk as a twenty-four pounder, looking the very beau ideal of stolidity. When I was given to their wondering eyes, interrogatories thick as hail were poured upon me: Kleber questioned me in German; Clement, after many vain efforts to make himself intelligible in the English he had picked up under the patronage of Mr. Alderman Jon-Brown, ended in French, with something about assassination. With the assistance of my comrades, from above, and the aid of some rubbish below, I contrived to re-ascend to my terrace, and, in a polyglott salmagundi sort of speech, I endeavoured to make my auditors comprehend what had occurred. Having, with much difficulty and many words, succeeded in my object, we held a council of war, wherein it was decided that we should alternately keep watch for the rest of the night. Garelle, who was not able to understand any thing, insisted that Monsieur L'Anglais was „soul comme dix mille hommes,“ and that it was all a dream, and betook himself to rest. Those who had possession of the apartment declined participating in our watch. Kleber insisted upon keeping the first vigil, and I and the Italian laid down again. In a short time we were all fast asleep, sentry and all. The early beams of the morning sun were the first interruption to my repose; both my comrades were still asleep: I looked round and saw the German's clothes hanging upon their pegs in statu quo. I aroused my friends, and Kleber proceeded to clothe his day apparel, in doing which he became aware of the abstraction of his watch, his purse, and a bunch of keys. As I had recognised the person of our midnight visitor, Vlacopolo was immediately summoned, but Vlacopolo was either out of hearing, or else had more pressing occupation.

His father and mother, on being acquainted with our suspicions, exhibited a great anxiety for his production. His male progenitor, in especial, commenced a vociferation that might have been heard all over the island, „Vlacopolo! brle sou pou eisai Anathema! Keratopolo,“ but Vlaco was deaf to the endearing epithets so lavishly bestowed upon him by his father, and came not. Kleber, whose bile had been sufficiently roused by the discovery of his loss, drew forth his schlaeger, and swore he would annihilate mine host if his property was not immediately produced. Barba Nicola endured this intimation of Kleber's suspicion of his being concerned in the theft, with a stoicism so unnatural to an innocent man, in like circumstances, that convinced me of his guilt. Not so the Cocona — her indignation knew no bounds at finding her son accused of robbery, and her husband of participation; she called us dogs of Franks, Keratades, and applied some very offensive epithets to our religion, intimating that it was no better than it should be. When the storm of voices had subsided, I had well nigh perpetrated an oration in English, my knowledge of modern Greek, or indeed, of any language except my own, being very limited. Fortunately I bethought me of my passport, which I handed to Barba Nicola, who therein discovered that I was an officer of the Zodiac, commanded by Colonel Fabvier, and encamped at Domnia, the other side the ferry. I backed this piece of intelligence by assuring him that unless prompt restitution was made, I would bring down the Colonel's vengeance upon him and his house. Barba Nicola appeared to be considerably taken aback at this intelligence, and begged for time in order, as he said, that he might find out the thief; this being granted, he set out immediately, while we sat down to the discussion of a famous „soupe au lait," prepared by Papa Clement. In about an hour Barba Nicola returned, with a face in which importance had almost mastered the look of cunning with which nature had so liberally gifted it. As he ascended the ladder that led to our chamber, he called out to some person following, „Capnasde exohelade capinasde apano." At last Barba Nicola entered, followed by an individual whom he pompously announced as his excellency Doctor Papathopolo, head physician of the island of Poros.

Those who have seen the „anatomie vivante" and those only, can form an adequate idea of the total absence of any thing like flesh under the shrivelled skin of the illustrious Doctor Papathopolo. His unclothed legs, like two bits of bamboo arising from out of a pair of black papouches, were met at the knees by an article, that I can only translate „breeches," but the only point in which it will bear a comparison with that exclusively European garment, is in its appropriation to the same uses. This garment, extending from the knees to the waist in length, and being about six yards in breadth, formed a contrast by no means advantageous to the thin yellow legs of his excellency; his waist, after the fashion of the Greeks, was as tightly bound up as possible by a tattered red silk sash. A close Zantiote vest, surmounted by a white sheep-skin jacket, invested his upper man, and his head was thatched by a round Frank hat. Long black lustreless elf locks streamed down his shoulders, and some half dozen hairs were left on each upper lip — a caricature on the generally handsome mustachios of his countrymen. Doctor Papathopolo, on making his entree, „grinned horribly a ghastly smile," and taking off his Frank hat, flourished it round his head as an Emeralder would his sipeen. I saluted the Esculapian with a „proskino sas kerie," one of the few Greek phrases I possessed; the man of physic drew himself up and assumed an air of injured pride. Barba Nicola then informed me that the worthy doctor was never addressed by any other title than that of your excellency. I amended my speech by adding the coveted „exohotate," and the offended dignitary was conciliated; he returned my salute by placing his right hand over his heart, giving another flourish of his beaver, and „Asis sassa sas," „Asko sas emera," said I. After replacing his much cherished hat, he, without further ceremony, sat himself down on the floor, and produced his rosary, a plaything hardly any Greek is without. Barba Nicola then furnished him with a tchibouque and a small cup of Mocha. While we were deliberating as to the expediency of kicking his excellency down the trap, he suddenly demanded who had been robbed; which was the first intimation we received of the object of his visit. Kleber then stepped forward, and I informed the doctor that he was the person; he then requested the description of the articles stolen. He was as minute in his enquiries as an Old Bailey counsel examining a prosecutor, but fortunately Kleber was enabled to give him satisfactory answers. His excellency, then getting up his smoke, inhaled enough to stifle half a dozen Europeans, and opening his lean jaws to their fullest extent, suffered it gradually to exhale from his mouth and nostrils; this ceremony being ended by an energetic puff, he put his hand beneath his girdle and slowly and separately produced the missing property, watch, keys, and purse, from which last had been abstracted a dollar, which, said his excellency, raising his hand to his lips, had been expended by the „kammeros" in drink. He attributed great credit to himself for the share he had had in the transaction, and insinuated that some compensation for the trouble he had taken would be very acceptable. Kleber, who appeared to look upon the renowned Papathopolo as, at least, an accessory after the fact, demurred to this, but taking to his consideration the wan condition of the doctor, he gave him a six piastre piece, about two shillings, being six times the fee usually paid for the medical services of this learned Theban.

I afterwards ascertained some particulars of this man's history. His first start in life was as a cabin-boy on board a Hydriot trader, employed in carrying corn to the French ports during the war with England. The vessel being chased by an English cruiser, Papathopolo, who, perhaps, like Shakspeare's fop, „but for this vile gunpowder," might himself have been a soldier, was nowhere to be found, till, after strict search, he was at length discovered in the lazaret, a hole under the cabin flooring. The ship ran up the Adriatic to Ancona, where the future doctor, being convinced of his unfitness for pursuits of danger, „faisait son paquet," and levanted, not forgetting to take with him such superfluous articles as he could lay his hands on; not by way of peculation, but only as a precautionary measure lest he should change his mind and return, as men who drown themselves, tie their hands together to assist their resolution. His grotesque appearance and outlandish dialect won for him the attention of a Dutch mountebank, who happened at that time to be curing the incurables in the dominions of his holiness the Pope. In this man's service, Papathopolo was in the precise station for which nature fitted him. Great was the influx of clients to the delighted Dutchman, in consequence of this addition to his caravan, and accordingly he recompensed Papathopolo with as much maccaroni as he could eat — coin, once passed into the pockets of Mynheer Van Windergelt, like the souls that had once sat in the state-room of old Charon's wherry — never being known to return. Orpheus, though he had asked but the value of a single horsehair to his fiddle-stick, would have whistled in vain. — Papathopolo continued to eat his maccaroni, and pocket his kicks, till he had acquired the figure of his master, and got a thorough initiation into the mystery of making bread-pills. Van Windergelt, after cheating all other creditors, was obliged to pay the debt of nature; and Papathopolo, not caring to go through the ceremony of a legal administration, decamped without beat of drum, taking with him his master's stock of nostrums, and leaving the obsequies of the defunct Doctor to be performed by the hands of strangers. With these „drugs potential," and a round Frank hat, Papathopolo returned to his native island. Passing through Venice, where there is a Greek press, he got some handbills struck off, describing himself as the renowned Doctor Demetrius Papathopolo, professor of medicine in the university of Padua, and further setting forth his skill in astrology, thief finding, and other abstruse sciences. In the pride of his heart he took to himself a wife, and indulged in pleasing anticipations of a brilliant future; but, alas! for his hopes in computing the gullibility of the islanders, he had forgotten to take into account their powerful dislike to part with their money, and although they accorded to him the high-sounding titles of your excellency, and your brilliancy, yet small was the profit that accrued — and had it not been for such occasional adventures as that I have here recorded, starvation would long since have put an end to the exploits of the Pariote Doctor.

Nachricht der Verlagshandlung an die verehrlichen Abonnenten.

Die letzten Nummern dieser Zeitschrift hätten eigentlich schon zu Michaelis d. J. in den Händen der Abonnenten sein müssen, um aber die Quartale dieser Zeitschrift mit den Quartalen der Zeitrechnung besser in Uebereinstimmung zu bringen, haben wir die letzten Nummern so retardirt, daß solche erst jetzt den verehrl. Abonnenten zukommen, worauf nun wieder wie früher regelmäßig jede Woche eine Nummer erscheinen wird.

Ferner werden wir, durch mehrfache Gründe bewogen, vom nächsten Jahrgange an nicht mehr, wie bisher, jede Nummer einzeln, sondern alle 4 Wochen 4 Nummern auf einmal verschicken. Einestheils werden dadurch die unangenehmen Defecte einzelner verlorengehender Nummern vermieden, anderntheils wird es der Redaction dadurch möglich, den Inhalt weniger zerstückelt als bisher zu geben, und auch umfangreichere Stücke aufzunehmen, was bisher wegen der jeder Nummer zu gebenden Mannigfaltigkeit nicht thunlich war, obwohl dadurch manche der werthvollsten Sachen ausgeschlossen bleiben mußten.

Es sind der Redaction mitunter Zuschriften zugekommen, worin Wünsche und Vorschläge in Bezug auf das British Museum ausgesprochen waren. Die Redaction hat, in dankbarer Anerkennung der dadurch ausgesprochenen Theilnahme, diese Winke theils befolgt, theils, wo Gründe dawider sprachen, solche entgegengeantwortet. Da es aber bei zunehmender Menge solcher Zuschriften zu zeitraubend sein möchte, solche einzeln zu beantworten, so soll dies künftig von Zeit zu Zeit im Blatte selbst, ganz kurz am Ende, unter der Rubrik: Correspondenz, geschehen. Es wird der Redaction angenehm sein, recht oft von den Wünschen der geehrten Leser in Kenntniß gesetzt zu werden, doch muß sie bitten, dergleichen Schreiben entweder auf Buchhändler-Wege oder franco an sie gelangen zu lassen.

Und somit übergeben wir denn diesen Jahrgang dem wohlwollenden Leser zur Beurtheilung. Sorgsamkeit sowohl in der Auswahl eines möglichst interessanten und gediegenen Inhalts, als auch in der Herstellung eines anständigen Aeußern wird man der Redaction und der Verlagshandlung nicht absprechen können.

Noch Besseres aber dürfen wir für den nächsten Jahrgang versprechen. So z. B. bringen die ersten Nummern desselben eine ausführlichere historisch-kritische Uebersicht der literarischen Erscheinungen des Jahres 1837, die wir als höchst interessant bezeichnen dürfen.

Und so hoffen wir auch im nächsten Jahrgange zu beweisen, daß wir die große Theilnahme, womit man dies Unternehmen beehrt hat, dankbar erkennen und durch steigende Sorgfalt zu erwiedern suchen.

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Abonnements-Preis für das Quartal ist 16 gGr. oder 1 fl. 12 kr. rhein., wofür es sämmtliche Buchhandlungen des In- und Auslandes und alle Postämter liefern.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS

OF THE

MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS

BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS:

O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A.A. M.M.

Volume II.

BIELEFELD,
PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY VELHAGEN & KLASING.

1838.

AD
BIBL. UNIV
MONAC.

Universitäts-
München
Bibliothek

Contents
of the British Museum Vol. II.

The names of the authors, of whose lives and works a short notice has been given, are marked with an asterisk.

Annual, the splendid. Nro. 41 seq.
Audubon, the Hurricane. Nro. 29.
Autumn. Nro. 21.
Baillie Johanna, Song from the Beacon. Nro. 6.
Banim, John, the Irish Lord Lieutenant and his Double. Nro. 23 seq.
Barton, the solitary Tomb. Nro. 44.
Boz, a little Talk about Spring and the Sweeps. Nro. 26.
— the Tuggs at Ramsgate. Nro. 30 seq.
Brockedon, the Spanish Brigand. Nro. 18.
* Bulwer, Introduction of Ernest Maltravers. Nro. 43.
* Butler, Samuel, Satire upon the Imperfection and Abuse of human Learning. Nro. 14 seq.
— — — On Love. Nro. 18.
* Byron, Battle of Waterloo. Nro. 20.
— the Destruction of Sennacherib. Nro. 36.
Campbell, Thomas, the last Man. Nro. 17.
— — What's hallowed Ground. Nro. 23.
— — Ye Mariners of England. Nro. 44.
* Crabbe, George, the Hall of Justice. Nro. 7. seq.
Croly, the Alhambra. Nro. 67.
Dream, the. Nro. 33 seq.
* Edgeworth, Maria, Forester. Nro. 5 seq.
* Fielding, Henry, the History of Anne Boleyn. Nro. 32 seq.
Gall, the Bell of St. Bega. Nro. 18.
Grahame, the Sabbath morning. Nro. 49.
Grave Doings. Nro. 51 and 52.
* Hemans, Mrs., the Child and Flowers. Nro. [illegible]
— — the wounded Eagle. Nro. 18.
— — the Prayer for Life. Nro. 60.
— Farewell to Abbotsford. Nro. 41.
Holling, the Lace Maker. Nro. 30.
Hood, Thomas, the golden Cup and the D[illegible] of Silver. Nro. 35.
— — the three Jewels. Nro. 37.
— — Geronimo and Chiesla. Nro. 38.
* — — the Fall of the Leave. Nro. [illegible]
— — the Lady in Love with Romance. Nro. 39.
— — the eighth Sleeper of Ephesus. Nro. 47.
Howitt, the Harvest moon. Nro. 7.
* — Ellen Gray. Nro. 54.
— the Mother. Nro. 55.
Human Life. Nro. 53.
* Hunt, Leigh, la bella Tabaccaja. Nro. 26.
Image-man, the. Nro. 60 seq.
Irving, the rainy Sunday. Nro. 23.
Lamb, Charles, the superannuated Man. Nro. 4.
Landlord, my little grey. Nro. 24 seq.
* Landon, Miss L. E., the Bayadere. Nro. 9. seq.
— — — the Enchantress. Nro. 45 seq.
* Landor, W. S., Imaginary Conversations. Nro. 48.
Lilian of the Vale. Nro. 31 seq.

Mackenzie, H., Louisa Venoni. Nro. 19.
Madeline. Nro. 48.
Mandeville, Clara. Nro. 40 seq.
Marryat, Captain, the three Cutters. Nro. 27 seq.
Mitford, M. R., the Voice of Praise. Nro. 42.
Moore, Th., the Flying-fish. Nro. 27.
Morgan, Lady, the charitable Bazars of Dublin. Nro. 21.
Neighbours, opposite. Nro. 3 and 4.
Norton, Mrs., to my Child. Nro. 25.
O'Connors, the, and M'Carleys; or the Humours of an Irish Fair. Nro. 22.
Passages, some, in the Life of Francis Loose-fish, Esq. Nro. 44 seq.
Radcliff, Mrs., Song of a Spirit. Nro. 26.
Ritchie, Leitch, the mysterious Stranger; or the Beaver of Banff. Nro. 16 seq.
River, the. Nro. 52.
Rogers, the Butterfly. Nro. 28.
Rogers, the Alps at Day-break. Nro. 35.
Scott, W., the tapestried Chamber. Nro. 14 seq.
— — a Highland Anecdote. Nro. 29.
Sedgwick, Miss, the Country-cousin. Nro. 1 seq.
Sonnet. Nro. 38.
Southey, R., the Lover's Rock. Nro. 28.
Stray Leaves. Nro. 35.
Swain, the Snow. Nro. 48.
Ueberſicht, kurze, der neueſten engliſchen Literatur Nro. 1—3. 44. 49.
White, H. K., Christmas-day. Nro. 46.
Willis, W. H., Miss Smith „at home" or more Smiths? Nro. 19 seq.
Wilson, Spring. Nro. 7.
Wordsworth, W., We are Seven. Nro. 30.
— — The Farmer of Tilsbury Vale. Nro. 30.
— — The seven Sisters, or the Solitude of Binnorie. Nro. 31.

Contents
of the British Museum Vol. II.

The names of the authors, of whose lives and works a short notice has been given, are marked with an asterisk.

Annual, the splendid. Nro. 41 seq.
Audubon, the Hurricane. Nro. 29.
Autumn. Nro. 21.
Baillie, Johanna, Song from the Beacon. Nro. 6.
* Banim, John, the Irish Lord Lieutenant and his Double. Nro. 23 seq.
Barton, the solitary Tomb. Nro. 44.
Boz, a little Talk about Spring and the Sweeps. Nro. 20.
* — the Tuggs at Ramsgate. Nro. 30 seq.
Brockedon, the Spanish Brigand. Nro. 10.
Bulwer, Introduction of Ernest Maltravers. Nro. 43.
* Butler, Samuel, Satire upon the Imperfection and Abuse of human Learning. Nro. 14 seq.
— — — On Love. Nro. 18.
Byron, Battle of Waterloo. Nro. 20.
— the Destruction of Sennacherib. Nro. 36.
Campbell, Thomas, the last Man. Nro. 17.
— — What's hallowed Ground. Nro. 23.
— — Ye Mariners of England. Nro. 13.
* Crabbe, George, the Hall of Justice. Nro. 7. seq.
Croly, the Alhambra. Nro. 47.
Dream, the. Nro. 33 seq.
* Edgeworth, Maria, Forester. Nro. 5 seq.
* Fielding, Henry, the History of Anna Boleyn. Nro. 39 seq.
Galt, the Bell of St. Regis. Nro. 18.
Grahame, the Sabbath morning. Nro. 40.
Grave Doings. Nro. 31 and 32.
* Hemans, Mrs., the Child and Flowers. Nro. 1.
— — the wounded Eagle. Nro. 16.
— — the Prayer for Life. Nro. 40.
— Farewell to Abbotsford. Nro. 41.
Holling, the Lace Maker. Nro. 39.
Hood, Thomas, the golden Cup and the Dish of Silver. Nro. 33.
— — the three Jewels. Nro. 37.
— — Geronimo and Chiesla. Nro. 30.
* — — the Fall of the Leave. Nro. 40.
— — the Lady in Love with Romance. Nro. 20.
— — the eighth Sleeper of Ephesus. Nro. 42.
Howitt, the Harvest moon. Nro. 7.
* — Ellen Gray. Nro. 34.
— the Mother. Nro. 35.
Human Life. Nro. 38.
* Hunt, Leigh, la bella Tabernaja. Nro. 24.
Image-man, the. Nro. 40 seq.
Irving, the rainy Sunday. Nro. [illegible]
Lamb, Charles, the superannuated Man. Nro. 4
Landlord, my little grey. Nro. 24 seq.
* Landon, Miss L. E., the Bayadere. Nro. 9. seq.
— — — the Enchantress. Nro. 48 seq.
* Landor, W. S., imaginary Conversations. Nro. 49.
Lilian of the Vale. Nro. 37 seq.

Mackenzie, H., Louisa Venoni. Nro. 19.
Madeline. Nro. 48.
Mandeville, Clara. Nro. 40 seq.
Marryat, Captain, the three Cutters. Nro. 27 seq.
Mitford, M. R., the Voice of Praise. Nro. 42.
Moore, Th., the Flying-fish. Nro. 27.
Morgan, Lady, the charitable Bazars of Dublin. Nro. 21.
Neighbours, opposite. Nro. 3 and 4.
Norton, Mrs., to my Child. Nro. 25.
O'Connors, the, and M'Carleys; or the Humours of an Irish Fair. Nro. 22.
Passages, some, in the Life of Francis Loosefish, Esq. Nro. 44 seq.
Radcliff, Mrs., Song of a Spirit. Nro. 26.
Ritchie, Leitch, the mysterious Stranger; or the Bravo of Bondi. Nro. 16 seq.
River, the. Nro. 52.
Rogers, the Butterfly. Nro. 22.
Rogers, the Alps at Day-break. Nro. 35.
Scott, W., the tapestried Chamber. Nro. 14 seq.
— — a Highland Anecdote. Nro. 29.
Sedgwick, Miss, the Country-cousin. Nro. 1 seq.
Sonnet. Nro. 38.
Southey, R., the Lover's Rock. Nro. 28.
Stray Leaves. Nro. 35.
Swain, the Snow. Nro. 48.
Ueberſicht, kurze, der neueſten engliſchen Literatur. Nro. 1—3. 44. 49.
White, H. K., Christmas-day. Nro. 16.
Wills, W. H., Miss Smith „at home" or mere Smiths! Nro. 19 seq.
Wilson, Spring. Nro. 7.
Wordsworth, W., We are Seven. Nro. 30.
— — The Farmer of Tilsbury-Vale. Nro. 30.
— — The seven Sisters, or the Solitude of Binnorie. Nro. 31.

1838. № 1.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Kurze Ueberſicht der neueſten engliſchen Literatur.

I. Allgemeines.

Die vorherrſchende Klage, daß ſeit einigen Jahren die Richtung auf das Practiſche allem rein geiſtigen Intereſſe ſtörend und lähmend in den Weg trete und es faſt völlig verſchlinge, iſt auch in England ſehr laut geworden; ſie hat eigentlich dort begonnen und ſich nachher über das Feſtland verbreitet. Namentlich ſind es die eigentlichen Werke der Phantaſie, mögen ſie durch redende oder bildende Künſte die Form gewinnen, durch die ſie concret in das Daſein treten, für welche die allgemeine Theilnahme immer ſchwächer wird. Bei keinem Volke haben ſich in der Geſchichte der ſchönen Literatur binnen wenigen Jahren ſo ſchroffe Gegenſätze herausgeſtellt, als gerade bei dem freien und kunſtſinnigen Volke der Briten. — Es iſt noch nicht viel länger als zwei Decennien, daß dort die Vorliebe für die Erzeugniſſe der Einbildungskraft auf das Glänzendſte hervortrat. Der außerordentliche Erfolg, deſſen ſich die, (nach dem erſten ihrer Gattung generell ſo benannten) Waverley-Romane erfreuten, die auf die glückliche Weiſe die ſchillernde, farbenſatte Fiction ſich auf dem breiten Boden hiſtoriſcher Wirklichkeit entfalten ließen, hatte ein Heer von Nachfolgern hervorgerufen, welche ſich Alle mehr oder weniger einer guten Aufnahme von Seiten des leſenden Publicums rühmen durften. — Während der Zeit des Culminationspunktes dieſer Geſchmacksrichtung vor ungefähr zehn bis zwölf Jahren belief ſich die Zahl der jährlich erſcheinenden Werke dieſer Klaſſe auf [illegible] bis [illegible], deren jedes einigermaßen gelungene, einen Abſatz von 750 bis tauſend Exemplaren, jedes bedeutendere aber einen Debit von [illegible] bis [illegible] Exemplaren hatten; dieſe gute Zeit zog indeß ſchnell vorüber, und die Verfaſſer, bei deren Arbeiten die Verleger zu jener Zeit wenigſtens auf eine [illegible] Exemplare ſtarke Auflage bedacht ſein mußten, ſind jetzt froh, wenn ſich der Abſatz nur auf [illegible] erſtreckt, da ihnen dies doch wenigſtens den Beweis liefert, daß ihr perſönlicher Ruf noch nicht gelitten habe, indem es das höchſte iſt, was die kühnſte Hoffnung nur erwarten kann. — Noch ſchlimmer ſteht es um die eigentlichen poetiſchen Werke auf dem engliſchen Büchermarkte. „Bietet — ſagt ein vielgeleſener, wohl unterrichteter Schriftſteller, *)) — einem Verleger einen Band Poeſien an, und er wird krank ſchon bei dem bloßen Anblick derſelben. — Er wird Euch anhören, als hätte er Euch bei dem Verſuche ertappt, ihm ſeine Börſe oder ſeine Uhr zu ſtehlen. — Und das wahrlich nicht mit

---

*) Der Verfaſſer der Random Recollections of the House of Commons u. ſ. w., welche vor einigen Jahren ſo großes Aufſehen machten, in ſeiner neueſten Schrift: The great Metropolis. Second Series. London [illegible]. Vol. I. S. [illegible]. Die ſämmtlichen Notizen über den engliſchen Büchermarkt, welche wir hier mittheilen, ſind größtentheils dieſer Schrift entlehnt.

Unrecht, denn während der letzten drei oder vier Jahre haben Buchhändler in verſchiedenen Fällen die Speculation auf poetiſchen Verlag höchſt ſchmerzlich bereuen müſſen, während das, was ſie von dieſer Art auf den Büchermarkt brachten, allgemein und von allen Partheien ohne Ausnahme als vortrefflich anerkannt wurde. Vor Kurzem noch verkaufte ein beliebter, populärer Dichter einem Verleger im Weſt-End *) ein Gedicht für hundert Pfund Sterling. — Es war in der That ein herrliches Werk und wurde auf das Zärtlichſte und Ausführlichſte in den verſchiedenſten und anerkannteſten kritiſchen Journalen geprieſen und doch überſtieg der ganze Abſatz deſſelben nicht 50 Exemplare. — Von einem anderen ſehr witzigen, humoriſtiſchen Gedichte, das ungefähr drei hundert Seiten füllte, große Tiefe und Kenntniß entfaltete und die Arbeit mehrerer Jahre geweſen war, gingen im Allem achtzehn, ſage achtzehn Exemplare ab. — Ja ſelbſt die gefeiertſten Dichter Englands, wie Campbell, Rogers oder Wordsworth, können ihrem Verleger nicht dafür bürgen, daß von einem neuen Werke ihrer kunſtreichen Feder mehr als 2000 bis höchſtens 2500 Exemplare Abnehmer fänden.

Dieſe Abneigung des engliſchen Publikums vor dem Ankauf poetiſcher Producte erſtreckt ſich nicht bloß auf die Werke lebender oder neuerer Poeten, auch die älteſten und gefeiertſten Dichter, die die Nation mit Stolz anerkennt, werden eben ſo wenig geſucht. Noch ganz kürzlich unternahm ein engliſcher Buchhändler die Beſorgung einer neuen Ausgabe der Werke Cowpers, ſtattete dieſelbe auf jegliche Weiſe glänzend aus, ſo daß auch der ſtrengſte Richter keinen Tadel daran zu finden wußte, wandte allein an die Bekanntmachung der neuen Ausgabe eine Summe von 500 Pfund Sterling, und erwartete nun ganz ruhig einen Abſatz von 3000 Exemplaren, aber — der Debit belief ſich im Ganzen noch nicht auf ſo viele hundert. Dergleichen Beiſpiele laſſen ſich leider noch viele anführen. —

Nun wird man aber mit Recht fragen, wohin hat ſich denn die Kaufluſt in der Literatur gewendet. — Es wird jetzt überall mehr geleſen als je und es gibt doch eine große Menge von Leuten, denen faſt allein und jedenfalls mehr um Unterhaltung und Amuſement durch Lectüre als um Belehrung zu thun iſt; was fordern, was kaufen denn die? hier fällt die Antwort in Hinſicht auf Großbritannien eben ſo betrübt aus, als mit mehr oder weniger Modificationen, in Hinſicht auf Frankreich und Deutſchland; denn ſie enthält eine über das ganze gebildete Europa ſich verbreitende und eine immer mehr überhand nehmende Verderbtheit des Geſchmacks, die ſich darauf gründet, daß das Leſen jetzt Modeſache iſt, daß Jeder, obwohl er am Ende kaum buchſtabiren kann, doch lieſt und über das Geleſene raiſonnirt, und daß die Menge, die eben, weil ſie die Menge iſt, den Ton angeben muß, aus ſolchen buchſtabirenden Raiſonneurs beſteht. — Man findet jetzt in England, wie in Frankreich und Deutſchland und überhaupt partout comme chez nous, das meiſte Wohlgefallen an leichter, ſkizzenhafter Lectüre, beſonders wenn ſie Klatſchereien und Perſönlichkeiten enthält. — Wir Deutſchen ſind noch inſofern den Engländern voraus, daß dieſer Geſchmack ſich bei uns nur unſerer, mit wenigen Ausnahmen herzlich ſchlechten belletriſtiſchen Journale, die die wahren Fundgruben für litteräriſche und kleinſtädtiſche Klatſcherei ſind, bemächtigt und von den Büchern, mit Ausnahme der wenigen, zu denen eine Branche unſerer bald verrufenen ſogenannten [illegible] Schriftſteller den Ton anſtimmte, bisher noch fern gehalten hat. — Dies iſt in Großbritannien, wo auch die belletriſtiſchen Journale eine beſtimmte politiſche Richtung haben und dadurch gewichtiger ſind, weil ſie als Organe einer Parthei erſcheinen (wir werden ſpäter noch ausführlicher bei dieſem Umſtande verweilen), umgekehrt, und ſo hat vorzüglich in der neueſten Zeit ſich eine eigene Maſſe von Büchern gebildet, die freilich flüchtig nur für den Tag geſchrieben, doch dem Tage höchſt willkommen iſt und auch täglich neuen Zuwachs findet. Anfangs erhielten dieſe Producte doch eine beſtimmte Form und verbargen die Perſönlichkeiten und Klatſchereien aus der Wirklichkeit mit dem Gewande eben derſelben, indem ſie als Romane oder Novellen erſchienen und wenigſtens wie Fictionen ausſahen, wenn ſie auch eigentlich keine waren, oder Wahrheit und Dichtung ſo mit einander verſchmolzen, daß eine Unterſcheidung unmöglich wurde; jetzt aber gibt man ſich nicht einmal mehr die Mühe, einen hiſtoriſchen Faden zu erfinden, an welchem man die Perſönlichkeiten künſtlich aufreiht, ſondern man ſchreibt Bücher, in denen man eben ſo loſe, eben ſo ungenirt und mitunter eben ſo boshaft und giftig über Perſonen und Dinge mit dem ganzen Publicum ſchwatzt, als man es ſonſt höchſtens in ſtillen Stunden vor dem Kamine mit ſeinen vertrauteſten Freunden that. Das aber will die Menge und kauft und lieſt es mit großem Eifer, und das eben iſt die einzige Branche im Fache der Unterhaltungsliteratur, bei der ein engliſcher Verleger noch auf einen erklecklichen Abſatz hoffen darf. Darum gefielen auch die Briefe eines Verſtorbenen vom Fürſten Pückler (deren Intereſſe für England weit beſchränkter iſt als für uns, denn der Engländer findet im Allgemeinen nur bekannte Dinge darin) ſo [illegible] wurden ſo viele geleſen, wie aus derſelben Urſache ſich jetzt die Schriften der redſeligen und einfältigen Miſtriß Trollope, des Amerikaners Willis Pencillings by the way und Inklings of Adventure, Boz's Sketches of Every-day Scenes and Every-day People und andere ähnliche Leiſtungen einer ſo großen Theilnahme erfreuen, daß z. B. die Bücher der beiden letztgenannten Verfaſſer einen Abſatz von mehr als 8000 Exemplaren binnen wenigen Monaten fanden. —

---

*) Stadtviertel von London.

(Fortſetzung folgt.)

The Country Cousin,

by Miss Sedgwick.

He is a man, and men
Have imperfections; it behoves
Me pardon nature then.
The Patient Countess.

L'homme honore la vertu,
Dieu la récompense.

The dark empire of superstition has passed away. This is the age of facts and evidence, experience and demonstration, the enlightened age, par excellence. Ghosts, apparitions, banshees, phocas, clurichaunes, fairies, „good people all,“ are now departed spirits. The fairies, the friends of poets and story-tellers, the patrons, champions, and good geniuses of children, no longer keep their merry revels on the green sward by the glow-worm's lamp; they are gone, exhaled like the dews that glittered on last summer's leaves. The „dainty spirits“ that know „to swim, to dive into the fire, to ride on the curled clouds, to put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes,“ have no longer a being save in poetry. Like the Peri of the Persian mythology, they forfeit their immortality when they pass the bounds of their paradise — that paradise the poet's imagination.

Though in the full meridian of our „enlightened day,“ we look back with something like regret to the imaginative era of darkness, when spirits, embodied in every form that fear or fancy could invent, thronged the paths of human life, broke its monotony, and coloured its dull surface with the bright hues and deep shadows of magic light. We almost envy the twilight of our Indian predecessors, whose quickening faith, like the ancient philosophy, infused vitality into external nature, imparting a portion of the Infinite Spirit to mountain, valley, stream, and flower, that faith that gave discourse and reason to trees, and stones, and running brooks. Strange that in the progress of light, mind should surrender its dominion to matter! that the metaphysics of nature should yield to the physical sciences! that the materialism of the mineralogist, the botanist, the geologist, should prevail over the spirituality of the savage! But so it is. The suggestions of superstition so universal in man's natural state of ignorance, are silenced by the clear, cold demonstrations of knowledge. Who now ventures to tell a fairy tale beyond the purlieus of the nursery? Who would hope to raise a ghost above the subterranean region of the kitchen? The murdered lie as quietly in their graves as if they had been dismissed to their rest anointed and annealed; and even Love's martyrs, the most persevering of all night-walkers, no more revisit the glimpses of the moon. And yet there seems to be a deep foundation in nature for a belief in mysterious visitations, in our unknown and incomprehensible connexion with spiritual beings. The mighty mind of Johnson was duped by the ghost of Cocklane, and seized, as he himself confesses, on every tale of the reappearance of the dead to support his religious faith! What are we to infer from the horoscope of the hero of „Guy Mannering,“ what from the „Lady of Avenel,“ and all the strange prophecies fulfilled of Sir Walter Scott, but that the wild and fantastic superstitions of his native land, that „meet nurse of a poetic child,“ still control his imagination. Even Napoleon, who feared no power embodied in flesh and blood, bowed like an Oriental slave before the dark, mysterious despot Destiny.

We have made this long introduction to a ghost story it was once our good fortune to hear well told, to persuade our readers that we have drunk deep enough of the spirit of the age to laugh, when we are in the presence of the honoured public, at the superstition and credulity of others, though we may still cherish some relic of it in our secret soul.

Somewhere between twenty and thirty years ago — there is, alas! a period when accurate dates become a sort of memento mori, — we, or rather I — for, like a late popular writer, we detest that reviewer in the abstract, the „cold, and critical,“ and pompous we — I was on a visit to a friend of my parents who resided in New York, Mrs. Reginald Tudor. She was an Englishwoman by birth, but had long been a resident in this country, and, though of a noble family, and educated with aristocratic prejudices, she was, in all acts of kindness, condescension, and humanity, a Christian; and is not Christianity the foundation, the essence of republicanism? Her instincts were aristocratic, or those principles of conduct that are so early inculcated and acted on that they become as impulsive and powerful as instincts; but when a deed of kindness was to be done, she obeyed the levelling law of the religion of universal equality. As Mrs. Reginald Tudor, the lady of polite society, she was versed and strict in all artificial distinctions and nice observances; but as a Christian, friend, and benefactress, no fiery revolutionist ever so well illustrated the generous doctrine of equality; for here was the perfect standard of rectitude, and every one who needed the tender charities of life from her, was her „brother and her sister.“ Forgive her then, gentle reader, a slight contempt of republican manners, and a little pride in her titled ancestry and noble English relatives.

Like most old people, Mrs. Tudor talked always of the past, and the friends of her youth. Her grandfather, whose pet she had been sixty years since, was her favourite topic. Her stories began with „My dear grandfather, Lord Moreland“ — „Lord Moreland“ was the invariable sequence. But this was an innocent vanity, and should not cast a shade over my honoured friend's memory. The only evil attending this foible, so ill adapted to our country, was that it had infected her granddaughter, my friend Isabel Williamson.

Isabel, at the period of which I write, was, a beautiful girl of eighteen, an only child, and as such cherished and caressed, but not spoiled by her parents and grandmother. Nothing could spoil so frank and generous a disposition, so noble-minded a creature. But Isabel was touched with the family taint of pride. She had a feeling very closely bordering on contempt for every thing American, and, though born in the city of New York, though her mother and her maternal ancestors were American, she always called herself English, preferred all English usages, however ill suited to our state of society, had some pretty affectations of Anglican phraseology, imported her dresses, hats, shoes, from England, employed English teachers, and preferred English men and admirers.

At the time I was with her, her parents were away from home on a long absence, and during my visit her cousin Lucy Atwell arrived in town from „the West.“ „The West,“ a designation that has removed with our emigrants to Missouri, then meant one of the middle district counties of the state of New York. Lucy came, consigned for life, to Isabel's parents. She was a meek, timid, country girl, of about seventeen, made an orphan by sudden bereavement, and by an accumulation of misfortunes left penniless. This was an irresistible appeal to Isabel's heart. „Grandmamma,“ she said to Mrs. Tudor, „we must provide for poor Lucy.“

„Certainly, Isabel, I was sure you would say so.“

„I have been thinking,“ resumed Isabel, „that Mrs. Arnott's would be such a good place for Lucy to board.“

„My dear Isabel, we must keep her with us.“

„Grandmamma!“

„Why not, my child?“

Isabel well knew the „why not,“ operative on her mind, but she did not care to tell it, and she offered the most plausible reason that occurred to her. „You know, Ma'am, it must be so unpleasant for a person to live as a dependant in the family of relatives."

„That depends, Isabel, on the temper of the parties. If you are not wanting in kindness and consideration, I am sure, from little Lucy's sweet face, she will not fail in gratitude and contentment; at any rate she must stay with us."

„Do you not think," said Isabel to me when we were alone together, „that grandmamma is getting childish? She was so decided, so obstinate to day, about Lucy."

The following day I perceived that Isabel suffered a series of mortifications on her cousin's account. In the first place nothing could be more decidedly countrified, not to say vulgar, for I cannot bear to apply that word even for once to one so pretty, gentle, and essentially refined as Lucy — nothing could be more countrified, more ill made, and unbecoming than our little rustic's dress. The date of our story was long before the artful looms of Europe had prepared every variety of texture, and brought the light silk and delicate barege level to the means of the most humble purchaser. It was the age of cotton cambrics, and bombazettes, and our country cousin was dressed in a stiff, glazed, black cotton cambric, with a vandyke of the same, a crimped leno frill, and white knit yarn stockings. It was then the fashion to dress the hair low, with braids and bands after the classic models; Lucy's was drawn up like a tower on the top of her head, and walled in by a horn comb. Isabel spent too much money, time, and thought on her dress not to pride herself on its style, and never was there a more striking contrast than the two cousins presented, when they were both seated together in the parlour. Isabel, arrayed in high fashion and taste, with her toy workbasket filled with the elegant implements of „Mosaic" work, and Lucy, in the costume we have described, diligently knitting a full sized, substantial cotton stocking. But in spite of this homely vulgarity, there was something of nature's aristocracy in her graceful and delicate outline, in her „serious eye," and thoughtful, fair young brow, and I felt hurt and mortified for my dear friend Isabel, when I perceived a little flutter and fidgetiness about her at every rap at the street door, indicating too plainly her dread of having her cousin seen by her fashionable acquaintance. Isabel was not sufficiently a woman of the world, and she had too much good feeling to disembarrass herself of this concern, as a true woman of ton does, by the current jokes on country cousins.

It was a day of trial to Isabel. The heavens were serene, the air balmy, and the walking fine; and it seemed as if all our acquaintances, and specially those who for very delicateness were afraid of the rough visitation of the winds, had selected this day to pour in upon us. Mrs. Tudor was at her usual station on a corner of the sofa, and, punctilious in the formal politeness of the day, she most precisely introduced every visitor to „Miss Lucy Atwell — Miss Williamson's niece; and each time, Lucy, according to her notion of good manners, laid aside her knitting-work, rose and dropped her little dot of a courtesy; and, though Isabel affected to laugh and talk in her usual careless style, I could perceive in her face, as in a mirror, her consciousness of poor Lucy's every word and motion.

Isabel's Anglo-mania had led her to avoid every Americanism, word or phrase; and the „concludes," „calculates," and „guesses," which were in all poor Lucy's replies to the few questions addressed to her, grated on her cousin's ear. It is difficult to recall, after time and matured sense has released us from the galling fetters that are imposed by the false notions and artificial distinctions of fashionable society, it is difficult to recall the feelings that, like the emotions of a troubled dream, were then as real to us, as they now are illusory and ridiculous. It now seems to me incredible that my friend Isabel, the noble woman whom I have since seen wrestling with fearful calamities, and enduring calmly and sweetly the darkest night of adversity, should at eighteen have wasted tears, and a flood of them, on the mortifications I have recorded. But so it was. They were, however, shed in private, and known only to myself and to her grandmother, with whom she again expostulated on the subject of Lucy's removal to some other home. Mrs. Tudor was mild, but firm in her first decision. In the evening, at the usual hour for retiring, the good old lady invited us to her apartment. This was her frequent custom, and a great pleasure to us, for there is always something in the sociality of one's own room, far more unbending, intimate, and endearing, than in the parlour intercourse. Mrs. Tudor left her stateliness, her only infirmity, below stairs, and in her own apartment was the true grandmother, easy, communicative, and loving.

It was late, I believe near the witching time of night, when we, Isabel, Lucy, and myself, drew our low chairs around Mrs. Tudor's matronly rocking-chair. The oil in the lamp was expended, a stick of wood was burning, as all wood burns after twelve o'clock, fitfully, and the bright, changeful flame threw such strange distorted figures on the wall, that braver spirits than ours might have been frightened at a shadow. Our conversation turned, I don't know how, but it then seemed naturally enough, on ghost stories. Mrs. Tudor was the benefactress of the rising generation; her mind was stored with strange and forgotten events; she had treasures of marvellous appearances, which had no record but in her memory. After relating various anecdotes till we were all in a state of considerable excitement, till Isabel had forgotten her coldness, and Lucy her timidity, Mrs. Tudor said; „There is one ghost story that I have never told, not even to you, Isabel, for whose insatiable curiosity I have produced every other treasure from my storehouse. This is connected with many sacred recollections, it deeply affected my imagination at the time, and related to persons in whom I had some interest. There are many preliminary circumstances before I can come at the supernatural incident — it is late — shall I tell it to-night?"

„Oh yes!" was the unanimous voice, and Mrs. Tudor proceeded.

„When I lived in London, I had an intimate friend who was, like myself, a widow, with an only son. Mrs. M'Arthur — that was her name — had set her heart on having her son fix himself in the calm quiet of home and domestic life, such as suited her matured and feminine tastes, but was not at all adapted to a young man of unchecked ambition and ardent passions. M'Arthur's mind was early steeped in the military spirit of tales and songs of chivalry, and as soon as he was old enough to think of a profession, he avowed his will — the will, and the wish of a widow's only son is fate — to be a soldier. My friend opposed him at first, but he who was never denied anything, was not long opposed in his most impetuous passion, and his poor mother, fearing all things and hoping nothing, procured a captaincy for him, and soon after had her heart almost broken by his being ordered on the American service. Your father, Isabel, came to this country at the same time, and was ever after intimately associated with M'Arthur, and from him I have received the particulars that I shall relate to you.

„Captain M'Arthur was appointed to command a detachment that was sent to wrest the possession of a small town from the Americans. The male inhabitants, notwithstanding the confusion of a surprise, made a valorous resistance, but, overcome by numbers and discipline, all who could fly, fled to support the banner of their country in a more fortunate field, and defend her where defence would be available."

„Ah!" said Isabel, whose particularities were always in the English ranks, „the Yankees often practised that better part of valour — discretion."

„Not till its bolder part was useless," retorted the gentle Lucy.

„The fray is past, fair champions," said I, „do not interrupt the story."

„No, girls," continued Mrs. Tudor, „my story has little to do with the war, though a good deal with the passions it engendered. Captain M'Arthur had gallantly achieved his object. He obtained undisputed possession of the town, but in effecting this, he received a dangerous wound, and was carried bleeding and insensible to the best house the place afforded, situate at the entrance of the town, and belonging to one Amos Blunt, a bold yeoman, who had been first and last to fight in defence of his home, and who, as he caught from a distant hill a last look of the roof that sheltered his two lovely and now defenceless daughters, swore eternal hatred to the English. Fatally and cruelly did he keep his vow.

,,To return to M'Arthur. The sad chances of the battle had made his life to depend on those very daughters of the yeoman, Emma and Anne Blunt. Unskilful surgical treatment aggravated his wound; a violent fever ensued, and for many weeks the gay and gallant young officer was as dependent as an infant on the tender vigilance of his pretty nurses.

,,The two sisters, as I have heard, were alike in nothing but their devoted affection to each other; even their looks were as dissimilar as distinct races, as unlike, Isabel, as you and your cousin Lucy. You might, indeed, if I remember their pictures accurately, stand for their living portraits, so fair, so like a snow-drop, or rather so like that meek representative of all spiritual purity and womanly tenderness, the Madonna, so like my sweet Lucy was Emma — yes, just as sensitive and blushing at her own praises, even from the lips of an old woman; and my dear Isabel — but you cannot so well bear flattery. It is enough to say that Anne had a brow of lofty daring, a quick, glancing, laughter-loving eye, a rich damask on her cheek that expressed the kindling and burning of her feelings; lips that a Grecian artist would have chiselled to utter the laws of love, rather than its prayers; in short, a face and shape that a painter would have chosen for a Semiramis, or Zenobia, or Clotilda."

,,Grandmamma!" exclaimed Isabel, ,,are you describing two daughters of a farmer?"

,,Even so, Isabel; and truly you must remember, my dear," what Isabel was prone to forget, ,,nature has no aristocratic moulds; the peasant is born with as fine limbs and beautiful features as his lord. Besides, you must know, those girls had not impaired their natural beauty by household drudgery. Their father was wealthy; they were his only children, and motherless from extreme childhood, their stern father, stern to everything but them, had lavished his wealth to procure for them whatever advantages of education the country then afforded.

,,You must allow, that when the romantic M'Arthur awoke from his long delirium, and beheld those beautiful forms flitting around his pillow, he was in more danger than he had been from their father's sword. In the flush of health and unbroken spirits, Anne would have been most attractive to him; but in the gentleness, the patient watchings, the soft, low toned voice, the uniform tranquillity of Emma, there was something so suited to the nurse and leech, so adapted to the abated spirit of the invalid, that his susceptible heart was touched, and, in the progress of a slow convalescence, entirely captivated, and honestly surrendered.

,,It was not in human nature, certainly not in Emma's tender nature, to resist the fondness of the most interesting man she had ever seen. She requited it, with a strength and depth of devotion, that, I believe, my dear girls, men seldom, if ever, feel.

,,The rash, impetuous lover proposed an immediate marriage. His intentions were strictly honourable; for Emma's sake he was willing to forget his noble birth, the wishes of his far-off, widowed, but, alas! proud mother, the duties of his official station, propriety, expediency, the world, for love. But Emma was of another temper. She could have surrendered every other happiness in life to be M'Arthur's wife, she could have died for him, but she would not deviate one point from the straight line of filial duty. She would not hear M'Arthur's vows, acknowledge him as a lover, nor think of him as a husband, till she had her father's sanction. This was strange to the indulged youth, who had never regarded any sanction but that of his own inclinations; he felt himself thwarted by her determination, and half offended by the absolute necessity of waiting till the consent of her father could be obtained. However, there was no alternative. He addressed an earnest letter to Amos Blunt! Emma added a modest, but decided, postscript; and a trusty American boy was hired to convey it a distance of little less than a hundred miles, where Blunt was stationed.

(To be continued in our next.)

The Child and Flowers.

By Mrs. Hemans.

> All good and guiltless as thou art,
> Some transient griefs will touch thy heart,
> Griefs that along thy altered face
> Will breathe a more subduing grace,
> Than even those looks of joy that lie
> On the soft cheek of infancy.
>
> Wilson.

Hast thou been in the woods with the honey-bee?
Hast thou been with the lamb in the pastures free?
With the hare through the copses and dingles wild?
With the butterfly over the heath, fair child?
Yes: the light fall of thy bounding feet
Hath not startled the wren from her mossy seat;
Yet hast thou ranged the green forest-dells,
And brought back a treasure of buds and bells.

Thou know'st not the sweetness, by antique song
Breathed o'er the names of that flowery throng;
The woodbine, the primrose, the violet dim,
The lily that gleams by the fountain's brim:
These are old words, that have made each grove
A dreamy haunt for romance and love;
Each sunny bank, where faint odours lie,
A place for the gushing of Poesy.

Thou know'st not the light wherewith fairy lore
Sprinkles the turf and the daisies o'er.
Enough for thee are the dews that sleep
Like hidden gems in the flower-urns deep;
Enough the rich crimson spots that dwell
Midst the gold of the cowslip's perfumed cell:
And the scent by the blossoming sweet-briers shed,
And the beauty that bows the wood-hyacinth's head.

Oh! happy child in thy fawn-like glee!
What is remembrance or thought to thee?
Fill thy bright locks with those gifts of spring,
O'er thy green pathway their colours fling;
Bind them in chaplet and wild festoon —
What if to droop and to perish soon?
Nature hath mines of such wealth — and thou
Never wilt prize its delights as now!

For a day is coming to quell the tone
That rings in thy laughter, thou joyous one!
And to dim thy brow with a touch of care,
Under the gloss of its clustering hair;
And to tame the flash of thy cloudless eyes
Into the stillness of autumn skies;
And to teach thee that grief hath her needful part,
Midst the hidden things of each human heart!

Yet shall we mourn, gentle child! for this?
Life hath enough of yet holier bliss!
Such be thy portion! — the bliss to look
With a reverent spirit, through Nature's book;
By fount, by forest, by river's line,
To track the paths of a love divine;
To read its deep meanings — to see and hear
God in earth's garden — and not to fear!

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. [illegible] — Abonnement-Preis für 26 Nummern [illegible]. [illegible] Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Postämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 2.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Kurze Ueberſicht der neueſten engliſchen Literatur.

(Fortſetzung.)

Einen nicht minder ſchädlichen Einfluß auf Geiſt und Geſchmack übt ferner die Pfennig-Literatur, welche bekanntlich in England erfunden wurde und ſich dort noch am längſten erhalten hat. Damit ſoll keineswegs das Gute derſelben nicht anerkannt werden, das beſonders in der großen und leichten Verbreitung nützlicher und für das tägliche Leben brauchbarer Kenntniſſe liegt, aber dieſer Vortheil wird ſehr durch den Schaden aufgewogen, der daraus erwächſt, daß gerade die wohlfeile Literatur ein Hauptgegenſtand der Speculationswuth geldgieriger Seelen geworden iſt, und daß der eigentliche Zweck des Zuſammentretens der Society for the diffusion of useful knowledge, bei welcher Brougham an der Spitze ſteht, nur bei ſehr wenigen Unternehmungen dieſer Art wirklich erſtrebt und demzufolge auch erreicht wird. Neben dem Penny-Magazine, der Penny-Cyclopaedia, dem Saturday-Magazine, welche mit Recht als die vorzüglichſten Leiſtungen dieſer Art gelten können, tauchten noch eine Menge von Pfennig-Unternehmungen in allen Zweigen der Literatur auf, welche weiter nichts waren als Compilationen aller Art, meiſtens auf gut Glück zuſammengeworfen und mit oft erbärmlichen Holzſchnitten ausgeſtattet. Ihre große Wohlfeilheit ſicherte ihnen einen raſchen Abſatz, und obwohl die Neigung zu denſelben ſich eben ſo raſch wieder verminderte, ſo haben ſich doch manche von ihnen, wie z. B. The Casket, the Penny Novelist (der ganze Romane auf wenigen Bogen für eben ſo viele Groſchen als die Romane Pfunde gekoſtet hatten, brachte), u. A. m. bis jetzt mit ganz leidlichem Gewinne erhalten. — Zwei Uebelſtänden aber, die daraus entſprangen, iſt bis jetzt noch nicht abgeholfen worden. — Der erſte beſteht darin, daß das Publikum nur wohlfeile Bücher kaufen will und die Verleger alſo an Werke, die keinen ausgebreiteten Abſatz ihrer Natur nach haben können, ohne bedeutenden Verluſt nicht mehr das wenden können, was ſie früher daran wandten; der zweite größere und nachhaltigere Uebelſtand jedoch iſt, daß die Menge mehr auf die Maſſe und den äußeren Reichthum des Dargebotenen, als auf den inneren Werth, Geiſt und Gehalt deſſelben ſieht, und daß ſie ſich um geiſtige Schönheit der Form wenig oder gar nicht mehr kümmert. Die Bildung iſt allerdings ungemein geſtiegen und wird in die Breite jedenfalls auch durch dieſe Pfennigmagazine außerordentlich befördert, aber bei der ganzen Richtung unſerer Zeit hören Kunſt und Wiſſenſchaft immer mehr und mehr auf, um ihrer ſelbſt willen cultivirt zu werden, und ihr Ziel iſt wie das aller menſchlichen Beſtrebungen jetzt zuerſt und ganz beſonders — der Gelderwerb.

Die große politiſche Ausbildung, der ſich das engliſche Volk mit Recht erfreut, iſt ebenfalls den ſchönen Wiſſenſchaften und ſelbſt auch den Künſten, wenigſtens der theoretiſchen Behandlung keineswegs förderlich, ſondern tritt ihnen ſtörend und nur zu häufig lähmend in den Weg. Dies ſcheint einem Ausländer, der nur eine generelle oberflächliche Kenntniß englischer Zustände hat, fast unglaublich und er ist weit entfernt bei den Begriffen, die er sich von der Freiheit des Geistes und der Presse in England durch Vorlesungen oder Lectüre bildete, das Gegentheil anzunehmen. — Forscht er indessen genauer und gründlicher den Dingen nach, so wird er bald finden, daß man in Gesellschaften eher seinen [illegible] religiösen als seinen politischen Glauben zu äußern braucht, (denn nach dem Ersteren wird so leicht Niemand fragen, sobald man sich nicht offenbar zu atheistischen Grundsätzen bekennt), und daß die Trennungen der Partheien sich über das ganze Volksleben in allen seinen Erscheinungen, nach allen Richtungen hin erstreckt. — Man muß, wenn auch mit noch so feinen Nuancirungen, Whig oder Tory, Radicaler oder Conservativer sein, und wird nur Gnade vor den Augen seiner Gegner finden. Alles trägt entschieden eine bestimmte politische Farbe und wird nach derselben eben so entschieden beurtheilt; jedes kritische und belletristische Journal bis zu den unbedeutendsten Winkelblättern hinunter [illegible] sich daher strenge ab, und selbst in rein poetischen Beziehungen ist an keine Ansicht zu denken, sondern von den politischen Principien geht jede Beurtheilung aus und Shakspeare selbst würde, wenn er jetzt mit seinen unsterblichen Werken zuerst aufträte, je nachdem er der einen oder der anderen Richtung des Tages huldigte, entschieden [illegible] von den Kritikern der anderen Parthei behandelt werden. — Dazu kommt nun noch die große Freiheit der Presse wie der Regierung, welche nie auf Milderung des [illegible] sinnen läßt, und so geschieht es denn, daß manches aufstrebende und bedeutende Talent schon bei seinem ersten öffentlichen Erscheinen vernichtet und im Keime gleichsam erstickt wird. Es ließe sich dies mit unzähligen Beispielen belegen, aber es genügt hier daran zu erinnern, wie Byron von den englischen Journalen [illegible], auf den die Nation vor Allem [illegible] mit seiner Verachtung [illegible], behandelt wurde, so ist es dem bedauernswürdigen Keats, der eigentlich an den Folgen einer solchen Recension starb, so auch manchem anderen höchst talentvollen Manne ergangen. — Das wahre Genie bricht sich zwar überall im Bewußtsein voller Kraft seine Bahn, aber die schüchterne Muse verbirgt sich scheu und erschreckt, und wagt sich verletzt in ihren jungfräulichen Empfindungen erst nach schweren inneren Kämpfen wieder an das Licht des Tages. — Wie wenig daher ein Fremder auf die kritischen Urtheile einer englischen Zeitschrift geben darf, sobald er nicht alle Verhältnisse genau kennt, wird jeder leicht nach dem Gesagten einsehen. — Will man sich aber durch eine Thatsache überzeugen, so lese man nur die verschiedenen Urtheile, welche über von Raumers Briefe aus England in englischen Journalen gefällt wurden und auch im Auszuge in mehrere deutsche Zeitschriften übergegangen sind.

Die fernere Beantwortung der Frage, wohin sich denn in neuester Zeit das Interesse der Menge hinsichtlich der einzelnen Zweige der Litteratur gewendet habe, ward absichtlich bis jetzt aufgespart, um den Leser durch die eingeschobenen Bemerkungen auf einen höheren und bequemeren Standpunkt für die Uebersicht zu stellen. Wir nehmen sie nun wieder auf, da die Erklärung mancher eigenthümlichen Erscheinung nur aus dem bereits Gesagten erhellt. Die practische Richtung ist — wir sprachen es schon zu Anfang dieser Skizze aus — die vorherrschende und was ihr [illegible] beitritt, daher besonders bearbeitet. — Geschichte wird noch immer studirt, aber man verlangt weit mehr kurze und gedrängte Darstellungen, welche eine bequeme Uebersicht gewähren, als größere Werke tiefer, gründlicher und ausgedehnter Forschung; auch ist in den letzten Jahren nichts Bedeutenderes auf diesem Felde geliefert worden. Dagegen fanden aber die einzelnen historische Gegenstände behandelnden Abtheilungen von Lardners Cyclopaedia großen Beifall und wurden in Menge gekauft. Noch gesuchter waren statistische und nationalökonomische Werke, wie z. B. Babbage's Economy of Manufacture, Lardner on Steam Engine, Baine's History of Cotton Manufacture u. A. m. — Dasselbe Interesse zeigt sich für allgemein verständliche und populäre Schriften aus dem Gebiete der Anthropologie, Diätetik und Heilkunde, so z. B. ist nicht leicht irgend ein Buch so sehr verbreitet und gelesen worden wie Dr. James Clark's Treatise on Consumption, wozu freilich die ausgezeichnet klare und lichtvolle Behandlung des Gegenstandes, der am Allgemeinsten in England verheerenden Krankheit sehr das Ihrige beitrug. — Gern und viel gelesen sind ferner biographische Schriften und besonders Autobiographieen, eben so gute Reisebeschreibungen, so z. B. wurden von Dunn's vortrefflicher [illegible] nahe an 1500, von des blinden aber höchst interessanten Holman's Reise um die Welt, 2000, von Capitain Ros Entdeckungsreise [illegible] und von Capitain Black's ähnlichem Werke mehr als 4000 Exemplaren, in weniger als einem Jahre, obwohl der Preis aller dieser Schriften ein hoher war, verkauft.

Das geringste Interesse zeigt sich dagegen für speculative Philosophie und Theologie; der Verleger eines noch so bedeutenden Werkes der ersteren Gattung kann kaum auf einen Absatz von 100 Exemplaren rechnen, und theologische Schriften, besonders Predigten, mit Ausnahme einiger älteren Werke der berühmtesten Gottesgelehrten werden gar nicht verlangt. —

Die große Revolution, welche ſich vor acht oder zehn Jahren für künſtleriſch reich ausgeſtattete Bücher kund that, hat ebenfalls ſehr merklich abgenommen. Als zu jener Zeit Ackermann mit ſeiner Nachahmung deutſcher Taſchenbücher, dem Forget me not, auftrat, machte dieſer Verſuch ein ungeheures Aufſehen und fand ſo große Theilnahme, daß augenblicklich eine Menge der eleganteſten und gefälligſten Annuals erſchien, welche ſämmtlich einen faſt unglaublichen Abſatz fanden. — Eine Auflage von zehntauſend, ſage zehntauſend Exemplaren, war für ein ſolches Taſchenbuch etwas ganz Gewöhnliches und wurde häufig vollſtändig verkauft; jetzt haben bereits viele derſelben zu erſcheinen aufgehört, denn die Koſten ſind ſo groß, daß ſie erſt durch den Verkauf von 4000 Exemplaren gedeckt werden, ſobald die Ausſtattung nur einigermaßen gut iſt; der Stich einer einzigen Platte wurde zu der Zeit, als die Concurrenz am Stärkſten war, mit 100, ja ſogar mit 150 Lſt. (1000 Rthlr.) bezahlt und ein Honorar von 50 bis 100 Pfund Sterling war durchaus in der Ordnung. — Wie ſehr aber auch die Forderungen des Publicums geſtiegen ſind, ergibt ſich leicht, wenn man nur die erſten Jahrgänge des Forget me not oder Bijou mit Heath's Book of Beauty oder Fishers Book of the Boudoir vergleicht, vom winzigen Sedez ging man zuletzt ſogar zum wohlbeleibten Folioformat über und die Anforderung an die artiſtiſche Ausſtattung iſt in eben dem Maaße geſtiegen, der einzige Almanach, welcher ſich fortwährend auf gleicher Höhe erhalten hat, iſt Friendship's Offering, von dem noch jährlich immer bis 7000 Exemplare Käufer finden.

(Fortſetzung folgt.)

The Country Cousin.

(Continued from our last.)

In the then condition of the country, this was a long and uncertain journey, and during the weary weeks of waiting, M'Arthur lost all patience. In this tedious interim the fearful Emma truly anticipated the result of their appeal to her father, and, with maidenly modesty withdrew herself from every demonstration of her lover's tenderness. He called this prudishness and coldness, and his pride, even more than his love, was offended.

„While Emma, with the resolution of a martyr, secluded herself in her own apartment, M'Arthur, still confined to the house, was limited to the society of Anna. The vigour of his spirit returned with his improving health, and then he found that her gay and reckless spirit harmonized far better with his natural temper, than the timid disposition of her sister.

„Anna's beauty was more brilliant, her conversation more lively and taking, and — have I prepared you for it, my dear girls? — when the parental fiat arrived, the peremptory, unchangeable, no, it was received by him with indifference, I am afraid with a secret satisfaction. Poor Emma! the cold, precise Emma, fainted in her sister's arms; and for many successive days she seemed hovering between life and death. To disobey, or evade, or attempt to soften her father's will, was to her impossible; but to endure it, appeared equally impossible. She must suffer, might die, but would submit.

„At first she dreaded the remonstrances of her lover, then she expected them, and expressed this expectation to Anna, first in broken sentences and then in more significant looks; but Anna made no reply to her words or questioning glances. She loved Emma better than anything but — M'Arthur! She hung over her with devoted tenderness, and, I doubt not, with a self-reproach she could not stifle.

„By slow degrees Emma recovered her self-control, and, armed with all the fortitude she could gather or assume, she prepared to meet her lover's gaze — that gaze was altered, the lover her lover no longer. How sure and rapid is the intelligence of true affection! A short, slight observation proved to her that M'Arthur's love was transferred — transferred to her sister. The infidelity of the two beings she most loved on earth, almost broke her heart; but, as the most touching of writers has said of the sweetest manifestation of character, the „temper of Emma was like an Aeolian harp whose sounds die away in the tempest, and are heard again in every gentle breeze." She said nothing, she looked nothing; she was much alone, and her troubled spirit found rest where it is only to be found in every modification of human misery, in those high communings that are on the spiritual mount, far above the atmosphere of mortal passions. Anna felt the rebuke of Emma's silence and downcast eye far more than she would the gentlest even of reproaches — an involuntary look. She accused herself, she wept, she fell at her sister's feet, she offered to abjure her lover for ever. Emma folded her in her arms, and it was long before either could speak or listen; but when Emma could utter her resolves gently, softly, tenderly, as they were spoken, it was evident they were unalterable. „That bond, Anna, is severed for ever; we are sisters, our God has united us by this tie, our sin alone can destroy or weaken it; it has been rudely jarred, but it is not harmed — is it Anna?" Anna only replied by a more fervent embrace, a freer burst of tears. Emma was long silent, but when she at last spoke, no one would have detected in the tones of her voice a feeling stronger than sisterly tenderness.

„During their interview, Anna confessed that the inconstant, but really ardent, and I must say really honourable lover —

„Oh! say nothing in his favour! interrupted, in one voice, the indignant young auditors.

„Ah! my dear girls," replied Mrs. Tudor, „we learn, as we go on in life, to look far more in sorrow than in anger, on the transgressions of our fellow beings; we know better how to estimate human infirmity and the power of temptation; but I have no time to moralise. I will only beg you to remember, when you have still more cause for indignation against poor M'Arthur, that he was then scarce twenty-two, that he was spoiled by fortune, by admiring friends, and by that chief spoiler, a doting, widowed mother: and, lest you should be too harsh, let me tell you, that he has since redeemed, by a virtuous life, the follies, aye, the sins of his youth.

„Where was I? Oh! on the point of telling you that Anna confessed M'Arthur had urged an immediate marriage, without a reference to her father, which, he maintained, experience had taught them would be useless. „The military events of the day," he said, „indicated that the British forces would soon be with-drawn from  town, and his last letters from his commanding officer, intimated that he would then probably be transferred to the southern army."

„He intreated, with all the vehemence of love, that Anna would give him a right to claim her, as his wife, when the disastrous war should be over. Anna had half consented to sacrifice her filial duty. Against this Emma remonstrated most earnestly. She adjured her sister not to provoke the wrath of Heaven, so sure speedily to overtake filial disobedience. She saw M'Arthur; and, with the unfaltering, and almost irresistible voice of determined virtue, intreated him not to tempt her sister to this departure from filial duty.

„,But of what use,' asked M'Arthur, ‚will be an appeal to your father, when his old prejudices will be all justified by,' his voice sunk to an almost inaudible tone, ‚by the demerit that none but an angel would forgive?'

„,Emma hesitated for a few moments, and then said, with decision, ‚I will go to him myself.'

„,You, Emma! You cannot, you shall not; there are a thousand dangers!'

„,There are none that need to deter me. I will go. My father, though terrible to his enemies and stern to the world, never denied me anything that I asked myself from him. I am sure I can make such representations that he will give me his consent. I will hear nothing more from you, — no, I will not hear your thanks till I return; provide a proper guard to attend me as far as your lines extend, I shall have nothing to fear after I get among our own people."

„M'Arthur would have poured out his admiration and gratitude, but Emma fled from it all, and hastily prepared herself for her romantic expedition. A small detachment of the regular army, and a large body of militia, to which her father was attached, had approached within fifty miles of  town; but for a young girl to traverse this distance in the unsettled state of the country, required all the spirit that a noble purpose inspires, and all the courage of heaven-born innocence. Poor Emma endured manifold fears, and encountered some dangers, but this detail I reserve for some other time. At the expiration of the third day she arrived safely at the American quarters.

„When her father's first surprise and joy at seeing her was over, she communicated, with her own sweet grace and earnestness, the purpose of her journey. No words can ever describe her father's rage. I would not repeat to you, if I could, his horrible language. He commanded her, on pain of his everlasting displeasure, never again to mention the name of M'Arthur. He looked upon his daughters as bewitched by a spell of the arch enemy. He said M'Arthur's conduct was just what he should have expected from an English scoundrel, from any, or all of the miscreants. Every breath that Emma dared to utter, swelled the torrent of his rage. He swore to revenge her wrongs, to avenge his polluted home; and, finally, he concluded by pronouncing curses, loud and deep, and as poor Emma thought, interminable on Anna, if she did not immediately break off all connexion with M'Arthur, and abjure him forever.

„Emma trembled and wept. She knew how unrelenting was her father's determination, and her whole anxiety now was to save her sister from those terrible curses, as fearful to the dutiful Emma as the wrath of Heaven. She set out on her return without any delay. A variety of circumstances protracted her journey. When she arrived at the point where M'Arthur's guard was to meet her, no guard was there, and her progress was arrested by an American officer, a friend of her father's, who absolutely forbade her proceeding. The British, he said, were daily contracting their lines. There were almost hourly skirmishes between small detachments of soldiers, and nothing could be more perilous than for a young woman to traverse even the short distance that remained to her home. She was conducted to a comfortable lodging in a kind family, but no kindness or security could tranquilize her troubled and anxious mind. She knew too well the impetuous temper of M'Arthur to hope he would have patience to await her return, and she feared that her light-hearted, reckless, sanguine sister, would, trusting implicitly to her success, yield to the importunities of her lover. For three weeks she was compelled to endure these apprehensions; to endure the thought that she was freighted with those curses that were to fall on her sister's head like the withering vengeance of Heaven.

„At last she was permitted to proceed, and she arrived at  town without the slightest molestation or accident. As soon as she entered it, she saw that the aspect of things was entirely changed. The military array that had given to the quiet scene a temporary life and bustle, had vanished. The street was as quiet as a sabbath morning. A few well known faces appeared peeping from the doors and windows. Emma did not stop to ask any explanation, she did not even see their welcoming nods and smiles; and though an old man, the walking chronicle of the town, quickened his pace towards her, as if he would be the first to communicate what tidings there were, she hurried her horse onward. Her home was on the outskirts of the town. When she reached it, her servant girl met her at the gate, and broke forth in exclamation of — Emma knew not what. She cast one wild glance around the parlour, screamed Anna's name, and flew to her apartment. The one fear that she had gone with M'Arthur prevailed over every other. She opened her chamber door, she was there, buried in her shawl, and weeping aloud. At the sight of Emma she uttered an exclamation of surprise and joy, and her voice dying away in bitter grief, ‚Oh! Emma, my sister,' she murmured, ‚he is gone, my husband is gone!' ‚Your husband!" cried Emma, and it was long, long, my dear girls, before she uttered another word. It was as she had apprehended. M'Arthur had been impatient of her delay, and had persuaded Anna to a private marriage, only one week after Emma had left them. Emma did not reproach her sister, she would not have added a father's weight to the inevitable consequences of her rashness. These consequences it was now her anxious care to avert. She only communicated to Anna so much of her father's reply as expressed his firm negative. This was fearful enough to Anna; but as her marriage had been strictly private, she hoped to keep it from his knowledge, and Emma, to shield her sister, prepared herself, for the first time in her life, for evasion and concealment.

„There was now no obstacle to her father's return. He came home the next day, and his wrath against the enemy grew at every trace of their footsteps. He suspected nothing, but he was for some time less kind and frank to his daughters than formerly. He never alluded to their guest by words, but, when anything having the most distant relation to his residence with them occurred, he would contract his brow, become suddenly pale, bite his lips, and indicate, in ways too obvious to his gentle daughters, that his hatred burst as fiercely as ever.

„Sally, the servant, made her appearance before him one day in a holiday suit, with a gay locket dangling from her neck. ‚Ah! Sally' said Blunt, ‚where did you get that pretty finery in these hard times?'

„The girl knew her master's infirmity, she saw the colour mount to her young ladies' cheeks, and she stammered out, as if she had stolen it, ‚Captain M'Arthur gave it to me, Sir.' Blunt tore it from her neck, and crushed it under his foot.

„Some weeks after this startling demonstration of his unabated hatred, and several months after M'Arthur's departure, a little crippled boy, who lived on an adjoining farm, came into Blunt's parlour with a pretty flute sticking in his hat-band. ‚Ah! Jerry, my boy,' said the old man kindly, for, like the lion, he was tender to all small and defenceless creatures, ‚Ah! Jerry, that is the little flute that makes such pleasant music for us of these moonlight evenings, and that piped such a merry welcome to us the day we came home, is it? let's see it, Jerry.' Jerry gave it to him. Emma and Anna trembled. ‚Oh!' said Jerry, ‚if you could only have heard the captain play it, Sir; he gave it to me for finding Miss Anna's ring.'

„The poor boy's flute was instantly crackling in the flames, and a fiery, suspicious, questioning glance darted at Anna. It fell on the ring — the fatal wedding ring. Oh! my dear girls, I cannot describe the scene that followed. All Blunt's honest feelings were wounded, all his fierce passions excited. Emma, fearless for herself, wept and interceded for her sister; but her voice could no more be heard than the wail of an infant amidst the raging of the ocean. Anna was cast out from his door, commanded never again to enter his presence, every name of dishonour was heaped upon her, and, while she lay on his door step, fainting in her sister's arms — for Emma, in spite of his commands, supported her — the last sounds she heard were her father's curses.

„Emma watched over Anna's fate with more than a sister's love. She procured a humble, but decent lodging for her, and expended her youth and strength in secretly working to obtain a pittance for her support. Blunt had peremptorily forbidden her ever to impart one shilling of his substance to his discarded child. Obedience to this command was the hardest of all Emma's trials; but she held fast to her integrity, and was compelled to see daily delicacies that she loathed, to live in overflowing plenty, without daring to give a crumb that fell from her father's table to her poor sister.

„Three months after Anna was driven from her father's house, she gave birth to a child, a boy, and, as if to fill up the measure of her sorrows, he was born blind. The poor, suffering, crushed mother, wore away her life in watching over her stricken boy, in sorrow for the past, and despair for the future. Five weary years were passed without one word of intelligence from her husband. Newspapers were then rare, and few found their way to * * * town, and in those few Emma, who diligently inquired, could never ascertain that any mention was made of M'Arthur. He might have perished in battle, might have returned to England, or, worse than all, might have forgotten his wife. Time had no tendency to soften the heart of Amos Blunt, time only cut in deeper the first decisions of his iron will. His property, though necessarily impaired by the war, was still far superior to his neighbours'; Emma was to inherit it all, and Emma, the dutiful and still lovely Emma was sought by many an earnest suitor. But she was alike deaf to all. She had no heart for anything but duty to her father and love to her sister, and the tenderest love to the little blind boy. For them she toiled, and with the inexhaustible ingenuity of affection, she devised for him every pleasure of which his darkened childhood was susceptible. She contrived toys to delight his ear. She sang for him for hours together. Every body in the country round loved Miss Emma, and the little rangers of flood and field brought her wild fruit and sweet flowers for her favourite.

„The child seemed to be infected with his mother's melancholy. He would lie on the floor for hours in most unnatural inactivity; but when he heard Emma's step, his feet danced, his hands were outstretched, his lips were raised, every limb, every feature welcomed her, all but that sparkling gem that most brightly and piercingly spoke the feelings of the soul. Emma would take him from his drooping mother's side, and try by exercise, and the free enjoyment of the genial air, to win the colour to his cheek, but alas! in vain.

„Finally, my dear girls, that power, at whose touch the sternest bend, laid his crushing hand on Blunt. A slow, but mortal disease seized him; he knew he must die. He had long before made his will, and given everything to Emma, but on condition that she never should transfer one penny of his property in any form to her sister. If she violated this condition, his estate was to be divided into one hundred dollar annuities, to be given to such survivors of the war as had served in the revolutionary army from the beginning of the contest, and could give sufficient testimony of their having killed each ten Englishmen.

„Among Emma's most constant and heartily devoted lovers was one Harry Lee. He was the favourite of her father. He had fought and had triumphed beside him; and to give Emma to Harry before he died, was the father's most earnest wish. On this subject he became every day more and more importunate. At first, Emma, who really felt a strong friendship for Lee, only said, ‚Father, Harry knows I cannot love him.‘

„‚What does that signify?‘ the old man would reply; ‚Harry knows you say that, to be sure; but he is willing to take you without it; a dutiful child will make a dutiful wife; and I tell Harry love is nothing but a jack-o'-lantern business.‘

„When this conversation was renewed in every form that could express that this was Blunt's strongest and almost only earthly wish, it occurred to Emma it was possible that, by a sacrifice of her feelings in this affair, she might induce her father to relent towards Anne. This was the hardest sacrifice a woman could make — but she was a noble creature.“

„Ah! grandmamma,“ exclaimed Isabel, „too, too noble — I cannot believe you are telling us a true story — I cannot believe that any woman so wronged as Emma, would have made such exertions, such sacrifices.“

„I believe it,“ said Lucy Atwell, her face kindling with an expression of fervent feeling, „I know there has been one woman capable of any virtue — my mother,“ she added, dropping her face on Mrs. Tudor's lap.

We were all affected at this involuntary tribute to her mother, for whom she was still in deep mourning, and it was some moments before Mrs. Tudor proceeded, and then in a faltering voice; „It is, in spite of your unbelief, Isabel, ‚an o'er true tale.‘ Emma prepared herself for a scene, and then, her face beaming with her celestial spirit, and her voice sustained by firm resolve, she told her father that she would comply with his wishes, that she would marry Harry Lee, if he would provide by will for her sister, and revoke those terrible curses that had already blasted her innocent offspring with blindness, and were consuming her life. The old man heard her without interruption, and without reply; a deadly paleness overspread his countenance, large drops of sweat rolled from his face, his breathing was difficult, and it seemed that the terrible conflict of unexpressed feeling must snap the worn thread of life. Emma was dreadfully alarmed; she dared not then urge him further but used every means to tranquilise and revive him.

„For two days these convulsive agitations continued, more or less violent. He spoke not one word to Emma, he did not even look at her; but still there was something in the gentle touch of his hand as he received the cordials she gave, that kept her hope alive — but just alive, for the physician had pronounced him dying. He revived, as is usual before the last struggle, and, looking Emma, for the first time since she had opened on the forbidden topic, full in the face, he bade her bring him a certain sealed packet from his desk. She obeyed. It was his will. With his trembling hands he tore it to fragments, and said, as he did so, ‚The law will do right to you — both.‘ Emma fell on her knees; ‚Oh, dear father‘ she cried, ‚say you forgive her.‘

„‚I can't, Emma; but I have — I have prayed God to forgive her; now, my good child, pray for your father.‘ Emma began that sacred petition, that blessed essence of all prayer, ‚Our Father,‘ and her parent, in a low dying whisper, repeated the words after her. When she came to the clause, ‚forgive us our trespasses as we‘ — ‚Stop,‘ he cried, in his own energetic voice, for then he, for the first time, understood the full import of those words, ‚stop! that I may not say.‘ At this moment Anna, the poor, disobedient, discarded, suffering child, rushed with her boy in her arms to the bedside. She knelt by Emma, she stretched out her hands, and her lips trembled with the prayer she could not utter. Pale, emaciated, her form attenuated, her eye sunken — was this the bright, blooming, gay Anna? To her father's eye she looked heaven-stricken, and indeed accursed. He groaned from his inmost soul. ‚Oh! I do forgive, but,‘ as he closed his eyes, ‚I never will forget;‘ and thus divided between the obdurate passions of earth, and the victorious spirit of Heaven, he heaved his last breath.“

Mrs. Tudor paused, her auditors were silent, appalled by the history of passions too stern to have come within the scope of their young experience, or even their imaginations. Isabel was the first to resume her interest in the progress of the story, and to revert to M'Arthur, who, in his character of an English officer, had peculiar claims in her eyes. „Grandmamma,“ she said, „I hope we have got over the dreadful part of the story, through the thick of it; Anna must die, that I see — poor, poor girl! I am sure she suffered more than she sinned — and I foresee how it will end, M'Arthur will return, find his wife dead, and marry Emma.“

„But,“ said Lucy,“ that was impossible, you know, after her promise to marry Harry Lee.“

„Oh! he was a generous fellow; I dare say he gave that up, and it would be a different case, you know, after poor Anna died. Ah! I know now how it will all be. Grandmamma began by saying it was a ghost story, and the only one she ever heard she fully believed. ‚Alas! poor ghost!‘ we did all forget thee. Anna's ghost appeared to Emma, and bade her marry M'Arthur, or perhaps the old man's — oh! I should hate to see him come back.“

„Well, my dear Isabel, if you are not more interested in your own speculations than in my story, I will proceed; and, in the first place, I assure you the old man's spirit never revisited the earth. I am a little astonished that you should, for a moment, think M'Arthur worthy of the saintly Emma; but, since you have such a predilection for him, I will let you know your instincts do not entirely err. He did afterwards become all that I — that — that his mother ever hoped of him.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. No 3.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. K. M.

Kurze Ueberſicht
der neueſten engliſchen Literatur.

(Fortſetzung.)

Für alle dieſe Unternehmungen, ſo wie überhaupt für das ganze Triebwerk der engliſchen Literatur, bildet London den Mittelpunkt, wenn es auch andererſeits nicht in intellectueller Hinſicht jene Macht der Centraliſation beſitzt, wie ſie Paris über Frankreich ausübt, denn in manchen Punkten halten ihm hier Oxford und Cambridge und vorzüglich Edinburg die Wage. — Wegen ſeiner regelmäßigen Verbindungen mit allen übrigen Theilen des Landes bleibt es indeſſen der große Stapelplatz der Literatur, und da hier Alles in dieſer Hinſicht zuſammenſtrömt, ſo übt es fortwährend auch ein ſo großes Uebergewicht aus, daß man keineswegs in einen Irrthum verfällt, wenn man von ſeinen Erſcheinungen auf die Richtungen ſchließt welche die Intelligenz überhaupt in Großbritannien genommen hat. — Hieher haben ſich denn auch die meiſten Schriftſteller gezogen, welche ihren Lebensunterhalt allein ihrer Feder verdanken; die Zahl derſelben ſoll ſich nach einer Durchſchnittsannahme auf 1000 belaufen, von denen 700 mit Zeitſchriften in Verbindung ſind. Daß die Wenigſten unter ihnen ſorgenfrei leben können von dem Ertrage ihrer Arbeiten, kann man ſich leicht denken, und wenn auch Einzelnen ein glänzendes Loos zugefallen iſt, wie z. B. dem bekannten Boz, der ſich gerade jetzt eines monatlichen Einkommens von wenigſtens 1000 Pf. ([illegible] Rthlr.) erfreut, ſo hat doch die Mehrzahl mit Mangel und Dürftigkeit zu kämpfen, und es gehört noch mehr Glück als Talent dazu, um ſich mit Vortheil bemerkbar und beliebt zu machen. Ebenſo iſt es in der neueſten Zeit auch bei den höchſten Ständen Mode geworden in die Reihe der Schriftſteller zu treten; Lords und Ladies wetteifern mit einander den Büchermarkt zu bereichern, gewiſſe Annuals werden z. B. allein von den Mitgliedern de la haute volaille (wie Jener den hohen Adel irrthümlich ſtatt la haute volée nannte) mit letter press *) verſehen. Wie aber dieſe vornehmen Leute das mitunter betreiben, davon möge hier zum Schluß ein ſcherzhaftes Pröbchen mitgetheilt werden, das wir, wie ſo manche ſtatiſtiſche Angabe in dieſen Zeilen ebenfalls dem geiſtreichen Verfaſſer der great Metropolis verdanken.

Zu einem unternehmenden und angeſehenen Buchhändler kam eines Tages ein edler Lord mit den Worten: „Ich möchte mit Ihnen wegen eines Buches einig werden, das ich herauszugeben beabſichtige."

Das Antlitz des Bibliopolen ward ſonnenhell ſchon bei der bloßen Idee der Ehre, das Werk eines Edelmannes vom erſten Range in die Welt zu befördern, wie er ſich ſpäter in ſeinen Ankündigungen ausdrückte. Es wird mich äußerſt glücklich machen Ihr Verleger zu werden, Mylord, antwortete er mit devoteſter Verbeugung.

---

*) Der techniſche Ausdruck für den eigentlichen oder weſentlichen Text in ſolchen Büchern.

— Sie wiſſen aber noch nicht welchen Gegenſtand es behandelt, Herr Krebs, verſetzte der edle Lord.

— Ei darauf kommt es gar nicht an, entgegnete Herr Krebs, was aus Ihrer Feder fließt und Ihren Namen trägt, gefällt gewiß.

— Sie ſchmeicheln mir, bemerkte der Lord.

— Gewiß nicht, das verſichere ich Euer Lordſchaft, erwiederte Herr Krebs mit noch tieferen Bücklingen als vorher.

— Es betrifft den letzten Krieg.

Mylord — rief nun Herr Krebs, faſt im Begriff ſeiner Lordſchaft um den Hals zu fallen, wenn es ſeine äußerſte Devotion nur verſtattet hätte — Mylord, ein vortrefflicher Gegenſtand; es giebt keinen beſſeren auf der ganzen Welt.

— Aber ich verlange viel für das Manuſcript.

— Mylord haben zu befehlen, und ich bin mit dem größten Vergnügen bereit.

— Das Werk wird zwei Octavbände füllen, und der Preis für das Verlagsrecht iſt [illegible] ([illegible])

— Zweitauſend Pfund, Mylord! — wiederholte Herr Krebs mit etwas verlängertem Antlitz und verändertem Ausdruck. — Das iſt viel, Mylord, ſehr viel — doch — fuhr er nach kurzem Beſinnen fort — Sie ſollen ſie haben, denn ein Werk aus Ihrer Feder und mit Ihrem Namen auf dem Titel wird gewiß ganz vortrefflich gehn.

— So will ich Ihnen denn morgen meinen Anwalt herſenden, um einen ſchriftlichen Contract aufzuſetzen.

— Sehr wohl, es wird mich freuen den Herrn bei mir zu ſehen.

— Guten Morgen, Herr Krebs.

— Guten Morgen, Mylord, antwortete Herr Krebs, ſich ſo tief verbeugend, daß er mit ſeiner Stirn faſt den [illegible] berührte.

Am andern Tage ſtellte ſich der Anwalt pünktlich ein; der Contract wurde in aller Form aufgeſetzt und unterſchrieben. — Dann überreichte Herr Krebs dem Geſchäftsmanne einen guten Wechſel auf tauſend Pf. und ſagte: Jetzt, mein Herr, bitte ich um Seiner Lordſchaft Manuſcript, damit ich den Druck gleich beginnen kann.

— Das Manuſcript, — verſetzte der Anwalt ganz erſtaunt — das Manuſcript! Haben denn Se. Lordſchaft Ihnen nicht geſagt, daß Sie es noch gar nicht angefangen haben?

Herr Krebs wurde ſo ſchneeweiß wie der [illegible] der von ihm verlegten Bücher, und war nahe daran in Ohnmacht zu fallen. Endlich erholte er ſich und ſtammelte: Ich hatte geglaubt und verſtanden, das Manuſcript ſei druckfertig.

— Das iſt ein kleiner Irrthum, entgegnete der Rechtsfreund. Im Kopfe haben es Se. Lordſchaft allerdings fertig, aber auf dem Papiere noch nicht.

— Ei! ſehr ſchlimm, ſehr ſchlimm für mich, entgegnete Herr Krebs.

— Alles, was man dabei thun kann, iſt, Se. Lordſchaft anzutreiben, bemerkte der Anwalt.

— Und wie lange wird es dauern, ehe es fertig ſein wird, — fragte Herr Krebs ängſtlich.

— Das weiß ich nicht, antwortete Jener trocken.

Herr Krebs wußte ſich vor Verlegenheit nicht zu laſſen. — Der Anwalt gab das Verſprechen, dem edlen Lord mitzutheilen, wie ängſtlich ſich der Herr Verleger nach dem Manuſcripte ſehne, und empfahl ſich dann, während Jener kaum im Stande war, das Abſchiedscompliment zu erwiedern.

Am nächſten Morgen kam ein Billet von dem vornehmen Schriftſteller, deß Inhalts: Herr Krebs möge ihm alle Schriften und Briefe ſenden, die er über den letzten Krieg beſitze. — Ein Freund des Lords war der Ueberbringer und wartete auf die Antwort.

— Was ſoll das bedeuten? rief Herr Krebs, über und über roth, als er den Brief las.

— Seine Lordſchaft wünſchen Alles zu haben, was Sie über den letzten Krieg beſitzen, antwortete der Ueberbringer.

— Ich habe gar nichts, gar nichts, — ſtotterte Herr Krebs haſtig — ich habe nichts der Art [illegible].

— Nun, ſo werden Sie die Güte haben, es von Anderen zu leihen — erwiederte Jener kalt.

— Was wollen Se. Lordſchaft damit? fragte der beſtürzte Buchhändler.

— Nun, das Buch ſchreiben, — lautete die Antwort.

Herrn Krebs Beſtürzung war ungeheuer; er hatte ſicher darauf gerechnet, daß das Werk die Frucht [illegible] eigenen, durch officielle Documente unterſtützten Bemerkungen und Beobachtungen des Verfaſſers ben wurde, und nun kam es heraus, daß dieſer nichts als eine Compilation zu liefern gedachte. — Indeſſen, was ſollte er thun, der Handel war abgeſchloſſen, das Geld ſchon ſo gut wie bezahlt, und die Katze im Sacke gekauft, — ja die Katze war ſogar noch nicht einmal im Sacke, als er ſie erkaufte. Er mußte alſo gute Miene zum böſen Spiel machen, und ſchleppte auch demgemäß Alles zuſammen, was er nur aufſtöbern konnte. — Der edle Lord übergab den ganzen Apparat, ſammt einigen perſönlichen Reminiſcenzen und den officiellen Documenten, die er beſaß, einem literäriſchen Freunde, und bat dieſen, das bewußte Buch abzufaſſen. — Die Vollendung desſelben verzögerte ſich noch ſechs Monate, und da mittlerweile einige andere gute Schriften über den Gegenſtand erſchienen, und das Werk ſelbſt ohne alle Bedeutung war, ſo litt Herr Krebs einen ſo ungeheuren Schaden dabei, daß er ſogar noch eine beträchtliche Summe eingebüßt haben würde, ſelbſt, wenn er das Manuſcript, ſtatt für 1500 Pfund Sterling, für gar Nichts erhalten hätte.

Indem wir dieſe allgemeinen Bemerkungen ſchließen, um zu den einzelnen Erſcheinungen überzugehen, müſſen wir bemerken, daß unſere Einleitung bisher mehr einem merkantiliſchen als einem literäriſchen Berichte glich. Der Leſer wird ſich aber bald überzeugen, wie nöthig es war, jetzt, wo das Geld der Haupthebel, ſelbſt der Intelligenz, iſt, auch dieſe Seite zu beleuchten, um ihn auf den rechten Standpunkt zu verſetzen, von welchem aus es ihm weit leichter werden muß, die Grundurſachen der Richtung und Darſtellung, welche ſich bei den verſchiedenen Zweigen ſo verſchiedenartig offenbart, in das Auge zu faſſen und zu beurtheilen.

(Fortſetzung folgt ſpäter.)

The Country Cousin,

by Miss Sedgwick.

(Concluded from our last.)

„He was, as he had expected to be, transferred to the army of the south. The ardour of his attachment to his wife was unabated for a long time; but he received no communications from her, and his own letters and remittances never reached her. After the lapse of two years the impression made by his short intercourse with Anne, in some measure faded. He distinguished himself in his military career, was loaded with favours by his commanding officer, he associated exclusively with the high born, gay, and, I fear, in too many cases, unprincipled young men of the army, and his own natural pride and self-indulgence were fostered; and — it must be told — he looked back on his humble alliance with mortification and deep regret. He never communicated it to a human being. At last came that monitor, so friendly, so necessary to human virtue, that messenger of Heaven — sickness. For months he was confined and wasting away under the effects of the fever of the southern climate, and it was not till about the period of the peace that he had health and strength to execute a resolution he had formed and cherished in the salutary solitude of his sick-room.

„A few weeks after Amos Blunt's death, M'Arthur, mounted on a fine, but way-worn steed, reined him up, at an inn, a few miles distant from  town. It was late, on a mild star-lit evening. Two or three men were sitting in the porch of the inn. His intention was to make some inquiries in relation to his wife's family, but he could not utter them. He merely asked, ‚How far is it to  town?' ‚Five miles and better.' He did summon courage to add, ‚How far to Amos Blunt's? he lives, I think a little up this side of the town?' ‚Yes; it is four miles to Amos Blunt's, to where he did live; the old man is dead, but you'll find some of the family there.'

„M'Arthur turned his horse's head abruptly, and spurred him on, afraid to hear another word; and he hurried him forward, or slackened his pace, as his hopes or fears prevailed. His mind was overshadowed with dark apprehensions; the lapse of years had given a new colouring to life, the pangs of awakened conscience a new aspect to his past career. He now looked, with something bordering on contempt, on his boyish, imprudent, and inconstant passion, and with deep anguish on his rash marriage and criminal neglect.

He felt that he deserved the judgments of Heaven; he believed he was going to receive them.

„His road gradually wound up a mountain. The feeble star-light was shut out by the towering pines, the lighter beeches, and the struggling dwarf oaks, that, with all their summer's growth of foliage, overhung the path. The woods were alive with the autumn insects, whose monotonous notes, associated as they are with the first fading and decay of nature, are always sad. To M'Arthur they seemed creatures of evil omen, and a whip-poor-will, who had lingered behind his tribe, for it was now September, and was perched on a blasted and riven oak, repeating his piercing plaint, was a bird of evil augury to his disturbed imagination. What sweet intimations these ‚wood notes wild' would have conveyed to the sense of a returning happy and hopeful lover! and how true is it that the mind does not receive, but gives its impressions to the outward world! When M'Arthur attained the summit of the mountain, the wide amphitheatre in which  town lay, was outspread before him. The waning moon had just risen above the horizon, but was veiled by a mass of dense clouds, their silvered edges just giving the intimation of her sweet presence. Above the moon there was a singular illumination of the atmosphere, resembling a column of golden mist, now streaming up like the most brilliant northern lights, and then fading and melting away in the clear depths of ether. The phenomenon was beautiful, but it was singular, and, to M'Arthur it appeared unnatural and portentous; so apt is man, even in his misery, to magnify himself, and so quick is his conscience to interpret and apply the manifestations of nature in the glorious heavens, as if they were a 'hand-writing on the wall.'

„Every variety of evil that could have happened to his wife, by turns offered itself to M'Arthur's imagination; but the fear that she might be dead, that she had passed the barrier whence the voice of forgiveness and love never comes, was stronger than any other. As he proceeded, the moon rose triumphantly above the clouds, and lent him her clear and steady light. He passed a rustic bridge, a sudden turn in the road, and mounted a little knoll that brought him in full view of Blunt's house. There it stood, just as he had left it, an irregular and spacious building, with its wealth of outhouses and its court yard, sparingly dotted with a few lilacs. Not a single 'little beam' of cheering, hope-inspiring light streamed from any of its windows; all was dark and sullen.

„Before M'Arthur reached the house, he had to pass a spot associated with his tenderest recollections, and now with his saddest fears. It was a smooth green area of about forty yards in breadth, level to the road-side, but elsewhere enclosed by a steep rocky bank, thickly set with maples, beech, and lime trees. Two old and magnificent elms sheltered this little sanctuary from the road. Amos Blunt, rough as he was, blind and deaf to all the beauties and appeals of nature, at some soft moment, had his heart touched by the genius of this sacred spot, and there he had said he would bury his dead. There M'Arthur had often been with the two sisters to visit their mother's grave; the sight of her grave inspired them with tenderness unmingled with gloom, and there they had often talked with him of death, as young persons, my dear girls, talk of it, to whom it is a matter of sentiment, not of experience.

„M'Arthur felt a coldness and shivering come over him, as he approached the little wicket gate, where he knew he could see distinctly every mound of earth. 'I will not look that way', he said to himself, 'I cannot bear to learn my fate here'. But he could not command his eye. It turned by irresistible instinct, and was fixed. He saw a figure approaching a grave, that, dim as the light was, appeared newly made. The figure had the height and movement of his wife. It was enveloped in a winding-sheet and, having reached the grave, laid down beside it, and rested its head on it. M'Arthur's fears now all vanished, for they had sprung, not from cowardice, but affection. He was not superstitious, all the habits of his mind and his life were opposed to superstition; and his first impression was that he was tricked by his sickly fancy, that his gloomy pensiveness, the lateness of the hour, the associations of the place, and his coward conscience had conjured up the apparition before him. He dismounted from his horse, turned his eyes from the figure to assure himself, by each familiar and sensible appearance, of the reality of the scene, and then, resolved not to be the sport of idle fancies, again turned towards the grave.

„The figure was still extended there. He approached so near as to discern the features. It was no illusion of his disordered imagination—the death-stricken cheek laid on the glittering and broken sods. It was the form of his wife, such as she was at parting, save the mortal paleness, and the signet of age that sad thought had stamped on her brow. Her face wore the peace and serenity of death, without its sternness; her eyelashes rested on her cheek as if the lids had fallen naturally in sleep. There was nothing of the rigidity of death about the figure; even the winding-sheet in which it was enfolded, had nothing of the precision of the drapery of death, but was wrapped about the form with a careless grace. One arm was thrown over the grave, as if encircling some loved object, with a consciousness of possession and security, and on the finger gleamed the wedding ring! M'Arthur at first gazed at the apparition with a critical eye. Incredulity was roused, and reason questioned, revolted from being duped by a mere phantasm of the brain; but as he gazed, as he marked each well remembered feature, his incredulity was overcome, his reason assented to the convictions of his senses, and yielding himself to the power of this awful visitation from the dead, he prostrated himself on the earth, and breathed a prayer he could not utter, that Heaven would vouchsafe to interpret the purpose of this spectral apparition to his senses. Again he lifted his head and looked at that silent, immoveable figure. In the eagerness of excited feelings, he drew nearer to it, he knelt beside it, he bent over it, and gazed till the awe and shrinking from a preternatural appearance gave place to a gush of tenderness and bitter grief and broken ejaculation to the spirit of his wife.

„At the sound of his impassioned voice, the figure became instinct with life, the blood mounted to her lips and cheeks, and Anna, his living Anna, stood before him. Her eye glanced wildly around, then fell on the new made grave, then fixed on her husband, and, uttering a shriek, expressive of her alarmed and uncertain feelings, she sunk senseless in his arms. She was living—he might hear the accents of forgiveness and love from her lips, and, nerved by this blessed assurance, he bore her in his arms to her father's house. Emma, first awakened by his footsteps, was at the door.

„I need not, my dear girls, detain you with any unnecessary particulars. The grave, as you have no doubt conjectured, was the little blind boy's. He had been interred there the preceding day; and his poor mother, exhausted by many nights' watchings, had in a deep sleep risen, wrapped the sheet over her night dress, and, led by her feverish dreams, had gone to the grave over which her imagination and affections hovered.“

We were all silent for a few moments, partly absorbed in the pleasure of finding the story turn out better for the happiness of all concerned than we had expected, and partly—I must confess it—disappointed that it was, after all, no ghost story. Isabel, as usual, was the first to speak. „And M'Arthur, grand-mamma,“ said she, „was M'Arthur always afterwards faithful and kind?“

„Always, my dear Isabel. He took his wife to England, where she was honourably received by his mother, and she has since been ever tenderly cherished.“

„And Emma,“ asked Lucy, „the sweet, excelling, sacrificing Emma, of course she married as she promised?“

„Yes, my dear girl, she did so; and in her growing affection for her excellent husband, she found what is not always the consequence of a first and romantic passion, a stable and tranquil happiness.“

„But,“ asked Isabel, „what did Anna—what could she do, to testify her gratitude to that angelic sister?"

„There are feelings, Isabel, for which there is no adequate expression, but Anna manifested in every mode their relative condition permitted her, love and gratitude; and Emma was satisfied, for when a sudden reverse of fortune befell her, and was followed by a mortal sickness, she bequeathed her only daughter to her sister, in the reposing confidence that she would share an equal care, an almost equal love with her own child."

Isabel looked eagerly in Mrs. Tudor's face— she started up, „Grandmamma!" she exclaimed, „it is so—I know it is. You have been telling us of our mothers!"

It was plain enough that she had guessed rightly. She turned to Lucy and folded her in her arms. I saw in Isabel's glowing face, and fine up-raised eye, the quick succeeding thoughts that were afterwards embodied in sisterly affection and kindness to Lucy; and Lucy's saintly face shone with a holy triumph such as the virtue of a parent may inspire.

The reason why these circumstances had never before been related to the daughters was obvious; the reason why Mrs. Tudor had now disclosed them, and deferred the exposé, by using assumed names, was as apparent, and fully approved by its permanent happy influence.

Isabel, with the generosity of a noble nature, assumed her mother's debt; and the only vestige I perceived of the worldliness that tinged her first intercourse with Lucy, was in the elaborate care with which she lavished all the elegant refinements of fashion on the native graces of the Country Cousin.

Opposite Neighbours.

A Sketch.

It was on a pouring wet morning in the end of the month of March, 1827, that I sat drowsily ensconced in a „Woburn" beside the fire in my study(!) in a front room in Upper Brook street — for I am in easy circumstances, and rent „a suite of apartments fit for the immediate reception of an M. P. or bachelor of fashion," in the house of a „professional man of celebrity, who has no family." I had spelt through two newspapers, even to the last resource of „Rowland's Kalydor" and „Gowland's Lotion." I had read and dozed over every article in the last page of my last paper, until I caught myself reading the small-printed prices of the markets — potatoes at 8s. and 6d."

I began to feel as hunting gentlemen do during a hard frost — what is called „hard up." I had stirred my fire till it was out; and yawned until I began to fear a locked jaw. In very despair I strolled to the window, hopeless as I was of seeing any thing more amusing than overflowing gutters, half-drowned sparrows, or a drenched apothecary's boy. It was early in the morning, at least in a London morning, and I could not even anticipate the relief of a close carriage, with an oil-skin hammercloth, driving by: what then was my delight when, at one glance, as I reached the window, I descried that the bills in a large and handsome house opposite had been taken down! Now do not suppose that I love to pry into my neighbour's affairs for the sake of gossip — far from it; but what is an honest bachelor gentleman to do on a rainy morning, if he may not pick up a small matter of amusement by watching his opposite neighbours now and then?

The houses opposite were worse than no houses at all; for one was inhabited by an old and infirm lady, who had no visitors but an M. D., an apothecary, and a man in a shovel-hat. The other house contained only an elderly and very quiet couple, who had not near so much variety as a clock; they never stopt — never went too fast or too slow — never wanted winding up — they went of themselves — their breakfast and dinner bells rung daily to a minute at half-past eight and at six o'clock — their fat coachman and fat horses came to the door precisely at two o'clock to take them out, always to the Regent's Park, and drove twice round the outer circle. I took care to enquire into that fact. I ascertained too for certain that they had a leg of mutton for dinner every Tuesday and Friday, and fish three times a week, including Sundays, on which day too the butcher always brought roasting beef — always the thick part of the sirloin. What could I do with such people as these? I gave them up as hopeless.

Preparations for the reception of a family in my favourite house now went on with great spirit; a thorough internal cleaning and scouring on the first day; on the second, all the windows were cleaned. I could stand it no longer, and snatching up my hat, I just stepped over promiscuously to ask the maid who was washing the steps, by whom the house was taken. She was a stupid, ignorant, country girl, and did not seem at all alive to the interest attaching to her examination. I however discovered that — the house was taken by a baronet, and that his family consisted of his lady and one child (a boy), and his wife's sister.

I took a few turns in the Park, and just as I rapped at my own door, I determined I would make no further enquiries concerning the expected family — no, it would be infinitely more interesting to discover every thing by my own penetration and ingenuity; it would be a nice employment for me, for I was dreadfully at a loss for something to do, and would keep me from falling asleep.

I began now to count the hours. I was afraid of stirring from the window lest the strangers should escape my vigilance, and arrive unknown to me. I even dined in my study, and here, by the way, I must let the reader into a little secret. I had a large wire blind fixed on one of my windows, behind which I could stand and direct my enquiries unseen by any body, though few within range were unseen by me.

A few days past slowly on. Muslin curtains were put up, not blinds, fortunately for me, (I have a mortal antipathy to blinds to any windows but my own), boxes of mignionette appeared in every window. A cart from Colville's in the King's Road, filled with Brompton stocks, moss roses, and heliotropes, [illegible] sweets at the door. They had then a rural taste; country people perhaps; and I sighed as I figured to myself a bevy of plump rosy misses in pink and green, and one or two young squires in green coats and top boots. The arrival, whatever it might be, must be drawing very near — nearer and nearer — for a respectable looking housekeeper made her appearance one morning at the window, who had stolen a march on me; I never could make that out, for I had never seen her arrive. Two or three maids also were flitting about, and a gentleman out of livery appeared, now at the area, and now at the hall-door, superintending the unpacking of a grand pianoforte from Broadwood's; then arrived a cart from Brecknell and Turner, wax-chandlers in the Haymarket; and one from Fortnum and Mason's in Piccadilly, with divers other carts and packages of minor consideration. Then came hackney-coaches with servants and coloured paper boxes — smart looking maids in Leghorn bonnets and drab shawls, and footmen in dark green, and very plain liveries. The family could not be far behind. At last, about four o'clock, the fish arrived — a turbot and two fine lobsters for sauce. I can be on my oath it was not a brill, and fish was very dear that morning, for I enquired; therefore that could not be for the servants; Sir Charles and family must be close at hand.

I remained rooted to the window, and was soon rewarded for my patient investigation, by hearing, at about six o'clock, a carriage driving rapidly up the street from Park Lane. It was them actually. A green travelling carriage, all over imperials, stopped at the door in good earnest, most beautifully splashed with mud — no arms — only a bird for the crest; four post horses, and a maid and man servant in the rumble. My heart beat thick, my eyes strained in my head lest any one of the inmates of the carriage should escape my vigilance. The hall doors were thrown open in an instant, and the gentleman out of livery, with two of his colleagues, flew out to assist the ladies to alight. First of all, a gentleman — Sir Charles of course — made his appearance, tall, and very distinguished looking, dressed in a brown frock coat, and dark fur travelling cap, and apparently about thirty years of age. Next came a lady, who skipped out very lightly, and who seemed rather in a hurry to see the new abode — that was the sister. She was thin, and very graceful, and wrapped in a white cachemere, with rather a narrow border; her features were hidden from my view, as she wore one of those plaguey large coarse straw bonnets, tied down with white satin ribbons – two bows, and the edges cut in vandykes. Another lady then descended, more slowly and carefully, and as she watched the alighting of a nurse who had deposited a fine rosy boy, about a twelvemonth old, into the arms of Sir Charles, I observed that she was evidently about to increase her family; therefore, I had already ascertained, beyond a doubt, which was the wife, and which was the wife's sister. The doors then closed, and I saw no more that evening, excepting that the lamp was lit in the dining room, and the shutters closed at seven o'clock, and then in the gloom I saw three figures descend the stairs, from which I concluded they all went to dinner; besides the turbot, they had house lamb, and asparagus.

The next morning, while dressing, I espied the sister, whom I shall call Ellen, standing on the balcony admiring and arranging the flowers. The morning was beautiful and very light, so that I had a perfect view of her. It was impossible that a more lovely creature could be seen. She appeared not more than sixteen or seventeen; indeed, from the extreme plainness of her dress, I suspected she had not quite left the school-room. She was rather above the middle height, very slight and graceful, bright and beautiful, with long light auburn curls, and a very patrician air about her. Had I been young and romantic, I should most assuredly have fallen in love on the instant, as she stooped over the balcony, with a most enchanting air, smiling and kissing her hand to the baby, whom his nurse, at that moment carried, out of the hall door for an early walk in the park.

Presently she was joined by her sister, whom I shall call Lady Seymour, and who evidently came to summon her to breakfast. She appeared about twenty-five or twenty-six years old: pale, interesting, and beautiful; had a mild and pensive, I almost thought a melancholy look, and seemed very quiet and gentle in all her movements.

I should have been inclined to fall in love with her too, if she had not been a married woman, and I had not seen Ellen first; but Ellen was by far the more beautiful of the two fair sisters—the most striking, the most animated, and I always admired animation, for it argues inquiry, and from inquiry springs knowledge. The ladies lingered, and stooped down to inhale the fragrance of their flowers until Sir Charles appeared to summon them, and the whole trio descended to breakfast, Lady Seymour leaning on the arm of her husband, and Ellen skipping down before them. Sir Charles was very handsome, very tall, and very dignified looking. Nothing could be more promising than the appearance of the whole party. I was delighted with the prospect; no more gaping over newspapers; adieu ennui, here was food for reflection. My mind was now both actively and usefully employed, and a transition from idleness to useful occupation is indeed a blessing.

Days flew on, and I gradually gathered much important and curious information. The Seymours had many visitors, a vast proportion of coroneted carriages among them; went regularly to the opera. I could not make out who was Ellen's harp-master; but Crivelli taught her singing, from which I argued their good taste. She went out to evening parties; I concluded therefore that she had only just come out and was still pursuing her education.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nr 4.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Opposite Neighbours.

A SKETCH.

(Concluded from our last.)

A green britska and chariot were in requisition for both ladies, as the day was fine or otherwise: a dark cab with a green page attended Sir Charles on some days, on others he rode a bay horse with black legs, and a star on his forehead. With respect to the general habits of the family, they were early risers, and dined at eight o'clock. The beautiful baby was the pet of both ladies, and lived chiefly in the drawing-room; and I observed that Ellen frequently accompanied him and his nurse in their early walks, attended by a footman.

The Seymours occupied the whole of my time; I gave up all parties for the present, on the score of business, and I assure you it was quite as much as one person could do conveniently to look to them. From discoveries I made the family speedily became very interesting to me, I may say painfully interesting. Now I am not at all given to romance or high-flying notions, seeing that I am but seldom known to invent anything; what I am about to relate, may safely be relied on as the result of an accurate though painful investigation.

Before communicating these discoveries to my readers, I pause, even on the threshold. I have endeavoured to bespeak their interest for the fair Ellen, as I felt a deep one for her myself, — but, — truth must out, — it is my duty.

From the first day of the arrival of the Seymours, as I shall continue to designate them, I had been struck by the evident dejection of Lady Seymour. I frequently observed her, when alone, bury her face in her hands, as she leant upon a small table beside the couch on which she sat.

The work, or the book, or the pencil, — for she drew, — was invariably thrown aside when her husband or her young sister quitted the apartment. The fine little baby seemed her greatest pleasure. He was a wild struggling little fellow, full of health and spirits, almost too much for her delicate frame, and apparently weak state of health. She could not herself nurse him long together, but I observed that the nurse was very frequently in the room with her, and that the fond mother followed and watched her little darling almost constantly. She was surrounded by luxuries — by wealth. Her husband, in appearance at least, was one whom all women must admire; one of whom a wife might feel proud; — she had a beautiful child; — she was young, lovely, titled. What then could be the cause of this dejection? What could it be? I redoubled my attention: I was the last to retire and the first to rise. I determined to discover this mystery.

One morning I discovered her weeping—weeping bitterly. Her bedroom was in the front of the house; she was walking backwards and forwards between the window and the opened folding doors, her handkerchief at her eyes. At first I thought she might have the toothache, — not being given as I before said to romance; — then I suspected her confinement was about to take place, — but no, that could not be. No Mr. Blagden appeared — his carriage had not even been at her door for more than a week; at which I was rather surprised. She was evidently and decidedly weeping. I ascertained that beyond a doubt. A flash of light beamed across my mind! I have it! thought I, — perhaps her husband's affections are estranged. Could it be possible? Husbands are wayward things, — I felt glad that I was not a husband.

A kind of disagreeable and tormenting suspicion at that moment strengthened my belief; a suspicion that — how shall I speak it? — perhaps he might love the beautiful Ellen. I tried to banish the idea: but circumstances, lightly passed over before, returned now in crowds to my recollection to confirm me in it. From that moment I renewed my observations daily, and with still increased vigilance, and was obliged to come to the painful conclusion that my suspicions were not only but too well founded with regard to Sir Charles, but that Ellen returned his passion. Yes, she was romantically in love with the husband of her sister! I seldom find myself wrong in my opinions, yet, in this case, I would willingly have given hundred pounds to feel sure that I was in error. Such was the interest with which the extreme beauty, the vivacity and grace of the youthful Ellen had inspired me. Here then was food for philosophy as well as reflection. Who shall say that inquirers are impertinent, when such facts as these can be elicited. Had it not been for me — such is the apathy of people about what does not concern them — a base husband, and an artful intriguing sister, might still have maintained a fair face to the world; but I was determined to cut the matter short, and open the eyes of the deluded wife as to the real causes of her injury. Honour compelled me to it. Let not the reader think me rash, — I will explain the circumstances which influenced my conviction. Oh, Ellen! how have I been deceived in thee! How hast thou betrayed a too susceptible heart!

Sir Charles was an M. P., which my ingenuity in setting together hours and facts enabled me to make sure of. He frequently returned late from the debates in the house. The weather grew warm, and the shutters were always left open till the family retired for the night. Their lamps were brilliant, and I could discern the fair Ellen peeping over the balustrades of the staircase, and lingering and waiting on the landing place, evidently on the look-out for an anxiously expected arrival. Then the cab of Sir Charles would stop at the door — his well-known knock would be heard, and Ellen would fly with the lightness of a fairy to meet him as he ascended the stairs. He would then fold her in his arms, and they would enter the drawing-room together; yet, before they did so, five or ten minutes' tête-à-tête frequently took place on the landing, and the arm of Sir Charles was constantly withdrawn from the waist of Ellen, before they opened the drawing room door and appeared in the presence of the poor neglected wife, whom he greeted with no embrace, as he took his seat beside her on the sofa.

For some time I set down the empressements of Ellen to meet Sir Charles as that of a lively and affectionate girl to greet her sister's husband, in the manner she would receive her own brother. I was soon obliged to think differently.

When Ellen played on the harp, which she did almost daily, Sir Charles would stand listening beside her, and would frequently imprint a kiss on her beautiful brow, gently lifting aside the curls which covered it: but this never took place when Lady Seymour was in the room — mark that — no, not in a single instance. Sir Charles sometimes sat reading in a chair near the drawing-room window, and would, as Ellen passed him, fondly draw her towards him and hold her hands, while he appeared to converse with her in the most animated manner. If the door opened, and the poor wife came to, the hands were instantly released.

As the spring advanced, the appearance of Lady Seymour, and more frequent visits of Mr. Blagden, led me to suppose her confinement drew near; she became later in rising in the morning, and Sir Charles and Ellen almost constantly took a very early tête-à-tête walk in the park, from which they usually returned long before Lady Seymour made her appearance in the drawing-room.

A very handsome man, with a viscount's coronet on his cab, was a frequent visiter in Upper Brook Street. I doubted not but that he was an admirer of and suitor to the fair Ellen. Yet she slighted him; he was entirely indifferent to her: otherwise why did she often leave the drawing room during his very long morning visits, and sit reading in the window of a room upstairs, or playing with the baby in the nursery, leaving her sister to entertain him? The reason was too evident: cruel and heartless Ellen! My heart bled more and more for the poor wife; I absolutely began to hate Ellen.

At length closed bedroom shutters, hurry and bustle, cart-loads of straw, and the galloping chariot of Mr. Blagden announced the accouchement of Lady Seymour. All seemed happily over before the house was closed for the night.

Sir Charles and Ellen were in the drawing-room together. The lady's maid rushed into the apartment; I almost fancied I heard her exclaim, „my lady is safe, and a fine boy." So well did the deceitful Ellen act her joy, she clasped her hands together, and then, in the apparent delight of her heart, shook hands with the maid, who left the room directly. My heart was relenting towards her, as she was flying to follow the woman, no doubt with the intention of hastening to the bedside of her sister; but no — she returned to tenderly embrace Sir Charles before she quitted the drawing-room. At such a time too! Oh, faithless and cruel Ellen!

Sir Charles and Ellen were now more frequently together — more in love than ever. They sang together, read together, walked together, played with the little boy together, and nursed the new little baby in turns.

In due course of time poor Lady Seymour recovered, and resumed her station in the drawing room, and then Sir Charles was less frequently at home. I was furious at him as well as at Ellen. All my tender compassion and interest centred in the unhappy and neglected wife.

One other instance in corroboration of the justness of my suspicions I will relate. A miniature painter, whom I knew by sight, came early every morning to the house. Sir Charles was sitting for his picture. One morning, when I concluded it must be nearly finished, Sir Charles and the artist left the house together. I saw the picture lying on the table near the window, in the same spot where the artist had been working at it for nearly two hours before, while Sir Charles was sitting to him. I had not for a moment lost sight of it, and am ready to affirm upon oath that the miniature was the likeness of Sir Charles, and of no one else; for you must know that I have a small pocket telescope by which I can detect these nice points accurately. Well, — Miss Ellen came into the room;—she was alone; —she walked up to the picture, gazed on it for a long while, and—will it be believed? pressed it several times to her lips and then to her heart! —Yes, I am quite sure she pressed it to her heart; no one can deceive me in that particular. She did not indeed think or guess that any eye observed her.—But oh! Ellen, there was an eye over you that never slumbered, at least very seldom. Things had thus arrived at such a pass, that concealment on my part would have been criminal. — My duty was clear,—an instant exposure without regard to the feelings of any one. But how could it be accomplished without personal danger. Sir Charles was a shot. I had seen a case of pistols arrive from John Manton and Son, Dover-street; besides, he was big enough to eat me, so that putting myself forward was out of the question. I had it—I would write to the Times and the True Sun, under the signature of „A Friend to Morality." That very night I condensed these notes into three columns, as I said to the editor, not to occupy too great a space in his valuable journal: and early on the following morning I arose to dispatch my letters, when, what should greet my astonished senses, but, at the door of the Seymours, their travelling carriage with four post horses! What could it mean? I had seen no signs of packing; no trunks, or waggons! What could it mean? I stood perfectly aghast; my eyes were fixed intently upon the carriage. — Oh! I had it again, my wits never fail me — the murder was out. I need not write to the Times. Miss Ellen was discovered, and going to be sent off to school, or perhaps to „tall aunts and croaking rooks" in the country! I was glad to be spared the pain of forwarding the explanation; and yet Good heavens! what was my surprise and profound mystification when Sir Charles appeared, handing in, first Lady Seymour, a beautiful flush on her countenance, radiant with smiles, and almost as quick and light in her movements as Ellen herself — then the old nurse with the new baby! then Ellen, smiling as usual; and last of all Sir Charles got upon the box, followed by the Viscount!! and then off they drove as fast as the horses could carry them. My eyes and mouth continued wide open long after they had turned the corner into Park Lane. I was at my wits end; at sea without a rudder. What could all this possibly portend? The little boy was left behind too! and all the servants, with the exception of one of the lady's maids, and Sir Charles's own man. Could it be that Ellen was going to be palmed off upon the poor deceived Viscount? But why then should they go out of town to be married? why had not I seen the least glimpse of a lawyer, or any preparation for a trousseau? and why did the new baby go with them? that could not be of much use at a wedding. No, that could not be it. Where could they be going? I passed a restless day, a sleepless night. The next morning I grew desperate, and was on the point of sallying forth in my cap and dressing gown, to knock at the door of the deserted mansion, and demand satisfaction of the butler, when who should I pounce upon at the door, but my old friend General Crosby. It was devilish unlucky, but I was obliged to ask him up. „I intended to call on my friends, the St. Legers, over the way, this morning," said he, „but I find they are gone to Portsmouth."

„To Portsmouth, are they? that's very curious," said I, interrupting him. „Do you know the family?" asked I, with something like agitation.

„I have known Sir Charles St. Leger all his life; he married Fanny Spencer, a daughter of Admiral Spencer."

„Good God!"

„Why are you surprised?" asked he gravely.

„Why, General, I must be candid with you; truth and honour compel me to a disclosure, which, I am sure will, as a friend of the family, cause you exceeding pain." The General was now surprised in his turn.

„Good heavens! he ejaculated, „Nothing has happened to Mrs. Murray or the child, I hope."

„I don't know who you mean by Mrs. Murray," I replied, with great seriousness. „It is of Lady St. Leger and her sister that I am about to speak." And I then told him every circumstance of guilt, with their corroborating proofs, to which I had been so unwilling a witness; I told him all without disguise; to all of which he listened, as I thought, very calmly, apathetically indeed considering he was a friend of the family; but on the conclusion of my recital, to my great dismay he arose, put on his hat, and looking at me sternly said, „Sir, the lady whom you have thus honoured by so great a share of your attention is not the intriguante you suppose, is not the paramour of Sir Charles St. Leger, but is no other than his wife and my god-daughter. — I wish you, Sir, a good morning."

„Wife! God-daughter?" I repeated in a faint voice. „But, General, for God's sake, one instant, the elder lady?" „Is Lady St. Leger's elder sister, the wife of the gallant Captain Murray, whose absence on service she has been for some time lamenting? His ship has arrived at Portsmouth, and they are all gone to meet him." He had reached the door; I was in an agony; my hair stood on end; — „One word more, the Viscount?" „Is Captain Murray's elder brother

And before I take my leave, permit me to wish you a better occupation than clandestinely watching the actions of others, of misinterpreting the actions of an amiable and virtuous lady, and traducing the character of an estimable man, whose refinement of feeling you have neither wit to understand nor appreciate. Sir, I wish you again a good morning."

What would I not have given at that moment of shame to have been on my travels down the bottomless pit. Anywhere rather than on the first floor at Brook-street. I was positively at my wits end.

I hung my head, completely abashed, discomfited. I had nothing to say, absolutely not a word—and was thoroughly ashamed of myself and my ingenuity. Had I possessed a tail, I should have slunk off with it hanging down between my legs, in the manner I have seen a discomfited dog do: but I had no such expressive appendage, and I could only ejaculate to myself at intervals during the whole of the next three days—

„God bless my soul! what a false scent I have been on! And for a bachelor gentleman too, not at all given to invention! Yet how was I to guess that a wife could be in love with her husband? There is some excuse for me after all. God bless my soul!"

P. S. The St. Legers are returned—Capt. Murray is with them—French blinds are putting up all over the house, „Othello's occupation's gone," can't stand it—off to the continent.

The Superannuated Man.

By Charles Lamb.

It is now six and thirty years since I took my seat at the desk in Mincing-lane. Melancholy was the transition at fourteen from the abundant playtime, and the frequently-intervening vacations of school-days, to the eight, nine, and sometimes ten hours' a-day attendance at a counting-house. But time partially reconciles us to anything. I gradually became content—doggedly contented, as wild animals in cages.

It is true I had my Sundays to myself; but Sundays, admirable as the institution of them is for purposes of Worship, are for that very reason the very worst adapted for days of unbending and recreation. In particular, there is a gloom for me attendant upon a city Sunday, a weight in the air. I miss the cheerful cries of London, the music, and the ballad-singers—the buzz and stirring murmur of the streets. Those eternal bells depress me.

The closed shops repel me. Prints, pictures, all the glittering and endless succession of knacks and gewgaws, and ostentatiously displayed wares of tradesmen, which make a weekday saunter through the less busy parts of the metropolis so delightful—are shut out. No book-stalls deliciously to idle over—No busy faces to recreate the idle man who contemplates them ever passing by—the very face of business is a charm by contrast to his temporary relaxation from it. Nothing to be seen but unhappy countenances—or half-happy at best—of emancipated 'prentices and little tradesfolks, with here and there a servant maid that has got leave to go out, who, slaving all the week, with the habit has lost almost the capacity of enjoying a free hour; and livelily expressing the hollowness of a day's pleasuring. The very strollers in the fields on that day look anything but comfortable.

But besides Sundays I had a day at Easter, and a day at Christmas, with a full week in the summer to go and air myself in my native fields of Hertfordshire. This last was a great indulgence; and the prospect of its recurrence, I believe, alone kept me up through the year, and made my durance tolerable. But when the week came round, did the glittering phantom of the distance keep touch with me? or rather was it not a series of seven uneasy days, spent in restless pursuit of pleasure, and a wearisome anxiety to find out how to make the most of them? Where was the quiet, where the promised rest? Before I had a taste of it, it was vanished. I was at the desk again, counting upon the fifty-one tedious weeks that must intervene before such another snatch would come. Still the prospect of its coming throw something of an illumination upon the darker side of my captivity. Without it, as I have said, I could scarcely have sustained my thraldom.

Independently of the rigours of attendance, I have ever been haunted with a sense (perhaps a mere caprice) of incapacity for business. This, during my latter years, had increased to such a degree, that it was visible in all the lines of my countenance. My health and my good spirits flagged. I had perpetually a dread of some crisis, to which I should be found unequal. Besides my daylight servitude, I served over again all night in my sleep, and would awake with terrors of imaginary false entries, errors in my accounts, and the like. I was fifty years of age, and no prospect of emancipation presented itself. I had grown to my desk, as it were; and the wood had entered into my soul.

My fellows in the office would sometimes rally me upon the trouble legible in my countenance; but I did not know that it had raised the suspicions of any of my employers, when, on the 5th of last month, a day ever to be remembered by me, L—, the junior partner in the firm, calling me on one side, directly taxed me with my bad looks, and frankly inquired the cause of them. So taxed, I honestly made confession of my infirmity, and added that I was afraid I should eventually be obliged to resign his service. He spoke some words of course to hearten me, and there the matter rested. A whole week I remained labouring under the impression that I had acted imprudently in my disclosure; that I had foolishly given a handle against myself, and had been anticipating my own dismissal. A week passed in this manner, the most anxious one, I verily believe, in my whole life, when on the evening of the 12th of April, just as I was about quitting my desk to go home (it might be about eight o'clock) I received an awful summons to attend the presence of the whole assembled firm in the formidable back parlour. I thought, now my time is surely come, I have done for myself, I am going to be told that they have no longer occasion for me. L—, I could see smiled at the terror I was in, which was a little relief to me, — when to my utter astonishment B—, the eldest partner, began a formal harangue to me on the length of my services, my very meritorious conduct during the whole of the time (the deuce, thought I, how did he find out that? I protest I never had the confidence to think as much). He went on to descant on the expediency of retiring at a certain time of life (how my heart panted!) and asking me a few questions as to the amount of my own property, of which I have a little, ended with a proposal, to which his three partners nodded a grave assent, that I should accept from the house, which I had served so well, a pension for life to the amount of two-thirds of my accustomed salary — a magnificent offer! I do not know what I answered, between surprise and gratitude, but it was understood that I accepted their proposal, and I was told that I was free from that hour to leave their service. I stammered out a bow, and at just ten minutes after eight I went home — for ever. This noble benefit — gratitude forbids me to conceal their names — I owe to the kindness of the most munificent firm in the world — the house of Boldero, Merryweather, Bosanquet, and Lacy.

Esto perpetua!

For the first day or two I felt stunned, overwhelmed. I could only apprehend my felicity; I was too confused to taste it sincerely. I wandered about, thinking I was happy, and knowing that I was not. I was in the condition of a prisoner in the old Bastile, suddenly let loose after a forty years' confinement. I could scarce trust myself with myself. It was like passing out of Time into Eternity — for it is a sort of Eternity for a man to have his Time all to himself. It seemed to me that I had more time on my hands than I could ever manage. From a poor man, poor in Time, I was suddenly lifted up into a vast revenue; I could see no end of my possessions, I wanted some steward, or judicious bailiff, to manage my estates in Time for me. And here let me caution persons grown old in active business, not lightly, nor without weighing their own resources, to forego their customary employment all at once, for there may be danger in it. I feel it by myself, but I know that my resources are sufficient; and now that those first giddy raptures have subsided, I have a quiet homefeeling of the blessedness of my condition. I am in no hurry. Having all holidays, I am as though I had none. If Time hung heavy upon me, I could walk it away; but I do not walk all day long, as I used to do in those old transient holidays, thirty miles a day, to make the most of them. If Time were troublesome, I could read it away, but I do not read in that violent measure, with which, having no Time my own but candle light Time, I used to weary out my head and eyesight in by-gone winters. I walk, read or scribble (as now) just when the fit seizes me. I no longer hunt after pleasure; I let it come to me. I am like the man,

> — That's born, and has his years come to him,
> In some green desert.

„Years," you will say! „what is this superannuated simpleton calculating upon? He has already told us, he is past fifty."

I have indeed lived nominally fifty years, but deduct out of them the hours which I have lived to other people, and not to myself, and you will find me still a young fellow. For that is the only true Time, which a man can properly call his own, that which he has all to himself; the rest, though in some sense he may be said to live it, is other people's time; not his. The remnant of my poor days, long or short, is at least multiplied for me threefold. My ten next years, if I stretch so far, will be as long as any preceding thirty. 'Tis a fair rule-of-three sum.

Among the strange fantasies which beset me at the commencement of my freedom, and of which all traces are not yet gone, one was, that a vast tract of time had intervened since I quitted the Counting House. I could not conceive of it as an affair of yesterday. The partners, and the clerks, with whom I had for so many years and for so many hours in each day of the year, been closely associated — being suddenly removed from them — they seemed as dead to me. There is a fine passage, which may serve to illustrate this fancy, in a Tragedy by Sir Robert Howard, speaking of a friend's death:

>  'Twas but just now he went away;
> I have not since had time to shed a tear;
> And yet the distance does the same appear
> As if he had been a thousand years from me.
> Time takes no measure in Eternity.

To dissipate this awkward feeling, I have been fain to go among them once or twice since; to visit my old desk-fellows — my co-brethren of the quill — that I had left below in the state militant. Not all the kindness with which they received me could quite restore to me that pleasant familiarity, which I had heretofore enjoyed among them. We cracked some of our old jokes, but methought they went off but faintly. My old desk, the peg where I hung my hat, were appropriated to another. I knew it must be, but I could not take it kindly. D—l take me, if I did not feel some remorse — beast, if I had not, — at quitting my old compeers, the faithful partners of my toils for six and thirty years, that soothed for me with their jokes and conundrums the ruggedness of my professional road. Had it been so rugged then after all? or was I a coward simply? Well, it is too late to repent; and I also know, that these suggestions are a common fallacy of the mind on such occasions. But my heart smote me. I had violently broken the bands betwixt us. It was at least not courteous. I shall be some time before I get quite reconciled to the separation. Farewell, old cronies, yet not for long, for again and again I will come among ye, if I shall have your leave. Farewell Ch, dry, sarcastic, and friendly! Do, mild, slow to move, and gentlemanly! Pl, officious to do, and to volunteer good services! — and thou, thou dreary pile, fit mansion for a Gresham or a Whittington of old, stately House of Merchants; with thy labyrinthine passages, and light-excluding, pent-up offices, where candles for one half the year supplied the place of the sun's light; unhealthy contributor to my weal, stern fosterer of my living, farewell! In thee remain, and not in the obscure collection of some wandering bookseller, my „works!" There let them rest, as I do from my labours, piled on thy massy shelves, more MSS. in folio than ever Aquinas left, and full as useful! My mantle I bequeath among ye. —

A fortnight has passed since the date of my first communication. At that period I was approaching to tranquillity, but had not reached it. I boasted of a calm indeed, but it was comparative only. Something of the first flutter was left; an unsettling sense of novelty; the dazzle to weak eyes of unaccustomed light. I missed my old chains, forsooth, as if they had been some necessary part of my apparel. I was a poor Carthusian, from strict cellular discipline suddenly by some revolution returned upon the world. I am now as if I had never been other than my own master. It is natural to me to go where I please, to do what I please. I find myself at eleven o'clock in the day in Bond-street, and it seems to me that I have been sauntering there at that very hour for years past. I digress into Soho, to explore a book-stall. Methinks I have been thirty years a collector. There is nothing strange nor new in it. I find myself before a fine picture in a morning. Was it ever otherwise? What is become of Fish-street Hill? Where is Fenchurch-street? Stones of old Mincing-lane, which I have worn with my daily pilgrimage for six and thirty years, to the footsteps of what toil-worn clerk are your everlasting flints now vocal? I indent the gayer flags of Pall Mall. It is Change time, and I am strangely among the Elgin marbles. It was no hyperbole when I ventured to compare the change in my condition to a passing into another world. Time stands still in a manner to me. I have lost all distinction of season. I do not know the day of the week, or of the month. Each day used to be individually felt by me in its reference to the foreign post-days; in its distance from, or propinquity to, the next Sunday. I had my Wednesday feelings, my Saturday nights' sensations. The genius of each day was upon me distinctly during the whole of it, affecting my appetite, spirits, etc. The phantom of the next day, with the dreary five to follow, sate as a load upon my poor Sabbath recreations. What charm has washed that Ethiop white? What is gone of Black Monday? All days are the same. Sunday itself — that unfortunate failure of a holiday as it too often proved, what with my sense of its fugitiveness, and over-care to get the greatest quantity of pleasure out of it — is melted down into a week day. I can spare to go to church now, without grudging the huge cantle which it used to seem to cut out of the holiday. I have time for every-thing. I can visit a sick friend. I can interrupt the man of much occupation when he is busiest. I can insult over him with an invitation to take a day's pleasure with me to Windsor this fine May-morning. It is Lucretian pleasure to behold the poor drudges, whom I have left behind in the world, carking and caring, like horses in a mill; drudging on in the same eternal round — and what is it all for? A man can never have too much Time to himself, nor too little to do. Had I a little son, I would christen him Nothing-to-do; he should do nothing. Man, I verily believe, is out of his element as long as he is operative. I am altogether for the life contemplative. Will no kindly earthquake come, and swallow up those accursed cotton mills? Take me that lumber of a desk there, and bowl it down

As low as to the fiends.

I am no longer , clerk to the Firm of, etc. I am Retired Leisure. I am to be met with in trim gardens. I am already come to be known by my vacant face and careless gesture, perambulating at no fixed pace, nor with any settled purpose. I walk about; not to and from. They tell me a certain cum dignitate air, that has been buried so long with my other good parts, has begun to shoot forth in my person. I grow into gentility perceptibly. When I take up a newspaper, it is to read the state of the opera. Opus operatum est. I have done all that I came into this world to do. I have worked task-work, and have the rest of the day to myself.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. No. 5.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZE, A. A. M. M.

Maria Edgeworth.

Keine engliſche Schriftſtellerin hat in ſo reichem Maaße ſich den Ruhm erworben, das ſchöne Talent, welches ihr die Gottheit verliehen, vorzüglich anzuwenden um der leidenden und irrenden Menſchheit zu nützen, ſie zu beſſern, und auf eine eben ſo eindringliche als anmuthige Weiſe zu belehren, wie diejenige, deren Name die Ueberſchrift zu dieſen Zeilen bildet. — Sie beſchäftigt ſich in ihren Werken nur mit Gegenſtänden und Ereigniſſen des täglichen Lebens, welche ſie hervortretend und wirkſam, doch in ſchmuckloſer Einfachheit, darſtellt, aber ſie verſteht es, ihnen eine neue intereſſante Seite abzugewinnen, und, indem ſie auch nicht den geringſten Incidenzpunkt unbeachtet vorüber läßt, ihren Gebilden und Charakteren die höchſte Wahrſcheinlichkeit zu geben, ſo daß der Leſer ſelbſt an Begebenheiten und Zuſtänden in ſeinem engen Kreiſe Theil zu nehmen glaubt, und dadurch ſchon vom Anbeginn für das Ganze gewonnen, um ſo leichter der praktiſchen, moraliſchen Lehre, welche unausgeſprochen aber darum nicht minder wirkſam der Schilderung zu Grunde liegt, ſeine volle Aufmerkſamkeit ſchenkt. Treffend ſagt der berühmte engliſche Kritiker Gifford in ſeinem Urtheil über ſie „Ihre Schriften, weit entfernt, dem Laſter, ſelbſt in ſeiner anmuthigen Geſtalt irgend Vorſchub zu thun, liefern einige der beſten Lectionen in der praktiſchen Moral, die wir kennen. Sie belehren nicht bloß einſeitig durch trockene allgemeine Maximen oder glänzende Beiſpiele, ſondern durch Vernunftgründe, welche den handelnden Perſonen ſelbſt in den Mund gelegt ſind, über das richtige Benehmen unter ſchwierigen und lockenden Umſtänden. Unabläſſig iſt ſie bemüht, mittelſt Darſtellung ſorgfältig gewählter oder geſchickt erdichteter Beiſpiele, aus einander zu ſetzen, auf welchem Wege die Tugend zur Glückſeligkeit führe. Es wird ſchwerlich eine gute Eigenſchaft geben, der nicht die wirkſame Empfehlung von Miß Edgeworth zu Theil geworden wäre; am Letzten führt ſie uns aber die endliche Belohnung redlicher und beharrlicher Beſtrebungen vor Augen, und ihre Wahl iſt, nach unſerem Dafürhalten, durch den Werth der Grundſätze gerechtfertigt, welche ſie einſchärft."

So weit Gifford, der gegen ſeine gewöhnliche Art nur Lobenswerthes in den Schriften der Miß Edgeworth zu finden weiß, und beſonders dadurch entſchuldigt wird, daß dieſe in England wirklich den ſegenreichſten Einfluß ausgeübt haben und noch ferner ausüben. — Uns aber, die wir die Leiſtungen dieſer vortrefflichen Frau nicht bloß von dem ethiſchen Standpunkte aus betrachten, ſei noch folgende Bemerkung vergönnt. Wir müſſen nämlich aufrichtig bedauern, daß dieſes reiche Talent bei ſo ſchönen Mitteln ſo ausſchließlich dem Nützlichkeits-Princip huldigt, und ſich in der Durchführung ſeiner Erzeugniſſe nur von dem Verſtande leiten läßt, der Phantaſie und der Leidenſchaft aber weder Einfluß noch Theilnahme geſtattet. — Dadurch erſcheint Alles ſtets zu beſonnen, zu nüchtern hingeſtellt, nur die Vernunft wird befriedigt, aber das Gemüth geht im Einzelnen leer aus, wenn ihm gleich das Ganze zuſagen mag. Der Leſer ſieht ſtets Miß Edgeworth als Schulmeiſterin neben den von ihr erſchaffenen Charakteren herwandeln, wie als theilnehmende Freundin dieselben begleiten und mit ihnen sich herzlich freuen oder sich betrüben, er wird dadurch von ihren Darstellungen belehrt, aber nicht hingerissen, unterhalten, aber nicht begeistert. Wollte sie begreifen, was einem weiblichen Wesen so wohl steht, etwas schwärmen und glühen mit und für ihre Helden, so würde sie unendlich mehr und nachhaltiger wirken, denn sie würde Verstand und Herz des Lesers zugleich bezaubern.

Maria Edgeworth ist die Tochter eines ausgezeichneten irländischen Rechtsgelehrten, Richard Lovel Edgeworth, der sich ebenfalls durch Schriften, wie durch seine practische Wirksamkeit große Verdienste erworben hat. Sie ward 1771 zu Edgeworthstown in Irland geboren, und lebt auf den, aus dem väterlichen Erbe ihr zugefallenen, Gütern unvermählt.

Ihre vorzüglichsten Schriften, welche sämmtlich als eine vortreffliche Lectüre empfohlen zu werden verdienen, sind: Essays on practical Education. 1798. (gemeinschaftlich mit ihrem Vater). Castle Rackrent, 1 Bd. Moral tales, 3 Bde. Popular tales, 4 Bde. (Diese beiden Sammlungen sind in unzähligen Ausgaben und Nachdrucken über das ganze civilisirte Europa verbreitet.) Tales of fashionable life, and the modern Griselda, 5 Bde. Belinda, 3 Bde. Leonora and letters for literary Ladies, 1 Bd. Patronage, 3 Bde. Comic dramas, 1 Bd. Harrington; Thoughts on bores, 1 Bd. Ormond, 1 Bd. Helen, 3 Bde. u. A. m.

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

Forester was the son of an English gentleman, who had paid some attention to his education, but who had some singularities of opinion, which probably influenced him in his conduct toward his children.

Young Forester was frank, brave, and generous; but he had been taught to dislike politeness so much, that the common forms of society appeared to him either odious or ridiculous; his sincerity was seldom restrained by any attention to the feelings of others. His love of independence was carried to such an extreme, that he was inclined to prefer the life of Robinson Crusoe in his desert island, to that of any individual in cultivated society. His attention had been early fixed upon the follies and vices of the higher classes of the people; and his contempt for selfish indolence was so strongly associated with the name of gentleman, that he was disposed to choose his friends and companions from amongst his inferiors: the inequality between the rich and the poor shocked him: his temper was enthusiastic as well as benevolent; and he ardently wished to be a man, and to be at liberty to act for himself, that he might reform society, or at least his own neighbourhood. When he was about nineteen years old, his father died, and young Forester was sent to Edinburgh, to Dr. Campbell, the gentleman whom his father had appointed his guardian. In the choice of his mode of travelling his disposition appeared. The stage-coach and a carrier set out nearly at the same time from Penrith. Forester, proud of bringing his principles immediately into action, put himself under the protection of the carrier, and congratulated himself upon his freedom from prejudice. He arrived at Edinburgh in all the glory of independence, and he desired the carrier to set him down at Dr. Campbell's door.

„The doctor's not at home," said the footman, who opened the door.

„He is at home," exclaimed Forester with indignation; „I see him at the window."

„My master is just going to dinner, and can't see any body now," said the footman; „but if you will call again at six o'clock, may be he may see you, my good lad."

„My name is Forester — let me in," said Forester, pushing forwards.

Forester! Mr. Forester! „said the footman; „the young gentleman that was expected in the „coach to day?"

Without deigning to give the footman any explanation, Forester took his own portmanteau from the carrier; and Dr. Campbell came down stairs just when the footman was officiously struggling with the young gentleman for his burden.

Dr. Campbell received his pupil very kindly; but Forester would not be prevailed upon to rub his shoes sufficiently upon the mat at the bottom of the stairs, or to change his disordered dress before he made his appearance in the drawing-room. He entered with dirty shoes, a threadbare coat, and hair that looked as if it never had been combed; and he was much surprised by the effect which his singular appearance produced upon the risible muscles of some of the company.

„I have done nothing to be ashamed of," said he to himself; but notwithstanding all his efforts to be and to appear at ease, he was constrained and abashed. A young laird, Mr. Archibald Mackenzie, seemed to enjoy his confusion with malignant, half-suppressed merriment, in which Dr. Campbell's son was too good-natured, and too well-bred, to participate. Henry Campbell, was three or four years older than Forester, and though he looked like a gentleman, Forester could not help being pleased with the manner in which he drew him into conversation. The secret magic of politeness relieved him insensibly from the torment of false shame.

„It is a pity this lad was bred up a gentleman," said Forester to himself, „for he seems to have some sense and goodness."

Dinner was announced, and Forester was provoked at being interrupted in an argument concerning carts and coaches, which he had begun with Henry Campbell. Not that Forester was averse to eating, for he was at this instant ravenously hungry; but eating in company he always found equally repugnant to his habits and his principles. A table covered with a clean table-cloth, dishes in nice order; plates, knives, and forks, laid at regular distances, appeared to our young Diogenes absurd superfluities, and he was ready to exclaim, „How many things I do not want!" Sitting down to dinner, eating, drinking, and behaving like other people, appeared to him difficult and disagreeable ceremonies. He did not perceive, that custom had rendered all these things perfectly easy to every one else in company; and as soon as he had devoured his food his own way, he moralized in silence upon the good sense of Sancho Panza, who preferred eating an egg behind the door to feasting in public; and he recollected his favourite traveller Le Vaillant's enthusiastic account of his charming Hottentot dinners, and of the disgust that he afterwards felt, on the comparison of European etiquette and African simplicity.

„Thank God the ceremony of dinner is over!" said Forester to Henry Campbell, as soon as they rose from table.

All those things, which seemed mere matter of course in society, appeared to Forester strange ceremonies. In the evening, there were cards for those who liked cards, and there was conversation for those who liked conversation. Forester liked neither; he preferred playing with a cat; and he sat all night apart from the company in a corner of a sofa. He took it for granted, that the conversation could not be worth his attention, because he heard lady Catherine Mackenzie's voice amongst others; he had conceived a dislike, or rather a contempt for this lady, because she showed much of the pride of birth and rank in her manners. Henry Campbell did not think it necessary to punish himself for her ladyship's faults, by withdrawing from entertaining conversation: he knew that his father had the art of managing the frivolous subjects started in general company, so as to make them lead to amusement and instruction; and this Forester would probably have discovered this evening, had he not followed his own thoughts, instead of listening to the observations of others. Lady Catherine, it is true, began with a silly history of her hereditary antipathy for pickled cucumbers; and she was rather tiresome in tracing the genealogy of this antipathy through several generations of her ancestry; but Dr. Campbell said, „that he had heard, from an ingenious gentleman of her ladyship's family, that her ladyship's grandfather, and several of his friends, nearly lost their lives by pickled cucumbers; and thence the doctor took occasion to relate several curious circumstances concerning the effects of different poisons.

Dr. Campbell, who plainly saw both the defects and the excellent qualities of his young ward, hoped that, by playful raillery, and by well-timed reasoning, he might mix a sufficient portion of good sense with Forester's enthusiasm; might induce him gradually to sympathize in the pleasures of cultivated society, and might convince him that virtue is not confined to any particular class of men; that education, in the enlarged sense of the word, creates the difference between individuals more than riches or poverty. Dr. Campbell foresaw that Forester would form a friendship with his son, and that this attachment would cure him of his prejudices against gentlemen, and would prevent him from indulging his taste for vulgar company. Henry Campbell had more useful energy, though less apparent enthusiasm than his new companion: he was always employed; he was really independent, because he had learned how to support himself either by the labours of his head or of his hands; but his independence did not render him unsociable; he was always ready to sympathize with the pleasures of his friends, and therefore he was beloved: following his father's example, he did all the good in his power to those who were in distress; but he did not imagine that he could reform every abuse in society, or that he could instantly new-model the universe. Forester became, in a few days, fond of conversing, or rather of holding long arguments with Henry; but his dislike to the young laird, Archibald Mackenzie, hourly increased. Archibald and his mother, lady Catherine Mackenzie, were relations of Mrs. Campbell, and they were now upon a visit at her house. Lady Catherine, a shrewd woman, fond of precedence, and fully sensible of the importance that wealth can bestow, had sedulously inculcated into the mind of her son all the maxims of worldly wisdom, which she had collected in her intercourse with society; she had inspired him with family pride, but at the same time had taught him to pay obsequious court to his superiors in rank or fortune; the art of rising in the world, she knew, did not entirely depend upon virtue or ability; she was consequently more solicitous about her son's manners than his morals, and was more anxious that he should form high connexions, than that he should apply to severe studies of a profession. Archibald was nearly what might be expected from his education, alternately supple to his superiors, and insolent to his inferiors; to insinuate himself into the favour of young men of rank and fortune, he affected to admire extravagance, but his secret maxims of parsimony operated even in the midst of dissipation. Meanness and pride usually go together. It is not to be supposed, that young Forester had such quick penetration, that he could discover the whole of the artful Archibald's character in the course of a few days' acquaintance, but he disliked him for good reasons, because he was a laird, because he had laughed at his first entree, and because he was learning to dance.

The Skeleton.

About a week after our hero's arrival at Dr. Campbell's, the doctor was exhibiting some chemical experiments, with which Henry hoped that his young friend would be entertained; but Forester had scarcely been five minutes in the laboratory, before Mackenzie, who was lounging about the room, sneeringly took notice of a large hole in his shoe. „It is easily mended, said the independent youth; and he immediately left the laboratory, and went to a cobbler's, who lived in a narrow lane, at the back of Dr. Campbell's house. Forester had, from his bed-chamber window, seen this cobbler at work early every morning; he admired his industry, and longed to be acquainted with him. The good-humoured familiarity of Forester's manner pleased the cobbler, who was likewise diverted by the eagerness of the young gentleman to mend his own shoe. After spending some hours at the cobbler's stall, the shoe was actually mended, and Forester thought that his morning's work was worthy of admiration. In a court (or, as such places are called in Edinburgh, a close) near the cobbler's, he saw some boys playing at ball: he joined them; and, whilst they were playing, a dancing-master, with his hair powdered, and who seemed afraid of spattering his clean stockings, passed through the court, and interrupted the ball-players for a few seconds. The boys, as soon as the man was out of hearing, declared that he passed through their court regularly twice a day, and that he always kicked their marbles out of the ring. Without staying to weigh this evidence scrupulously, Forester received it with avidity, and believed all that had been asserted was true, because the accused was a dancing-master: from his education he had conceived an antipathy to dancing-masters, especially to such as wore silk stockings, and had their heads well powdered. Easily fired at the idea of any injustice, and eager to redress the grievances of the poor, Forester immediately concerted with these boys a scheme to deliver them from what he called the insolence of the dancing-master, and promised that he would compel him to go round by another street.

In his zeal for the liberty of his new companions, our hero did not consider, that he was infringing upon the liberties of a man, who had never done him any injury, and over whom he had no right to exercise any control.

Upon his return to Dr. Campbell's, Forester heard the sound of a violin; and he found that his enemy, M. Pasgrave, the dancing-master, was attending Archibald Mackenzie: he learnt, that he was engaged to give another lesson the next evening; and the plans of the confederates in the ball-alley were arranged accordingly. In Dr. Campbell's room Forester remembered to have seen a skeleton in a glass case; he seized upon it, carried it down to his companions, and placed it in a niche in the wall, on the landing place of a flight of stone stairs down which the dancing-master was obliged to go. A butcher's son one of Forester's new companions he instructed to stand at a certain hour behind the skeleton, with two rushlights; which he was to hold up to the eye holes in the skull.

The dancing-master's steps were heard approaching at the expected hour; and the boys stood in ambush to enjoy the diversion of the sight. It was a dark night; the fiery eyes of the skeleton glared suddenly upon the dancing-master, who was so terrified at the spectacle, and in such haste to escape, that his foot slipped, and he fell down the stone steps; his ankle was sprained by the fall, and he was brought back to Dr. Campbell's. Forester was shocked at this tragical end of his intended comedy. The poor man was laid upon a bed, and he writhed with pain. Forester, with vehement expressions of concern, explained to Dr. Campbell the cause of this accident, and he was much touched by the dancing-master's good nature, who, between every twinge of pain, assured him that he should soon be well, and endeavoured to avert Dr. Campbell's displeasure. Forester sat beside the bed, reproaching himself bitterly; and he was yet more sensible of his folly, when he heard, that the boys, whose part he had hastily taken, had frequently amused themselves with playing mischievous tricks upon this inoffensive man, who declared, that he had never purposely kicked their marbles out of the ring, but had always implored them to make way for him with all the civility in his power.

Forester resolved, that, before he ever again attempted to do justice, he would, at least, hear both sides of the question.

The Alarm.

Forester would willingly have sat up all night with Pasgrave, to foment his ankle from time to time, and, if possible, to assuage the pain: but the man would not suffer him to sit up, and about twelve o'clock he retired to rest. He had scarcely fallen asleep, when his door opened, and Archibald Mackenzie roused him, by demanding, in a peremptory tone, how he could sleep when the whole family were frightened out of their wits by his prank?

„Is the dancing-master worse? — What's the matter?" exclaimed Forester, in great terror.

Archibald replied, that he was not talking or thinking about the dancing-master, and desired Forester to make haste and dress himself, and that he would then soon hear what was the matter.

Forester dressed himself as fast as he could, and followed Archibald through a long passage, which led to a back staircase. „Do you hear the noise?“ said Archibald.

„Not I,“ said Forester.

„Well, you'll hear it plain enough presently,“ said Archibald; „follow me down stairs.“

He followed, and was surprised, when he got into the hall, to find all the family assembled. Lady Catherine had been awakened by a noise, which she at first imagined to be the screaming of an infant. Her bed-chamber was on the ground floor, and adjoining to Dr. Campbell's laboratory, from which the noise seemed to proceed. She wakened her son Archibald and Mrs. Campbell; and, when she recovered her senses a little, she listened to Dr. Campbell, who assured her, that what her ladyship thought was the screaming of an infant was the noise of a cat! the screams of this cat were terrible; and, when the light approached the door of the laboratory, the animal flew at the door with so much fury, that nobody could venture to open it. Every body looked at Forester, as if they suspected that he had confined the cat, or that he was in some way or other the cause of the disturbance. The cat, who, from his having constantly fed and played with him, had grown extremely fond of him, used to follow him often from room to room: and he now recollected, that it followed him the preceding evening into the laboratory, when he went to replace the skeleton. He had not observed whether it came out of the room again, nor could he now conceive the cause of its yelling in this horrible manner. The animal seemed to be mad with pain. Dr. Campbell asked his son, whether all the presses were locked. Henry said he was sure that they were all locked. It was his business to lock them every evening; and he was so exact, that nobody doubted his accuracy.

Archibald Mackenzie, who all this time knew, or at least suspected the truth, held himself in cunning silence. The preceding evening, he, for want of something to do, had strolled into the laboratory, and, with the pure curiosity of idleness, peeped into the presses, and took the stoppers out of several of the bottles. Dr. Campbell happened to come in, and carelessly asked him if he had been looking in the presses; to which question Archibald, though with scarcely any motive for telling a falsehood, immediately replied in the negative. As the doctor turned his head, Archibald put aside a bottle, which he had just before taken out of the press, and, fearing that the noise of replacing the glass stopper would betray him, he slipped it into his waistcoat pocket. How much useless cunning! All this transaction was now fully present to Archibald's memory; and he was well convinced that Henry had not seen the bottle when he afterwards went to lock the presses: that the cat had thrown it down; and that this was the cause of all the yelling that disturbed the house. Archibald, however, kept his lips fast closed; he had told one falsehood; he dreaded to have it discovered; and he hoped the blame of the whole affair would rest upon Forester. At length the animal flew with diminished fury at the door; its screams became feebler and feebler, till, at last, they totally ceased. There was silence: Dr. Campbell opened the door: the cat was seen stretched upon the ground, apparently lifeless. As Forester looked nearer at the poor animal, he saw a twitching motion in one of its hind legs: Dr. Campbell said, that it was the convulsion of death. Forester was just going to lift up his cat, when his friend Henry stopped his hand, telling him that he would burn himself, if he touched it. The hair and flesh of the cat on one side were burnt away, quite to the bone. Henry pointed to the broken bottle, which, he said, had contained vitriolic acid.

Henry in vain attempted to discover by whom the bottle of vitriolic acid had been taken out of its place. The suspicions naturally fell upon Forester, who, by his own account, was the last person in the room before the presses had been locked for the night. Forester, in warm terms, asserted, that he knew nothing of the matter. Dr. Campbell coolly observed, that Forester ought not to be surprised at being suspected upon this occasion; because every body had the greatest reason to suspect the person, whom they had detected in one practical joke, of planning another.

„Joke!" said Forester, looking down upon his lifeless favourite: „Do you think me capable of such cruelty? Do you doubt my truth?" exclaimed Forester, haughtily. „You are unjust. Turn me out of your house this instant. I do not desire your protection, if I have forfeited your esteem."

„Go to bed for to-night in my house," said Dr. Campbell; „moderate your enthusiasm, and reflect upon what has passed coolly."

Dr. Campbell, as Forester indignantly withdrew, said, with a benevolent smile, as he looked after him, „He wants nothing but a little common sense. Henry, you must give him a little of yours."

In the morning, Forester first went to inquire how the dancing-master had slept; and then knocked impatiently at Dr. Campbell's door.

„My father is not awake," said Henry; „but Forester marched directly up to the side of the bed, and, drawing back the curtain with no gentle hand, cried, with a loud voice, „Dr. Campbell, I am come to beg your pardon. I was angry when I said you were unjust."

„And I was asleep when you begged my pardon," said Dr. Campbell, rubbing his eyes.

„The dancing-master's ankle is a great deal better; and I have buried the poor cat," pursued Forester: „and I hope, now, doctor, you'll at least tell me, that you do not really suspect me of any hand in her death."

„Pray let me go to sleep," said Dr. Campbell, „and time your explanations a little better."

The Geranium

The dancing-master gradually recovered from his sprain; and Forester spent all his pocket money in buying a new violin for him, as his had been broken in his fall; his watch had likewise been broken against the stone steps. Though Forester looked upon a watch as a useless bauble, yet he determined to get this mended; and his friend Henry went with him for this purpose to a watchmaker's.

While Henry Campbell and Forester were consulting with the watchmaker upon the internal state of the bruised watch, Archibald Mackenzie, who followed them for a lounge, was looking over some new watches, and ardently wishing for the finest that he saw. As he was playing with this fine watch, the watchmaker begged that he would take care not to break it.

Archibald, in the insolent tone in which he was used to speak to a tradesman, replied, that, if he did break it, he hoped he was able to pay for it. The watchmaker civilly answered, „he had no doubt of that, but that the watch was not his property; it was Sir Philip Gosling's, who would call for it, he expected, in a quarter of an hour."

At the name of Sir Philip Gosling, Archibald quickly changed his tone: he had a great ambition to be of Sir Philip's acquaintance; for Sir Philip was a young man who was to have a large fortune, when he should come of age, and who, in the mean time, spent as much of it as possible, with great spirit and little judgment. He had been sent to Edinburgh for his education; and he spent his time in training horses, laying bets, parading in the public walks, and ridiculing, or, in his own phrase, quizzing every sensible young man, who applied to literature or science. Sir Philip, whenever he frequented any of the professor's classes, took care to make it evident to every body present, that he did not come there to learn, and that he looked down with contempt upon all who were obliged to study; he was the first always to make any disturbance in the classes, or, in his elegant language, to make a row.

This was the youth of whose acquaintance Archibald Mackenzie was ambitious. He stayed in the shop, in hopes that Sir Philip would arrive: he was not disappointed; Sir Philip came, and with an address, which lady Catherine would perhaps have admired, Archibald entered into conversation with the young baronet, if conversation that might be called, which consisted of a species of fashionable dialect, devoid of sense, and destitute of any pretence to wit. To Forester this dialect was absolutely unintelligible: after he had listened to it with sober contempt for a few minutes, he pulled Henry away, saying, „Come, don't let us waste our time here; let us go to the brewery that you promised to show me."

Henry did not immediately yield to the rough pull of his indignant friend; for, at this instant, the door of a little back parlour behind the watchmaker's shop opened slowly, and a girl of about seven years old appeared, carrying, with difficulty, a flower-pot, in which there was a fine large geranium in full flower. Henry, who saw that the child was scarcely able to carry it, took it out of her hands, and asked her, „Where she would like to have it put?"

„Here, for to-day!" said the little girl, sorrowfully; „but to-morrow, it goes away for ever!"

The little girl was sorry to part with this geranium, because „she had watched it all the winter," and said, „that she was very fond of it, but that she was willing to part with it, though it was just come into flower, because the apothecary had told her, that it was the cause of her grandmother's having been taken ill. Her grandmother lodged," she said, „in that little room, and the room was very close, and she was taken ill in the night — so ill that she could hardly speak or stir; and when the apothecary came, he said," continued the little girl, „it was no wonder any body was ill, who slept in such a little close room, with such a great geranium in it, to poison the air. So my geranium must go!" concluded she with a sigh; „but as it is for grandmother, I shall never think of it again."

Henry Campbell and Forester were both struck with the modest simplicity of this child's countenance and manner, and they were pleased with the unaffected generosity with which she gave up her favourite geranium.

Forester noted this down in his mind, as a fresh instance in favour of his exclusive good opinion of the poor. This little girl looked poor, though she was decently dressed; she was so thin, that her little cheek bones could plainly be seen; her face had not the round, rosy beauty of cheerful health: she was pale and sallow, and she looked in patient misery. Moved with compassion, Forester regretted that he had no money to give, where it might have been so well bestowed. He was always extravagant in his generosity; he would often give five guineas where five shillings should have been given, and by these means he reduced himself to the necessity sometimes of refusing assistance to deserving objects. On his journey from his father's house to Edinburgh, he lavished, in undistinguishing charity, a considerable sum of money; and all that he had remaining of this money he spent in purchasing the new violin for M. Pasgrave. Dr. Campbell absolutely refused to advance his ward any money, till his next quarterly allowance should become due. Henry who always perceived quickly what passed in the minds of others, guessed at Forester's thoughts by his countenance, and forbore to produce his own money, though he had it just ready in his hand: he knew that he could call again at the watchmaker's, and give what he pleased, without ostentation.

Upon questioning the little girl farther, concerning her grandmother's illness, Henry discovered, that the old woman had sat up late at night knitting, and that, feeling herself extremely cold, she got a pan of charcoal into her room; that, soon afterwards, she felt uncommonly drowsy; and when her little granddaughter spoke to her, and asked her, why she did not come to bed? she made no answer: a few minutes after this she dropped from her chair.

(To be continued in our next.)

Das BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Die Postämter versenden die Nummern wöchentlich, die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnement-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monat 1 Thlr. [illegible] Ein Abonnement unter 26 Nummern findet nicht Statt. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Postämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nº 6.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Continued from our last.)

The child was extremely frightened, and though she felt it very difficult to rouse herself, she said, she got up as fast as she could, opened the door, and called to the watchmaker's wife, who luckily had been at work late, and was now raking the kitchen fire. With her assistance the old woman was brought into the air, and presently returned to her senses: the pan of charcoal had been taken away before the apothecary came in the morning; as he was in a great hurry when he called, he made but few inquiries, and consequently condemned the geranium without sufficient evidence. As he left the house, he carelessly said, „my wife would like that geranium, I think.“ And the poor old woman, who had but a very small fee to offer, was eager to give any thing that seemed to please the doctor.

Forester, when he heard this story, burst into a contemptuous exclamation against the meanness of this and of all other apothecaries. Henry informed the little girl, that the charcoal had been the cause of her grandmother's illness, and advised them never, upon any account, to keep a pan of charcoal again in her bedchamber; he told her, that many people had been killed by this practice. „Then,“ cried the little girl, joyfully, „If it was the charcoal, and not the geranium, that made grandmother ill, I may keep my beautiful geranium;“ and she ran immediately to gather some of the flowers, which she offered to Henry and to Forester. Forester, who was still absorbed in the contemplation of the apothecary's meanness, took the flowers, without perceiving that he took them, and pulled them to pieces as he went on thinking. Henry, when the little girl held the geraniums up to him, observed that the back of her hand was bruised and black; he asked her how she had hurt herself, and she replied innocently, „that she had not hurt herself, but that her schoolmistress was a very strict woman.“ Forester, roused from his reverie, desired to hear what the little girl meant by a strict woman, and she explained herself more fully: she said, that, as a favour, her grandmother had obtained leave from some great lady to send her to a charity-school: that she went there every day to learn to read and work, but that the mistress of the charity-school used her scholars very severely, had often kept them for hours, after they had done their own tasks, to spin for her; and that she beat them if they did not spin as much as she expected. The little girl's grandmother then said, that she knew all this, but that she did not dare to complain, because the schoolmistress was under the patronage of some of „the grandest ladies in Edinburgh,“ and that, as she could not afford to pay for her little [illegible]'s schooling, she was forced to have her taught as well as she could for nothing.

Forester, fired with indignation at this history of injustice, resolved, at all events, to stand forth immediately in the child's defence; but, without staying to consider how the wrong could be redressed, he thought only of the quickest, or, as he said, the most manly means of doing the business: he declared, that if the little girl would show him the way to the school, he would go that instant and speak to the woman in the midst of all her scholars. Henry in vain represented, that this would not be a prudent mode of proceeding.

Forester disdained prudence, and, trusting securely to the power of his own eloquence, he set out with the child, who seemed rather afraid to come to open war with her tyrant. Henry was obliged to return home to his father, who had usually business for him to do about this time. The little girl had staid at home on account of her grandmother's illness, but all the other scholars were hard at work, spinning in a close room, when Forester arrived.

He marched directly into the school-room. The wheels stopped at once on his appearance, and the schoolmistress, a raw-boned intrepid-looking woman, eyed him with amazement; he broke silence in the following words: —

„Vile woman, your injustice is come to light! How can you dare to tyrannise over these poor children? Is it because they are poor? Take my advice, children, resist this tyrant, put by your wheels, and spin for her no more."

The children did not move, and the schoolmistress poured out a torrent of abuse in broad Scotch, which, to the English ear of Forester, was unintelligible. At length she made him comprehend her principal questions — Who he was? and by whose authority he interfered between her and her scholars? „By nobody's authority," was Forester's answer; „I want no authority to speak in the cause of injured innocence." No sooner had the woman heard these words, than she called to her husband, who was writing in an adjoining room: without further ceremony, they both seized upon our hero, and turned him out of the house.

The woman revenged herself without mercy upon the little girl, whom Forester had attempted to defend, and dismissed her, with advice never more to complain of being obliged to spin for her mistress.

Mortified by the ill success of his enterprise, Forester returned home, attributing the failure of his eloquence chiefly to his ignorance of the Scotch dialect.

The Canary Bird.

At his return, Forester heard, that all Dr. Campbell's family were going that evening to visit a gentleman, who had an excellent cabinet of minerals. He had some desire to see the fossils; but, when he came to the gentleman's house, he soon found himself disturbed at the praises bestowed by some ladies in company upon a little canary bird, which belonged to the mistress of the house. He began to kick his feet together, to hang first one arm and then the other, over the back of his chair, with the obvious expression of impatience and contempt in his countenance. Henry Campbell, in the mean time, said, without any embarrassment, just what he thought about the bird. Archibald Mackenzie, with artificial admiration, said a vast deal more than he thought, in hopes of effectually recommending himself to the lady of the house. The lady told him the history of three birds, which had successively inhabited the cage before the present occupier. „They all died," continued she, „in a most extraordinary manner, one after another, in a short space of time, in convulsions."

„Don't listen," whispered Forester, pulling Henry away from the crowd who surrounded the bird-cage; „how can you listen, like that polite hypocrite, to this foolish woman's history of her extraordinary favourites? Come down stairs with me, I want to tell you my adventure with the schoolmistress: we can take a turn in the hall and come back, before the cabinet of minerals is opened, and before these women have finished the ceremony of tea-come."

„I'll come presently," said Henry; „I really want to hear this."

Henry Campbell was not listening to the history of the lady's favourite birds like a polite hypocrite, but like a good-natured sensible person, the circumstances recalled to his memory the conversation that we formerly mentioned, which began about pickled cucumbers, and ended with Dr. Campbell's giving an account of the effects of some poisons. In consequence of this conversation, Henry's attention had been turned to the subject, and he had read several essays, which had informed him of many curious facts. He recollected, in particular, to have met with the account of a bird, which had been poisoned, and whose case bore a strong resemblance to the present. He begged leave to examine the cage, in order to discover whether there were any lead about it, with which the birds could have poisoned themselves. No lead was to be found: he next examined whether there were any white or green paint about it; he inquired whence the water came which the birds had drunk; and he examined the trough which held their seeds. The lady, whilst he was pursuing these inquiries, said she was sure that the birds could not have died either for want of air or exercise, for that she often left the cage open on purpose, that they might fly about the room. Henry immediately looked round the room, and at length he observed, in an inkstand, which stood upon a writing table, a number of wafers, which were many of them chipped round the edges; upon sweeping out the birdcage, he found a few very small bits of wafer mixed with the seeds and dust; he was now persuaded that the birds had eaten the wafers, and that they had been poisoned by the red-lead which they contained; he was confirmed in this opinion, by being told, that the wafers had lately been missed very frequently, and it had been imagined that they had been used by the servants. Henry begged the lady would try an experiment, which might probably save the life of her new favourite; the lady, though she had never before tried an experiment, was readily prevailed upon. She promised Henry, that she would lock up the wafers; and he prophesied that her bird would not, like his predecessors, come to an untimely end. Archibald Mackenzie was vexed to observe, that knowledge had in this instance succeeded better even with a lady, than flattery. As for Forester, he would certainly have admired his friend Henry's ingenuity, if he had been attending to what had passed; but he had taken a book, and had seated himself in an arm-chair, which had been placed on purpose for an old gentleman in the company, and was deep in the history of a man, who had been cast away, some hundred years ago, upon a desert island.

He condescended, however, to put down his book when the fossils where produced; and, as if he had just awakened from a dream, rubbed his eyes, stretched himself, and joined the rest of the company. The malicious Archibald, who observed that Forester had seated himself, through absence of mind, in a place which prevented some of the ladies from seeing the fossils, instantly made a parade of his own politeness, to contrast himself advantageously with the rude negligence of his companion: but Archibald's politeness was always particularly directed to the persons in company, whom he thought of the most importance. „You can't see there," said Forester, suddenly rousing himself, and observing that Dr. Campbell's daughter, miss Flora Campbell, was standing behind him, „had not you better sit down in this chair? I don't want it, because I can see over your head; sit down." Archibald smiled at Forester's simplicity, in paying this awkward compliment to the young lady, who had, according to his mode of estimating, the least pretensions to notice of any one present. Flora Campbell was neither rich nor beautiful, but she had a happy mixture in her manner of Scottish sprightliness and English reserve. She had an eager desire to improve herself, whilst a nice sense of propriety taught her never to intrude upon general notice, or to recede from conversation with airs of counterfeit humility. Forester admired her abilities, because he imagined that he was the only person who had ever discovered them: as to her manners, he never observed them; but even whilst he ridiculed politeness, he was anxious to find out what she thought polite. After he had told her all that he knew concerning the fossils, as they were produced from the cabinet, and he was far from ignorant, he at length perceived, that she knew full as much of natural history as he did, and he was surprised that a young lady should know so much, and should not be conceited. Flora, however, soon sunk many degrees in his opinion; for, after the cabinet of mineralogy was shut, some of the company talked of a ball, which was to be given in a few days, and Flora, with innocent gaiety, said to Forester, „Have you learned to dance a Scotch reel since you came to Scotland?“ — „I,“ cried Forester with contempt, „do you think it the height of human perfection to dance a Scotch reel? — then that fine young laird, Mr. Archibald Mackenzie, will suit you much better than I shall.“

And Forester returned to his arm-chair and his desert island.

The Fete

It was unfortunate, that Forester retired from company in such abrupt displeasure at Flora Campbell's question; for, had he bore the idea of a Scotch reel more like a philosopher, he would have heard of something interesting relative to the intended ball, if any thing relative to a ball could be interesting to him. It was a charity ball, for the benefit of the mistress of the very charity-school to which the little girl with the bruised hand belonged. „Do you know,“ said Henry to Forester, when they met, „that I have great hopes we shall be able to get justice done to the poor children. I hope the tyrannical schoolmistress may yet be punished. The lady, with whom we drank tea yesterday, is one of the patronesses of the charity-school.“

„Lady patronesses!“ cried Forester, „we need not expect justice from a lady patroness, depend upon it, especially at a ball; her head will be full of feathers, or some such things. I prophesy you will not succeed better than I have.“

The desponding prophecies of Forester did not deter Henry from pursuing a scheme which he had formed. The lady, who was the mistress of the canary bird, came in a few days to visit his mother, and she told him, that his experiment had succeeded, that she had regularly locked up the wafers, and that her favourite bird was in perfect health. „And what fee, doctor,“ said she, smiling, „shall I give you for saving his life?“

„I will tell you in a few minutes,“ replied Henry; and in a few minutes the little girl and her geranium were sent for, and appeared. Henry told the lady all the circumstances of her story with so much feeling, and, at the same time, with so much propriety, that she became warmly interested in the cause: she declared, that she would do every thing in her power to prevail upon the other ladies to examine into the conduct of the schoolmistress, and to have her dismissed immediately, if it should appear, that she had behaved improperly.

Forester, who was present at this declaration, was much astonished, that a lady, whom he had seen caressing a canary bird, could speak with so much decision and good sense. Henry obtained his fee: he asked and received permission to place the geranium in the middle of the supper-table at the ball. Henry begged, that the lady would also take an opportunity, at supper, to mention the circumstances which he had related to her; but this she declined, and politely said, that she was sure Henry would tell the story much better than she could.

„Come out and walk with me,“ said Forester to Henry, as soon as the lady was gone. Henry frequently left his occupations with great good nature, to accompany our hero in his rambles, and he usually followed the subjects of conversation which Forester started. He saw, by the gravity of his countenance, that he had something of importance revolving in his mind. After he had proceeded in silence for some time along the walk, under the high rock called Arthur's Seat, he suddenly stopped, and turning to Henry, exclaimed, „I esteem you; do not make me despise you!“

„I hope I never shall,“ said Henry, a little surprised by his friend's manner: „what is the matter?"

„Leave balls, and lady patronesses, and petty artifices, and supple address, to such people as Archibald Mackenzie," pursued Forester, with enthusiasm.

„Who noble ends by noble means obtains —"
„Will scorn canary birds, and cobble shoes," replied Henry, laughing: „I see no meanness in my conduct: I do not know what it is that you disapprove."

„I do not approve," said Forester, „of your having recourse to mean address to obtain justice."

Henry requested to know what his severe friend meant by address; but this was not easily explained. Forester, in his definition of mean address, included all that attention to the feelings of others, all those honest arts of pleasing, which make society agreeable. Henry endeavoured to convince him, that it was possible for a person to wish to please, nay, even to succeed in that wish, without being insincere. Their argument and their walk continued, till Henry, who, though very active, was not quite so robust as his friend, was completely tired, especially as he perceived that Forester's opinions remained unshaken.

„How effeminate you gentlemen are!" cried Forester: „see what it is to be brought up in the lap of luxury. Why, I am not at all tired; I could walk a dozen miles farther, without being in the least fatigued!"

Henry thought it a very good thing to be able to walk a number of miles without being fatigued, but he did not consider it as the highest perfection of human nature. In his friend's present mood, nothing less could content him, and Forester went on to demonstrate to the weary Henry, that all fortitude, all courage, and all the manly virtues, were inseparably connected with pedestrian indefatigability. Henry, with good-natured presence of mind, which perhaps his friend would have called mean address, diverted our hero's rising indignation by proposing, that they should both go and look at the large brewery, which was in their way home, and with which Forester would, he thought, be entertained.

The brewery fortunately turned the course of Forester's thoughts, and, instead of quarrelling with his friend for being tired, he condescended to postpone all further debate. Forester had, from his childhood, a habit of twirling a key, whenever he was thinking intently: the key had been produced, and had been twirling upon its accustomed thumb during the argument upon address; and it was still in Forester's hand, when they went into the brewery. As he looked and listened, the key was committed to his power of attending; at length, as he stooped to view a large brewing vat, the key unluckily slipped from his thumb, and fell to the bottom of the vat: it was so deep, that the tinkling sound of the key, as it touched the bottom, was scarcely heard. A young man, who belonged to the brewery, immediately descended, by a ladder, into the vat to get the key, but scarcely had he reached the bottom, when he fell down senseless. Henry Campbell was speaking to one of the clerks of the brewery when this accident happened: a man came running to them with the news, „The vat has not been cleaned; it's full of bad air." „Draw him up, let down a hook and cords for him instantly, or he's a dead man," cried Henry, and he instantly ran to the place. What was his terror, when he beheld Forester descending the ladder! He called to him to stop; he assured him that the man could be saved without his hazarding his life; but Forester persisted; he had one end of a cord in his hand, which he said he could fasten in an instant round the man's body. There was a sky-light nearly over the vat, so that the light fell directly upon the bottom.

Henry saw his friend reach the last rung of the ladder. As Forester stooped to put the rope round the shoulders of the man, who lay insensible, at the bottom of the vat, a sudden air of idiocy came over his animated countenance; his limbs seemed no longer to obey his will; his arms dropped, and he fell insensible.

The spectators, who were looking down from above, were so much terrified, that they could not decide to do any thing: some cried, „He's all over with him! Why would he go down?" „Others ran to procure a hook — others called to him to take up the rope again, if he possibly could: but Forester could not hear or understand them. Henry Campbell was the only person who, in this scene of danger and confusion, had sufficient presence of mind to be of service.

Near the large vat, into which Forester had descended, there was a cistern, of cold water. Henry seized a bucket, which was floating in the cistern, filled it with water, and emptied the water into the vat, dashing it against the sides of the vat, to disperse the water, and to displace the mephitic air. He called the people, who surrounded him, for assistance; the water expelled the air; and, when it was safe to descend, Henry instantly went down the ladder himself, and fastened the cord round Forester, who was now quite helpless.

„Draw him up!" said Henry. They drew him up. Henry fastened another cord round the body of the other man, who lay at the bottom of the vessel, and he was taken up in the same manner. Forester soon returned to his senses, when he was carried into the air; it was with more difficulty that the other man, whose animation had been longer suspended, was recovered; at length, however, by proper applications, his lungs played freely, he stretched himself, looked round upon the people who were about him with an air of astonishment, and was some time before he could recollect what had happened to him. Forester, as soon as he had recovered the use of his understanding, was in extreme anxiety to know whether the poor man, who went down for his key, had been saved. His gratitude to Henry, when he heard all that had passed, was expressed in the most enthusiastic manner.

„I acted like a madman, and you like a man of sense," said Forester. „You always know how to do good: I do mischief, whenever I attempt to do good. — But now, don't expect, Henry, that I should give up any of my opinions to you, because you have saved my life. I shall always argue with you just as I did before. Remember, I despise address. I don't yield a single point to you. Gratitude shall never make me a sycophant."

The Flower-Pot.

Eager to prove that he was not a sycophant, Forester, when he returned home with his friend Henry, took every possible occasion to contradict him, with even more than his customary rigidity; nay, he went farther still, to vindicate his sincerity.

Flora Campbell had never entirely recovered our hero's esteem, since she had unwittingly expressed her love for Scotch reels; but she was happily unconscious of the crime she had committed, and was wholly intent upon pleasing her father and mother, her brother Henry, and herself. She had a constant flow of good spirits, and the engaging domestic talent of making every trifle a source of amusement to herself and others: she was sprightly, without being frivolous; and the uniform sweetness of her temper showed, that she was not in the least in want of flattery, or dissipation, to support her gaiety. But Forester, as the friend of her brother, thought it incumbent upon him to discover faults in her, which no one else could discover, and to assist in her education, though she was only one year younger than himself. She had amused herself, the morning, that Forester and her brother were in the brewing vat, with painting a pasteboard covering for the flowerpot which held the poor little girl's geranium. Flora had heard from her brother of his intention to place it in the middle of the supper table, at the ball; and she flattered herself, that he would like to see it ornamented by her hands at his return. She produced it after dinner. Henry thanked her, and her father and mother were pleased to see her eagerness to oblige her brother. — The cynical Forester alone refused his sympathy. He looked at the flowerpot with marked disdain. Archibald, who delighted to contrast himself with the unpolished Forester, and who remarked that Flora and her brother were both somewhat surprised at his unaudible silence, slily said, „There's something in this flower-pot, miss Campbell, which does not suit Mr. Forester's correct taste; I wish he would allow us to profit by his criticisms."

Forester vouchsafed not a reply.

„Don't you like it, Forester?" said Henry.

„No, he does not like it," said Flora, smiling; „don't force him to say that he does."

„Force me to say I like what I don't like!" repeated Forester; „no, I defy any body to do that."

„But why," said Dr. Campbell, laughing, „why such a waste of energy and magnanimity about a trifle? If you were upon your trial for life or death, Mr. Forester, you could not look more resolutely guarded, more as if you had „worked up each corporal agent to the terrible feat?"

„Sir, said Forester, who bore the laugh, that was raised against him, with the air of a martyr, „I can bear even your ridicule in the cause of truth." The laugh continued at the solemnity with which he pronounced these words. „I think," pursued Forester, „that those, who do not respect truth in trifles, will never respect it in matters of consequence."

Archibald Mackenzie laughed more loudly, and with affectation, at this speech; and Henry and Dr. Campbell's laughter instantly ceased.

„Do not mistake us," said Dr. Campbell; „we did not laugh at your principles, we only laughed at your manner."

„And are not principles of rather more consequence than manners?" said Forester.

„Of infinitely more consequence," said Dr. Campbell: „but why to excellent principles, may we not add agreeable manners? Why should not truth be amiable, as well as respectable? You, that have such enlarged views for the good of the whole human race, are, I make no doubt, desirous that your fellow-creatures should love truth, as well as you love it yourself?"

„Certainly, I wish they did," said Forester.

„And have your observations upon the feelings of others, and upon your own, led you to conclude, that we are most apt to like those things which always give us pain? And do you, upon this principle, wish to make truth as painful as possible, in order to increase our love for it?"

„I don't wish to make truth painful," said Forester; but, at the same time, it is not my fault if people can't bear pain. I think people who cannot bear pain, both of body and mind, cannot be good for any thing; for, in the first place, they will always," said Forester, glancing his eye at Flora and her flower-pot; „they will always prefer flattery to truth, as all weak people do."

At this sarcastic reflection, which seemed to be aimed at the sex, lady Catherine, Mrs. Campbell, and all the ladies present, except Flora, began to speak at once in their own vindication.

As soon as there was any prospect of peace, Dr. Campbell resumed his argument, in the calmest voice imaginable.

„But, Mr. Forester, without troubling ourselves for the present with the affairs of the ladies, or of weak people, may I ask what degree of unnecessary pain you think it the duty of a strong person, a moral Samson, to bear?"

„Unnecessary pain! I do not think it is any body's duty to bear unnecessary pain."

„Nor to make others bear it?"

„Nor to make others bear it."

„Then we need argue no farther. I congratulate you, Mr. Forester, upon your becoming so soon a proselyte to politeness."

„To politeness!" said Forester, starting back.

„Yes, my good sir; real politeness only teaches us to save others from unnecessary pain, and this you have just allowed to be your wish. — And now for the grand affair of Flora's flower-pot. You are not bound by politeness to tell any falsehoods; weak as she is, and a woman, I hope she can bear to hear the painful truth upon such an important occasion."

„Why," said Forester, who at last suffered his features to relax into a smile, „the truth then is, that I don't know whether the flower-pot be pretty or ugly, but I was determined not to say it was pretty."

„But why," said Henry, „did you look so heroically severe about the matter?"

„The reason I looked grave," said Forester, „was, because I was afraid your sister Flora would be spoiled by all the foolish compliments that were paid to her and her flower pot."

„You are very considerate; and Flora, I am sure, is much obliged to you," said Dr. Campbell, smiling, „for being so clear-sighted to the dangers of female vanity. You would not then, with a safe conscience, trust the completion of her education to her mother, or to myself?"

„I am sure, sir," said Forester, who now, for the first time, seemed sensible that he had not spoken with perfect propriety, „I would not interfere impertinently for the world. You are the best judges; only I thought parents were apt to be partial. Henry has saved my life, and I am interested for every thing that belongs to him. So I hope, if I said any thing rude, you will attribute it to a good motive. I wish the flower-pot had never made its appearance, for it has made me appear very impertinent."

Flora laughed with so much good humour at this odd method of expressing his contrition, that even Forester acknowledged the influence of engaging manners and sweetness of temper. He lifted up the flower-pot, so as completely to screen his face, and, whilst he appeared to be examining it he said, in a low voice, to Henry, „She is above the foibles of her sex."

„Oh, Mr. Forester, take care!" cried Flora.

„Of what?" said Forester, starting.

„It is too late now," said Flora.

And it was too late: — Forester, in his awkward manner of lifting the flower-pot, and its painted case, had put his thumbs into the mould, with which the flower-pot had been newly filled. It was quite soft and wet. Flora, when she called to him, saw the two black thumbs just ready to stamp themselves upon her work, and her warning only accelerated its fate; for the instant she spoke, the thumbs closed upon the painted covering, and Forester was the last to perceive the mischief that he had done.

There was no possibility of effacing the stains, nor was there time to repair the damage, for the ball was to commence in a few hours, and Flora was obliged to send her disfigured work, without having had the satisfaction of hearing the ejaculation, which Forester pronounced in her praise behind the flower-pot.

(To be continued in our next.)

Song from the Beacon.

By Joanna Baillie.

Wish'd-for gales the light vane veering,
Better dreams the dull night cheering,
Lighter heart the morning greeting,
Things of better omen meeting;
Eyes each passing stranger watching,
Ears each feeble rumour catching,
Say, he existeth still on earthly ground,
The absent will return, the long, long lost be found.

In the tower the ward-bell ringing,
In the court the carols singing;
Busy hands the gay board dressing,
Eager steps the threshold pressing;
Open'd arms in haste advancing,
Joyful looks through blind tears glancing;
The gladsome bounding of his aged hound,
Say, he in truth is here, our long, long lost is found.

Hymned thanks and bedesmen praying,
With sheathed sword the urchin playing;
Blazon'd hall with torches burning,
Cheerful morn in peace returning,
Converse sweet that strangely borrows
Present bliss from former sorrows —
O, who can tell each blessed sight and sound,
That says, he with us bides, our long, long lost is found!

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. № 7.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

George Crabbe.

Dieſer glücklichſte Genremaler unter den neueren Dichtern Albions ward am 24. December 1754 in Aldborough in Suffolk, wo ſein Vater als Zollbeamter lebte, geboren. Zum Wundarzte beſtimmt, ergriff er dieſen Beruf nur ungern, und ging 1778 durch das Gewinnen eines Preiſes für das gelungenſte Gedicht auf die Hoffnung ermuthigt, nach London mit dem beſten Willen, aber mit ſehr geringen Mitteln ausgerüſtet, um dort ſein Glück zu verſuchen. Als ihm dies fehlſchlug, wandte er ſich vertrauensvoll an den berühmten Eduard Burke, der ſich ſeiner väterlich annahm. Er widmete ſich dem geiſtlichen Stande, wurde 1781 ordinirt, bekleidete ſeitdem nacheinander mehrere Würden in der engliſchen Kirche, (ſeit 1813 das Rectoral zu Trowbridge) und ſtarb zu Anfange des Jahres 1832. Die erſte vollſtändige Sammlung ſeiner Gedichte gab er ſelbſt 1819, unter dem Titel: Tales of the Hall, zu einem Ganzen vereinigt, heraus.

Scharfe Beobachtungsgabe, naturgetreue Darſtellung, genaue Kenntniß des menſchlichen Herzens, tiefes Gefühl und Liebe zum Edeln und Wahren, ſind die Hauptzüge von Crabbe's Muſe. Dazu geſellt ſich eine höchſt weltkluge, aber ſtets wohlwollende Ironie, die ſich mitunter gern zur Satyre verſchwiſtert. Der Dichter gefällt ſich faſt nur in Gegenſtänden des inneren Lebens, aber er behandelt Alles, was er berührt, mit einer ſolchen Zartheit und Feinheit, ohne je in das Schöne malen zu wollen, daß er zwar nicht den Leſer hinreißt, aber dagegen allmählich und dauernd deſſen Neigung zu gewinnen verſteht. Dabei iſt Alles echt und geſund, dem Leben bis auf die kleinſten Züge entlehnt, und doch, ſo gern Crabbe auch ſich in den geringſten Details ergeht, nie langweilig oder durch Monotonie ermüdend. Er weiß auch dem Unbedeutendſten einen eigenthümlichen Reiz zu verleihen, was um ſo mehr zu bewundern iſt, als er ſtets ſeine Perſönlichkeit ganz aus dem Spiele läßt und meiſtens ſehr ernſt verfährt.

Seine geſammelten Werke ſind in einer ſehr eleganten Ausgabe nach ſeinem Tode zu London, (1834, 8 Bände mit Vignetten) begleitet von ſeiner Biographie, erſchienen.

THE HALL OF JUSTICE.

By George Crabbe.

PART I.

Confiteor facere hoc annos; sed et altera causa est,
Anxietas animi, continuusque dolor.
Ovid.

Magistrate, Vagrant, Constable.

VAGRANT.

Take, take away thy barbarous hand,
And let me to thy master speak;
Remit awhile the harsh command,
And hear me, or my heart will break.

MAGISTRATE.

Fond wretch! and what canst thou relate,
But deeds of sorrow, shame, and sin?
Thy crime is proved, thou knowest thy fate;
But come, thy tale! — begin, begin! —

VAGRANT.

My crime! — — This sick'ning child to feed,
I seized the food, your witness saw;
I knew your laws forbade the deed,
But yielded to a stronger law.

Knowst thou, to Nature's great command
All human laws are frail and weak?
Nay! frown not — stay his eager hand,
And hear me, or my heart will break.

In this, th' adopted babe I hold
With anxious fondness to my breast,
My heart's sole comfort I behold,
More dear than life, when life was blest;
I saw her pining, fainting, cold,
I begg'd — but vain was my request.

I saw the tempting food, and seized —
My infant-sufferer found relief;
And, in the pilfer'd treasure pleased,
Smiled on my guilt, and hush'd my grief.

But I have griefs of other kind,
Troubles and sorrows more severe;
Give me to ease my tortured mind,
Lend to my woes a patient ear;
And let me — if I may not find
A friend to help — find one to hear.

Yet nameless let me plead — my name
Would only wake the cry of scorn;
A child of sin, conceived in shame,
Brought forth in woe, to misery born.

My mother dead, my father lost,
I wander'd with a vagrant crew;
A common care, a common cost,
Their sorrows and their sins I knew;
With them, by want or error forced,
Like them, I base and guilty grew.

Few are my years, not so my crimes;
The age, which these sad looks declare,
Is Sorrow's work, it is not Time's,
And I am old in shame and care.

Taught to believe the world a place
Where every stranger was a foe,
Train'd in the arts that mark our race,
To what new people could I go?
Could I a better life embrace,
Or live as virtue dictates? No! —

So through the land I wandering went,
And little found of grief or joy;
But lost my bosom's sweet content
When first I loved — the Gipsy-Boy.

A sturdy youth he was and tall,
His looks would all his soul declare,
His piercing eyes were deep and small,
And strongly curl'd his raven-hair.

Yes, Aaron had each manly charm,
All in the May of youthful pride,
He scarcely fear'd his father's arm,
And every other arm defied. —

Oft, when they grew in anger warm,
(Whom will not love and power divide?);
I rose, their wrathful souls to calm,
Not yet in sinful combat tried.

His father was our party's chief,
And dark and dreadful was his look;

His presence fill'd my heart with grief,
Although to me he kindly spoke.

With Aaron I delighted went,
His favour was my bliss and pride,
In growing hope our days we spent,
Love growing charms in either spied,
It saw them, all which Nature lent,
It lent them, all which she denied.

Could I the father's kindness prize,
Or grateful looks on him bestow,
Whom I beheld in wrath arise,
When Aaron sunk beneath his blow?

He drove him down with wicked hand,
It was a dreadful sight to see;
Then vex'd him, till he left the land,
And told his cruel love to me; —
The clan were all at his command,
Whatever his command might be.

The night was dark, the lanes were deep,
And one by one they took their way;
He bade me lay me down and sleep,
I only wept and wish'd for day.

Accursed be the love he bore,
Accursed was the force he used,
So let him of his God implore
For mercy, and be so refused!

You frown again — to show my wrong,
Can I in gentle language speak?
My woes are deep, my words are strong, —
And hear me, or my heart will break.

MAGISTRATE.

I hear thy words, I feel thy pain;
Forbear awhile to speak thy woes;
Receive our aid, and then again
The story of thy life disclose.

For, though seduced and led astray,
Thou'st travell'd far and wander'd long;
Thy God hath seen thee all the way,
And all the turns that led thee wrong.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Continued from our last.)

The Ball.

Henry seized the moment when Forester was softened by the mixed effect of Dr. Campbell's raillery and Flora's good humour, to persuade him, that he would be perfectly consistent with sound philosophy to dress himself for a ball, nay, even to dance a country-dance. The word reel, to which Forester had taken a dislike, Henry prudently forbore to mention; and Flora observing, and artfully imitating her brother's prudence, substituted the word jigs instead of reels in her conversation. When all the party were ready to go to the ball, and the carriages at the door, Forester was in Dr. Campbell's study, reading the natural history of the elephant.

„Come,“ said Henry, who had been searching for him all over the house, „we are waiting for you: I'm glad to see you dressed — come!“

„I wish you would leave me behind,“ said Forester, who seemed to have relapsed into his former unsociable humour, from having been left half an hour to his beloved solitude; nor would Henry probably have prevailed, if he had not pointed to the print of the elephant. „That mighty animal, you see, is so docile, that he lets himself be guided by a young boy,“ said Henry; „and so must you.“

As he spoke, he pulled Forester gently; who thought he could not show less docility than his favourite animal. When they entered the ball-room, Archibald Mackenzie asked Flora to dance, whilst Forester was considering where he should put his hat. — „Are you going to dance without me? I thought I had asked you to dance with me. I intended it all the time we were coming in the coach.“

Flora thanked him for his kind intentions; whilst Archibald, with a look of triumph, hurried his partner away, and the dance began. Forester saw this transaction in the most serious light, and it afforded him subject for meditation till at last half a dozen country dances had been finished. In vain the Berwick Jockey, the Highland Laddie, and the Flowers of Edinburgh, were played; „they suited not the gloomy habit“ of his soul. He fixed himself behind a pillar, proof against music, mirth, and sympathy; he looked upon the dancers with a cynical eye. At length he found an amusement that gratified his present splenetic humour: he applied both his hands to his ears, effectually to stop out the sound of the music, that he might enjoy the ridiculous spectacle of a number of people capering about, without any apparent motive. Forester's attitude caught the attention of some of the company; indeed it was strikingly awkward. His elbows stuck out from his ears, and his head was sunk beneath his shoulders. Archibald Mackenzie was delighted beyond measure at his figure, and pointed him out to his acquaintance with all possible expedition. The laugh and the whisper circulated with rapidity. Henry, who was dancing, did not perceive what was going on, till his partner said to him, „Pray, who is that strange mortal?“

„My friend,“ cried Henry: „will you excuse me for one instant?“ — And he ran up to Forester, and roused him from his singular attitude. „He is,“ continued Henry, as he returned to his partner, „an excellent young man, and he has superior abilities, we must not quarrel with him for trifles.“

With what different eyes different people behold the same objects! Whilst Forester had been stopping his ears, Dr. Campbell, who had more of the nature of the laughing than of the weeping philosopher, had found much benevolent pleasure in contemplating the festive scene. Not that any folly or ridicule escaped his keen penetration; but he saw every thing with an indulgent eye; and, if he laughed, laughed in such a manner, that even those who were the objects of his pleasantry could scarcely have forborne to sympathize in his mirth. Folly, he thought, could be as effectually corrected by the tickling of a feather, as by the lash of the satirist. When lady Margaret M'Gregor, and lady Mary Mackintosh, for instance, had almost forced their unhappy partners into a quarrel to support their respective claims to precedency, Dr. Campbell, who was appealed to as the relation of both the furious fair ones, decided the difference expeditiously, and much to the amusement of the company, by observing, that, as the pretentions of each of the ladies were incontrovertible, and precisely balanced, there was but one possible method of adjusting their precedency — by their age. He was convinced, he said, that the youngest lady would with pleasure yield precedency to the elder. The contest was now, which should stand the lowest, instead of which should stand the highest, in the dance: and when the proofs of seniority could not be settled, the fair ones drew lots for their places, and submitted that to chance, which could not be determined by prudence.

Forester stood beside Dr. Campbell whilst all this passed, and wasted a considerable portion of virtuous indignation upon the occasion. „And look at that absurd creature!“ exclaimed Forester, pointing out to Dr. Campbell a girl who was footing and pounding for fame at a prodigious rate. Dr. Campbell turned from the pounding lady to observe his own daughter Flora, and a smile of delight came over his countenance: for „parents are apt to be partial“ especially those who have such daughters as Flora. Her light figure and graceful agility attracted the attention even of many impartial spectators; but she was not intent upon admiration: she seemed to be dancing in the gaiety of her heart; and that was a species of gaiety in which every one sympathized, because it was natural, and of which every one approved, because it was innocent. There was a certain delicacy mixed with her sportive humour, which seemed to govern, without restraining, the tide of her spirits. Her father's eye was following her as she danced to a lively Scotch tune, when Forester pulled Dr. Campbell's cane, on which he was leaning, and exclaimed, „Doctor, I've just thought of an excellent plan for a tragedy!“

„A tragedy! repeated Dr. Campbell, with unfeigned surprise: — Are you sure you don't mean a comedy?“

Forester persisted that he meant a tragedy and was proceeding to open the plot. — „Don't force me to your tragedy now," said Dr. Campbell, for it will infallibly be condemned. I cannot say that I have my buskin on; and I advise you to take yours off. — Look, is that the tragic muse?"

Forester was astonished to find, that so great a man as Dr. Campbell had so little the power of abstraction, and he retired to muse upon the opening of his tragedy, in a recess under the music gallery. But here he was not suffered long to remain undisturbed; for, near this spot, Sir Philip Gosling presently stationed himself: Archibald Mackenzie, who left off dancing as soon as Sir Philip entered the room, came to the half intoxicated baronet; and they, with some other young men, worthy of their acquaintance, began so loud a contest concerning the number of bottles of claret which a man might, could, or should drink at a sitting, that even Forester's powers of abstraction failed, and his tragic muse took her flight.

„Supper! Supper! thank God!" exclaimed Sir Philip, as supper was now announced. „I'd never set my foot in a ball-room," added he, with several suitable oaths, „if it was not for the supper."

„Is that a rational being?" cried Forester to Dr. Campbell, after Sir Philip had passed them.

„Speak a little lower," said Dr. Campbell, „or he will infallibly prove his title to rationality by shooting you, or by making you shoot him, through the head."

„But, sir," said Forester, holding Dr. Campbell fast, whilst all the rest of the company were going down to supper, „how can you bear such a number of foolish, disagreeable people with patience?"

„What would you have me do?" said Dr. Campbell. „Would you have me get up and preach in the middle of a ball-room? Is it not as well, since we are here, to amuse ourselves with whatever can afford us any amusement, and to keep in good humour with all the world, especially with ourselves? and had we not better follow the crowd to supper?"

Forester went downstairs; but, as he crossed an antechamber, which led into the supper-room, he exclaimed, „If I were a legislator, I would prohibit balls."

„And if you were a legislator" said Dr. Campbell, pointing to a tea-kettle, which was on the fire in the antechamber, and from the spout of which a grey cloud of vapour issued, — „if you were a legislator, would not you have stoppers wedged tight into the spouts of all tea-kettles in your dominions?"

„No, sir," said Forester; „they would burst."

„And do you think that folly would not burst and do more mischief than a tea-kettle in the explosion, if you confined it so tight?"

Forester would willingly have staid in the ante-chamber, to begin a critical dissertation of this allusion; but Dr. Campbell carried him forwards into the supper-room. Flora had kept a seat for her father; and Henry met them at the door.

„I was just coming to see for you, sir," said he to his father. „Flora began to think you were lost."

„No, said Dr. Campbell," I was only detained by a would-be Cato, who wanted me to quarrel with the whole world, instead of eating my supper. What would you advise me to eat, Flora?" said he, seating himself beside her.

„Some of this trifle, papa; and, as she lightly removed the flowers, with which it was ornamented, her father said, „Yes, give me some trifle, Flora. Some characters are like that trifle — flowers and light froth at the top, and solid, good sweetmeat beneath."

Forester impatiently stretched out his plate for some trifle. „But I don't see any use in the flowers, sir," said he.

„No — any beauty?" said Dr. Campbell.

Forester picked the troublesome flowers out of his trifle, and ate a quantity of it sufficient for a stoic. Towards the end of the supper, he took some notice of Henry, who had made several ineffectual efforts to amuse him by such slight strokes of wit as seemed to suit the time and place. Time and place were never taken into Forester's consideration. He was scarcely displeased with his friend Henry, for having danced all the evening instead of sitting still; and he looked at Henry's partner with a scrutinizing eye. „So," said he, at last, „I observe I have not been thought worthy of your conversation to-night! this is what gentlemen, polite gentlemen, who dance reels, call friendship!"

„If I had thought that you would have taken it ill that I should dance reels," said Henry, laughing," I would have made the sacrifice of a reel at the altar of friendship: but we don't come to a ball to make sacrifices to friendship, but to divert ourselves."

„If we can," said Forester, sarcastically. — Here he was prevented from reproaching his friend any longer, for a party of gentlemen began to sing catches, at the desire of the rest of the company.

Forester was now intent upon criticising the nonsensical words that were sung; and he was composing an essay upon the power of the ancient bards, and the effect of national music, when Flora's voice interrupted him: „Brother," said she, „I have won my wager." The wager was, that Forester would not, during supper, observe the geranium that was placed in the middle of the table.

As soon as the company were satisfied, both with their supper and their songs, Henry, whose mind was always present, and who, in the midst of luxury and festivity, was awake to the feelings of benevolence, seized the moment when there was silence, to turn the attention of the company towards the object upon which his own thoughts were intent. The lady-patroness, the mistress of the canary bird, had performed her promise; she had spoken to several of her acquaintance concerning the tyrannical school-mistress; and now, fixing the attention of the company upon the geranium, she appealed to Henry Campbell, and begged him to explain its history. A number of eager eyes turned upon him instantly; and Forester felt, that, if he had been called upon in such a manner, he could not have uttered a syllable. He now felt the great advantage of being able to speak, without hesitation or embarrassment, before numbers. When Henry related the poor little girl's story, his language and manner were so unaffected and agreeable, that he interested every one, who heard him, in his cause. A subscription was immediately raised; every body was eager to contribute something to the child, who had been so ready, for her old grandmother's sake, to part with her favourite geranium. The lady, who superintended the charity-school, agreed to breakfast the next morning at Dr. Campbell's, and to go from his house to the school, precisely at the hour when the school-mistress usually set her unfortunate scholars to their extra-task of spinning.

Forester was astonished at all this; he did not consider, that negligence and inhumanity are widely different. The lady-patronesses had, perhaps, been rather negligent in contenting themselves with seeing the charity-children show well in procession to church; and they had not sufficiently inquired into the conduct of the school-mistress; but, as soon as the facts were properly stated, the ladies were eager to exert themselves, and candidly acknowledged, that they had been to blame in trusting so much to the reports of the superficial visitors, who had always declared, that the school was going on perfectly well.

„More people, who are in the wrong," said Dr. Campbell to Forester, „would be corrected, if some people, who are in the right, had a little candour and patience joined to their other virtues."

As the company rose from the supper-table, several young ladies gathered round the geranium, to admire Flora's pretty flower-pot. The black stains, however, struck every eye. Forester was standing by, rather embarrassed. Flora, with her usual good-nature, refrained from all explanation, though the exclamations of „How was that done? — „Who could have done that?" were frequently repeated.

„It was an accident," said Flora; and, to change the conversation, she praised the beauty of the geranium; she gathered one of the fragrant leaves; but, as she was going to put it amongst the flowers in her bosom, she observed she had dropped her moss-rose. It was a rarity at this time of the year. It was a rose which Henry Campbell had raised in a conservatory of his own construction.

„Oh! my brother's beautiful rose!“ exclaimed Flora.

Forester, who had been much pleased by her good-nature about the stains on the flower-pot, now, contrary to his habits, sympathized with her concern for the loss of her brother's moss-rose. He even exerted himself so far, as to search under the benches, and under the supper-table. He was fortunate enough to find it; and, eager to restore the prize, he, with more than his usual gallantry, but not with less than his customary awkwardness, crept from under the table, and, stretching half his body over a bench, pushed his arms between two young ladies, into the midst of the group which surrounded Flora. As his arm extended, his wrist appeared; and, at the sight of that wrist, all the young ladies shrank back, with unequivocal tokens of disgust. They whispered, — they tittered — and many expressive looks were lost upon our hero, who still resolutely held out the hand, upon which every eye was fixed. „Here's your rose! is not this the rose?“ said he, still advancing the dreaded hand to Flora, whose hesitation and blushes surprised him. Mackenzie burst into a loud laugh; and, in a whisper, which all the ladies could hear, told Forester, that „Miss Campbell was afraid to take the rose out of his hands, lest she should catch from him what he caught from the carter, who brought him to Edinburgh, or from some of his companions at the cobbler's.“

Forester flung the rose he knew not where, sprang over the bench, rushed between Flora and another lady, made towards the door in a straight line, pushing every thing before him, till a passage was made for him by the astonished crowd, who stood out of his way, as if he had been a mad dog.

„Forester!“ cried Henry and Dr. Campbell, who were standing upon the steps before the door, speaking about the ladies' carriages — What's the matter? — where are you going? — The carriage is coming to the door.“

„I had rather walk — don't speak to me,“ said Forester. „I've been insulted — I am in a passion, but I can command myself. I did not knock him down. Pray let me pass!“

Our hero broke from Dr. Campbell and Henry with the strength of an enraged animal from his keepers: and he must have found his way home by instinct, for he ran on without considering how he went. He snatched the light from the servant, who opened the door at Dr. Campbell's — hurried to his own apartment — locked, double locked, and bolted the door — flung himself into a chair — and taking breath, exclaimed, „Thank God! I've done no mischief. Thank God! I didn't knock him down. Thank God! he is out of my sight! — and I am cool now — quite cool — let me recollect it all.“

Upon the coolest recollection, Forester could not reconcile his pride to his present circumstances. „Archibald spoke the truth — why am I angry? — why was I angry, I mean?“ He reasoned much with himself upon the nature of true and false shame: he represented to himself, that the disorder, which disfigured his hands, was thought shameful only because it was vulgar; that what was vulgar was not therefore immoral; that the young tittering ladies, who shrank back from him, were not supreme judges of right and wrong, that he ought to despise their opinions; and he despised them with all his might, for two or three hours, as he walked up and down his room with unremitting energy. At length, our peripatetic philosopher threw himself upon his bed, determined that his repose should not be disturbed by such trifles; he had by this time worked himself up to such a pitch of magnanimity, that he thought he could, with composure, meet the disapproving eyes of millions of his fellow-creatures; but he was alone when he formed this erroneous estimate of the strength of the human mind. Wearied with passion and reasons, he fell asleep, dreamed that he was continually presenting flowers, which nobody would accept; awakened at the imaginary repetition of Archibald's laugh, composed himself again to sleep, and dreamed that he was in a glover's shop, trying on gloves, and that amongst a hundred pair, which he pulled on, he could not find one that would fit him. Just as he tore the last pair in his hurry, he awakened, shook off his foolish dream, saw the sun rising between two chimneys many feet below his window; recollected that in a short time he should be summoned to breakfast; that all the lady-patronesses were to be at this breakfast, that he could not breakfast in gloves; that Archibald would, perhaps, again laugh, and Flora, perhaps, again shrink back. He reproached himself for his weakness in foreseeing and dreading this scene. His aversion to lady-patronesses and to balls, was never at a more formidable height: he sighed for liberty and independence, which he persuaded himself were not to be had in his present situation. In one of his long walks, he remembered to have seen, at some miles' distance from the town of Edinburgh, on the road to Leith, a gardener and his boy, who were singing at their work. These men appeared to Forester to be yet happier than the cobbler, who formerly was the object of his admiration; and he was persuaded, that he should be much happier at the gardener's cottage than he could ever be at Dr. Campbell's house.

„I am not fit,“ said he to himself, „to live amongst idle gentlemen and ladies; I should be happy if I were a useful member of society; a gardener is a useful member of society, and I will be a gardener, and live with gardeners.“

Forester threw off the clothes, which he had worn the preceding night at the fatal ball, dressed himself in his old coat, tied up a small bundle of linen, and took the road to Leith.

(To be continued in our next.)

The Harvest Moon.

I must not omit to notice the splendid appearance of the Harvest Moon. The circumstance of this moon rising several nights successively almost at the same time, immediately after sunset, has given it an importance in the eyes of farmers; but it is not the less remarkable for its singular and splendid beauty. No moon during the year can bear any comparison with it. At its rising it has a character so peculiarly its own, that the more a person is accustomed to expect and to observe it, the more it strikes him with astonishment. I would advise every one who can go out in the country, to make a practice of watching for its rising. The warmth and the dryness of the earth, the clearness and balmy serenity of the atmosphere at that season, the sounds of voices borne from distant fields, the freshness which comes from the evening, combine to make the twilight walk delicious; and scarcely has the sun departed in the west, when the moon in the east rises from beyond some solitary hill, or from behind the dark rich foliage of trees, and sails up into the still and transparent air in the full magnificence of a world. It comes not as in common, a fair but flat disc on the face of the sky, — we behold it suspended in the crystal air in its greatness and rotundity: we perceive the distance beyond it as sensibly as that before it; and its apparent size is magnificent. In a short time, however, it has acquired a considerable altitude — its apparent bulk is diminished — its majestic grandeur has waned, and it sails on its way calmly beautiful, but in nothing differing from its usual character.

Howitt.

Spring.

How beautiful the pastime of the spring!
Lo! newly waking from its wintry dream,
She, like a smiling infant, timid plays
On the green margin of the sunny lake,
Fearing by starts, the little breaking waves,
(If ripplings, rather known by sounds than sight,
May haply so be named,) that in the grass
Soon fade in murmuring mirth.

Wilson.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. № 8.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

THE HALL OF JUSTICE.

By George Crabbe.

(Concluded from our last)

PART II.

Quondam ridentes oculi nunc fonte perenni
Deplorant poenas nocte dieque suas.
Corn. Galli Eleg.

MAGISTRATE.

Come, now again thy woes impart,
Tell all thy sorrows, all thy sin;
We cannot heal the throbbing heart
Till we discern the wounds within.

Compunction weeps our guilt away,
The sinner's safety is his pain;
Such pangs for our offences pay,
And these severer griefs are gain.

VAGRANT.

The son came back — he found us wed,
Then dreadful was the oath he swore; —
His way through Blackburn Forest led, —
His father we beheld no more.

Of all our daring clan not one
Would on the doubtful subject dwell;
For all esteem'd the injured son,
And fear'd the tale which he could tell.

But I had mightier cause for fear,
For slow and mournful round my bed
I saw a dreadful form appear; —
It came when I and Aaron wed.

(Yes! we were wed, I know my crime, —
We slept beneath the elmin-tree;
But I was grieving all the time,
And Aaron frown'd my tears to see.

For he not yet had felt the pain,
That rankles in a wounded breast;
He waked to sin; then slept again,
Forsook his God, yet took his rest. —

But I was forced to feign delight,
And joy in mirth and music sought, —
And mem'ry now recalls the night,
With such surprise and horror fraught,
That reason felt a moment's flight,
And left a mind to madness wrought.)

When waking, on my heaving breast
I felt a hand as cold as death;
A sudden fear my voice suppress'd,
A chilling terror stopp'd my breath. —

I seem'd — no words can utter how!
For there my father-husband stood, —
And thus he said; — Will God allow,
The great avenger, just and good,
A wife to break her marriage-vow?
A son to shed his father's blood?

I trembled at the dismal sounds,
  But vainly strove a word to say;
Then, pointing to his bleeding wounds,
  The threat'ning spectre stalk'd away.

I brought a lovely daughter forth,
  His father's child, in Aaron's bed;
He took her from me in his wrath; —
  Where is my child? — Thy child is dead.

'Twas false — we wander'd far and wide,
  Through town and country, field and fen,
Till Aaron, fighting, fell and died,
  And I became a wife again.

I then was young: — my husband sold
  My fancied charms for wicked price;
He gave me oft, for sinful gold,
  The slave, but not the friend of vice: —
Behold me, Heaven! my pains behold,
  And let them for my sins suffice!

The wretch who lent me thus for gain,
  Despised me when my youth was fled;
Then came disease, and brought me pain! —
  Come, death, and bear me to the dead!
For though I grieve, my grief is vain,
  And fruitless all the tears I shed.

True, I was not to virtue train'd,
  Yet well I knew my deeds were ill;
By each offence my heart was pain'd,
  I wept, but I offended still;
My better thoughts my life disdain'd,
  But yet the viler led my will.

My husband died, and now no more
  My smile was sought, or ask'd my hand,
A widow'd vagrant, vile and poor,
  Beneath a vagrant's vile command.

Ceaseless I roved the country round,
  To win my bread by fraudful arts,
And long a poor subsistence found,
  By spreading nets for simple hearts.

Though poor, and abject, and despised,
  Their fortunes to the crowd I told;
I gave the young the love they prized,
  And promised wealth to bless the old;
Schemes for the doubtful I devised,
  And charms for the forsaken sold.

At length for arts like these confined
  In prison with a lawless crew,
I soon perceived a kindred mind,
  And there my long-lost daughter knew.

His father's child, whom Aaron gave
  To wander with a distant clan,
The miseries of the world to brave,
  And be the slave of vice and man.

She knew my name — we met in pain,
  Our parting pangs can I express?
She sail'd a convict o'er the main,
  And left an heir to her distress.

This is that heir to shame and pain,
  For whom I only could descry
A world of trouble and disdain:
  Yet, could I bear to see her die,
Or stretch her feeble hands in vain,
  And, weeping, beg of me supply?

No! though the fate thy mother knew
  Was shameful! shameful though thy race
Have wandered all, a lawless crew,
  Outcasts, despised in every place;

Yet as the dark and muddy tide,
  When far from its polluted source,
Becomes more pure, and, purified,
  Flows in a clear and happy course; —

In thee, dear infant! so may end
  Our shame, in thee our sorrows cease!
And thy pure course will then extend,
  In floods of joy, o'er vales of peace.

Oh! by the God who loves to spare,
  Deny me not the boon I crave;
Let this loved child your mercy share,
  And let me find a peaceful grave;

Make her yet spotless soul your care,
And let my sins their portion have;
Her for a better fate prepare,
And punish whom 'twere sin to save!

MAGISTRATE.

Recall the word, renounce the thought,
Command thy heart and bend thy knee.
There is to all a pardon brought,
A ransom rich, assured and free;
'Tis full when found, 'tis found if sought,
Oh! seek it, till 'tis seal'd to thee.

VAGRANT.

But how my pardon shall I know?

MAGISTRATE.

By feeling dread that 'tis not sent,
By tears for sin that freely flow,
By grief, that all thy tears are spent,
By thoughts on that great debt we owe,
With all the mercy God has lent.
By suffering what thou canst not show,
Yet showing how thine heart is bent,
Till thou canst feel thy bosom glow,
And say: My Saviour, I repent!

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Continued from our last.)

Breakfast.

When Henry found that Forester was not in his room in the morning, he concluded, that he had rambled out towards Salisbury Craigs, whither he talked, the preceding day, of going to botanize.

„I am surprised,“ said Dr. Campbell, „that the young gentleman is out so early, for I have a notion he has not had much sleep since we parted, unless he walks in his sleep, for he has been walking over my poor head half the night.“

Breakfast went on — no Forester appeared. Lady Catherine began to fear, that he had broken his neck upon Salisbury Craigs, and related all the falls she had ever had, or had ever been near having, in carriages, on horseback, or otherwise. She then entered into the geography of Salisbury Craigs, and began to dispute upon the probability of his having fallen to the east or to the west.

„My dear lady Catherine,“ said Dr. Campbell, „we are not sure that he has been upon Salisbury Craigs; whether he have fallen to the east or to the west, we cannot, therefore, conveniently settle.“

But lady Catherine, whose prudential imagination travelled fast, went on to inquire of Dr. Campbell, to whom the great Forester estate would go, in case of any accident having happened, or happening to the young gentleman, before he should come of age.

Dr. Campbell was preparing to give her ladyship satisfaction upon this point, when a servant put a letter into his hands. Henry looked in great anxiety—Dr. Campbell glanced his eye over the letter, put it into his pocket, and desired the servant to show the person who brought the letter into his study.

„It's only a little boy,“ said Archibald; „I saw him as I passed through the hall.“

„Cannot a little boy go into my study?“ said Dr. Campbell, coolly.

Archibald's curiosity was strongly excited, and he slipped out of the room a few minutes afterward, resolved to speak to the boy, and to discover the purport of his embassy. But Dr. Campbell was behind him before he was aware of his approach, and just as Archibald began to cross-examine the boy in these words, „So you come from a young man, who is about my size“, Dr. Campbell put both his hands upon his shoulders, saying: „He came from a young man, who does not in the least resemble you, believe me, M. Archibald Mackenzie.“

Archibald started, turned round, and was so abashed by the civilly contemptuous look with which Dr. Campbell pronounced these words, that he retired from the study, without even attempting any of his usual equivocating apologies for his intrusion. Dr. Campbell now read the letter which he had in his pocket. It was as follows: —

„Dear Sir,

„Though I have quitted your house thus abruptly, I am not insensible of your kindness. For the step I have taken, I can offer no apology merely to my guardian; but you have treated me, Dr. Campbell, as your friend, and I shall lay my whole soul open to you.

„Notwithstanding your kindness, notwithstanding the friendship of your son Henry, whose excellent qualities I know how to value, I must ingenuously own to you, that I have been far from happy in your house. I feel that I cannot be at ease in the vortex of dissipation; and the more I see of the higher ranks of society, the more I regret that I was born a gentleman. Neither my birth nor my fortune shall, however, restrain me from pursuing that line of life, which, I am persuaded, leads to virtue and tranquillity. Let those, who have no virtuous indignation, obey the voice of fashion! and at her commands, let her slaves eat the bread of idleness, till it palls upon the sense! I reproach myself with having yielded, as I have done of late, my opinions to the persuasions of friendship; my mind has become enervated, and I must fly from the fatal contagion. Thank Heaven, I have yet the power to fly. I have yet sufficient force to break my chains. I am not yet reduced to the mental degeneracy of the base monarch, who hugged his fetters because they were of gold.

„I am conscious of powers that fit me for something better than to waste my existence in a ball-room; and I will not sacrifice my liberty to the absurd ceremonies of daily dissipation. I, that have been the laughing-stock of the mean and frivolous, have yet sufficient manly pride, unextinguished in my breast, to assert my claim to your esteem: to assert, that I never have committed, or shall designedly commit, any action unworthy of the friend of your son.

„I do not write to Henry, lest I should any way involve him in my misfortunes. He is formed to shine in the polite world, and his connexion with me might tarnish the lustre of his character in the eyes of the ‚nice judging fair.' I hope, however, that he will not utterly discard me from his heart, though I cannot dance a reel. I beg that he will break open the lock of the trunk, that is in my room, and take out of it my Goldsmith's Animated Nature, which he seemed to like.

„In my table-drawer there are my Martyn's Letters on Botany, in which you will find a number of plants, that I have dried for Flora — miss Flora Campbell, I should say. After what passed last night, I can scarcely hope they will be accepted. I would rather have them burned than refused; therefore please to burn them, and say nothing more upon the subject. Dear sir, do not judge harshly of me; I have had a severe conflict with myself, before I could resolve to leave you. But I would rather that you should judge of me with severity, than that you should extend to me the same species of indulgence, with which you last night viewed the half-intoxicated baronet.

„I can bear any thing but contempt.

„Yours, etc.

Forester.

„P. S. I trust that you will not question the bearer; he knows where I am. I therefore put you on your guard. I mean to earn my own bread as a gardener; I have always preferred the agricultural to the commercial system."

To this letter, to which the mixture of sense and extravagance did not much surprise Dr. Campbell, he returned the following answer: —

„My dear cobbler, gardener, orator, or by whatever other name you choose to be addressed, I am too old to be surprised at any thing, otherwise I might have been rather surprised at some things in your eloquent letter. You tell me that you have the power to fly, and that you do not hug your chains, though they are of gold! Are you an alderman, or Dedalus? or are these only figures of speech? You inform me, that you cannot live in the vortex of dissipation, or eat the bread of idleness, and that you are determined to be a gardener. These things seem to have no necessary connexion with each other. Why you should reproach yourself so bitterly for having spent one evening of your life in a ball-room, which I suppose is what you allude to, when you speak of a vortex of dissipation, I am at a loss to discover. And why you cannot, with so much honest pride, yet unextinguished in your breast, find any occupation more worthy of your talents, and as useful to society, as that of a gardener, I own puzzles me a little. Consider these things coolly; return to dinner, and we will compare, at our leisure, the advantages of the mercantile and the agricultural system. I forbear to question your messenger, as you desire; and I shall not show your letter to Henry till after we have dined. I hope, by that time, you will insist upon my burning it; which, at your request, I shall do with pleasure, although it contains several good sentences. As I am not yet sure you have departed this life, I shall not enter upon my office of executor; I shall not break open the lock of your trunk (of which I hope you will some time, when your mind is less exalted, find the keys), nor shall I stir in the difficult case of Flora's legacy. When next you write your will, let me, for the sake of your executor, advise you to be more precise in your directions; for what can be done, if you order him to give and burn the same thing in the same sentence? As you have, amongst your other misfortunes, the misfortune to be born heir to five or six thousand a year, you should learn a little how to manage your own affairs, lest you should, amongst poor or rich companions, meet with some who are not quite so honest as yourself.

„If, instead of returning to dine with us, you should persist in your gardening scheme, I shall have less esteem for your good sense, but I shall forbear to reproach you. I shall leave you to learn by your own experience, if it be not in my power to give you the advantages of mine gratis. But, at the same time, I shall discover where you are, and shall inform myself exactly of all your proceedings. This, as your guardian, is my duty. I should farther warn you, that I shall not, whilst you choose to live in a rank below your own, supply you with your customary yearly allowance. Two hundred guineas a year would be an extravagant allowance in your present circumstances. I do not mention money with any idea of influencing your generous mind by mercenary motives; but it is necessary that you should not deceive yourself by inadequate experiments. You cannot be rich and poor at the same time. I gave you, the day before yesterday, five ten-pound notes for your last quarterly allowance; I suppose you have taken these with you, therefore you cannot be in any immediate distress for money. I am sorry, I own, that you are so well provided, because a man who has fifty guineas in his pocket-book cannot distinctly feel what it is to be compelled to earn his own bread.

„Do not, my dear ward, think me harsh; my friendship for you gives me courage to inflict present pain, with a view to your future advantage. You must not expect to see any thing of your friend Henry, until you return to us. I shall, as his father and your guardian request that he will trust implicitly to my prudence upon this occasion, that he will make no inquiries concerning you, and that he will abstain from all connexion with you, whilst you absent yourself from your friends. You cannot live amongst the vulgar (by the vulgar I mean the ill-educated, the ignorant, those who have neither noble sentiments nor agreeable manners), and at the same time enjoy the pleasures of cultivated society. I shall wait, not without anxiety, till your choice be decided.

„Believe me to be,
„Your sincere friend and guardian
„H. Campbell, sen."

As soon as Dr. Campbell had despatched this letter, he returned to the company. The ladies, after breakfast, proceeded to the charity-school; but Henry was so anxious to learn what was become of his friend Forester, that he could scarcely enjoy the effects of his own benevolent exertions. It was with difficulty, such as he had never before experienced, that Dr. Campbell obasked from him the promise to suspend all intercourse with Forester. Henry's first impulse, when he read the letter, which his father now found it prudent to show him, was to search for his friend instantly. „I am sure," said he, I shall be able to find him out: and, if I can but see him, and speak to him, I know I could prevail upon him to return to us."

„Yes," said Dr. Campbell, „perhaps you might persuade him to return; but that is not the object: unless his understanding be convinced, what should we gain?"

„It should be convinced. I could convince him," cried Henry.

„I have, my dear son," said Dr. Campbell, smiling, „the highest opinion of your logic and eloquence; but are your reasoning powers stronger to-day than they were yesterday? Have you any new arguments to produce? I thought you had exhausted your whole store without effect."

Henry paused.

„Believe me," continued his father lowering his voice, „I am not insensible to your friend's good, and, I will say, great qualities; I do not leave him to suffer evils, without feeling as much perhaps as you can do; but I am convinced, that the solidity of his character, and the happiness of his whole life, will depend upon the impression that is now made upon his mind by realities. He will see society as it is. He has abilities and generosity of mind which will make him a first-rate character, if his friends do not spoil him out of false kindness, Henry."

Henry, at these words, held out his hand to his father, and gave him the promise which he desired.

„But," added he, „I still have hopes from your letter — I should not be surprised to see Forester at dinner to-day."

„I should," said Dr. Campbell.

Dr. Campbell, alas! was right. Henry looked eagerly towards the door every time it opened, when they were at dinner; but he was continually disappointed. Flora, whose gaiety usually enlivened the evenings, and agreeably relieved her father and brother after their morning studies, was now silent.

Whilst lady Catherine's volubility overpowered even the philosophy of Dr. Campbell, she wondered — she never ceased wondering, that Mr. Forester did not appear — and that the doctor and Mrs. Campbell, and Henry, and Flora, were not more alarmed. She proposed sending twenty different messengers after him. She was now convinced, that he had not fallen from Salisbury Craigs, because Dr. Campbell assured her ladyship, that he had a letter from him in his pocket, and that he was safe; but she thought that there was imminent danger of his enlisting in a frolic, or, perhaps, marrying some cobbler's daughter in a pet. She turned to Archibald Mackenzie, and exclaimed, „He was at a cobbler's: it could not be merely to mend his shoes. What sort of a fancy is the cobbler's daughter: or has the cobbler a daughter?"

„She is hump-backed, luckily," said Dr. Campbell, coolly.

„That does not signify," said lady Catherine; „I'm convinced she is at the bottom of the whole mystery; for I once heard Mr. Forester say — and I'm sure you must recollect it, Flora, my dear; for he looked at you at the time — I once heard him say, that personal beauty was no merit, and that ugly people ought to be liked — or some such thing — out of humanity. Now, out of humanity, with his odd notions, it's ten to one, Dr. Campbell, he marries this hump-backed cobbler's daughter. I'm sure, if I was his guardian, I could not rest an instant with such a thought in my head."

„Not I," said Dr. Campbell, quietly; and in spite of her ladyship's astonishment, remonstrances, and conjectures, he maintained his resolute composure.

The Gardener.

The gardener, that lived on the road to Leith, who had struck Forester's fancy, was a square, thick, obstinate-eyed, hard-working, ignorant, elderly man, whose soul was intent upon his petty daily gains, and whose honesty was of that coarse-spun, vulgar sort, which alone can be expected from men of uncultivated minds. Mr. M'Evoy, for that was the gardener's name, was both good-natured and selfish; his views and ideas all centred in his own family; and his affection was accumulated and reserved for two individuals, his son and his daughter. The son was not so industrious as the father; he was ambitious of seeing something of the world, and he consorted with all the young 'prentices in Edinburgh, who would condescend to forget that he was a country boy, and to remember that he expected, when his father should die, to be rich. Mr. M'Evoy's daughter was an ugly, cross-looking girl, who spent all the money that she could either earn or save upon ribands and fine gowns, with which she fancied she could supply all the defects of her person.

This powerful motive for her economy operated incessantly upon her mind, and she squeezed all that could possibly be squeezed for her private use from the frugal household. The boy, whose place Forester thought himself so fortunate to supply, had left the gardener, because he could not bear to work and be scolded without eating or drinking.

The gardener willingly complied with our hero's first request; he gave him a spade, and he set him to work. Forester dug with all the energy of an enthusiast, and dined like a philosopher upon colcannon: but colcannon did not charm him so much the second day as it had done the first; and the third day it was yet less to his taste; besides, he began to notice the difference between oaten and wheaten bread. He however recollected, that Cyrus lived, when he was a lad, upon water-cresses — the black broth of the Spartans he likewise remembered, and he would not complain. He thought, that he should soon accustom himself to his scanty, homely fare. A number of the disagreeable circumstances of poverty he had not estimated, when he entered upon his new way of life; and though at Dr. Campbell's table he had often said to himself, „I could do very well without all these things," yet, till he had actually tried the experiment, he had not clear ideas upon the subject. He missed a number of little pleasures and conveniences, which he had scarcely noticed, whilst they had every day presented themselves as matters of course. The occupation of digging was laborious, but it afforded no exercise to his mind, and he felt most severely the want of Henry's agreeable conversation; he had no one to whom he could now talk of the water-cresses of Cyrus, or the black broth of the Spartans; he had no one with whom he could dispute concerning the Stoic or the Epicurean doctrines, the mercantile or the agricultural system. Many objections to the agricultural system, which had escaped him, occurred now to his mind, and his compassion for the worms, which he was obliged to cut in pieces continually with his spade, acted every hour more forcibly upon his benevolent heart. He once attempted to explain his feelings for the worms to the gardener, who stared at him with all the insolence of ignorance, and bade him mind his work, with a tone of authority, which ill suited Forester's feelings and love of independence.

„Is ignorance thus to command knowledge? Is reason thus to be silenced by boorish stupidity?" said Forester to himself, as he recollected the patience and candour with which Dr. Campbell and Henry used to converse with him. He began to think, that in cultivated literary society he had enjoyed more liberty of mind, more freedom of opinion, than he could taste in the company of an illiterate gardener. The gardener's son, though his name was Colin, had no Arcadian simplicity, nothing which could please the classic taste of Forester, or which could recall to his mind the Eclogues of Virgil, or the golden age; the Gentle Shepherd, or the Ayrshire Ploughman. Colin's favourite holiday's diversion was playing a goff; this game, which is played with a bat loaded with lead, and with a ball, which is harder than a cricket-ball, requires much strength and dexterity. Forester used, sometimes, to accompany the gardener's son to the Links, where numbers of people, of different descriptions, are frequently seen practising this diversion. Our hero was ambitious of excelling at the game of goff; and, as he was not particularly adroit, he exposed himself, in his first attempts, to the derision of the spectators, and he likewise received several severe blows. Colin laughed at him without mercy; and Forester could not help comparing the rude expressions of his new companion's untutored vanity, with the unassuming manners and unaffected modesty of Henry Campbell. Forester soon took an aversion to the game of golf; and recollected Scotch reels with less contempt.

One evening, after having finished his task of digging (for digging was now become a task) he was going to take a walk to a lake near Edinburgh; when Colin, who was at the same instant setting out for the Links, roughly insisted upon Forester's accompanying him. Our hero, who was never much disposed to yield to the taste of others, positively refused the gardener's son, with some imprudent expressions of contempt. From this moment, Colin became his enemy, and, by a thousand malicious devices, contrived to show his vulgar hatred.

Forester now, to his great surprise, discovered, that hatred could exist in a cottage. Female vanity, he likewise presently perceived, was not confined to the precincts of a ball-room; he found that Miss M'Evoy spent every leisure moment in the contemplation of her own coarse image in a fractured looking-glass. He once ventured to express his dislike of a many-coloured plaid, in which Miss M'Evoy had arrayed herself for a dance; and the fury of her looks, and the loud-toned vulgarity of her conceit, were strongly contrasted with the recollection of Flora Campbell's gentle manners and sweetness of temper. The painted flower-pot was present to his imagination, and he turned from the lady, who stood before him, with an air of disgust, which he had neither the wish nor the power to conceal. The consequences of offending this high-spirited damsel our hero had not sufficiently considered: the brother and sister, who seldom agreed in any thing else, now agreed though from different motives, in an eager desire to torment Forester. Whenever he entered the cottage, either to rest himself, or to partake of those „savoury messes, which the neat-handed Phillis dresses," he was received with sullen silence, or with taunting reproach. The old gardener, stupid as he was, Forester thought an agreeable companion, compared with his insolent son, and his vixen daughter. The happiest hours of the day, to our hero, were those which he spent at his work, his affections, repressed and disappointed, became a source of misery to him.

„Is there nothing in this world, to which I can attach myself?" said Forester, as he one day leaned upon his spade in melancholy mood. — „Must I spend my life in the midst of absurd altercations? Is it for this, that I have a heart and an understanding? No one here comprehends one word I say — I am an object of contempt and hatred, whilst my soul is formed for the most benevolent feelings, and capable of the most extensive views. And of what service am I to my fellow-creatures? Even this stupid gardener, even a common labourer, is as useful to society as I am. Compared with Henry Campbell, what am I? Oh, Henry! — Flora! could you see me at this instant, you would — pity me."

But the fear of being an object of pity wakened Forester's pride; and though he felt that he was unhappy, he could not bear to acknowledge that he had mistaken the road to happiness. His imaginary picture of rural felicity was not, to be sure, realised; but he resolved to bear his disappointment with fortitude, to fulfil his engagements with his master, the gardener, and then to seek some other more eligible situation. In the mean time, his benevolence tried to expand itself upon the only individual in this family, who treated him tolerably well: he grew fond of the old gardener, because there was nothing else near him to which he could attach himself, not even a dog or a cat.

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing

1838. Nr. 9.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Miss L. E. Landon.

Eine gelehrte und talentvolle Dichterin der neueren Zeit, welche ſich gewöhnlich auf ihren Schriften nur mit den drei Initialen ihres Namens bezeichnet. Sie iſt beſonders ein Günſtling der engliſchen Damenwelt, und kann, nicht mit Unrecht, als eine äußerſt gewandte poetiſche Miniaturmalerin betrachtet werden, die ſich in den Hauptzügen nach Moore gebildet zu haben ſcheint. Geſchmack, Reichthum der Phantaſie, Eleganz der Sprache und ein äußerſt harmoniſcher Bau der Verſe, ſind die Hauptzierden ihrer Leiſtungen, dagegen mangelt es ihr durchaus an Tiefe. Gewandt weiß ſie ſich auf der Oberfläche der Fluthen des Lebens zu bewegen, doch die Wunder und Schrecken des Grundes ergreifen ſie nicht, da ſie ſich keine Mühe giebt, in dieſelben einzudringen. Ihre drei größeren während der Jahre 1824 bis 1828 erſchienenen Gedichte, The improvisatrice, the golden Violet and the Troubadour ſind eigentlich nur als Namen für eben ſo viel Sammlungen von romantiſchen und hiſtoriſchen Bildern zu betrachten. Grazie iſt der Hauptzug, der alle ziert. — Ihre Verfaſſerin liebt indeſſen mehr die Situationen zu ſchildern, als die Begebenheiten zu entwickeln und den inneren pſychologiſchen Faden derſelben darzulegen; denn ſie iſt ſich zu deutlich des Mangels an jener männlichen Kraft bewußt, welche erfordert wird, die letzteren Aufgaben mit demſelben Erfolge, wie ſie es bei der erſteren thut, zu löſen. — Unter ihren kleineren Gedichten findet ſich manches ſehr Gelungene, vorzüglich in den Beſchreibungen der Werke neuerer Kunſt, mit welchen ſie ſich vorzugsweiſe beſchäftigt, und die ſie mit großem Geſchick poetiſch zu reproduciren weiß.

Miß Landon lebt in angenehmen Verhältniſſen zu London. In der neueſten Zeit hat ſie ſich es beſonders angelegen ſein laſſen, die zahlreichen eleganten Annuals, Keepsakes, Books of beauty u. ſ. w. mit poetiſchem Schmucke zu verzieren, und ſelten wird irgend eine ſolche luxuriöſe Prachtausgabe erſcheinen, die ſie nicht entweder ganz allein mit dem erforderlichen poetiſchen Texte verſehen oder zu der ſie nicht wenigſtens Beiträge geliefert hätte; gleich dieſen zierlichen Neujahrsgaben, hat ſie ſich als ein Modeartikel bei der feinen Welt zu erhalten verſtanden.

The Bayadere.

An Indian Tale.

The Bayadere was taken from some faint recollection of a tale I had either read or heard; and meeting with the word „Bayadere" many years after recalled it to my memory as a subject exquisitely poetical. I have been since told it was a poem of Goethe's. This poem has never been to my knowledge translated; and, being ignorant of the German language, I am unable to say whether the tale conforms to the original or not.

There were seventy pillars around the hall,
Of wreathed gold was each capital,
And the roof was fretted with amber and gems,
Such as light kingly diadems;
The floor was marble, white as the snow
Ere its pureness is stained by its fall below:
In the midst played a fountain, whose starry showers
Fell like beams on the radiant flowers,
Whose colours were gleaming, as every one
Burst from the blossom just caught from the sun;
And vases sent forth their silvery clouds,
Like those which the face of the young moon shrouds,
But sweet as the breath of the twilight-hour
When the dew awakens the rose's power.
At the end of the hall was a sun-bright throne,
Rich with every glorious stone;
And the purple canopy overhead
Was like the shade o'er the dayfall shed;
And the couch beneath was of buds half blown,
Hued with the blooms of the rainbow's zone;
And round, like festoons, a vine was rolled,
Whose leaf was of emerald, whose fruit was of gold.

But though graced as for a festival,
There was something sad in that stately hall:
There floated the breath of the harp and flute,—
But the sweetest of every music is mute:
There are flowers of light, and spiced perfume,—
But there wants the sweetest of breath and of bloom:
And the hall is lone, and the hall is drear,
For the smiling of woman shineth not here.
With urns of odour o'er him weeping,
Upon the couch a youth is sleeping:
His radiant hair is bound with stars,
Such as shine on the brow of night,
Filling the dome with diamond-rays,
Only than his own curls less bright.
And such a brow, and such an eye
As fit a young divinity;
A brow like twilight's darkening line,
An eye like morning's first sunshine,
Now glancing through the veil of dreams
As sudden light at daybreak streams.
And richer than the mingled shade
By gem, and gold, and purple made,
His orient wings closed o'er his head;
Like that bird's, bright with every dye,
Whose home, as Persian bards have said,
Is fixed in scented Araby.
Some dream is passing o'er him now —
A sudden flush is on his brow;
And from his lip come murmured words,
Low, but sweet as the light lute-chords
When o'er its strings the night-winds glide
To woo the roses by its side.
He, the fair boy-god, whose nest
Is in the water-lily's breast;
He of the many-arrowed bow,
Of the joys that come and go
Like the leaves, and of the sighs
Like the winds of summer-skies,
Blushes like the birds of spring,
Soon seen and soon vanishing:
He of hopes, and he of fears,
He of smiles, and he of tears —
Young CAMDEO, he has brought
A sweet dream of coloured thought,
One of love and woman's power,
To MANDALLA's sleeping hour.

Joyless and dark was his jewelled throne,
When MANDALLA awakened and found him alone.
He drank the perfume that around him swept,
'Twas not sweet as the sigh he drank as he slept;
There was music, but where was the voice at whose thrill
Every pulse in his veins was throbbing still?
And dim was the home of his native star
While the light of woman and love was afar;
And lips of the rosebud, and violet eyes
Are the sunniest flowers in Paradise.
He veiled the light of his glorious race
In a mortal's form and a mortal's face,
And 'mid earth's loveliest sought for one

Who might dwell in his hall and share in his throne.

The lorie brought to his cinnamon-nest
The bee from the midst of its honey-quest,
And upon the leaves of the lotus lay
To welcome the noon of the summer-day.
It was glory, and light, and beauty all,
When Manhalla closed his wing in Bengal.
He stood in the midst of a stately square,
As the waves of the sea rolled the thousands there;
Their gathering was round the gorgeous car
Where sat in his triumph the Subadar;
For his sabre was red with the blood of the slain,
And his proudest foes were slaves in his chain;
And the sound of the trumpet, the sound of his name,
Rose in shouts from the crowd as onwards he came.
With gems and gold on each ataghan,
A thousand warriors led the van,
Mounted on steeds black as the night,
But with foam and with stirrup gleaming in light;
And another thousand came in their rear,
On white horses, armed with bow and spear,
With quivers of gold on each shoulder laid,
And with crimson belt for each crooked blade.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Continued from our last.)

The old man, whose temper was not quite so enthusiastical as Forester's, looked upon him as an industrious simple young man, above the usual class of servants, and rather wished to keep him in his service, because he gave him less than the current wages. Forester, after his late reflections upon digging, began to think that, by applying his understanding to the business of gardening, he might perhaps make some discoveries, which should excite his master's everlasting gratitude, and immortalize his own name. He pledged a shirt and pair of stockings at a poor bookseller's stall, for some volumes upon gardening; and these, in spite of the ridicule of Collis and miss M'Evoy, he studied usefully at his meals. He at length met with an account of some experiments upon fruit trees, which, he thought would infallibly make the gardener's fortune.

„Did you not tell me,“ said Forester, to the gardener, „that cherries were sometimes sold very high in Edinburgh?“

„Five a penny,“ said the gardener; and he wished, from the bottom of his heart, that he had a thousand cherry-trees, but he possessed only one.

He was considerably alarmed, when Forester proposed to him, as the certain means of making his fortune, to strip the bark of this cherry-tree, assuring him, that a similar experiment had been tried and had succeeded; that his cherry-tree would bear twice as many cherries, if he would only strip the bark from it. „Let me try one branch for an experiment — I will try one branch!“

But the gardener peremptorily forbade all experiments, and shutting Foresters book, bade him leave such nonsense, and mind his business.

Provoked by this instance of tyrannical ignorance, Forester forgot his character of a servant boy, and at length called his master an obstinate fool.

No sooner were these words uttered, than the gardener emptied the remains of his watering-pot coolly in Forester's face; and, first paying him his wages, dismissed him from his service.

Miss M'Evoy, who was at work, seated at the door, made room most joyfully for Forester to pass, and observed, that she had long since prophesied he would not do for them.

Forester was now convinced, that it was impossible to reform a positive old gardener, to make him try new experiments upon cherry-trees, or to interest him for the progress of science. He deplored the perversity of human nature, and he began, when he reflected upon the characters of miss M'Evoy and her brother, to believe, that they were beings distinct from the rest of their species; he was, at all events, glad to have parted with such odious companions. On his road from Leith to Edinburgh he had time for various reflections.

„Thirty shillings then, with hard bodily labour, I have earned for one month's service!" said Forester to himself. „Well, I will keep to my resolution. I will live upon the money I earn, and upon that alone; I will not have recourse to my bank-notes till the last extremity." He took them out of his pocket-book, however, and looked at them, to see that they were safe. „How wretched," thought he, „must be that being, who is obliged to purchase, in his utmost need, the assistance of his fellow-creatures with such vile trash as this! I have been unfortunate in my first experiment; but all men are not like this selfish gardener and his brutal son, incapable of disinterested friendship."

Here Forester was interrupted in his meditations by a young man, who accosted him with— „Sir, if I don't mistake I believe I have a key of yours."

Forester looked at the young man's face, and recollected him to be the person who had nearly lost his life in descending for his key into the brewing-vat.

„I know you again, sir," continued the brewer's clerk, „by your twirling those scissars upon your finger, just as you were doing that day at the brewery.

Forester was unconscious, till this moment, that he had a pair of scissars in his hand: whilst the gardener was paying him his wages, to relieve his mauvaise honte, our hero took up miss M'Evoy's scissars, which lay upon the table, and twirled them upon his finger, as he used to do with a key. He was rather ashamed to perceive, that he had not yet cured himself of such a silly habit. „I thought the lesson I got at the brewery," said he, „would have cured me for ever of this foolish trick; but the diminutive chains of habit, as somebody says, are scarcely ever heavy enough to be felt, till they are too strong to be broken."

„Sir!" said the astonished clerk.

„O, I beg your pardon," said our hero, who now perceived by his countenance, that this observation on the peculiar nature of the chains of habit was utterly unintelligible to him; „pray, sir, can you tell me what o'clock it is?"

„Half after four — I am — sir," said the clerk, producing his watch, with the air of a man, who thought a watch a matter of some importance. „Hum! He can't be a gentleman; he has no watch!" argued he with himself, and he looked at Forester's rough apparel with astonishment. Forester had turned back towards Leith, that he might return miss M'Evoy her scissars. The brewer's-clerk was going to Leith, to collect some money for his master. As they walked on, the young man talked to our hero with good nature, but with a species of familiarity, which was strikingly different from the respectful manner in which he formerly addressed Forester, when he had seen him in a better coat, and in the company of a young gentleman.

„You have left Dr. Campbell's then?" said he, looking with curiosity. Forester replied, that he had left Dr. Campbell's, because he preferred earning his own bread, to living an idle life amongst gentlemen and ladies.

The clerk, at this speech, looked earnestly in Forester's face, and began to suspect, that he was deranged in his mind.

As the gravity of our hero's looks, and the sobriety of his demeanour, did not give any strong indications of insanity, the clerk, after a few minutes' consideration, inclined to believe, that Forester concealed the truth from him; that probably he was some dependent of Dr. Campbell's family; that he had displeased his friends, and had been discarded in disgrace. He was confirmed in these suppositions by Forester's telling him, that he had just left the service of a gardener; that he did not know where to find a lodging for the night; and that he was in want of some employment, by which he might support himself independently.

The clerk, who remembered with gratitude the intrepidity with which Forester had hazarded his life to save him the morning that he was at the brewery, and who had also some compassion for a young gentleman reduced to poverty, told him that if he could write a good hand, knew any thing of accounts, and could get a character for punctuality (meaning to include honesty in this word) from any creditable people, he did not doubt, that his master, who had large concerns, might find employment for him as an under clerk. Forester's pride was not agreeably soothed by the manner of this proposal, but he was glad to hear of a situation, to use the clerk's genteel expression; and he moreover thought, that he should now have an opportunity of comparing the commercial and agricultural system.

The clerk hinted, that he supposed Forester would choose to „make himself smart," before he called to offer himself at the brewery, and advised him to call about six, as, by that time in the evening, his master was generally at leisure.

A dinner at a public house (for our hero did not know where else to dine), and the farther expense of a new pair of shoes, and some other articles of dress, almost exhausted his month's wages: he was very unwilling to make any of these purchases, but the clerk assured him, that they were indispensable; and, indeed, at last, his appearance was scarcely upon a par with that of his friendly adviser.

The Bet.

Before we follow Forester to the brewery, we must request the attention of our readers to the history of a bet of Mr. Archibald Mackenzie's.

We have already noticed the rise and progress of this young gentleman's acquaintance with Sir Philip Gosling. Archibald, cultivated assiduously the friendship of this weak, dissipated, vain young baronet, in hopes that he might, in process of time, make some advantage of his folly. Sir Philip had an unfortunately high opinion of his own judgement; an opinion which he sometimes found it difficult to inculcate upon the minds of others, till he hit upon the compendious method of laying high wagers in support of all his assertions. Few people chose to venture a hundred guineas upon the turn of a straw. Sir Philip, in all such contests, came off victorious; and he plumed himself much upon the successes of his purse. Archibald affected the greatest deference for Sir Philip's judgement; and, as he observed that the baronet piqued himself upon his skill as a jockey, he flattered him indefatigably upon this subject. He accompanied Sir Philip continually in his long visits to the livery-stables; and he made himself familiarly acquainted with the keeper of the livery-stables, and even with the hostlers. To how low can interested pride descend! All this pains Archibald took, and more — for a very small object. He had set his fancy upon Surrey, one of his friend's horses; and he had no doubt, but that he should either induce Sir Philip to make him a present of this horse, or that he should jockey him out of it, by some well-timed bet.

> „Whose ev'ry frolic had some end in view,
> Ne'er play'd the fool, but play'd the rascal too."

In counting upon the baronet's generosity, Archibald was mistaken. Sir Philip had that species of good-nature, which can lend, but not that which can give. He offered to lend the horse to Archibald most willingly; but the idea of giving it was far distant from his imagination. Archibald, who at length despaired of his friend's generosity, had recourse to his other scheme of the wager. After having judiciously lost a few guineas to Sir Philip in wagers, to confirm him in his extravagant opinion of his own judgement, Archibald, one evening, when the fumes of wine and vanity, operating together, had somewhat exalted the man of judgement's imagination, urged him, by artful, hesitating contradiction, to assert the most incredible things of one of his horses, to whom he had given the name of Favourite. Archibald knew, from the best authority — from the master of the livery-stables, who was an experienced jockey — that Favourite was by no means a match for Surrey; he therefore waited quietly, till Sir Philip Gosling laid a very considerable wager upon the head of his „Favengeance.“ Archibald immediately declared, he could not, in conscience — that he could not, for the honour of Scotland, give up his friend Sawney.

„Sawney!“ cried Sir Philip; „I'll bet fifty guineas, that Favourite beats him hollow at a walk, trot, or gallop, whichever you please.“

Archibald artfully affected to be startled at this defiance; and, seemingly desirous to draw back, pleaded his inability to measure purses with such a rich man as Sir Philip.

„Nay, my boy,“ replied Sir Philip, „that excuse shan't stand you in stead. You have a pretty little pony there, that lady Catherine has just given you; if you won't lay me fifty guineas, will you risk your pony against my judgement?“

Archibald had now brought his friend exactly to the point at which he had been long aiming. Sir Philip staked his handsome horse Sawney against Archibald's sorry pony, upon this wager, that Favourite should, at the first trials, beat Sawney at a walk, a trot and a gallop.

Warmed with wine, and confident in his own judgement, the weak baronet insisted upon having the bet immediately decided. The gentlemen ordered out their horses, and the wager was to be determined upon the sands of Leith.

Sir Philip Gosling, to his utter astonishment, found himself for once mistaken in his judgement. The treacherous Archibald coolly suffered him to exhale his passion in unavailing oaths, and at length rejoiced to hear him consoling himself with the boast, that this was the first wager upon horse-flesh that he had ever lost in his life. The master of the livery-stables stared with well-affected incredulity, when Sir Philip, upon his return from the sands of Leith, informed him, that Favourite had been beat hollow by Sawney; and Archibald, by his additional testimony, could scarcely convince him of the fact, till he put two guineas into his hand, when he recommended his new horse Sawney to his particular care. Sir Philip, who was not gifted with quick observation, did not take notice of this last convincing argument. Whilst this passed, he was talking eagerly to the hostler, who confirmed him in his opinion, which he still repeated as loud as ever, „that Favourite ought to have won.“ This point Archibald prudently avoided to contest; and he thus succeeded in duping and flattering his friend at once.

„Sawney for ever!“ cried Archibald, as soon as Sir Philip left the stables. „Sawney for ever!“ repeated the hostler, and reminded Mackenzie, that he had promised him half a guinea. Archibald had no money in his pocket; but he assured the hostler, that he would remember him the next day. The next day, however, Archibald, who was expert in parsimonious expedients, considered, that he had better delay giving the hostler his half guinea, till it had been earned by his care of Sawney.

It is the usual error of cunning people to take it for granted, that others are fools. This hostler happened to be a match for our young laird in cunning; and as soon as he perceived, that it was Archibald's intention to cheat him of the interest of his half-guinea, he determined to revenge himself in his care of Sawney. We shall hereafter see the success of his devices.

The Saddle and Bridle.

Scarcely had Archibald Mackenzie been two days in possession of the long-wished-for object of his mean soul, when he became dissatisfied with his own saddle and bridle, which certainly did not, as Sir Philip observed, suit his new horse. The struggles in Archibald's mind, betwixt his taste for expense and his habits of saving, were often rather painful to him. He had received from lady Catherine a ten-guinea note, when he first came to Dr. Campbell's; and he had withstood many temptations to change it. One morning (the day that he had accompanied Henry and Forester to the watchmaker's), he was so strongly charmed by the sight of a watch-chain and seals, that he actually took his bank-note out of his scrutoire at his return home, put it into his pocket, when he dressed for dinner, and resolved to call that evening at the watchmaker's, to indulge his fancy, by purchasing the watch-chain, and to gratify his family pride, by getting his coat of arms splendidly engraven upon the seal. He called at the watchmaker's, in company with Sir Philip Gosling, but he could not agree with him respecting the price of the chain and seals; and Archibald consoled himself with the reflection, that his bank-note would still remain. He held the note in his hand, whilst he haggled about the price of the watch-chain.

„O, d—n the expense!" cried Sir Philip.

„O, I mind ten guineas as little as any man," said Archibald, thrusting the bank-note, in imitation of the baronet, with affected carelessness, into his waistcoat pocket. He was engaged that night to go to the play with Sir Philip, and he was much hurried in dressing. His servant observed that his waistcoat was stained, and looked out another for him.

Now this man sometimes took the liberty of wearing his master's clothes; and, when Archibald went to the play, the servant dressed himself in the stained waistcoat, to appear at a ball, which was given that night in the neighbourhood, by some „gentleman's gentleman." The waistcoat was rather too tight for the servant: he tore it; and, instead of sending it to the washerwoman's, to have the stain washed out, as his master had desired, he was now obliged to send it to the tailor's, to have it mended.

Archibald's sudden wish for a new saddle and bridle for Mowbray could not be gratified without changing the bank-note; and forgetting that he had left it in the pocket of his waistcoat the night that he went to the play, he searched for it in the scrutoire, in which he was accustomed to keep his treasures. He was greatly disturbed, when the note was not to be found in the scrutoire; he searched over and over again; not a pigeonhole, not a drawer, remained to be examined. He tried to recollect when he had last seen it, and at length remembered that he put it into his waistcoat pocket, when he went to the watchmaker's; that he had taken it out to look at, whilst he was in the shop; but whether he had brought it home safely or not, he could not precisely ascertain. His doubts upon this subject, however, he cautiously concealed, resolved, if possible, to make somebody or other answerable for his loss. He summoned his servant, told him that he had left a ten-guinea bank-note in his waistcoat pocket the night that he went to the play; and that, as the waistcoat was given into his charge, he must be answerable for the note. The servant boldly protested, that he neither could nor would be to the loss of a note which he had never seen.

Archibald now softened his tone; for he saw, that he had no chance of bullying the servant. „I desired you to send it to the washerwoman's," said he.

„And so I did, sir," said the man.

This was true, but not the whole truth. He had previously sent the waistcoat to the tailor's to have the rent repaired, which it received the night he wore it at the ball. These circumstances the servant thought proper to suppress; and he was very ready to agree with his master in accusing the poor washerwoman of having stolen the note. The washerwoman was extremely industrious, and perfectly honest; she had a large family, that depended upon her labour, and upon her character, for support. She was astonished and shocked at the charge that was brought against her; and declared, that, if she were able, she would rather pay the whole money at once, than suffer any suspicion to go abroad against her. Archibald rejoiced to find her in this disposition; and he assured her, that the only method to avoid disgrace, a lawsuit, and ruin, was instantly to pay the money. It was out of her power to pay it; and she would not promise what she knew she could not perform.

Archibald redoubled his threats; the servant stood by his master. The poor woman burst into tears; but she steadily declared that she was innocent; and no promise could be extorted from her, even in the midst of her terror. Though she had horrible, perhaps not absolutely visionary, ideas of the dangers of a lawsuit, yet she had some confidence in the certainty that justice was on her side. Archibald said, that she might talk about justice as much as she pleased, but that she must prepare to submit to the law. The woman trembled at the sound of these words; but, though ignorant, she was no fool, and she had a friend in Dr. Campbell's family, to whom she resolved to apply in her distress. Henry Campbell had visited her little boy when he was ill, and had made him some small present; and, though she did not mean to encroach upon Henry's good-nature, she thought, that he had so much learning, that he certainly could, without its costing her any thing, put her in the right way to avoid the law, with which she had been threatened by Archibald Mackenzie and his servant.

Henry heard the story with indignation, such as Forester would have felt in similar circumstances; but prudence tempered his enthusiastic feelings; and prudence renders us able to assist others, whilst enthusiasm frequently defeats its own purposes, and injures those whom it wildly attempts to serve. Henry, knowing the character of Archibald, governed himself accordingly; he made no appeal to his feelings; for he saw that the person must be deficient in humanity, who could have threatened a defenceless woman with such severity; he did not speak of justice to the tyrannical laird, but he spoke of law. He told Archibald, that, being thoroughly convinced of the woman's innocence, he had drawn up a state of her case, which she, in compliance with his advice, was ready to lay before an advocate, among the first counsel in Edinburgh.

The young laird repeated, with a mixture of apprehension and suspicion, „Drawn up a case! No; you can't know how to draw up cases; you are not a lawyer — you only say this to bully me."

Henry replied, that he was no lawyer; that he could, notwithstanding, state plain facts in such a manner, he hoped, as to make a case intelligible to any sensible lawyer; that he meant to show what he had written to his father.

„You'll show it to me, first, won't you?" said Archibald, who wished to gain time for consideration.

Henry put the paper, which he had drawn up, into his hands, and waited with a determined countenance beside him, whilst he perused the case. Archibald saw that Henry had abilities and steadiness to go through with the business; the facts were so plainly and forcibly stated, that his hopes even from law began to falter. He therefore talked about humanity — said, he pitied the poor woman; could not bear to think of distressing her; but that, at the same time, he had urgent occasion for money; that, if he could even recover five guineas of it, it would be something. He added, that he had debts, which he could not, in honour, delay to discharge.

Now Henry had five guineas, which he had reserved for the purchase of some additions to his cabinet of mineralogy, and he offered to lend this money to Archibald, to pay the debts that he could not, in honour, delay to discharge, upon express condition, that he should say nothing more to the poor woman concerning the banknote.

To this condition Archibald most willingly acceded; and as Henry, with generous alacrity, counted the five guineas into his hand, the mean, incorrigible being said to himself, „What fools these bookish young men are, after all! Though he can draw up cases so finely, I've taken him in at last; and I wish it was ten guineas instead of five!"

Fatigued with the recital of the various petty artifices of this avaricious and dissipated young laird, we shall now relieve ourselves, by turning from the history of meanness to that of enthusiasm. The faults of Forester we hope and wish to see corrected; but who can be interested for the selfish Archibald Mackenzie?

(To be continued in our next.)

Das BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. [illegible]

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. № 10.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, [illegible]

The Bayadere.

An Indian Tale.

(Concluded from our last.)

Then followed the foot-ranks, — their turbans showed
Like flashes of light from a mountain cloud,
For white were the turbans as winter-snow,
And death-black the foreheads that darkened below;
Scarlet and white was each soldier's vest,
And each bore a lion of gold on his breast,
For this was the chosen band that bore
The lion-standard, it floated o'er
Their ranks like morning; at every wave
Of that purple banner, the trumpets gave
A martial salute to the radiant fold
That bore the lion-king wrought in gold,
And last the elephant came, whose tower
Held the lord of this pomp and power.
And round that chariot of his pride,
Like chains of white sea pearls,
Or braids entwove of summer flowers
Glided fair dancing-girls;
And as the rose-leaves fall to earth,
Their light feet touched the ground, —
But for the zone of silver bells
You had not heard a sound,
So, scattering flowers o'er the way,
Whirled round the beautiful array.
But there was one who 'mid them shone
A planet lovely and alone,
A rose, one flower amid many,
But still the loveliest of any;
Though fair her arm as the moonlight,
Others might raise an arm as white;
Though light her foot as music's fall,
Others might be as musical;
But where were such dark eyes as hers?
So tender, yet withal so bright,
As the dark orbs had in their smile
Mingled the light of day and night.
And where was that wild grace which shed
A loveliness o'er every tread,
A beauty shining through the whole,
Something which spoke of heart and soul.
The Almas had passed lightly on,
The armed ranks, the crowd, were gone,
Yet gazed Mandalla on the square
As she he sought still glided there, —
Oh that fond look, whose eyelids strain
And will not know they look in vain!
At length he turned, — his silent mood
Sought that impassioned solitude,
The Eden of young hearts, where first
Love in its loneliness is nursed.
He sat him by a little fount;
A tulip-tree grew by its side,
A lily with its silver towers
Floated in silence on the tide;
And far round a banana-tree

Kneeled in green sanctuary;
And the long grass, which was his seat,
With every motion grew more sweet,
Yielding a more voluptuous scent
At every blade his pressure bent.
And there he lingered, till the sky
Lost somewhat of its brilliancy,
And crimson shadows rolled on the west,
And round the moon her diamond-crest,
And came a freshness on the trees,
Harbinger of the evening-breeze,
When a sweet far sound of song,
Was borne by the breath of flowers along,
A mingling of the voice and lute,
Such as the wind-harp, when it makes
Its pleasant music to the gale
Which kisses first the chords it breaks.
He followed where the echo led,
Till in a cypress-grove he found
A funeral train, that round a grave
Poured forth their sorrow's wailing sound;
And by the tomb a choir of girls,
With measured steps and mournful notes,
And snow-white robes, while on the air,
Unbound their wreaths, each dark curl floats,
Paced round and sang to her who slept
Calm, while their young eyes o'er her wept.
And she, that loveliest one, is here,
The morning's radiant Bayadere:
A darker light in her dark eyes, —
For tears are there, — a paler brow
Changed but to charm the morning's smile,
Less sparkling, but more touching now.
And first her sweet lip prest the flute,
A nightingale waked by the rose,
And when that honey breath was mute,
Was heard her low song's plaintive close,
Wailing for the young blossom's fall,
The last, the most beloved of all.
As died in gushing tears thy lay,
The band of mourners passed away:
They left their wreaths upon the tomb,
As fading leaves and long perfume
Of her were emblems; and unbound
Many a cage's gilded round,
And set the prisoners free, as none
Were left to love now she was gone.
And azure wings spread on the air,
And songs, rejoicing songs, were heard;
But, pining, as forgotten now,
Lingered one solitary bird:
A beautiful and pearl-white dove,
Alone in its remembering love.
It was a strange and lovely thing
To mark the drooping of its wing,
And how into the grave it prest,
Till soiled the dark earth-stain its breast;
And darker as the night-shades grew,
Sadder became its wailing coo,
As if it missed the hand that bore,
As the cool twilight came, its store
Of seeds and flowers. — There was one
Who, like that dove, was lingering lone, —
The Bayadere: her part had been
Only the hired mourner's part;
But she had given what none might buy, —
The precious sorrow of the heart.
She wooed the white dove to her breast,
It sought at once its place of rest;
Round it she threw her raven hair, —
It seemed to love the gentle snare,
And its soft beak was raised to sip
The honey-dew of her red lip.
Her dark eyes filled with tears, to feel
The gentle creature closer steal
Into her heart with soft caress,
As it would thank her tenderness;
To her 'twas strange and sweet to be
Beloved in such fond purity,
And sighed MANDALLA to think that sin
Could dwell so fair a shrine within.
„Oh, grief to think that she is one
Who like the breeze is wooed and won!
Yet sure it were a task for love
To come like dew of the night from above
Upon her heart, and wash away,
Like dust from the flowers, its stain of clay,
And win her back in her tears to Heaven
Pure, loved and humble, and forgiven:
Yes! freed from the soil of her earthly thrall,
Her smile shall light up my starry hall!"
   The moonlight is on a little bower,

With wall and with roof of leaf and of flower,
Built of that green and holy tree
Which heeds not how rude the storm may be.
Like a bridal canopy overhead
The jasmines their slender wreathings spread,
One with stars as ivory white,
The other with clusters of amber light;
Rose-trees four grew by the wall,
Beautiful each, but different all:
One with that pure hot crimson flush
That marks the maiden's first love-blush;
By its side grew another one,
Pale as the snow of the funeral stone;
The next was rich with the damask dye
Of a monarch's purple drapery;
And the last had leaves like those leaves of gold
Worked on that drapery's royal fold.
And there were four vases, with blossoms filled,
Like censers of incense, their fragrance distilled;
Lilies, heaped like the pearls of the sea,
Peeped from their large leaves' security;
Hyacinths with their graceful bells,
Where the spirit of odour dwells
Like the spirit of music in ocean shells:
And tulips, with every colour that shines
In the radiant gems of Serendib's mines;
One tulip was found in every wreath,
That one most scorched by the summer's breath,
Whose passionate leaves with their ruby glow
Hide the heart that lies burning and black below.
And there, beneath the flowered shade
By a pink acacia made,
MANDALLA lay, and by his side,
With eye, and breath, and blush that vied
With the star and with the flower
In their own and loveliest hour,
Was that fair Bayadere, the dove
Yet nestling in her long black hair:
She has now more than that to love,
And the loved one sat by her there.
And by the sweet acacia porch
They drank the softness of the breeze. —
Oh more than lovely are love's dreams,
'Mid lights and blooms and airs like these!
And sometimes she would leave his side,
And like a spirit round him glide;
A light shawl now wreathed round her brow,
Now waving from her hand of snow,
Now wound around her graceful waist,
And now like fetters round her placed;
And then, flung suddenly aside,
Her many curls, instead, unbound,
Waved in fantastic braids, till loosed,
Her long dark tresses swept the ground;
Then, changing from the soft slow step,
Her white feet bounded on the wind
Like gleaming silver, and her hair
Like a dark banner swept behind:
Or with her sweet voice, sweet like a bird's
When it pours forth its first song in spring,
The one like an echo to the other,
She answered the sigh of her soft lute-string,
And with eyes that darkened in gentlest tears,
Like the dewy light in the dark-eyed dove,
Would she sing those sorrowing songs that breathe
Some history of unhappy love.
Yes, thou art mine! MANDALLA said, —
I have lighted up love in thy youthful heart;
I taught thee its tenderness, now I must teach
Its faith, its grief, and its gloomier part;
And then, from thy earth-stains purified,
In my star and my hall shalt thou reign my bride.

It was an evening soft and fair,
As surely those in Eden are,
When, bearing spoils of leaf and flower,
Entered the Bayadere her bower:
Her love lay sleeping, as she thought,
And playfully a bunch she caught,
Of azure hyacinth-bells, and o'er
His face she let the blossoms fall:
„Why I am jealous of thy dreams,
Awaken at thy Ada's call."
No answer came from him whose tone
Had been the echo of her own.
She spoke again, — no words came forth;
She clasped his hand, — she raised his head, —
One wild, loud scream, she sank beside,
As pale, as cold, almost as dead!

By the Ganges raised, for the morning-sun
To shed his earliest beam upon,

In a funeral pile, — around it stand
Priests and the hired mourners' band.
But who is she that so wildly prays
To share the couch and light the blaze?
Mahadeva's love, while scornful eye
And chilling jests mock her agony:
An Alma girl! oh shame, deep shame,
To Brahma's race and Brahma's name!
Unmarked, unpitied, she turned aside,
For a moment her bursting tears to hide.
None thought of the Bayadere, till the fire
Blazed swiftly and fiercely the funeral pyre;
Then like a thought she darted by,
And sprang on the burning pile to die!

„Now thou art mine! away, away
To my own bright star, to my home of day!"
A dear voice sighed, as he bore her along
Gently as spring breezes bear the song.
„Thy love and thy faith have won for thee
The breath of immortality.
Maid of earth, Mahadeva is free to call
Thee the queen of his heart and hall!"

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Continued from our last.)

Forester, a Clerk.

We left Forester, when he was just going to offer himself as clerk to a brewer. The brewer was a prudent man; and he sent one of his porters with a letter to Dr. Campbell, to inform him that a young lad, whom he had formerly seen in company with Mr. Henry Campbell, and who, he understood, was the doctors' ward, had applied to him, and that he should be very happy to take him into his service, if his friends approved of it, and could properly recommend him. In consequence of Dr. Campbell's answer to the brewer's letter, Forester, who knew nothing of the application to his friends, obtained the vacant clerkship. He did not, however, long continue in his new situation. At first, he felt happy, when he found himself relieved from the vulgar petulance of Miss M'Evoy and her brother Colin: in comparison with their rude ill-humours, the clerks who where his companions appeared patterns of civility. — By hard experience, Forester was taught to know, that obliging manners in our companions add something to the happiness of our lives. „My mind to me a kingdom is," was once his common answer to all that his friend Henry could urge in favour of the pleasures of society; but he now began to suspect, that, separated from social intercourse, his mind, however enlarged, would afford him but a dreary kingdom.

He flattered himself, that he could make a friend of the clerk, who had found his key: this young man's name was Richardson; he was good-natured, but ignorant; and neither his education nor his abilities distinguished him from any other clerk in similar circumstances. Forester invited him to walk to Arthur's Seat, after the mundane business of the day was over, but the clerk preferred walking on holidays in Prince's Street; and, after several ineffectual attempts to engage him in moral and metaphysical arguments, our hero discovered the depth of his companion's ignorance with astonishment. Once, when he found that two of the clerks, to whom he had been talking of Cicero and Pliny, did not know any thing of these celebrated personages, he said with a sigh,

> „But knowledge to their eyes her ample page,
> Rich with the spoils of time, did ne'er unroll;
> Chill penury repress'd their noble rage,
> And froze the genial current of their soul."

The word penury, in this stanza, the clerks at least understood, and it excited their „noble rage;" they hinted, that it ill became a person, who did not dress nearly as well as themselves, to give himself such airs, and to taunt his betters with poverty; they said, that they supposed, because he was an Englishman, as they perceived by his accent, he thought he might insult Scotchmen as he pleased. It was vain for him to attempt any explanation; their pride and their prejudices combined against him; and, though their dislike to him was not so outrageous as that of the gardener, gentle Colin, yet it was quite sufficient to make him uneasy in his situation. Richardson was as civil as could reasonably be expected; but he showed so little desire to have „the ample page, rich with the spoils of time," unrolled to him, that he excited our young scholar's contempt. No friendships can be more unequal than those between ignorance and knowledge. We pass over the journal of our hero's hours, which were spent in casting up and verifying accounts; this occupation, at length, he decided must be extremely injurious to the human understanding: „All the higher faculties of my soul," said he to himself, „are absolutely useless at this work, and I am reduced to a mere machine." But there were many other circumstances, in the mercantile system, which Forester had not foreseen, and which shocked him extremely. The continual attention to petty gain, the little artifices which a tradesman thinks himself justifiable in practising upon his customers, could not be endured by his ingenuous mind. One morning, the brewery was in an uncommon bustle; the clerks were all in motion. Richardson told Forester, that they expected a visit in a few hours from the gauger*) and the supervisor, and that they were preparing for their reception. When the nature of these preparations was explained to Forester, when he was made to understand, that the business and duty of a brewer's clerk was to assist his master in evading certain acts of parliament; when he found, that to trick a gauger was thought an excellent joke, he stood in silent moral astonishment. He knew about as much of the revenue laws as the clerks did of Cicero and Brutus; but his sturdy principles of integrity could not bend to any of the arguments, founded on expediency, which were brought by his companions in their own and their master's justification. He declared, that he must speak to his master upon the subject immediately. His master was as busy as he could possibly be; and when Forester insisted upon seeing him, he declared that he would speak as quickly as he could, for that he expected the supervisor every instant. Our hero declared, that he could not, consistently with his principles, assist in evading the laws of his country. The brewer stared, and then laughed, assured him, that he had as great a respect for the laws as other people, that he did nothing but what every person in his situation was obliged to do in their own defence. Forester resolutely persisted in his determination against all clandestine practices. The brewer cut the matter short, by saying, he had not time to argue; but that he did not choose to keep a clerk, who was not in his interest; that he supposed the next thing would be, to betray him to his supervisor.

„I am no traitor!" exclaimed Forester; „I will not stay another instant with a man who suspects me."

The brewer suffered him to depart without reluctance; but what exasperated Forester the most was the composure of his friend Richardson during this scene. Richardson did not offer to shake hands with him, when he saw him going out of the house; for Richardson had a good place, and did not choose to quarrel with his master, for a person whom he now verily believed to be, as he had originally suspected, insane.

„This is the world! — this is friendship!" said Forester to himself.

His generous and enthusiastic imagination supplied him with eloquent invectives against human nature, even whilst he ardently desired to serve his fellow creatures. He wandered through the streets of Edinburgh, indulging himself alternately in misanthropic reflections and benevolent projects. One instant, he resolved to study the laws, that he might reform the revenue law; the next moment, he recollected his own passion for a desert island; and he regretted that he could not be shipwrecked in Edinburgh.

The sound of a squeaking fiddle roused Forester from his reverie; he looked up, and saw a thin, pale man, fiddling to a set of dancing dogs, that he was exhibiting upon the flags, for the amusement of a crowd of men, women, and children. It was a deplorable spectacle! the dogs appeared so wretched, in the midst of the merriment of the spectators, that Forester's compassion was moved, and he exclaimed. —

---

*) [illegible]

„Enough, enough! — They are quite tired; here are some halfpence!“

The showman took the halfpence; but several fresh spectators were yet to see the sight; and, though the exhausted animals were but little inclined to perform their antic feats, their master twitched the rope, that was fastened round their necks, so violently, that they were compelled to renew their melancholy dance.

Forester darted forward, stopped the fiddler's hand, and began an expostulation, not one word of which was understood by the person to whom it was addressed. A stout lad, who was very impatient of this interruption of his diversion, began to abuse Forester, and presently from words he proceeded to blows.

Forester, though a better orator, was by no means so able a boxer as his opponent. The battle was obstinately fought on both sides; but, at length, our young Quixote received what has no name in heroic language, but in the vulgar tongue is called a black eye; and covered with blood and bruises, he was carried by some humane passenger into a neighbouring house. It was a printer and bookseller's shop. The bookseller treated him with humanity; and, after advising him not to be so hastily engaged to be the champion of dancing-dogs, inquired who he was, and whether he had any friends in Edinburgh, to whom he could send.

This printer, from having been accustomed to converse with variety of people, was a good judge of the language of gentlemen; and, though there was nothing else in Forester's manners which could have betrayed him, he spoke in such good language, that the bookseller was certain, that he had received a liberal education.

Our hero declined telling his history; but the printer was so well pleased with his conversation, that he readily agreed to give him employment; and, as soon as he recovered from his bruises, Forester was eager to learn the art of printing.

„The art of printing,“ said he, „has emancipated mankind, and printers ought to be considered as the most respectable benefactors of the human race.“

Always warm in his admiration of every new phantom that struck his imagination, he was now persuaded that printers' devils were angels, and that he should be supremely blessed in a printer's office.

„What employment so noble!“ said he, as he first took the composing-stick in his hand; „what employment so noble, as that of disseminating knowledge over the universe!“

Forester, a Printer.

It was some time before our hero acquired dexterity in his new trade: his companions formed, with amazing celerity, whole sentences, whilst he was searching for letters, which perpetually dropped from his awkward hands, but he was ashamed of his former versatility, and he resolved to be steady to his present way of life. — His situation, at this printer's, was far better suited to him than that which he had quitted, with so much disgust, at the brewer's. He rose early, and, by great industry, overcame all the difficulties which at first so much alarmed him. He soon became the most useful journeyman in the office. His diligence and good behaviour recommended him to his master's employers. Whenever any work was brought, Forester was sent for. This occasioned him to be much in the shop, where he heard the conversation of many ingenious men who frequented it; and he spent his evenings in reading. His understanding had been of late uncultivated; but the fresh seeds, that were now profusely scattered upon the vigorous soil took root, and flourished.

Forester was just at that time of life when opinions are valued for being new; he heard varieties of the most contradictory assertions in morals, in medicine, in politics. It is a great advantage to a young man to hear opposite arguments, to hear all that can be said upon every subject.

Forester no longer obstinately adhered to the set of notions which he had acquired from his education; he heard many, whom he could not think his inferiors in abilities, debating questions which he formerly imagined scarcely admitted of philosophic doubt. His mind became more humble; but his confidence in his own powers, after having compared himself with numbers, if less arrogant, was more secure and rational: he no longer considered a man as a fool the moment he differed with him in opinion; but he was still a little inclined to estimate the abilities of others by the party to which they belonged. This failing was increased, rather than diminished, by the company which he now kept.

Amongst the young students who frequented Mr. * * *, the bookseller, was Mr. Thomas * * *, who from his habit of blurting out strange opinions in conversation, acquired the name of Tom Random. His head was confused between politics and poetry; his arguments were paradoxical, his diction florid, and his gesture something between the spouting action of a player, and the threatening action of a pugilist.

Forester was caught by the oratory of this genius from the first day he heard him speak.

Tom Random asserted, that „this great globe, and all that it inhabit," must inevitably be doomed to destruction, unless certain ideas of his own, in the government of the world, were immediately adopted by universal acclamation.

It was not approbation, it was not esteem, which Forester felt for his new friend; it was for the first week blind, enthusiastic admiration — every thing that he had seen or heard before appeared to him trite and obsolete; every person who spoke temperate common sense he heard with indifference or contempt; and all who were not zealots in literature, or in politics, he considered as persons whose understandings were so narrow, or whose hearts were so depraved, as to render them „unfit to hear themselves convinced."

Those who read and converse have a double chance of correcting their errors.

Forester, most fortunately, about this time, happened to meet with a book which in some degree counteracted the inflammatory effects of Random's conversation, and which had a happy tendency to sober his enthusiasm, without lessening his propensity to useful exertions: this book was the life of Dr. Franklin.

The idea that this great man began by being a printer interested our hero in his history; and whilst he followed him, step by step, through his instructive narrative, Forester sympathised in his feelings, and observed how necessary the smaller virtues of order, economy, industry, and patience were in Franklin's great character and splendid success. He began to hope that it would be possible to do good to his fellow-creatures, without overturning all existing institutions.

About this time, another fortunate coincidence happened in Forester's education. One evening, his friend, Tom Random, who was printing a pamphlet, came, with a party of his companions, into Mr. * * *, the bookseller's shop; enraged at the decision of a prize in a literary society to which they belonged.

All the young partisans who surrounded Mr. Random loudly declared that he had been treated with the most flagrant injustice; and the author himself was too angry to affect any modesty upon the occasion.

„Would you believe it?" said he to Forester — „my Essay has not been thought worthy of the prize! — The medal has been given to the most wretched, tame, common-place performance you ever saw. Every thing in this world is done by corruption, by party, by secret influence!"

At every pause, the irritated author wiped his forehead, and Forester sympathised in his feelings.

In the midst of the author's exclamations, a messenger came with the manuscript of the prize Essay, and, with the orders of the society to have a certain number of copies printed off with all possible expedition.

Random snatched up the manuscript, and, with all the fury of criticism, began to read some of the passages which he disliked aloud.

Though it was marred in the reading, Forester could not agree with his angry friend in condemning the performance. It appeared to him excellent writing and excellent sense.

„Print it — print it then, as fast as you can — that is your business — that's what you are paid for. Every one for himself,“ cried Random, insolently throwing the manuscript at Forester; and, as he flung of the shop with his companions, he added, with a contemptuous laugh, „A printer's devil setting up for a critic! He may be a capital judge of pica and brevier*), perhaps — but let not the compositor go beyond his stick).“

„Is this the man,“ said Forester, „whom I have heard so eloquent in the praise of candour and liberality? Is this the man who talks of universal toleration and freedom of opinion, and who yet cannot bear that any one should differ from him in correcting a sentence? Is this the man who would have equality amongst all his fellow-creatures, and who calls a compositor a printer's devil! Is this the man who cants about the pre-eminence of mind and the perfections of intellect; who takes advantage of his rank, of his supporters, of the cry of his partisans, to bear down the voice of reason? — Let not the compositor go beyond his composing-stick! — And why not? why should not he be a judge of writing?“ At this reflection, Forester eagerly took up the manuscript, which had been flung at his feet. All his indignant feelings instantly changed into delightful exultation — he saw the hand — he read the name of Henry Campbell. The title of the manuscript was „An Essay on the best Method of reforming Abuses.“ This was the subject proposed by the society; and Henry had written upon the question with so much moderation, and yet with such unequivocal decision had shown himself the friend of rational liberty, that all the members of the society who were not borne away by their prejudices were unanimous in their preference of this performance.

Random's declamation only inflamed the minds of his own partisans. Good judges of writing exclaimed, as they read it — „This is all very fine, but what would this man be at? His violence hurts the cause he wishes to support.“

Forester read Henry Campbell's Essay with all the avidity of friendship; he read it again and again — his generous soul was incapable of envy; and whilst he admired, he was convinced by the force of reason.

His master desired that he would set about the Essay early in the morning; but his eagerness for his friend Henry's fame was such, that he sat up above half the night, hard at work at it. He was indefatigable the next day at the business; and, as all hands were employed on the Essay, it was finished that evening.

Forester rubbed his hands with delight, when he had set the name of Henry Campbell in the title-page — but an instant afterwards he sighed bitterly.

„I am only a printer,“ said he to himself. „These just arguments, these noble ideas, will instruct and charm hundreds of my fellow-creatures: no one will ever ask — Who set the types?“

His reflections were interrupted by the entrance of Tom Random and two of his partisans: he was extremely displeased to find that the printers had not been going on with his pamphlet; his personal disappointments seemed to increase the acrimony of zeal for the public good; he declaimed upon politics — upon the necessity for the immediate publication of his sentiments, for the salvation of the state. His action was suited to his words: violent and blind to consequences, with one sudden kick, designed to express his contempt for the opposite party, this political Alnaschar unfortunately overturned the form which contained the types for the newspaper of the next day, which was just going to the press — a newspaper in which he had written splendid paragraphs.

(To be continued in our next.)

---

*) Cicero und Petit.

) Winkelhaken.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. No. 11.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Continued from our last.)

Forester, happily for his philosophy, recollected the account which Franklin, in his history of his own life, gives of the patience with which he once bore a similar accident. The printers, with secret imprecations against oratory, or at least against those orators who think that action is every thing, set to work again to repair the mischief.

Forester, much fatigued, at length congratulated himself upon having finished his hard day's work, when a man from the shop came to inquire whether three hundred cards, which had been ordered the week before to be printed off, were finished. The man to whom the order was given had forgotten it, and he was going home: he decidedly answered, „No; the cards can't be done till to-morrow: we have left work for this night, thank God."

„The gentleman says he must have them," expostulated the messenger.

„He must not, he cannot have them. I would not print a card for his majesty at this time of night," replied the sullen workman, throwing his hat upon his head, in token of departure.

„What are these cards?" said Forester.

„Only a dancing-master's cards for his ball," said the printer's journeyman. „I'll not work beyond my time for any dancing-master that wears a head."

The messenger then said, that he was desired to ask for the manuscript card.

This card was hunted for all over the room; and, at last, Forester found it under a heap of refuse papers: his eye was caught with the name of his old friend, Monsieur Pasgrave, the dancing-master, whom he had formerly frightened by the skeleton with the fiery eyes.

„I will print the cards for him myself; I am not at all tired," cried Forester, who was determined to make some little amends for the injury which he had formerly done to the poor dancing-master. He resolved to print the cards for nothing, and he staid up very late to finish them. His companions all left him, for they were in a great hurry to see, what in Edinburgh is a rare sight, the town illuminated.

These illuminations were upon account of some great naval victory.

Forester, steady to Monsieur Pasgrave's cards, did what no other workman would have done; he finished for him, on this night of public joy, his three hundred cards. Every now and then, as he was quietly at work, he heard the loud huzzas in the street: his wasting candle sunk in the socket, as he had just packed up his work.

By the direction at the bottom of the cards, he learned where M. Pangrave lodged, and, as he was going out to look at the illuminations, he resolved to leave them himself at the dancing-master's house.

The Illuminations.

The illuminations were really beautiful. He went up to the Castle, whence he saw a great part of the Old Town, and all Princes'-street, lighted up in the most splendid manner. He crossed the North-bridge into Princes'-street. Walking down Princes'-street, he saw a crowd of people gathered before the large illuminated window of a confectioner's shop. As he approached nearer, he distinctly heard the voice of Tom Random, who was haranguing the mob. The device and motto which the confectioner displayed in his window displeased this gentleman; who, beside his public-spirited abhorrence of all men of a party opposite to his own, had likewise private cause of dislike to this confectioner, who had refused him his daughter in marriage.

It was part of Random's new system of political justice to revenge his own quarrels.

The mob, who are continually, without knowing it, made the instruments of private malice, when they think they are acting in a public cause, readily joined in Tom Random's cry of „Down with the motto! Down with the motto!"

Forester, who, by his lesson from the dancing dog had earned a little prudence, and who had just printed Henry Campbell's Essay on the best Means of reforming Abuses, did not mix with the rabble, but joined in the remonstrances of some peaceable passengers, who prayed that the poor man's windows might be spared. The windows were, notwithstanding, demolished, with a terrible crash, and the crowd then, alarmed at the mischief they had done, began to disperse. The constables, who had been sent for, appeared. Tom Random was taken into custody. Forester was pursuing his way to the dancing-master's, when one of the officers of justice exclaimed, „Stop! — stop him! — he's one of 'em: he's a great friend of Mr. Random: I've seen him when parading arm in arm in High-street with him!"

This, alas! was too true: the constables seized Forester, and put him, with Tom Random and the ring-leaders of the riot, into a place of confinement for the night.

Poor Forester, who was punished for the faults of his former friend and present enemy, had, during this long night, leisure for much wholesome reflection upon the danger of forming imprudent intimacies. He resolved never to walk again in High-street arm in arm with such a man as Tom Random.

The constables were rather hasty in the conclusions they drew from this presumptive evidence.

Our hero, who felt the disgrace of his situation, was not a little astonished at Tom Random's consoling himself with drinking instead of philosophy. The sight of this enthusiast, when he had completely intoxicated himself, was a disgusting but useful spectacle to our indignant hero. Forester was shocked at the union of gross vice and rigid pretensions to virtue: he could scarcely believe that the reeling, stammering idiot whom he now beheld was the same being from whose lips he had heard declamations upon the omnipotence of intellect — from whose pen he had seen projects for the government of empires.

The dancing-master, who, in the midst of the illuminations, had regretted that his cards could not be printed, went early in the morning to inquire about them at the printer's.

The printer had learnt that one of his boys was taken up amongst the rioters: he was sorry to find that Forester had gotten himself into such a scrape; but he was a very cautious canny man, and he did not choose to interfere: he left him quietly to be dealt with according to law.

The dancing-master, however, was interested in finding him out, because he was informed that Forester had sat up almost all night to print his cards, and that he had them now in his pocket.

M. Pangrave at length gained admittance to him in his confinement: the officers of justice were taking him and Henry before Mr. W, a magistrate, with whom informations had been lodged by the confectioner, who had suffered in his windows.

Pangrove, when he beheld Forester, was surprised to such a degree, that he could scarcely finish his bow, or express his astonishment, either in French or English. — „Eh, monsieur! — mon Dieu! — bon Dieu! I beg ten million pardon — I am come to search for a printer, who has my cards in his pocket."

„Here are your cards," said Forester; „let me speak a few words to you." He took M. Pangrove aside — „I perceive," said he, „that you have discovered who I am. Though in the service of a printer, I have still as much the feelings and principles of a gentleman as I had when you saw me in Dr. Campbell's house. I have particular reasons for being anxious to remain undiscovered by Dr. Campbell, or any of his family: you may depend upon it that my reasons are not dishonourable. I request that you will not, upon any account, betray me to that family. I am going before a magistrate, and am accused of being concerned in a riot, which I did every thing in my power to prevent.

„Ah! monsieur," interrupted the dancing-master, but you are de grand inconvenience of concealing your rank and name. You, who are comme il faut, are confounded with the mob: permit me at least to follow you to Mr. W, the magistrate: I have de honneur to teach les demoiselles his daugters to dance; dey are to be at my ball — dey take above a dozen tickets. I must call dere with my cards; and I shall, if you will give me leave, accompany you now, and mention dat I know you to be un homme comme il faut, above being guilty of so unbecoming action. I flatter myself I have some interest wid de ladies of de family, and dat dey will do me de favour to speak to monsieur leur cher père sur votre compte."

Forester thanked the good-natured dancing-master, but he proudly said, that he should trust to his own innocence for his defence.

M. Pangrove, who had seen something more of the world than our hero, and who was interested for him, because he had once made him a present of an excellent violin, and because he had sat up half the night to print the ball cards, resolved not to leave him entirely to his innocence for a defence: he followed Forester to Mr. W's. The magistrate was a slow, pompous man, by no means a good physiognomist, much less a good judge of character. He was proud of his authority, and glad to play the small portion of legal knowledge which he possessed. As soon as he was informed that some young men were brought before him, who had been engaged the preceding night in a riot, he put on all his magisterial terrors, and assured the confectioner, who had a private audience of him, that he should have justice; and that the person or persons concerned in breaking his window or windows should be punished with the utmost severity that the law would allow. Contrary to the humane spirit of the British law, which supposes every man to be innocent till it is proved that he is guilty, this harsh magistrate presumed that every man who was brought before him was guilty till he was proved to be innocent. Forester's appearance was not in his favour: he had been up all night; his hair was dishevelled; his linen was neither fine nor white; his shoes were thicksoled and dirty; his coat was that in which he had been at work at the printer's the preceding day; it was in several places daubed with printer's ink; and his unwashed hands bespoke his trade. Of all these circumstances the slow incompetent eye of the magistrate took cognizance, one by one. Forester observed the effect which this survey produced upon his judge; and he felt that appearances were against him, and that appearances are sometimes of consequence. After having estimated his poverty by these external symptoms, the magistrate looked, for the first time, in his face, and pronounced that he had one of the worst countenances he ever beheld. This judgment once pronounced, he proceeded to justify it, by wresting to the prisoner's disadvantage every circumstance that appeared. Forester's having been frequently seen in Tom Random's company was certainly against him: the confectioner perpetually repeated that they were constant companions; that they were continually walking together every Sunday; and that they often had come arm in arm into his shop, talking politics; that he believed Forester to be of the same way of thinking with Mr. Random; and that he saw him close behind him, at the moment the stones were thrown that broke the windows. It appeared that Mr. Random was at that time active in encouraging the mob. To oppose the angry confectioner's conjectural evidence, the lad who threw the stone, and who was now produced, declared that Forester held back his arm, and said, „My good lad, don't break this man's windows: go home quietly; here's a shilling for you." The person who gave this honest testimony, in whom there was a strange mixture of the love of mischief and the spirit of generosity, was the very lad who fought with Forester, and beat him, about the dancing-dogs. He whispered to Forester, „Do you remember me? I hope you don't bear malice." The magistrate, who heard this whisper, immediately construed it to the prisoner's disadvantage. — „Then, sir," said he, addressing himself to our hero, „this gentleman, I understand, claims acquaintance with you; his acquaintance really does you honour, and speaks strongly in favour of your character. If I mistake not, this is the lad whom I sent to the Tolbooth, some little time ago, for a misdemeanour; and he is not, I apprehend, a stranger to the stocks."

Forester commanded his temper as well as he was able, and observed, that whatever might be the character of the young man who had spoken in his favour, his evidence would, perhaps, he thought to deserve some credit, when the circumstances of his acquaintance with the witness were known. He then related the adventure of the dancing-dogs, and remarked, that the testimony of an enemy came with double force in his favour. The language and manner in which Forester spoke surprised all who were present; but the history of the dancing-dogs appeared so ludicrous and so improbable, that the magistrate decidedly pronounced it to be „a fabrication, a story invented to conceal the palpable collusion of the witnesses." Yet, though he one moment declared that he did not believe the story, he the next inferred from it, that Forester was disposed to riot and sedition, since he was ready to fight with a vagabond in the streets for the sake of a parcel of dancing-dogs.

M. Pasgrave, in the mean time, had, with great good-nature, been representing Forester in the best light he possibly could to the young ladies, the magistrate's daughters. One of them sent to beg to speak to their father. Mr. Pasgrave judiciously dwelt upon his assurances of Forester's being a gentleman: he told Mr. W that he had met him in one of the best families in Edinburgh; that he knew he had some private reasons for concealing that he was a gentleman; „perhaps the young, gentleman was reduced to temporary distress," he said; but whatever might be these reasons, M. Pasgrave vouched for his having very respectable friends and connexions. The magistrate wished to know the family in which M. Pasgrave had met Forester; but he was, according to his promise, impenetrable on this subject. His representations had, however, the desired effect upon Mr. W: when he returned to the examination of our hero, his opinion of his countenance somewhat varied: he despatched his other business, bailed Tom Random on high sureties; and, when Forester was the only person that remained, he turned to him with great solemnity; bade him sit down; informed him that he knew him to be a gentleman; that he was greatly concerned that a person like him, who had respectable friends and connexions, should involve himself in such a disagreeable affair; that it was a matter of grief and surprise to him, to see a young gentleman in such apparel; that he earnestly recommended to him to accommodate matters with his friends; and, above all things, to avoid the company of seditious persons. Much good advice, but in a dictatorial tone, and in cold, pompous language, he bestowed upon the prisoner; and at length dismissed him. „How different," said Forester to himself, „is this man's method of giving advice from Dr. Campbell's!"

This lesson strongly impressed, however, upon our hero's mind the belief, that external appearance, dress, manners, and the company we keep, are the usual circumstances by which the world judge of character and conduct. When he was dismissed from Mr. W's august presence, the first thing he did was to inquire for Pangrove; he was giving the magistrate's daughters a lesson, and could not be interrupted; but Forester left a note for him, requesting to see him at ten o'clock, the next day, at Mr.  the bookseller's. New mortifications awaited our hero: on his return to his master, the bookseller, he was very coldly received; Mr.  let him know, in unqualified terms, that he did not like to employ any one in his work who got into quarrels at night in the public streets. Forester's former favour with his master, his industry and talents, were not considered without envy by the rest of the journeymen printers; and they took advantage of his absence to misrepresent him to the bookseller: however, when Forester came to relate his own story, his master was convinced that he was not to blame; that he had worked extremely hard the preceding day; and that, far from having been concerned in a riot, he had done every thing in his power to prevent mischief. He desired to see the Essay, which was printed with so much expedition: it was in the hands of the corrector of the press. The sheets were sent for, and the bookseller was in admiration at the extraordinary correctness with which it was printed; the corrector of the press scarcely had occasion to alter a word, a letter, or a stop. There was a quotation in the manuscript from Juvenal. Henry Campbell had, by mistake, omitted to name the satire and line, and the author from which it was taken, though he had left a blank in which they were to be inserted. The corrector of the press, though a literary gentleman, was at a stand. Forester immediately knew where to look for the passage in the original author; he found it, and inserted the book and line in their proper place. His master did not suffer this to pass unnoticed; he hinted to him, that it was a pity a young man of his abilities and knowledge should waste his time in the mere technical drudgery of printing. „I should be glad now," continued the bookseller, „to employ you as a corrector of the press, and to advance you, according to your merits, in the world, but," glancing his eye at Forester's dress, „you must give me leave to say, that some attention to outward appearance is necessary in our business. Gentlemen call here, as you well know, continually, and I like to have the people about me make a creditable appearance. You have earned money since you have been with me — surely you can afford yourself a decent suit of clothes and a cleaner shirt. I beg your pardon for speaking so freely; but I really have a regard for you, and wish to see you get forward in life."

Forester, a Corrector of the Press.

Forester had not, since he left Dr. Campbell's, been often spoken to in a tone of friendship. The bookseller's well-meant frank remonstrance made its just impression; and he resolved to make the necessary additions to his wardrobe; nay, he even went to a hair-dresser, to have his hair cut and brought into decent order. His companions, the printers, had not been sparing in their remarks upon the meanness of his former apparel, and Forester pleased himself with anticipating the respect they would feel for him, when he should appear in better clothes. „Can such trifles," said he to himself, „make such a change in the opinion of my fellow-creatures? And why should I fight with the world for trifles? My real merit is neither increased nor diminished by the dress I may happen to wear; but I see that, unless I waste all my life in combating the prejudices of superficial observers, I should avoid all those peculiarities in my external appearance which prevent whatever good qualities I have from obtaining their just respect." He was surprised at the blindness of his companions, who could not discover his merit through the roughness of his manners and the disadvantages of his dress; but he determined to shine out upon them in the superior dress and character of a corrector of the press. He went to a tailor's, and bespoke a suit of clothes. He bought new linen; and our readers will perhaps hear with surprise, that he actually began to consider very seriously whether he should not take a few lessons in dancing. He had learned to dance formerly, and was not naturally either inactive or awkward; but his contempt for that art prevented him, for some years, from practising it; and he had nearly forgotten his wonted agility. Henry Campbell once, when Forester was declaiming against dancing, told him, that if he had learned to dance, and excelled in the art, his contempt for the trifling accomplishment would have more effect upon the minds of others, because it could not be mistaken for envy. This remark made a deep impression upon our hero, especially as he observed that his friend Henry was not in the least vain of his personal graces, and had cultivated his understanding, though he could dance a Scotch reel. Scotch reels were associated in Forester's imagination with Flora Campbell; and in balancing the arguments for and against learning to dance, the recollection of Archibald Mackenzie's triumphant look, when he led her away as his partner at the famous ball, had more influence perhaps upon Forester's mind than his pride and philosophy apprehended. He began to have some confused design of returning, at some distant period, to his friends; and he had hopes that he should appear in a more amiable light to Flora, after he had perfected himself in an accomplishment, which he fancied she admired prodigiously. His esteem for the lady was rather diminished by this belief; but still a sufficient quantity remained to excite in him a strong ambition to please. The agony he felt the night he left the ball-room was such, that he could not even now recollect the circumstance without confusion and anguish of mind. His hands were now such as could appear without gloves; and he resolved to commence the education of his feet.

M. Pasgrave called upon him, in consequence of the message which he left at the magistrate's: his original design in sending for the dancing-master was to offer him some acknowledgment for his obliging conduct. „M. Pasgrave," said he, „you have behaved towards me like a man of honour; you have kept my secret; I am convinced that you will continue to keep it inviolate." As he spoke, he produced a ten-guinea bank-note; for at length he had prevailed upon himself to have recourse to his pocket-book, which, till this day, had remained untouched. Pasgrave stared at the sight of the note, and withdrew his hand at first, when it was offered; but he yielded at length, when Forester assured him that he was not in any distress, and that he could perfectly well afford to indulge his feelings of gratitude. „Nay" continued Forester, who, if he had not always practised the maxims of politeness, notwithstanding possessed that generosity of mind and good sense on which real politeness must depend — „you shall not be under any obligation to me, M. Pasgrave: I am just going to ask a favour from you. You must teach me to dance." „Wid de utmost pleasure," exclaimed the delighted dancing-master; and the hours of his attendance were soon settled. Whatever Forester attempted, he pursued with energy. M. Pasgrave, after giving him a few lessons, prophesied that he would do him infinite credit; and Forester felt a secret pride in the idea that he should surprise his friends, some time or other, with his new accomplishments.

He continued in the bookseller's service, correcting the press for him, much to his satisfaction, and the change in his personal appearance pleased his master, as it showed attention to his advice. Our hero, from time to time, exercised his talents in writing; and, as he inserted his compositions, under a fictitious signature, in his master's newspaper, he had an opportunity of hearing the most unprejudiced opinions of a variety of critics, who often came to read the papers at their house. He stated, in short essays, some of those arguments concerning the advantages and disadvantages of politeness, luxury, the love of society, misanthropy, etc., which had formerly passed between him and Henry Campbell; and he listened to the remarks that were made upon each side of the question. — How it happened, we know not; but after he had taken lessons for about six weeks from M. Pasgrave, he became extremely solicitous to have a solution of all his sceptical doubts, and to furnish himself with the best possible arguments in favour of civilized society. He could not bear the idea that he yielded his opinions to any thing less than strict demonstration: he drew up a list of queries, which concluded with the following question: — „What should be the distinguishing characteristics of the higher classes of people in society?" — This query was answered in one of the public papers, a few days after it appeared in M's paper, and the answer was signed H. C., a friend to Society. Even without these initials, Forester would easily have discovered it to be Henry Campbell's writing; and several strokes seemed to be so particularly addressed to him, that he could not avoid thinking Henry had discovered the querist. The impression which arguments make upon the mind varies with time and change of situation. Those arguments in favour of subordination in society, in favour of agreeable manners, and attention to the feelings of others in the great concerns of life, which our hero had heard with indifference from Dr. Campbell and Henry in conversation, struck him when he saw them in a printed essay, with all the force of conviction; and he wondered how it had happened that he never before perceived them to be conclusive.

He put the newspaper, which contained this essay, in his pocket; and, after he had finished his day's work, and had taken his evening lesson from M. Pasgrave, he went out with an intention of going to a favourite spot upon Arthur's Seat, to read the essay again at his leisure.

But he was stopped at the turn from the North Bridge into High-street by a scavenger's cart. The scavenger, with his broom which had just swept the High-street, was clearing away a heap of mud. Two gentlemen on horseback, who were riding like postillions, came up during this operation — Sir Philip Gosling and Archibald Mackenzie. Forester had his back towards them, and he never looked round, because he was too intent upon his own melancholy thoughts. Archibald was mounted upon Sawney, the horse which he had so fairly won from his friend sir Philip. The half-guinea which had been promised to the hostler had not yet been paid; and the hostler, determined to revenge himself upon Archibald, invented an ingenious method of gratifying his resentment. He taught Sawney to rear and plunge, whenever his legs were touched by the broom with which the stables were swept. When Sawney was perfectly well trained to this trick, the cunning hostler communicated his design, and related his cause of complaint against Archibald to a scavenger, who was well known at the livery-stables. The scavenger entered into his friend the hostler's feelings, and promised to use his broom in his cause, whenever a convenient and public opportunity should offer. The hour of retribution was now arrived: the scavenger saw his young gentleman in full glory, mounted upon Sawney: he kept his eye upon him, whilst, in company with the baronet, he came over the North Bridge: there was a stop, from the meeting of carts and carriages. The instant Archibald came within reach of the broom, the scavenger slightly touched Sawney's legs; Sawney plunged and reared — and reared and plunged. The scavenger stood grinning at the sight. Forester attempted to seize the horse's bridle; but Sawney, who seemed determined upon the point, succeeded. When Forester snatched at his bridle he reared, then plunged; and Archibald Mackenzie was fairly lodged in the scavenger's cart. Whilst the well-dressed laird floundered in the mud, Forester gave the horse to the servant, who had now ridden up; and satisfied that Mackenzie had received no material injury, inquired not farther. He turned to assist a poor washerwoman, who was lifting a large basket of clean linen into her house, to get it out of the way of the cart. As soon as he had helped her to lift the basket into her passage, he was retiring, when he heard a voice at the back-door, which was at the other end of the passage. It was the voice of a child; and he listened, for he thought he had heard it before. — „The door is locked,“ said the washerwoman. „I know who it is that is knocking; it is only a little girl who is coming for a cap which I have there in the basket.“ The door was unlocked, and Forester saw the little girl to whom the fine geranium belonged. What a number of ideas she recalled to his mind! She looked at him, and hesitated, curtsied, then turned away, as if she was afraid she was mistaken, and asked the washerwoman if she had plaited her grandmother's cap. The woman searched in her basket, and produced the cap nicely plaited. The little girl, in the mean time, considered Forester with anxious attention. „I believe,“ said she, timidly, „you are, or you are very like, the gentleman who was so good as to — “ „Yes,“ interrupted Forester, „I know what you mean. I am the man who went with you to try to obtain justice from your tyrannical school-mistress: I did not do you any good. — Have you seen — have you heard any thing of — ?“ Such a variety of recollections pressed upon Forester's heart, that he could not pronounce the name of Henry Campbell; and he changed his question. „Is your old grandmother recovered?“ „She is quite well, thank you, sir; and she is grown young again, since you saw her: perhaps you don't know how good Mr. Henry and the young lady have been to us. We don't live now in that little, close, dark room at the watchmaker's. We are as happy, sir, as the day is long.“ „But what of Henry? — what of — ?“ „O sir! — but if you are not very busy, or in a great hurry — it is but a little way off — if you could come and look at our new house — I don't mean our house, for it is not ours; but we take care of it, and we have two little rooms to ourselves; and Mr. Henry and Miss Flora very often come to see us. I wish you could come to see how nice our rooms are! The house is not far off, only at the back of the Meadows.“ „Go, show me the way — I'll follow you,“ said Forester, after he had satisfied himself that there was no danger of his meeting any of Dr. Campbell's family.

The Meadows.

Our hero accompanied the little girl with eager, benevolent curiosity. „There,“ said she, when they came to the Meadows, „do you see that white house, with the paling before it?“ — „But that cannot be your house!“ „No, no, sir, Dr. Campbell and several gentlemen have the large room, and they come there twice a week, to teach something to a great many children. Grandmother can explain all that better to you, sir, than I can; but all I know is, that it is our business to keep the room aired and swept, and to take care of the glass things which you'll see; and you shall see how clean it is — it was I swept it this morning.“

They had now reached the gate, which was in the paling before the house. The old woman came to the door, clean, neat, and cheerful; she recollected to have seen Forester in company with Henry Campbell at the watchmaker's; and this was sufficient to make him a welcome guest. „God bless the family and all that belongs to them, for ever and ever!“ said the woman. „This way, sir,“ — „O, don't look into our little rooms yet; look at the great room first, if you please, sir,“ said the child.

There was a large table in the middle of this long room, and several glass retorts, and other chemical vessels, were ranged upon shelves, wooden benches were placed on each side of the table. The grandmother, to whom the little girl had referred for a clear explanation, could not, however, tell Forester very exactly the uses of the retorts; but she informed him that many of the manufacturers in Edinburgh sent their sons hither, twice a week; and Dr. Campbell, and Mr. Henry Campbell, and some other gentlemen, came by turns to instruct them.

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. №. 12.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Forester.

BY MARIA EDGEWORTH.

(Continued from our last.)

Forester recollected now that he once heard Henry talking to his father about a scheme for teaching the children of the manufacturers of Edinburgh some knowledge of chemistry; such as they might afterwards employ advantageously to the arts, and every-day business of life.

„I have formed projects, but what good have I ever actually done to my fellow-creatures?" said Forester to himself. With melancholy steps he walked to examine every thing in the room. „Dr. Campbell sits in this armchair, does not he? and where does Henry sit?" The old woman placed the chairs for him as they usually were placed. Upon one of the shelves there was a slate, which, as it had been written upon, the little girl had put by very carefully; there were some calculations upon the weight of different gases, and the figures Forester knew to be Henry's; he looked at every thing that was Henry's with pleasure. „Because I used to be so rough in my manner to him," said Forester to himself, „I dare say that he thinks I have no feeling; and I suppose he has forgotten me by this time. I deserve, indeed, to be forgotten by every body! How could I leave such friends!" On the other side of the slate poor Forester saw his own name written several times over, in his friend's hand-writing, and he read two lines of his own poetry, which he remembered to have repeated to Henry, the day that they walked to Arthur's Seat. Forester felt much pleasure from this little proof of his friend Henry's remembrance. „Now won't you look at our nice rooms?" said the child, who had waited with some impatience, till he had done pondering upon the slate.

The little rooms were well arranged, and their neatness was not now so much lost upon our hero as it would have been some months before. The old woman and her grand-daughter, with all the pride of gratitude, exhibited to him several little presents of furniture which they had received from Dr. Campbell's family. „Mr. Henry gave me this! — Miss Flora gave me that" was frequently repeated. The little girl opened the door of her own room. On a clean, white deal bracket, which „Mr. Henry had put up with his own hands" stood the well-known geranium in its painted flower-pot. Forester saw nothing else in the room, and it was in vain that both the old woman and her grand-daughter talked to him at once — he heard not a word that was said to him. The flowers were all gone, and the brown calyces of the geranium flowers reminded him of the length of time which had elapsed since he had first seen them. „I am sorry there are no flowers to offer you," said the little girl, observing Forester's melancholy look; „but I thought you did not like geraniums; for I remember, when I gave you a fine flower in the watchmaker's shop, you pulled it to pieces, and threw it on the ground.“ „I should not do so now,“ said Forester. The black marks on the painted flower-pot had been entirely effaced. Forester turned away, endeavoured to conceal his emotion, and took leave of the place, as soon as the grateful inhabitants would suffer him to depart. The reflection, that he had wasted his time; that he had never done any good to any human being; that he had lost opportunities of making both himself and others happy, pressed upon his mind; but his natural pride still resisted the thought of returning to Dr. Campbell's. „It will be imagined that I yield my opinions from meanness of spirit,“ said he to himself, „Dr. Campbell certainly has no farther regard or esteem for me: neither he nor Henry have troubled themselves about my fate. They are doing good to more deserving objects; they are intent upon literary pursuits, and have not time to bestow a thought on me: and Flora, I suppose, is as gay as she is good. I alone am unhappy — a wanderer — an outcast — a useless being.“

Forester, whilst he was looking at the geranium, or soon afterwards, missed his handkerchief: the old woman and her grand-daughter searched for it all over the house, but in vain. He then thought he must have left it at the washerwoman's, where he met the little girl. He called to inquire for it, upon his return to Edinburgh. When he returned to this woman's house for his handkerchief, he found her sitting upon a low stool, in her laundry, weeping bitterly; her children stood round her. Forester inquired into the cause of her distress; and she told him that, a few minutes after he left her, the young gentleman who had been thrown from his horse into the scavenger's cart was brought into her house, whilst his servant went home for another suit of clothes for him. „I did not at first guess that I had ever seen the young gentleman before,“ continued she; „but when the mud was cleared from his face, I knew him to be Mr. Archibald Mackenzie. I am sure I wish I had never seen his face then, or at any time. He was in a very bad humour after his tumble; and he began again to threaten me about a ten-guinea bank-note, which he and his servant declare they left in his waistcoat pocket to be washed. I'm sure I never saw it. Mr. Henry Campbell quieted him about it for a while; but just now he began again with me, and he says he has spoken to an attorney, and that he will make me pay the whole note; and he swore at me as if I had been the worst creature in the world; and God knows, I work hard for my children, and never wronged any one in my days!“

Forester, who forgot all his own melancholy reflections as soon as he could assist any one who was in distress, bade the poor woman dry her tears and assured her that she had nothing to fear; for he would instantly go to Dr. Campbell, and get him to speak to Mackenzie. „If it is necessary,“ said he, I'll pay the money myself.“ She clasped her hands joyfully as he spoke; and all her children joined in an exclamation of delight. „I'll go to Dr. Campbell's this instant,“ said our hero, whose pride now yielded to the desire of doing justice to this injured woman; he totally forgot himself, and thought only of her: „I'll go with you to Dr. Campbell's, and I will speak to Mr. Mackenzie immediately.“

A Summons.

Whilst Forester was walking through the streets, with the energy which the hope of serving his fellow creatures always excited in his generous mind, he even forgot a favourite scheme which had, for some weeks past, occupied his imagination. He had formed the design of returning to his friends an altered being in his external appearance: all his apparel was now finished, and ready for the grand day when he intended to present himself to Dr. Campbell, or rather to Flora Campbell in the character of a well-bred gentleman. He had laid aside the dress and manners of a gentleman, from the opinion that they were degrading to the character of a man: as soon as this prejudice had been conquered, he was ready to resume them. Many were the pleasing anticipations in which he indulged himself: the looks of each of his friends, the generous approving eye of Henry, the benevolent countenance of Dr. Campbell, the arch smile of Flora, were all painted by his fancy; and he invented every circumstance that was likely to happen, every word that would probably be said by each individual. We are sure that our readers will give our enthusiastic hero credit for his forgetting the pleasing reveries, for his forgetting himself, nay, even Flora Campbell, when humanity and justice called upon him for exertion.

When he found himself in George's square, within sight of Dr. Campbell's house, his heart beat violently, and he suddenly stopped to recollect himself. He had scarcely stood a few instants, when a hard, stout looking man came up to him, and asked him if his name were Forester. He started, and answered, „Yes, sir: what is your business with me?“ The stranger replied by producing a paper, and desiring him to read it. The paper, which was half printed, half written, began with these words: —

„You are hereby required to appear before me — —“ „What is all this?“ exclaimed our hero. „It is a summons,“ replied the stranger: „I am a constable, and you will please to come with me before him, I am told.“ To this last insolent taunt Forester made no reply; but in a firm tone said, that he was conscious of no crime, but that he was ready to follow the constable, and appear before Mr. W———, or any other magistrate who wished to inquire into his conduct. Though he summoned all his fortitude, and spoke with composure, he was much astonished by this proceeding; he could not help reflecting, that an individual in society, who has friends, an established character, and a home, is in a more desirable situation than an unconnected being, who has no one to answer for his conduct, no one to rejoice in his success, or to sympathise in his misfortunes. „Ah, Dr. Campbell! happy father! in the midst of your own family, you have forgotten your imprudent ward!“ said Forester to himself. „You do not know how near he is to you! You do not see that he is, at this moment, perhaps, on the brink of disgrace!“

The Bank-note.

Forester was mistaken in his idea that Dr. Campbell had forgotten him; but we shall not yet explain farther upon this subject: we only throw out this hint, that our readers may not totally change their good opinion of the doctor. We must now beg their attention to the continuation of the history of Archibald Mackenzie's bank-note.

Lady Catherine Mackenzie one day observed that the colours were changed in one spot on the right hand pocket of her son's waistcoat. „My dear Archibald,“ said she, „what has happened to your smart waistcoat? What is that terrible spot?“ „Really, ma'am, I don't know,“ said Archibald with his usual soft voice and deceitful smile. Henry Campbell observed that it seemed as if the colours had been discharged by some acid. „Did you wear that waistcoat, Mr. Mackenzie,“ said he, „the night the large bottle of vitriolic acid was broken — the night that poor Forester's cat was killed — don't you remember?“ „Oh! I did not first recollect — I cannot possibly remember, indeed, it is so long ago, what waistcoat I wore on that particular night.“ The extreme embarrassment in Archibald's manner surprised Henry. „I really don't perceive your drift,“ continued Mackenzie. — „What made you ask the question so earnestly?“ He was relieved from his panic, when Henry answered, that he only wished to know whether it was probable that it was stained with vitriolic acid; „because,“ said he, „I think that is the pocket in which you said you left your ten-guinea note; then, perhaps, the note may have been stained.“ „Perhaps, so,“ replied Mackenzie, drily. „And if it were, you could identify the note: you have forgotten the number; but if the note has been stained with vitriolic acid, we should certainly be able to know it again. The acid would have changed the colour of the ink.“ Mackenzie engerly seized this idea; and immediately, in pursuance of Henry's advice, went to several of the principal bankers in Edinburgh, and requested that if a note, stained in such a manner, should be presented to them, they would stop payment of it, till Mackenzie should examine it. Some time elapsed, and nothing was heard of the note. Mackenzie gave up all hopes of recovering it; and, in proportion as these hopes diminished, his old desire of making the poor washerwoman answerable for his loss increased. We have just heard this woman's account of his behaviour to her, when he came into her house to be refitted, after his tumble from Sawney into the scavenger's cart. All his promises to Henry he thought proper to disregard: promises appeared to him mere matters of convenience; and the idea of „taking in" such a young man as Henry Campbell was to him an excellent joke. He resolved to keep the five guineas quietly which Henry lent him; and, at the same time, to frighten this innocent, industrious woman into paying him the value of his bank-note.

Upon Mackenzie's return to Dr. Campbell's, after his fall from Sawney, the first thing he heard was that his note was found; that it had been stopped at the bank of Scotland; and that one of the clerks of the bank, who brought it for his examination, had been some time waiting for his return from riding. When the note was produced, Henry saw that two or three of the words which had been written in ink, the name of the name of the person to whom it was payable, and the date of the month and year, were so pale, as to be scarcely visible; and that there was a round hole through one corner of the paper. This round hole puzzled Henry; but he had no doubt that the ink had been thus nearly obliterated by vitriolic acid. He poured a few drops, diluted with water, upon some printing, and the ink was quickly turned to nearly the same pale colour as that in Mackenzie's note. The note was easily traced, as it had not passed through many hands — our readers will be sorry to hear it — to M. Pasgrave, the dancing-master. Mackenzie and the clerk went directly to his house, found him at home, and, without much preface, informed him of their business. The dancing-master trembled from head to foot; and, though innocent, exhibited all the signs of guilt. He had not the slightest knowledge of business; and the manner and language of the banker's clerk who accompanied Mackenzie terrified him beyond measure, because he did not comprehend one word in ten that he said about checks, entries, and day-books; and he was nearly a quarter of an hour before he could recover sufficient presence of mind to consider from whom he received the note. At length after going over, in an unintelligible manner, all the puzzled accounts of monies received and paid which he kept in his head, he declared that he clearly recollected to have received the ten-guinea note at Mr. Macpherson's, the tailor; that he went a few weeks ago to settle his year's account with him; and that, in change for a twenty-pound note, he received that which the banker's clerk now produced. To Mackenzie it was perfectly indifferent who was found guilty, so that he could recover his money. „Settle it as you will amongst you," said he — „the money must be refunded, or I must have you all before a magistrate directly." Pasgrave, in great perturbation, set out for Mr. Macpherson's, showed him the note, and reminded him of the day when he paid his account. „If you received the note from us, sir," said the master tailor, very calmly, „it must be entered in our book; for we keep regular accounts." The tailor's foreman, who knew much more of the affair than his master, appealed, with assumed security, to the entry in the books. By this entry, it appeared that M. Pasgrave settled his account the 17th of October; that he paid the balance by a twenty-pound note, and that he received in change a ten-guinea note, on Sir William Forbes's bank. „You see, sir," said the tailor, „this cannot possibly be Mr. Mackenzie's; for his note is on the bank of Scotland. Our entry is as full as possible; and I am ready to produce my books, and to abide by them in any court of justice in the world." M. Pasgrave was totally at a loss; he could only repeat, that he remembered to have received Machenzie's note from one of the tailor's men, who brought it to him from an inner room. The foreman boldly asserted that he brought the change exactly as his master gave it to him, and that he knew nothing more of the matter. But, in fact, he knew a great deal more. He had found the note in the pocket of Mackenzie's waistcoat, which his servant had left to be mended, after he had worn it furtively, as has been already related. When his master called him into the inner room, to give him the change for Pasgrave, he observed that there was a ten-guinea note wrapped up with some halfpence: and he thought that it would be a prudent thing to substitute Mackenzie's note, which he had by him, in the place of this. He accordingly gave Pasgrave Mackenzie's note; and thrust the note, which he had received from his master, into a corner of his trunk, where he usually kept little windfalls that came to him by the negligence of customers — tooth-pick cases, loose silver, odd gloves, etc.; all which he knew how to dispose of. But this bank-note was a higher prize than usual, and he was afraid to pass it, till all inquiry had blown over. He knew his master's regularity, and he thought that if the note was stopped afterwards at any of the banks, it could never be traced further than to M. Pasgrave. He was rejoiced to see that this poor man was in such trepidation of mind that he could not, in the least, use his understanding: and he saw, with much satisfaction, that his master, who was a positive man, and proud of the accuracy of his books, was growing red in the face in their defence. Mackenzie, in the mean time, who had switched his boots with great impatience during their debate, interfered at last with — „Come, gentlemen, we can't stand here all day to hear you give one another the lie. One of you, it's plain, must shell out your coriandere; but as you can't settle which, we must put you to your oath, I see." „Mr. W's is not far off, and I'm ready to go before him with my books this instant," said the fiery master-tailor. „My books were never called in question since I was in trade till this instant; and nobody but a French dancing-master, who understands no more of debtor and creditor than my goose, would stand up against such an entry as this."

To Mr. W's, the tailor, his foreman, the dancing-master, the banker's clerk, and Mackenzie, repaired. Pasgrave turned paler than ever dancer turned before; and gave himself, his character, and his wife and children, all up for lost, when he heard that he was to be put upon his oath. He drew back when Mr. W held the book to him, and demanded whether he would swear to the person from whom he received the note. He said he could not swear; but to the best of his belief — en conscience — en honneur — foi d'honnête homme — he was convinced he received it from Mr. Macpherson's foreman. The foreman, who, from one step in villany, found himself hurried on to another and another, now scrupled not to declare that he was ready to take his oath that he delivered the note and change, just as his master gave it to him, to M. Pasgrave. The magistrate turned to the pale, conscientious, incapacitated dancing-master, and, in a severe tone, said, „Appearances are strongly against you, M. Pasgrave. Here's a young gentleman has lost a bank-note — it is stopped at the bank of Scotland — it is traced home to you — you say you got it from Mr. Macpherson or his foreman — his books are produced — the entry in them is clearly against you; for it states that the note given to you to change was one of Sir William Forbes's bank; and this which I hold now in my hand is of the bank of Scotland. Please now to tell how this note of the bank of Scotland, which has been proved to be the property of Mr. Mackenzie, came into your possession? From whom did you receive it? or how did you come by it? I am not surprised that you decline taking an oath upon this occasion." „Ah, monsieur, ayez pitié de moi!" cried the innocent, but terrified man, throwing himself upon one knee, in an attitude, which, on the stage, would have produced a sublime effect. — „Ah, monsieur, ayez pitié de moi! I have no more dan de child no sense in affairs." Mackenzie interrupted him with a brutal laugh. The more humane banker's clerk was moved by the simplicity of this avowed ignorance of business. He went up to the distracted dancer, and said, „It is not to be expected that every body should understand business as we do, sir: if you are innocent, only give yourself time to recollect; and though it's unfortunate that you never keep any regular accounts, may be we shall be able to make out this affair of the entry. If Mr. W will give me leave to take this pen and ink, and if you will try to recollect all the persons from whom you have received money lately —" „Ah, mon Dieu, dat is impossible." Then he began to name the quarterly and half-yearly payments that he had received from his various pupils. „Did any of them lately give you a ten-guinea note?" „Ah, oui, je me rappelle — un jeune monsieur — un certain monsieur, qui ne veut pas que — qui est là incognito — who I would not betray for the world; for he has behave wid de most parfaite générosité to me." But did he give you a ten-guinea bank-note? — that is all we want to know," said the magistrate. „Mais — oui — yes." „About what time?" said the clerk. It was about the beginning of October: and this was so near the time when he settled accounts with Mr. Macpherson, the tailor, that he even himself began to believe it possible that he had mistaken one note for the other. „When the young gentleman gave you the note," said the banker's clerk, „surely you must have looked at it — you must have observed these remarkable stains?" Pangrave replied, that he did look at it, he supposed; that he saw it was a ten-guinea note: it might be stained; he could not pretend to be certain about it. He repeated his assurances that he was ignorant of business, and of every thing in this world but dancing. „Pour la danse, je m'y connois — pour les affaires, je n'en sais rien, moi." He, with his usual simplicity, added, that if M. W would give him leave, he would go to the young gentleman, his friend, and learn from him exactly the number of the note which he had given him; that he was sure he could recollect his own note immediately. Mackenzie, who thought that this was merely pretence, in order to escape, told him that he could not be suffered to go out upon his parole. „But," said Mr. W, „tell us the name of this young gentleman who has so much generosity, and who lives incognito. I don't like gentlemen who live incognito. I think I had a young man here before me, about two months ago, charged with breaking a confectioner's windows in a riot, the night of the great illuminations — Hey? don't I remember some such thing? And you, M. Pangrave, if I mistake not, interested yourself mightily about this young man; and told me and my daughters, sir, that he was a young gentleman incognito. I begin to see through this affair. Perhaps this is the same young gentleman from whom you received the note. And pray what value did you give for it?" Pangrave, whose fear of betraying Forester now increased his confusion, stammered, and first said the note was a present, but afterwards added, „I have been giving de young person lessons in dancing for dese six week."

„Well, then, we must summon this young person," said Mr. W. „Tell us his name, if you please," said Mackenzie. „I have some suspicion that I know your gentleman incognito." „You need not trouble him," said the magistrate; „I know the name already, and I know where the bird is to be found: his name, if he has not changed it since he was last in this room, is Forester." „Forester!" exclaimed Mackenzie — „I thought so! I always thought how he would turn out. I wonder what his friends, the Campbells, will have to say for him now!"

Mr. W's pen stopped. „His friends, the Campbells — humph! So the Campbells are his friends, are they?" repeated he. „They were his friends," answered Mackenzie; „but Mr. Forester thought proper, nobody knows why, to run away from them, some months ago; the only reason I could ever learn was that he did not like to live amongst gentlemen; and he has been living ever since incognito, amongst blackguards, and we see the fruits of it." Mackenzie eagerly handed the summons, as soon as it was signed, to a constable; and Mr. W directed the constable to go to Mr. 's, the bookseller, adding, „Booksellers and printers are dangerous persons." The constable, who had seen Forester the night that he was confined with Tom Random, knew his face and person; and we have told our readers that he met Forester in George's square, going to Dr. Campbell's to vindicate the innocence of the poor washerwoman.

The tailor's foreman was not a little alarmed when the summons was sent for our hero; he dreaded that the voice of truth should be heard, and he skulked behind the rest of the company. What astonishment did Forester feel when he entered the room, and saw the group that surrounded the justice's table! — Archibald Mackenzie, with an insulting sneer on his lips — Pangrave, with eyes fixed upon him in despair — Mr. Macpherson, the tailor, pointing to an entry in his book — his foreman shrinking from notice — the banker's clerk, with benevolent scepticism in his countenance — and the justice, with a portentous scowl upon his brow.

„Come forward, Mr. Forester," said the magistrate, as our hero made a sudden pause of astonishment; „come forward, sir." Forester advanced with calm intrepidity. „You are better dressed than when I had the honour of seeing you here some time ago, sir. Are you a printer still, or a gentleman? Your dress certainly bespeaks a change in your condition." „I am sure I should hardly know Mr. Forester again, he has grown such a beau comparatively speaking, I mean," said Mackenzie — „But certainly, M. Pangrave, you must have made some mistake; I don't know how to believe my senses! Is this the young gentleman to whom you alluded? — Mr. Forester, do you know ——?" „Give me leave, Mr. Mackenzie," interrupted the justice; „I shall examine this young incognito myself. I think I know how to come at the truth. Will you do me the favour, sir, to inform me whether you recollect any thing of a ten-guinea bank-note which you gave or paid, some time in last October, to this gentleman?" — pointing to M. Pangrave. „I do," replied Forester, in a distinct, unembarrassed voice, „perfectly well remember giving M. Pangrave a ten-guinea bank-note." „Ah, monsieur, je ne suis pas un ingrat! — Je ne pense pas que ——" „O, M. Pangrave," interrupted Mackenzie, „this is no time for compliments and fine speeches: for God's sake, let us get at the bottom of this affair without farther ceremony." „Sir," said the banker's clerk, „all we want to know is the number of your note, and the firm of the bank. Was your note one of Sir William Forbes's, or of the bank of Scotland?" Forester was silent. „I do not recollect," said he, after some pause. „You don't recollect, sir," said the justice, „is something like an evasive answer. You must have a vast number of bank-notes then, we must presume, if you cannot recollect to what bank your ten-guinea note belonged." Forester did not understand this logic; but he simply repeated his assertion. — „Pray, sir," said the tailor, who could no longer restrain his impatience — „Pray, sir," said the magistrate, in a solemn manner, „be silent. I shall find out the truth. So, Mr. Forester, you cannot possibly recollect the bank of your note? You will tell us next, I dare say, that you cannot possibly recollect how you came by it." „Sir," said Forester, „if it be necessary, I can readily tell you how I came by it." „It is very necessary, sir, for your own credit." „I received it from Dr. Campbell." „Dr. Campbell!" repeated the magistrate, changing his tone. „And I have some idea that the doctor gave me a list of the numbers of that and four other notes, with which I fortunately have not parted." „Some idea means nothing in courts of justice, sir: if you have any such paper, you can do us the favour to produce it." Now this list was locked up in the trunk, of which the key was dropped into the brewing-vat. Richardson, the clerk, had returned the key to him: but, such is the force of habit, he had not cured himself of the foolish trick of twirling it upon his thumb; and about two months ago he dropped it in one of his walks to Arthur's Seat. He long searched for it amongst the rocky fragments, but at last gave it up — he little imagined of how much consequence it might be to him. Dr. Campbell had once refused to break open the lock, and he felt very unwilling to apply to him in his present circumstances. However, he wrote a few lines to Henry Campbell; but as soon as he had written them, his pride revolted from thoughts of supplicating the assistance of his friend in such a disgraceful situation. — „If you don't choose to write," said the officious malevolence of Archibald, „I can, however, speak; I'll desire Dr. Campbell to open your trunk, and search for the paper." He left the room before Forester could make any further opposition.

„I have answered, I hope, both distinctly and respectfully, all the questions that you have asked me," said Forester, turning to Mr. W. „I hope you will no longer keep me in the dark. Of what am I suspected?" „I will tell you, sir," replied the deliberate, unfeeling magistrate: „you are suspected of having, I will not say stolen, but you are more than suspected of having come unfairly by a certain ten-guinea bank-note, which the young gentleman who has just left the room lost a few months ago." Forester, as this speech was slowly pronounced, sat down, folded his arms, and appeared totally insensible — quite unconscious that he was in the presence of a magistrate, or that any human being was observing him. „Ah, mon cher monsieur, pardonnez!" cried Pangrave, bursting into tears. „N'en parlons plus," added he, turning to the magistrate. „Je paierai tout ce qu'il faut. I will pay de ten guineas. I will satisfy every body. I cannot never forgive myself if I bring him into any disgrace." „Disgrace!" exclaimed Forester, starting up, and repeating the word in a tone which made every person in the room, not excepting the phlegmatic magistrate, start and look up to him, with a sudden feeling of inferiority. His ardent eye spoke the language of his soul. No words could express his emotion. The master-tailor dropped his pay-book. „Constable — call a constable!" cried the justice. „Sir, you forget in whose presence you are — you think, I suppose, that your friends, the Campbells, will bear you out. Sir, I would have you to know that all the Campbells in Scotland can't bail you for a felony. Sir, philosophers should know these things. If you cannot clear yourself to my entire satisfaction, Mr. Forester, I shall commit you, — in one word, to gaol: — you — look so you please, sir — to gaol. And if the doctor and his son, and all his family, come up to bail you, I shall, meo periculo, refuse their bail. The law, sir, is no respecter of persons. No none of your rodomontades, young gentleman, in my presence: but step into this closet, if you please; and, I advise you, bring your mind into a becoming temperament, whilst I go to dinner. Gentlemen," continued he to Macpherson and Pangrave, „you'll be so good as to wait here in this apartment. Constable, look to your prisoner," pointing to the door of the closet. „John, let me know when Dr. Campbell arrives, and tell them to send up dinner directly," said the justice to his butler.

While he dines, we must leave the tailor complaining that he was wasting precious time; the foreman in the panic of guilt; and the good-natured dancing-master half distracted betwixt his fears and his ignorance. He looked from time to time through the key-hole of the closet in which Forester was confined, and exclaimed, „Grand Dieu! comme il a l'air noble à cet instant! Ah! lui coupable! — lui go to gaol! — il is impossible!"

„We shall see how that will be presently," said the foreman, who had hitherto preserved absolute silence. „I abide by my books," said the master-tailor, „and I wish Dr. Campbell would make haste. I have lost a day!"

In spite of the tailor's imperial exclamation, he was obliged to wait some time longer. When Mackenzie arrived at Dr. Campbell's, Henry was not at home: he was gone to the house at the back of the meadows, to prepare some chemical experiments for the next day's lecture.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nro 13.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Forester.

By Maria Edgeworth.

(Concluded from our last.)

Mackenzie, however, found Dr. Campbell at home in his study; and, in a soft hypocritical voice, lamented that he was obliged to communicate some disagreeable circumstances relating to young Mr. Forester. „You do not, I presume, know where that unfortunate, misguided youth is at present — at this moment, I mean." „I do not know where he is at this moment," said Dr. Campbell, calmly; „but I know where he has been for some time — at Mr. 's, the bookseller. I have had my eye upon him ever since he left this house. I have traced him from place to place. Though I have said little about him, Mr. Mackenzie, I have a great regard for my unfortunate ward." „I am sorry for it, sir," said Mackenzie: „this note will wound your feelings the more deeply." „What is the matter? pray speak at once," cried Dr. Campbell, who now forgot all his usual calmness. „Where is Forester?" „He is at this moment before Mr. W, the magistrate, sir, charged with — but, I own, I cannot believe him guilty —" „Charged with what? For God's sake, speak plainly, Mr. Mackenzie." „Then, in one word, sir, my lost bank-note is traced home to Mr. Forester. M. Pargrave says he received it from him." „Surely, sir," said Dr. Campbell, with indignation, „you would not insinuate that Forester has stolen your bank-note?" — „I insinuate nothing, doctor," said Archibald; „but, I fear, the thing is too plainly proved — My bank-note has certain stains, by which it has been identified. All that I know is that Mr. W says he can take no bail; and that he must commit Mr. Forester to gaol, unless he can clear himself. He says that, a few days before he left your house, you paid him his quarterly allowance of fifty guineas, in five ten-guinea bank-notes." „He says true — I did so," said Dr. Campbell, eagerly. „And he says that you gave them to him wrapped in a piece of paper, on which the numbers of the notes were written." „I remember it distinctly: I desired him to take care of that paper." „He is not famous for taking care, you know, sir, of any thing. He says, he believes he threw it into his trunk; but he has lost the key of the trunk, I understand." „No matter; we can break it open this instant, and search for the paper," cried Dr. Campbell, who was now extremely alarmed for his ward. Mackenzie stood by without offering any assistance, whilst Dr. Campbell broke open the trunk, and searched it with the greatest anxiety. It was in terrible disorder. The coat and waistcoat which Forester wore at the ball were crammed in at the top; and underneath appeared unfolded linen, books, maps, shoes, crayons, fossils, and heaps of little crumpled bits of paper, in which the fossils had once been contained. Dr. Campbell opened every one of them. The paper he wanted was not amongst them. He took every thing out of the box, shook and searched all the pockets of the coat, in which Forester used, before his reformation, to keep hoards of strange papers. No list of bank-notes appeared. At length, Dr. Campbell espied the white corner of a paper-mark in a volume of Goldsmith's Animated Nature. He pulled out this mark, and, to his great joy, he found it to be the very paper he wanted. „So it's found, is it?" said Mackenzie, disappointed; whilst Dr. Campbell seized his hat, left every thing upon the floor, and was very near locking the door of the room upon Mackenzie. „Don't lock me in here, doctor — I am going back with you to Mr. W's," said Archibald. „Won't you stay? — dinner's going up — Mr.  was going to his dinner when I came away." Without listening to him, Dr. Campbell just let him out, locked the door, and hurried away to his poor ward.

„I have let things go too far," said he to himself. „As long as Forester's credit was not in danger, so long as he was unknown, it was well, but now his character is at stake; he may pay too dear for his experience."

„Dr. Campbell," said the pompous magistrate, who hated philosophers, rising from table as Dr. Campbell entered, „do not speak to me of bailing this ward of yours — it is impossible, sir: I know my duty." „I am not come to offer bail for my ward, said Dr. Campbell, „but to prove his innocence." „We must hope the best," said Mr. W; and, having forced the doctor to pledge him in a bumper of port — „Now I am ready to proceed again to the examination of all the parties concerned."

Dr. Campbell was now shown into the room where Mr. Macpherson, his foreman, and Pangrove, were waiting. „Ah, monsieur, Dieu merci! vous voilà!" exclaimed Pangrove. „You may go," said Mr. W to the constable; but wait below stairs." He unlocked the closet-door. Forester, at the sight of Dr. Campbell, covered his face with his hands; but, an instant afterwards, he advanced with intrepidity. „You cannot, I am sure, believe me to be guilty of any meanness, Dr. Campbell," said he. „Imprudent I have been, and I suffer for my folly." „Guilty!" cried Dr. Campbell — „No: I could almost as soon suspect my own son of such an action. But my belief is nothing to the purpose. We must prove your innocence." „Ah oui, monsieur — and mine too; for I am innocent, I can assure you," cried M. Pangrove. „The whole business, sir," said the banker's clerk, who had, by this time, returned to hear the termination of the affair — „the whole thing can be settled in two minutes by a gentleman like you, who understands business. Mr. Forester cannot recollect the number or the firm of a ten-guinea bank-note which he gave to M. Pangrove. M. Pangrove cannot recollect either; and he is in doubt whether he received this stained note, which Mr. Mackenzie lost, from Mr. Forester, or from Mr. Macpherson, the tailor." „There can be no doubt about me," said Macpherson. „Dr. Campbell, will you be so good as to look at the entry? I acknowledge, I gave M. Pangrove a ten-guinea note; but here's the number of it, 177, of Forbes's bank. Mr. Mackenzie's note, you see, is of the bank of Scotland; and the stains upon it are so remarkable, that, if I had ever seen it before, I should certainly remember it. I'll take my oath I never saw it before." „Sir, said Forester eagerly to Dr. Campbell, „you gave me five ten-guinea notes: here are four of them in this pocket-book; the fifth I gave to M. Pangrove. Can you tell me the number of that note?" „I can," said Dr. Campbell, producing the paper which he found in Goldsmith's Animated Nature. „I had the precaution to write down the numbers of all your notes myself. Here they are." Forester opened his pocket-book. His four remaining notes were compared, and perfectly agreed with the numbers in the list. The fifth, the number of the note which he gave to Pangrove, was 1920, of the New-Bank. — „One of your ten-guinea notes," said Dr. Campbell to Pangrove, „you paid into the bank of Scotland; and this gentleman," pointing to the banker's clerk," stopped it this morning. Now you have had another ten-guinea note; what became of that?“ Pawgrave, who understood Dr. Campbell's plain method of questioning him, answered immediately — „I did give the other to my hairdresser — not long ago — who lives in  street.“ Dr. Campbell instantly went himself to the hair-dresser — found that he had the note still in his possession — brought him to Mr. W's, and, when the note was examined, it was found to be No. 1240, of the New Bank, which exactly corresponded with the entry in the list of notes which Dr. Campbell had produced.

„Then all is right,“ said Dr. Campbell. „Ah me! — Ah me!“ exclaimed Pawgrave. „What will become of me?“ „Compose yourself, my good sir,“ said Dr. Campbell, „You had but two ten-guinea notes, you are sure of that?“ „But two — but two — I will swear, but two.“ „You are now certain which of these two notes you had from my ward. The other, you say, you received from —“ „From die gentleman, I will swear,“ cried Pawgrave, pulling the tailor's foreman forwards. „I can swear now I am in no embarras: I am sure I did get de oder note from die gentleman.“ The master-tailor was astonished to see all the pallid marks of guilt in his foreman's countenance. „Did you change the note that I gave you in the inner room?“ said Mr. Macpherson. The foreman, as soon as he could command his voice, denied the charge; and persisted in it that he gave the note and change, which his master wrapped up, exactly as it was, to the dancing-master. Dr. Campbell proposed that the tailor's shop, and the foreman's room, should be searched. Mr. W sent proper people to Mr Macpherson's; and, whilst they are searching his house, we may inquire what is become of Henry Campbell.

The Cataſtrophe.

Henry Campbell, the last time we heard of him, was at the house at the back of the Meadows. When he went into the large room to his chemical experiments, the little girl, who was proud of having arranged it neatly, ran on before him, and showed him the places where all his things were put. „The writing and the figures are not rubbed off your slate — there it is, sir,“ said she, pointing to a high shelf. „But whose handkerchief is this?“ said Henry, taking up a handkerchief, which was under the slate. „O, dear! that must be the good gentleman's handkerchief; he missed it just as he was going out of the house. He thought he had left it at the washerwoman's, where I met him; and he's gone back to look for it there. I'll run with it to the washerwoman's — may be she knows where to find him.“ „But you have not told me who he is? Who do you mean by the good gentleman?“ „The good gentleman, sir, that I saw with you at the watchmaker's, the day that you helped me to carry the great geranium out of my grand-mother's room.“ „Do you mean that Forester has been here?“ exclaimed Henry. „I never heard his name, sir; but I mean that the gentleman has been here, whom I call the good gentleman, because it was he who went with me to my cross school-mistress, to try to persuade her to use me well. She beat me, to be sure, after he was gone, for what he had said; but I'm not the less obliged to him, because he did every thing, as he thought, for the best. And so I'll run with his handkerchief to the woman's, who will give it safe to him.“

Henry recollected his promise to his father. It required all his power over himself to forbear questioning the child, and endeavouring to find out something more of his friend. He determined to mention the circumstance to his father, and to Flora, as soon as he returned home. He was always impatient to tell any thing to his sister that interested himself or his friends: for Flora's gaiety was not of that unfeeling sort, which seeks merely for amusement, and which, unmixed with sympathy for others, may divert in a companion, but disgusts in a friend.

Whilst Henry was reflecting upon the manner in which he might most expeditiously arrange his chemical experiments and return home, the little girl came running back, with a face of great distress. As soon as she had breath to speak, she told Henry that when she went to the washerwoman's with the handkerchief, she was told a sad piece of news — that Mr. Forester had been taken up and carried before Mr. W, the magistrate. „We don't know what he has done. I'm sure I don't think he can have done any thing wrong." Henry no sooner heard these words than he left all his retorts, rushed out of the house, hurried home to his father, and learned from Flora, with great surprise, that his father had already been sent for, and was gone to Mr. W's. She did not know the circumstances that Mackenzie related to Dr. Campbell; but she told him that her father seemed much alarmed; that she met him crossing the hall, and that he could not stop to speak to her. Henry proceeded directly to Mr. W's, and he arrived there just as the people returned from the search of the tailor's house. His opinion of Forester's innocence was so strong, that, when he entered the room, he instantly walked up to him, and embraced him, with a species of frank confidence in his manner, which, to Forester, was more expressive than any thing that he could have said. The whole affair was quickly explained to him; and the people who had been sent to Mr. Macpherson's now came up stairs to Mr. W, and produced a ten-guinea bank-note, which was found in the foreman's box. Upon examination, this note was discovered to be the very note which Mr. Macpherson sent with the change to Pasgrave. It was No. 177, of Sir William Forbes's bank, as mentioned in the circumstantial entry in the day-book. The joy of the poor dancing-master at this complete proof of his innocence was rapturous and voluble. Secure of the sympathy of Forester, Henry, and Dr. Campbell, he looked at them by turns, whilst he congratulated himself upon this „éclaircissement;" and assured the banker's clerk that he would in future keep accounts. We are impatient to get rid of the guilty foreman; he stood, a horrible image of despair. He was committed to gaol, and was carried away by the constables, without being pitied by any person present. Every body, however, was shocked. Mackenzie broke silence first, by exclaiming, „Well, now, I presume, Mr. W, I may take possession of my own bank-note again." He took up all the notes which lay upon the table to search amongst them for his own. „Mine, you know, is stained," said Archibald. „But it is very singular," said Henry Campbell, who was looking over his shoulder, „that here are two stained notes. That which was found in the foreman's box is stained in one corner, exactly as yours was stained, Mr. Mackenzie." Macpherson, the tailor, now stooped to examine it. „Is this No. 177, the note that I sent in change, by my foreman, to M. Pasgrave? — I'll take my oath it was not stained in that manner when I took it out of my desk. It was a new and quite clean note. It must have been stained since." „And it must have been stained with vitriolic acid," continued Henry. „Why, there's cunning for you," cried Archibald. „The foreman, I suppose, stained it, that it might not be known again." „Have you any vitriolic acid in your house?" pursued Henry, addressing himself to the master-tailor. „Not I, indeed, sir: we have nothing to do with such things. They'd be very dangerous to us." „Pray," said Henry „will you give me leave, Mr. W, to ask the person who searched the foreman's box a few questions?" „Certainly, sir," said Mr. W, though; I protest, I cannot see what you are driving at." Henry inquired what was found in the box with the bank-note. The man who searched it enumerated a variety of things. „None of these," said Henry, „could have stained the note. Are you sure that there was nothing else?" „Nothing in the world — nothing but an old glass stopper, I believe." „I wish I could see that stopper," said Henry. „This note was rolled round it," said the man, „but I threw it into the box again. I'll go and fetch it, sir, if you have any curiosity to see it." „Curiosity to see an old stopper? No!" cried Archibald Mackenzie, with a forced laugh — " what good would that do us? We have been kept here long enough. I move that we go home to our dinners." But Dr. Campbell, who saw that Henry had some particular reason for wishing to see this glass stopper, seconded his son. The man went for it; and, when he brought it into the room, Henry Campbell looked at it very carefully, and then decidedly said, fixing his eyes upon Archibald Mackenzie, who in vain struggled to keep his countenance from changing. „This glass stopper, Mr. Mackenzie, is the stopper of my father's vitriolic acid bottle, that was broken the night the cat was killed. This stopper has stained both the handkerchiefs. And it must have been in the pocket of your waistcoat.“ „My pocket! interrupted Archibald: „how should it come into my pocket? It never was in my pocket, sir.“ Henry pointed to the stain on his waistcoat. He wore the very waistcoat in question. „Sir,“ said Archibald, „I don't know what you mean by pointing at my waistcoat. It is stained, it is true, and very likely by vitriolic acid; but as I have been so often in the doctor's laboratory, when your chemical experiments have been going on, is it not very natural to suppose that a drop of one of the acids might have fallen on my clothes? I have seen your waistcoats stained, I am sure. Really, Mr. Campbell, you are extremely, uncharitable; your partiality for Mr. Forester should not blind you, surely. I know you want to exculpate him from having any hand in the death of this cat: but that should not, my dear sir, make you forget what is due to justice. You should not, permit me to say, endeavour to criminate an innocent person.“ „This is all very fair,“ said Henry; „and you may prove your innocence to me at once, Mr. Mackenzie, if you think proper, by showing that the waistcoat was really, as you assert, stained by a drop of vitriolic acid falling upon the outside of it. Will you show us the inside of the pocket?“ Mackenzie, who was now in too much confusion to know distinctly what Henry meant to prove, turned the pocket inside out, and repeated, „That stopper was never in my pocket, I'll swear.“ „Don't swear to that, for God's sake,“ said Henry. „Consider what you are saying. You see that there is a hole burnt in this pocket. Now if a drop of acid had fallen, as you said, upon the outside of the waistcoat, it must have been more burnt on the outside than on the inside.“ I don't know — I can't pretend to be positive,“ said Archibald; „but what signifies all this fuss about the stopper?“ „It signifies a great deal to me,“ said Dr. Campbell, turning away from Mackenzie with contempt, and addressing himself to his ward, who met his approving eye with proud delight — „It signifies a great deal to me. Forgive me, Mr. Forester, for having doubted your word for a moment.“ Forester held his guardian's hand, without being able for some instants to reply. You are coming home with us, Forester?“ said Henry. „No,“ said Dr. Campbell, smiling; „you must not ask him to come home with us to-night. We have a little dance at our house to-night. Lady Catherine Mackenzie wished to take leave of her Edinburgh friends. She goes from us to-morrow. We must not expect to see Forester at a ball; but to-morrow morning ——“ „I see,“ said Forester smiling, „you have no faith in my reformation. Well, I have affairs to settle with my master, the printer. I must go home, and take leave of him. He has been a good master to me; and I must go and finish my task of correcting. Adieu.“ He abruptly left Dr. Campbell and Henry, and went to the bookseller's, to inform him of all that had passed, and to thank him for his kindness. „You will be at a loss to-morrow for a corrector of the press,“ said he. „I am determined you shall not suffer for my vagaries. Send home the proof-sheets of the work in hand to me, at Dr. Campbell's, and I will return them to you punctually corrected. Employ me till you have provided yourself with another, I will not say a better hand. I do not imagine,“ continued Forester, „that I can pay you for your kindness to me by presents; indeed, I know you are in such circumstances that you disdain money. But I hope you will accept of a small mark of my regard — a complete fount of new types.“

Whilst Forester's generous heart expanded with joy at the thoughts of returning once more to his friends, we are sorry to leave him, to finish the history of Archibald Mackenzie. He sneaked home after Dr. Campbell and Henry, whose silent contempt he well understood. Dr. Campbell related all that had passed to lady Catherine. Her ladyship showed more apprehension that her son's meanness should be made known to the world, than indignation or sorrow for his conduct. Archibald, whilst he was dressing for the ball, began to revolve in his mind certain words which his mother had said to him, about his having received the lie direct from Henry Campbell — his not having the spirit of a gentleman. „She certainly means," said he to himself, „that I ought to fight him. It's the only way I can come off, as he spoke so plainly before Mr. W * * *, and all those people: the banker's clerk too was by; and, as my mother says, it will be talked of. I'll get Sir Philip Gosling to go with my message. I think I've heard Dr. Campbell say, he disapproved of duels. Perhaps Henry won't fight. — Has Sir Philip Gosling sent to say, whether he would be with us at the ball to-night?" said Archibald to the servant: „Sir Philip's man has not been here: but major O'Shannon has been here twice since you were away, to see you." — „To me! — message to me?", repeated Archibald, turning pale. Archibald knew major O'Shannon, who had of late insinuated himself into Sir Philip Gosling's favour, had a particular dislike to him, and had successfully bullied him upon one or two occasions. Archibald had that civil cowardice, which made him excessively afraid of the opinion of the world; and major O'Shannon, a gamester, who was jealous of his influence over the rich dupe, Sir Philip, determined to entangle him in a quarrel. The major knocked at the door a third time before Archibald was dressed; and when he was told that he was dressing, and could not see any one, he sent up the following note: —

„Sir,

„The last time I met you at the livery stables, in company with my friend, Sir Philip Gosling, I had the honour of telling you my mind, in terms sufficiently explicit, concerning a transaction, which cannot have escaped your memory. My friend, Sir Philip, declares you never hinted that the pony was spavined. I don't pretend to be so good a jockey as you; but you'll excuse my again saying, I can't consider your conduct as that of a gentleman. Sir Philip is of my mind; and, if you resent my interference, I am ready to give you the satisfaction of a gentleman. If not, you will do well to leave Edinburgh along with your mother to-morrow morning; for Edinburgh is no place for cowards as long as one has the honour of living in it, who calls himself (by courtesy)

„Your humble servant,

„CORNELIUS O'SHANNON.

P. S. Sir Philip is at your service, after your settling with me."

Archibald, oppressed with the sense of his own meanness, and somewhat alarmed at the idea of fighting three duels, to retrieve his credit, thought it best to submit, without struggle, in the first instance, to that public disgrace which he had merited. He wrote a shabby apology to major O'Shannon and Sir Philip, concluding with saying, that rather than lose a friend he so much valued as Sir Philip Gosling, he was willing to forget all that had passed, and even to take back the pony, and to return Sawney, if the matter could, by this means, be adjusted to his satisfaction. He then went to his mother, and talked to her, in a high style, of his desperate intentions with respect to Henry Campbell. — „Either he or I must fall, before we quit the ground," said the artful Archibald — well knowing that lady Catherine's maternal tenderness would be awakened by these ideas. Other ideas were also awakened in the prudent mother's mind. Dr. Campbell was nearly related to a general officer, from whom she looked for promotion for her son. „Archibald," said she, „we must make allowances, and conciliate matters — unless you make this young gentleman, your friend, you can never hope to be on eligible footing with his guardian. His guardian, you see, is glad to get him back again, and, I dare say, has his reasons. I never saw him, and I know him well, in such spirits in my life as he was when he came back to us to announce the probability of his ward's return to-morrow morning. The doctor, I dare say, has good reasons for what he does; and, I understand his ward is reconciled to the idea of living in the world, and enjoying his fine fortune like other people. So I hope you and he, and of course you and the doctor, and Henry Campbell, will be very good friends. Pray let me hear no more of duels and quarrels. And let us go down into the ball-room; for miss Campbell has been dressed and down stairs this half hour; and I would not have you inattentive—that might displease as much as the other extreme. In short, I may safely leave you to your own discretion." Lady Catherine, after this prudent exhortation, entered the ball-room, where all the company soon after assembled. Seated in gay ranges, the well-dressed belles were eager for the dancing to commence. Lady Catherine stood by Dr. Campbell; and as soon as the ball began, when the music played, and she saw every one absorbed in themselves, or in their partners, she addressed herself to the doctor, on the subject which was next her heart, or rather next her imagination. „The general is to be with you shortly, I understand," said she. Dr. Campbell coldly answered in the affirmative. „To be candid with you, doctor, if you'll sit down, I want to have a little chat with you about my Archibald. He is not every thing I could wish, and I see you are displeased with him about this foolish business that has just happened. For my own part, I think him to blame; but we must pardon, we must make allowances for the errors of youth, and I need not, to a man of your humanity, observe, what a cruel thing it is to prejudice the world against a young man, by telling little anecdotes to his disadvantage. Relations must surely uphold one another; and I am convinced you will speak of Archibald with candour and friendship."

„With candour and with truth," replied Dr. Campbell. „I cannot pretend to feel friendship merely on the score of relationship."

The proud blood mounted into lady Catherine's face, and she replied: „Some consideration of one's own relations, I think, is not unbecoming. Archibald, I should have thought, had as strong a claim upon Dr. Campbell's friendship as the son of an utter stranger to the family. Old Mr. Forester had a monstrous fortune, 'tis true; but his wife, who was no grand affair, I believe — a merchant's daughter, I'm told — brought him the greatest part of it, and yet, without any natural connexion between the families, or any thing very desirable, setting fortune out of the question, you accept the guardianship of this young man, and prefer him, I plainly see, to my Archibald. I candidly ask you the question, and answer me candidly."

„As you have explicitly asked the question, I will answer your ladyship candidly. I do prefer my ward to your son. I have avoided drawing comparisons between your son and Forester; and I now wish to avoid speaking of Mr. Archibald Mackenzie, because I have little hopes of service to him."

„Nay," said lady Catherine, softening her tone, „you know you have it in your power to be of the greatest service to him."

„I have done all I could," said Dr. Campbell, with a sigh; „but habits of — —"

„O, but I'm not talking of habits," interrupted lady Catherine. „I'll make him alter his habits. We shall soon turn him into what you like: he's very quick; and you must not expect every young man to be just cut out upon the pattern of our dear Henry. I don't want to trouble you to alter his habits, or to teach him chemistry, or any of those things. But you can, you know, without all that, do him an essential service."

„How?" said Dr. Campbell."

„Why how? — I don't know you this evening, you are so dry. See you not what I mean? speak three words for him to your friend, the general."

„Your ladyship must excuse me," said Dr. Campbell.

Lady Catherine was stunned by this distinct refusal. She urged Dr. Campbell to explain the cause of his dislike to her son.

„There is a poor washerwoman now below stairs," replied Dr. Campbell, „who can explain to you more than I wish to explain; and a story about a horse of Sir Philip Gosling was told to me the other day, by one of the baronet's friends, which I should be glad Mr. Archibald Mackenzie could contradict effectually."

„Archibald, come here," said lady Catherine:

„before the next dance begins, I must speak to you. What is this about a horse of Sir Philip Gosling?"

„Ma'am!" said Archibald, with great astonishment. At this instant one of Dr. Campbell's servants came into the room, and gave two notes to Archibald, which, he said, two gentlemen just left, and desired him to deliver to Mr. Mackenzie whilst he was in the ball-room if possible.

„What is it? — What are they, child?" cried lady Catherine. „I will see them." „Her ladyship snatched the notes, read, and when she saw that her son, in the grossest terms, was called a coward, for refusing the challenges of two such fashionable men as Sir Philip Gosling and major O'Shannon, all her hopes of him were at an end. „Our family is disgraced for ever!" she exclaimed; and then, perceiving that she had uttered this unguarded sentence loud enough for several of the company to hear, she endeavoured to laugh, and fell into violent hysterics. She was carried out of the ball-room. A whisper now ran round the room of — „What's the matter with lady Catherine Mackenzie?" — It was at an unfortunate moment that she was carried out, for all the dancers had just seated themselves, after a brisk country dance; and the eyes of all the young and old were upon her ladyship as she made her exit. A young man, a friend of major O'Shannon, who was present, whispered the secret to his partner; she, of course, to her next neighbour. Archibald saw that the contents of the notes were made public; and he quitted the apartment, „to inquire how his mother did."

The buzz of scandal was general for some moments; but a new object soon engrossed the attention of the company. „Pray," said a young lady, who was looping up Flora Campbell's gown, „who is this gentleman, who is just coming into the room?" Flora looked up, and saw a well-dressed stranger entering the room, who had much the appearance of a gentleman. He certainly resembled a person she had seen before; but she could scarcely believe that her eyes did not deceive her. Therefore, she hesitatingly replied to the young lady's question, „I don't know — I am not sure." But she, an instant afterwards, saw her brother Henry and her father advance so eagerly to meet the stranger, that her doubts vanished; and, as he now directed his steps towards the spot where she was standing, she corrected her first answer to her companion's question, and said, „Yes, I fancy — it certainly is — Mr. Forester." Forester, with an open countenance, slightly tinged with the blush of ingenuous shame, approached her, as if he was afraid she had not forgotten some things which he wished to be forgotten; and yet as if he was fully conscious that he was not wholly unworthy of her esteem. „Amongst other prejudices of which I have cured myself," said he to Dr. Campbell, „since we parted, I have cured myself of my foolish antipathy to Scotch reels."

„That I can scarcely believe," said Dr. Campbell, with an incredulous smile.

„I will convince you of it," said Forester, „if you will promise to forget all my other follies."

„All!" said Dr. Campbell. „Convince me first, and then it will be time enough to make such a desperate promise."

Flora was rather surprised when our once cynical hero begged the favour of her hand, and led her to dance a reel. M. Pasgrave would have been in ecstasy, if he had seen his pupil's performance.

„And now, my dear Forester," said Dr. Campbell, as his ward returned to claim his promise of a general amnesty, „if you do not turn out a coxcomb, if you do not ‚mistake reserve of wrong for right,' you will infallibly be a very great man. Give me a pupil who can cure himself of any one foible, and I have hopes of him. What hopes must I have of him who has cured himself of so many!"

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 14.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Samuel Butler.

Ueber die Lebensumſtände dieſes berühmteſten engliſchen Satyrikers iſt trotz den Nachforſchungen ſpäterer Literarhiſtoriker wenig bekannt geworden, da er in einer viel bewegten Zeit es vorzog, ſich lieber in ruhiger Dunkelheit zu verhalten, als kämpfend und wagend öffentlich an die Spitze eines Haufens zu ſtellen und ſich entſchieden für die eine oder die andere Parthei zu erklären. Wahrſcheinlich hielten ihn ſeine beſchränkten Vermögensumſtände und Familienverhältniſſe davon ab, denn an Geiſt und Muth eine bedeutende Rolle zu ſpielen, fehlte es ihm gewiß nicht. — Selbſt ſein Geburtsjahr iſt nicht beſtimmt ermittelt worden; nach Einigen erblickte er bereits 1600, nach Anderen erſt 1612 zu Strensham in Worceſterſhire das Licht der Welt. Wer ſein Vater geweſen, weiß man eben ſo wenig genau, doch ſtimmen die Meiſten darin überein, daß er ein unbemittelter Pächter war, der ſeinem Sohne eine möglichſt gute Erziehung geben und ihn auf einer der beiden engliſchen Univerſitäten (ob Oxford oder Cambridge, bleibt unentſchieden) ſtudiren ließ. Butler ſoll darauf Schreiber bei einem Friedensrichter, und dann nach einander Secretair in mehreren vornehmen Häuſern, namentlich bei Sir Samuel Luke, einem eifrigen Anhänger und Beamten Oliver Cromwells geweſen ſein. Nach der Rückkehr Karl's II. wurde er Secretair des Earl von Carbery und Steward von Ludlow Caſtle. In dieſer Periode vermählte er ſich mit einer Dame aus guter Familie, einer Mrs. Herbert, welche ihm ein hübſches Vermögen zubrachte, das aber ſpäter durch Unglücksfälle verloren ging. Im Jahre 1663 gab er den erſten Theil ſeines ſatiriſchen Heldengedichts Hudibras heraus, welcher die drei erſten Geſänge enthielt und am Hofe ſehr günſtig aufgenommen wurde, obwohl er dem Dichter nicht den mindeſten Vortheil brachte. Der zweite Theil des Hudibras erſchien 1664, der dritte 1678. — Butler ſtarb zwei Jahre ſpäter zu London (1680) nach allgemeiner Annahme in Dürftigkeit, und ließ das Werk unvollendet. Ein Freund ließ ihn auf ſeine Koſten auf dem Kirchhofe zu Coventgarden beſtatten; erſt vierzig Jahre ſpäter wurde ihm ein Denkmal in der Weſtminſterabtei durch den Mayor von London, John Barber, errichtet. — Butler's einzelne Gedichte erſchienen nach ſeinem Tode geſammelt; ſeine ſämmtlichen Schriften haben ſeitdem unzählige Ausgaben erlebt.

Das Hauptwerk dieſes genialen Dichters, der Hudibras, iſt ein Meiſterſtück komiſchen Witzes, zwar ſtreng genommen eine Nachahmung des Don Quixote, aber doch ſo ſelbſtſtändig und in der Ausführung ſo neu und eigenthümlich, daß es vollen Anſpruch auf den Namen eines Original's machen darf. — Es enthält eine beißende Satyre auf die Puritaner, die jedoch ſo allgemein geſtellt iſt, daß ſie nebenher alle eingebildeten, ſtreitſüchtigen, mit Spitzfindigkeiten um ſich werfenden Pedanten geißelt; wäre nicht alles Karrikatur darin und namentlich der Charakter des Helden Hudibras und ſeines Schreibers Ralph ſo widrig und verzerrt, ſo müßte die Wirkung eine noch ſchlagendere und allgemeinere ſein, um ſo mehr als das Gedicht ſelbſt dem jetzigen Engländer ohne hiſtoriſchen Commentar nicht ganz verſtändlich iſt. — Die Form iſt vortrefflich gewählt, über den Plan läßt ſich aber kein beſtimmtes Urtheil bilden, da das Ganze, wie bereits bemerkt wurde, unvollendet blieb, wenig ſatiriſche Gedichte haben einen ſolchen Reichthum treffenden Witzes, ſchlagender und überraſchender Einfälle und burlesker Situationen aufzuweiſen. — Butler's kleinere poetiſche Schriften ſtehen zwar dem Hudibras an Bedeutung nach, bekunden aber ebenfalls das große Talent des Verfaſſers und den Reichthum ſeiner Phantaſie; vorzüglich geben ſeine ſatiriſchen, der Weiſe des Juvenal nachgebildeten Gedichte zur ſelben Zeit einen großen Beweis von der ſtrengen Redlichkeit dieſes tüchtigen Mannes, indem er die ſchamloſe Unſittlichkeit, welche an Karl's II. Hofe vorherrſchte, eben ſo ſtrenge geißelt, als die fanatiſche Unduldſamkeit der Presbyterianer.

In Proſa hat Butler eine klare und lichtvolle, aber nicht gerade ſehr gründliche Abhandlung über die Vernunft und eine Folgereihe von witzigen und gelungenen Characterzeichnungen nach Art des Theophraſt hinterlaſſen.

Satire, upon the Imperfection and Abuse of human Learning.

By Samuel Butler.

Part I.

It is the noblest act of human reason
To free itself from slavish prepossession,
Assume the legal right to disengage
From all it had contracted under age,
And not its ingenuity and wit
To all it was imbu'd with first submit;
Take true or false for better or for worse,
To have or t' hold indiff'rently of course.

For Custom, tho' but usher of the school
Where Nature breeds the body and the soul,
Usurps a greater pow'r and interest
O'er man, the heir of Reason, than brute beast,
That by two different instincts is led,
Born to the one, and to the other bred,
And trains him up with rudiments more false
Than Nature does her stupid animals;
And that 's one reason why more care 's bestow'd
Upon the body than the soul 's allow'd,
That is not found to understand and know
So subtly as the body 's found to grow.

Tho' children without study, pains or thought,
Are languages and vulgar notions taught,
Improve their nat'ral talents without care,
And apprehend before they are aware,
Yet as all strangers never leave the tones
They have been us'd of children to pronounce,
So most men's reason never can outgrow
The discipline it first receiv'd to know,
But renders words they first began to con,
The end of all that 's after to be known,
And sets the help of education back,
Worse than, without it, man could ever lack;
Who, therefore, finds the artificiall'st fools
Have not been chang'd i' th' cradle, but the schools,
Where error, pedantry, and affectation,
Run them behindhand with their education,
And all alike are taught poetic rage,
While hardly one 's fit for it in an age.

No sooner are the organs of the brain
Quick to receive, and stedfast to retain Best knowledges, but all 's laid out upon
Retrieving of the curse of Babylon,
To make confounded languages restore
A greater drudg'ry than it barr'd before:
And therefore those imported from the East,
Where first they were incurr'd are held the best,
Altho' convey'd in worse Arabian pothooks
Than gifted tradesmen scratch in sermon notebooks;
Are really but pains and labour lost
And not worth half the drudgery they cost,
Unless, like rarities, as they 've been brought
From foreign climates, and as dearly bought,
When those who had no other but their own,
Have all succeeding eloquence outdone;
As men that wink with one eye see more true,
And take their aim much better than with two:
For the more languages a man can speak,
His talent has but sprung the greater leak;
And, for th' industry he has spent upon 't,
Must full as much some other way discount
The Hebrew, Chaldee, and the Syriac,
Do, like their letters, set men's reason back,

And turns their wits, that strive to understand it,
(Like those that write the characters) left-handed;
Yet he that is but able to express
No sense at all in several languages,
Will pass for learneder than he that 's known
To speak the strongest reason in his own.

These are the modern arts of education,
With all the learned of mankind in fashion,
But practis'd only with the rod and whip,
As riding-schools inculcate horsemanship;
Or Romish penitents let out their skins,
To bear the penalties of others' sins.
When letters, at the first, were meant for play,
And only us'd to pass the time away,
When th' ancient Greeks and Romans had no name
T'express a school and playhouse but the same,
And in their languages, so long agone,
To study or be idle was all one;
For nothing more preserves men in their wits
Than giving of them leave to play by fits,
In dreams to sport, and ramble with all fancies,
And waking, little less extravagancies,
The rest and recreation of tir'd thought,
When 't is run down with care and overwrought,
Of which whoever does not freely take
His constant share, is never broad awake,
And when he wants an equal competence
Of both recruits, abates as much of sense.

Nor is their education worse design'd
Than Nature (in her province) proves unkind:
The greatest inclinations with the least
Capacities are fatally possess'd,
Condemn'd to drudge, and labour, and take pains,
Without an equal competence of brains;
While those she has indulg'd in soul and body,
Are most averse to industry and study,
And th' activ'st fancies share as loose alloys,
For want of equal weight to counterpoise.
But when those great conveniencies meet,
Of equal judgment, industry, and wit,
The one but strives the other to divert,
While Fate and Custom in the feud take part,
And scholars by prepost'rous overdoing,
And under-judging, all their projects ruin;
Who, tho' the understanding of mankind
Within so strait a compass is confin'd,
Disdains the limits Nature sets to bound
The wit of man, and vainly rove beyond.
The bravest soldiers scorn, until they 're got Close to the enemy, to make a shot;
Yet great philosophers delight to stretch
Their talents most at things beyond their reach,
And proudly think t' unriddle ev'ry cause
That Nature uses, by their own bye-laws;
When 't is not only impertinent, but rude,
Where she denies admission, to intrude;
And all their industry is but to err,
Unless they have free quarantine from her;
Whence 't is the world the less has understood,
By striving to know more than 't is allow'd.

For Adam, with the loss of Paradise,
Bought knowledge at too desperate a price,
And ever since that miserable fate
Learning did never cost an easier rate;
For tho' the most divine and sov'reign good
That Nature has upon mankind bestow'd,
Yet it has prov'd a greater hinderance
To th' interest of truth than ignorance,
And therefore never bore so high a value
As when 't was low, contemptible, and shallow;
Had academies, schools, and colleges,
Endow'd for its improvement and increase;
With pomp and show was introduc'd with maces,
More than a Roman magistrate had fasces;
Empower'd with statute, privilege, and mandate,
T'assume an art, and after understand it;
Like bills of store for taking a degree,
With all the learning to it custom-free;
And own professions which they never took
So much delight in as to read one book:
Like princes, had prerogative to give
Convicted malefactors a reprieve;
And having but a little paltry wit
More than the world, reduc'd and govern'd it,
But scorn'd, as soon as 't was but understood,
As better is a spiteful foe to good,
And now has nothing left for its support
But what the darkest times provided for 't.

Man has a natural desire to know,
But th' one half is for int'rest, th' other show:
As scriv'ners*) take more pains to learn the sleight
Of making knots than all the hands they write:
So all his study is not to extend
The bounds of knowledge, but some vainer end;
T' appear and pass for learned, tho' his claim
Will hardly reach beyond the empty name:
For most of those that drudge and labour hard,
Furnish their understandings by the yard,
As a French library by the whole is,
So much an ell for quartos and for folios;
To which they are but indexes themselves,
And understand no further than the shelves;
But smatter with their titles and editions,
And place them in their Classical partitions;
When all a student knows of what he reads
Is not in 's own, but under general heads
Of common-places, not in his own pow'r,
But, like a Dutchman's money, i' th' cantore,
Where all he can make of it, at the best,
Is hardly three per cent. for interest;
And whether he will ever get it out
Into his own possession is a doubt:
Affects all books of past and modern ages,
But reads no further than the title-pages,
Only to con the authors' names by rote,
Or, at the best, those of the books they quote,
Enough to challenge intimate acquaintance
With all the learned Moderns and the Ancients.
As Roman noblemen were wont to greet,
And compliment the rabble in the street,
Had nomenclators in their trains, to claim
Acquaintance with the meanest by his name,
And by so mean contemptible a bribe
Trepann'd the suffrages of ev'ry tribe;
So learned men, by authors' names unknown,
Have gain'd no small improvement to their own,
And he's esteem'd the learned'st of all others
That has the largest catalogue of authors.

(To be concluded in our next.)

---

*) [illegible]   ) Die Knot., Schnörkel zu machen.

The Tapestried Chamber.

A Tale.

By Sir W. Scott.

The following narrative is given from the pen, so far as memory permits, in the same character in which it was presented to the author's ear; nor has he claim to further praise, or to be more deeply censured, than in proportion to the good or bad judgment which he has employed in selecting his materials, as he has studiously avoided any attempt at ornament which might interfere with the simplicity of the tale.

At the same time, it must be admitted, that the particular class of stories which turns on the marvellous, possesses a stronger influence when told, than when committed to print. The volume taken up at noonday, though rehearsing the same incidents, conveys a much more feeble impression, than is achieved by the voice of the speaker on a circle of fireside auditors, who hang upon the narrative as the narrator details the minute incidents which serve to give it authenticity, and lowers his voice with an affectation of mystery while he approaches the fearful and wonderful part. It was with such advantages that the present writer heard the following events related, more than twenty years since, by the celebrated Miss Seward, of Lichfield, who, to her numerous accomplishments, added, in a remarkable degree, the power of narrative in private conversation. In its present form, the tale must necessarily lose all the interest which was attached to it, by the flexible voice and intelligent features of the gifted narrator. Yet still, read aloud, to an undoubting audience, by the doubtful light of the closing evening, or, in silence, by a decaying taper, and amidst the solitude of a half-lighted apartment, it may redeem its character as a good ghost story. Miss Seward always affirmed, that she had derived her information from an authentic source, although she suppressed the names of the two persons chiefly concerned. I will not avail myself of any particulars I may have since received concerning the localities of the detail, but suffer them to rest under the same general description in which they were first related to me; and, for the same reason, I will not add to or diminish the narrative, by any circumstance, whether more or less material, but simply rehearse as I heard it, a story of supernatural terror.

About the end of the American war, when the officers of Lord Cornwallis's army, which surrendered at Yorktown, and others, who had been made prisoners during the impolitic and ill-fated controversy, were returning to their own country, to relate their adventures, and repose themselves after their fatigues, there was amongst them a general officer, to whom Miss S. gave the name of Browne, but merely, as I understood, to save the inconvenience of introducing a nameless agent in the narrative. He was an officer of merit, as well as a gentleman of high consideration for family and attainments.

Some business had carried General Browne upon a tour through the western counties, when, in the conclusion of a morning stage, he found himself in the vicinity of a small country town, which presented a scene of uncommon beauty, and of a character peculiarly English.

The little town, with its stately old church, whose tower bore testimony to the devotion of ages long past, lay amidst pastures and cornfields of small extent, but bounded and divided with hedge-row timber of great age and size. There were few marks of modern improvement. The environs of the place intimated neither the solitude of decay, nor the bustle of novelty; the houses were old, but in good repair; and the beautiful little river murmured freely on its way to the left of the town, neither restrained by a dam, nor bordered by a towing-path.

Upon a gentle eminence, nearly a mile to the southward of the town, were seen, amongst many venerable oaks and tangled thickets, the turrets of a castle, as old as the wars of York and Lancaster, but which seemed to have received important alterations during the age of Elizabeth and her successor. It had not been a place of great size; but whatever accommodation it formerly afforded, was, it must be supposed, still to be obtained within its walls; at least, such was the inference which General Browne drew from observing the smoke arise merrily from several of the ancient wreathed and carved chimney-stalks. The wall of the park ran alongside of the highway for two or three hundred yards; and through the different points by which the eye found glimpses into the woodland scenery, it seemed to be well stocked. Other points of view opened in succession; now a full one, of the front of the old castle, and now a side glimpse at its particular towers; the former rich in all the bizarrerie of the Elizabethan school, while the simple and solid strength of other parts of the building seemed to show that they had been raised more for defence than ostentation.

Delighted with the partial glimpses which he obtained of the castle through the woods and glades by which this ancient feudal fortress was surrounded, our military traveller was determined to inquire whether it might not deserve a nearer view, and whether it contained family pictures or other objects of curiosity worthy of a stranger's visit; when, leaving the vicinity of the park, he rolled through a clean and well-paved street, and stopped at the door of a well-frequented inn.

Before ordering horses, to proceed on his journey, General Browne made inquiries concerning the proprietor of the chateau which had so attracted his admiration; and was equally surprised and pleased at hearing in reply a nobleman named, whom we shall call Lord Woodville. How fortunate! Much of Browne's early recollections, both at school and at college, had been connected with young Woodville, whom, by a few questions, he now ascertained to be the same with the owner of this fair domain. He had been raised to the peerage by the decease of his father a few months before, and, as the general learned from the landlord, the term of mourning being ended, was now taking possession of his paternal estate, in the jovial season of merry autumn, accompanied by a select party of friends, to enjoy the sports of a country famous for game.

This was delightful news to our traveller.

Frank Woodville had been Richard Browne's fag at Eton, and his chosen intimate at Christ Church; their pleasures and their tasks had been the same; and the honest soldier's heart warmed to find his early friend in possession of so delightful a residence, and of an estate, as the landlord assured him with a nod and a wink, fully adequate to maintain and add to his dignity. Nothing was more natural than that the traveller should suspend a journey, which there was nothing to render hurried, to pay a visit to an old friend under such agreeable circumstances.

The fresh horses therefore, had only the brief task of conveying the general's travelling carriage to Woodville Castle. A porter admitted them at a modern Gothic lodge, built in that style to correspond with the castle itself, and at the same time rang a bell to give warning of the approach of visitors. Apparently the sound of the bell had suspended the separation of the company, bent on the various amusements of the morning; for, on entering the court of the chateau, several young men were lounging about in their sporting dresses, looking at and criticising the dogs, which the keepers held in readiness to attend their pastime. As General Browne alighted, the young lord came to the gate of the hall, and for an instant gazed, as at a stranger, upon the countenance of his friend, on which war, with its fatigues and its wounds, had made a great alteration. But the uncertainty lasted no longer than till the visitor had spoken, and the hearty greeting which followed was such as can only be exchanged betwixt those who have passed together the merry days of careless boyhood or early youth.

„If I could have formed a wish, my dear Browne,“ said Lord Woodville, „it would have been to have you here, of all men, upon this occasion which my friends are good enough to hold as a sort of holiday. Do not think you have been absent from us. I have traced you through your dangers, your triumphs, your misfortunes, and was delighted to see that, whether in victory or defeat, the name of my old friend was always distinguished with applause.“

The general made a suitable reply, and congratulated his friend on his new dignities, and the possession of a place and domain so beautiful.

„Nay, you have seen nothing of it as yet,“ said Lord Woodville, and I trust you do not mean to leave us till you are better acquainted with it. It is true, I confess, that my present party is pretty large and the old house, like other places of the kind, does not possess so much accommodation as the extent of the outward walls appears to promise. But we can give you a comfortable oldfashioned room, and I venture to suppose, that your campaigns have taught you to be glad of worse quarters.“

The general shrugged his shoulders and laughed. „I presume,“ he said, „the worst apartment in your chateau is considerably superior to the old tobacco cask, in which I was fain to take up my night's lodging when I was in the Bush, as the Virginians call it, with the light corps. There I lay, like Diogenes himself, so delighted with my covering from the element, that I made a vain attempt to have it rolled on to my next quarters; but my commander for the time would give way to no such luxurious provision, and I took farewell of my beloved cask with tears in my eyes.“

„Well, then, since you do not fear your quarters,“ said Lord Woodville, „you will stay with me a week at least. Of guns, dogs, fishing-rods, flies, and means of sport by sea and land, we have enough and to spare. You cannot pitch on an amusement, but we will find the means of pursuing it. But if you prefer the gun and pointers, I will go with you myself, and see whether you have mended your shooting since you have been amongst the Indians of the back settlements.“

The general gladly accepted his friendly host's proposal in all its points. After a morning of manly exercise, the company met at dinner, where it was the delight of Lord Woodville to conduce to the display of the high properties of his recovered friend, so as to recommend him to his guests, most of whom were persons of distinction. He led General Browne to speak of the scenes he had witnessed; and as every word marked alike the brave officer and the sensible man, who retained possession of his cool judgment under the most imminent dangers, the company looked upon the soldier with general respect, as on one who had proved himself possessed of an uncommon portion of personal courage — that attribute, of all others, of which every body desires to be thought possessed.

The day at Woodville Castle ended as usual in such mansions. The hospitality stopped within the limits of good order. Music, in which the young lord was a proficient, succeeded to the circulation of the bottle: cards and billiards, for those who preferred such amusements, were in readiness; but the exercise of the morning required early hours, and not long after eleven o'clock the guests began to retire to their several apartments.

The young lord himself conducted his friend, General Browne, to the chamber destined for him, which answered the description he had given of it, being comfortable, but old-fashioned. The bed was of the massive form used in the end of the seventeenth century, and the curtains of faded silk, heavily trimmed with tarnished gold. But then, the sheets, pillows, and blankets looked delightful to the campaigner, when he thought of his „mansion, the cask.“ — There was an air of gloom in the tapestry hangings, which, with their worn-out graces, curtained the walls of the little chamber, and gently undulated as the autumnal breeze found its way through the ancient lattice window, which pattered and whistled as the air gained entrance. The toilet, too, with its mirror, turbaned, after the manner of the beginning of the century, with a coiffure of murray-coloured *) silk, and its hundred strange-shaped boxes, providing for arrangements which had been obsolete for more than fifty years, had an antique, and in so far a melancholy aspect. But nothing could blaze more brightly and cheerfully than the two large wax candles; or if aught could rival them, it was the flaming, bickering fagots in the chimney, that sent at once their gleam and their warmth through the snug apartment; which, notwithstanding the general antiquity of its appearance, was not wanting in the least convenience that modern habits rendered either necessary or desirable.

„This is an old-fashioned sleeping apartment, general,“ said the young lord, „but I hope you find nothing that makes you envy your old tobacco-cask.“

„I am not particular respecting my lodgings,“ replied the general; „yet, were I to make any choice, I would prefer this chamber by many degrees to the gayer and more modern air of your family mansion. Believe me, that when I unite its modern air of comfort with its venerable antiquity, and recollect that it is your lordship's property, I shall feel better quarters here, than if I were in the best hotel London could afford.“

„I trust — I have no doubt — that you will find yourself as comfortable as I wish you, my dear general,“ said the young nobleman; and, again bidding his guest good night, he shook him by the hand, and withdrew.

The general once more looked round him, and, internally congratulating himself on his return to peaceful life, the comforts of which were endeared by the recollection of the hardships and dangers he had lately sustained, undressed himself, and prepared for a luxurious night's rest.

Here, contrary to the custom of this species of tale, we leave the general in possession of his apartment until the next morning.

The company assembled, for breakfast at an early hour, but without the appearance of General Browne, who seemed the guest that Lord Woodville was desirous of honouring above all whom his hospitality had assembled around him. He more than once expressed surprise at the general's absence, and at last sent a servant to make inquiry after him. The man brought back information that General Browne had been walking abroad since an early hour of the morning, in defiance of the weather, which was misty and ungenial.

---

*) [illegible]

„The custom of a soldier,“ said the young nobleman to his friends; „many of them acquire habitual vigilance, and, cannot sleep after the early hour at which their duty usually commands them to be alert.“

Yet the explanation which Lord Woodville then offered to the company seemed hardly satisfactory to his own mind and it was in a fit of silence and abstraction that he awaited the return of the general. It took place near an hour after the breakfast bell had rung. He looked fatigued and feverish. His hair — the powdering and arrangement of which was, at this time, one of the most important occupations of a man's whole day, and marked his fashion as much as, in the present time, the tying of a cravat, or the want of one — was dishevelled, uncurled, void of powder, and dank with dew. His clothes were huddled on with a careless negligence, remarkable in a military man, whose real or supposed duties are usually held to include some attention to the toilet; and his looks were haggard and ghastly in a peculiar degree.

„So you have stolen a march upon us this morning, my dear general,“ said Lord Woodville; „or you have not found your bed so much to your mind as I had hoped, and you seemed to expect. How did you rest last night?“

„O, excellently well — remarkably well — never better in my life,“ said General Browne rapidly, and yet with an air of embarrassment, which was obvious to his friend. He then hastily swallowed a cup of tea, and, neglecting or refusing whatever else was offered, seemed to fall into a fit of abstraction.

„You will take the gun to-day, general?“ said his friend and host; but had to repeat the question twice ere he received the abrupt answer, „No, my lord; I am sorry I cannot have the honour of spending another day with your lordship: my posthorses are ordered, and will be here directly.“

All who were present shewed surprise, and Lord Woodville immediately replied: „Post-horses, my good friend! what can you possibly want with them, when you promised to stay with me quietly for at least a week?“

„I believe,“ said the general, obviously much embarrassed, „that I might, in the pleasure of my first meeting with your lordship, have said something about stopping here a few days; but I have since found it altogether impossible.“

„That is very extraordinary,“ answered the young nobleman. „You seemed quite disengaged yesterday, and you have not had a summons to-day; for our post has not yet come up from the town, and therefore you cannot have received any letters.“

General Browne, without giving any further explanation, muttered something of indispensable business, and insisted on the absolute necessity of his departure, in a manner which silenced all opposition on the part of his host, who saw that his resolution was taken, and forbore all further importunity.

„At least, however,“ he said, „permit me, my dear Browne, since go you will, or must, to shew you the view from the terrace, which the mist, that is now rising, will soon display.“

He threw open a sash window, and stepped down upon the terrace as he spoke. The general followed him mechanically, but seemed little to attend to what his host was saying, as looking across an extended and rich prospect, he pointed out the different objects worthy of observation. Thus they moved on till Lord Woodville had attained his purpose of drawing his guest entirely apart from the rest of the company, when, turning round upon him with an air of great solemnity, he addressed him thus: — Richard Browne, my old and very dear friend, we are now alone — let me conjure you to answer me, upon the word of a friend and the honour of a soldier — how did you in reality rest during last night?“

(To be concluded in our next.)

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erſcheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Die Poſtämter verſenden die Nummern wöchentlich, die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnements-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monat 1 Thlr. 5 Sgr. Ein Abonnement unter 26 Nummern findet nicht Statt. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Poſtämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. No 15.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Satire, upon the Imperfection and Abuse of human Learning.

By Samuel Butler.

(Concluded from our last.)

Fragments of an intended second Part of the foregoing Satire.

Man's intellects grow more bold and confident,
The further they're beyond their just extent,
As smatt'rers prove more arrogant and pert,
The less they truly understand an art;
And, where they've least capacity to doubt,
Are wont t'appear most perempt'ry and stout;
While those that know the mathematic lines
Where Nature all the wit of man confines,
And when it keeps within its bounds, and where
It acts beyond the limits of its sphere,
Enjoy an absolute free command
O'er all they have a right to understand,
Than those that falsely venture to encroach
Where Nature has denied them all approach;
And still the more they strive to understand,
Like great estates, run furthest behindhand;
Will undertake the universe to fathom,
From infinite down to a single atom;
Without a geometric instrument,
To take their own capacity's extent;
Can tell as easy how the world was made,
As if they had been brought up to the trade,
And whether Chance, Necessity, or Matter,
Contriv'd the whole establishment of Nature;
When all their wits to understand the world
Can never tell why a pig's tail is curl'd,
Or give a rational account why fish,
That always use to drink, do never piss.

What mad fantastic gambols have been play'd
By th' ancient Greek forefathers of the trade,
That were not much inferior to the freaks
Of all our lunatic fanatic sects?
The first and best philosopher of Athens
Was crack'd, and ran stark-staring mad with patience,
And had no other way to show his wit
But when his wife was in her scolding fit;
Was after in the Pagan inquisition,
And suffer'd martyrdom for no religion.
Next him, his scholar striving to expel
All poets his poetic common weal,
Exil'd himself, and all his followers,
Notorious poets, only bating verse.
The Stagyrite, unable to expound
The Euripus, leapt into 't, and was drown'd;
So he that put his eyes out, to consider
And contemplate on nat'ral things the steadier,
Did but himself for idiot convince,
Tho' rev'renc'd by the learned ever since.
Empedocles, to be esteem'd a god,
Leapt into Ætna, with his sandals shod,

That b'ing blown out, discover'd what an ass
The great philosopher and juggler was,
That to his own new deity sacrific'd,
And was himself the victim and the priest.
The Cynic coin'd false money, and for fear
Of being hang'd for 't, turned philosopher;
Yet with his lantern went, by day, to find
One honest man i' th' heap of all mankind;
An idle freak he needed not have done
If he had known himself to be but one.
With swarms of maggots of the self-same rate,
The learned of all ages celebrate
Things that are properer for Knightsbridge college,
Than th' authors and originals of knowledge;
More sottish than the two fanatics, trying
To mend the world by laughing, or by crying;
Or he that laugh'd until he chok'd his whistle,
To rally on an ass that ate a thistle;
That th' antique sage, that was gallant t' a goose,
A fitter mistress could not pick and choose,
Whose tempers, inclinations, sense, and wit,
Like two indentures, did agree to fit.

The ancient sceptics constantly denied
What they maintain'd, and thought they justified;
For when th' affirm'd that nothing 's to be known,
They did but what they said before disown;
And, like Polemics of the Post, pronounce
The same thing to be true and false at once.

These follies had such influence on the rabble
As to engage them in perpetual squabble;
Divided Rome and Athens into clans
Of ignorant mechanic partisans:
That, to maintain their own hypotheses,
Broke one another's blockheads, and the peace;
Were often set by officers i' th' stocks,
For quarrelling about a paradox:
When pudding-wives were launch'd in cuckquean stools,
For falling foul on oysterwomen's schools,
No herb-woman sold cabbages or onions,
But to their gossips of their own opinions,
A Peripatetic cobbler scorn'd to seal
A pair of shoes of any other school;
And porters of the judgment of the Stoics,
To go an errand of the Cyrenaics;
That us'd t' encounter in athletic lists,
With beard to beard, and teeth and nails to fists,
Like modern kicks and cuffs among the youth
Of academics, to maintain the truth.
But in the boldest feats of arms the Stoic
And Epicureans were the most heroic,
That stoutly ventur'd breaking of their necks,
To vindicate the int'rests of their sects,
And still behav'd themselves as resolute
In waging cuffs and bruises as dispute,
Until with wounds and bruises which th' had got,
Some hundreds were kill'd dead upon the spot;
When all their quarrels, rightly understood,
Were but to prove disputes the sov'reign good.

Distinctions, that had been at first design'd
To regulate the errors of the mind,
By b'ing too nicely overstrain'd and vext,
Have made the comment harder than the text,
And do not now, like carving, hit the joint,
But break the bones in pieces of a point,
And with impertinent evasions force
The clearest reason from its native course—
That argue things s' uncertain, 't is no matter
Whether they are, or never were in nature;
And venture to demonstrate, when they 've slurr'd,
And palm'd a fallacy upon a word.
For disputants (as swordsmen use to fence
With blunted foils) engage with blunted sense;
And as they 're wont to falsify a blow,
Use nothing else to pass upon the foe,
Or, if they venture further to attack,
Like bowlers, strive to beat away the jack;
And, when they find themselves too hardly prest on,
Prevaricate, and change the state o' th' quest'on,
The noblest science of defence and art
In practice now with all that controvert,
And th' only mode of prizes from Bear-garden
Down to the schools, in giving blows, or warding.

As old knights-errant in their harness fought
As safe as in a castle or redoubt,
Gave one another desperate attacks,
To storm the counterscarps upon their backs;
So disputants advance, and post their arms,
To storm the works of one another's terms;
Fall foul on some extravagant expression,

But ne'er attempt the main design and reason —
So some polemics use to draw their swords
Against the language only and the words;
As he who fought at barriers with Salmasius,
Engag'd with nothing but his style and phrases,
Wav'd to assert the murder of a prince,
The author of false Latin to convince;
But laid the merits of the cause aside,
By those that understood them to be tried;
And counted breaking Priscian's head a thing
More capital than to behead a king
For which he 'as been admir'd by all the learn'd
Of knaves concern'd, and pedants unconcern'd.

Judgement is but a curious pair of scales,
That turns with th' hundredth part of true or false,
And still the more 't is us'd is wont t' abate
The subtlety and niceness of its weight,
Until 't is false, and will not rise, nor fall,
Like those that are less artificial;
And therefore students, in their ways of judging,
Are fain to swallow many a senseless gudgeon,
And by their over-understanding lose
Its active faculty with too much use;
For reason, when too curiously 't is spun,
Is but the next of all remov'd from none.

It is Opinion governs all mankind,
As wisely as the blind that leads the blind:
For as those surnames are esteem'd the best
That signify in all things else the least,
So men pass fairest in the world's opinion
That have the least of truth and reason in 'em.
Truth would undo the world, if it possess'd
The meanest of its right and interest;
Is but a tit'lar princess, whose authority
Is always under age, and in minority;
Has all things done and carried in its name,
But most of all where it can lay no claim;
As far from gaiety and complaisance,
As greatness, insolence, and ignorance;
And therefore has surrender'd her dominion
O'er all mankind to barbarous Opinion,
That in her right usurps the tyrannies
And arbitrary government of loss.

As no tricks on the rope but those that break,
Or come most near to breaking of a neck,
Are worth the sight, so nothing goes for wit
But nonsense, or the next of all to it:
For nonsense being neither false nor true,
A little wit to any thing may screw;
And, when it has a while been us'd, of course
Will stand as well in virtue, pow'r, and force,
And pass for sense t' all purposes as good
As if it had at first been understood:
For nonsense has the amplest privileges,
And more than all the strongest sense obliges,
That furnishes the schools with terms of art,
The mysteries of science to impart;
Supplies all seminaries with recruits
Of endless controversies and disputes;
For learned nonsense has a deeper sound
Than easy sense, and goes for more profound.

For all our learned authors now compile
At charge of nothing but the words and style,
And the most curious critics or the learned
Believe themselves in nothing else concerned;
For as it is the garniture and dress
That all things wear in books and languages,
(And all men's qualities are wont t' appear
According to the habits that they wear)
'Tis probable to be the truest test
Of all the ingenuity o' th' rest.
The lives of trees lie only in the barks,
And in their styles the wit of greatest clerks;
Hence 't was the ancient Roman politicians
Went to the schools of foreign rhetoricians,
To learn the art of patrons, in defence
Of int'rest and their clients' eloquence;
When consuls, censors, senators, and prætors,
With great dictators, us'd t' apply to rhetors,
To hear the greater magistrate o' th' school
Give sentence in his haughty chair-curule,
And those who mighty nations overcame,
Were fain to say their lessons, and declaim.

Words are but pictures, true or false design'd,
To draw the lines and features of the mind;
The characters and artificial draughts,

T' express the inward images of thoughts;
And artists say a picture may be good,
Altho' the moral be not understood:
Whence some infer they may admire a style,
Tho' all the rest be e'er so mean and vile;
Applaud th' outsides of words, but never mind
With what fantastic tawdry they are lin'd.

So orators, enchanted with the twang
Of their own trillos, take delight t' harangue;
Whose science, like a juggler's box and balls,
Conveys and counterchanges true and false;
Casts mists before an audience's eyes,
To pass the one for th' other in disguise;
And, like a morrice dancer dress'd with bells,
Only to serve for noise and nothing else,
Such as a carrier makes his cattle wear,
And hangs for pendants in a horse's ear;
For if the language will but bear the test,
No matter what becomes of all the rest:
The ablest orator, to save a word,
Would throw all sense and reason overboard.

Hence 't is that nothing else but eloquence
Is tied to such a prodigal expense;
That lays out half the wit and sense it uses
Upon the other half 's, as vain excuses:
For all defences and apologies
Are but specifics t' other frauds and lies;
And th' artificial wash of eloquence
Is daub'd in vain upon the clearest sense,
Only to stain the native ingenuity
Of equal brevity and perspicuity,
Whilst all the best and sob'rest things he does,
Are when he coughs, or spits, or blows his nose;
Handles no point so evident and clear
(Besides his white gloves) as his handkercher,
Unfolds the nicest scruple so distinct,
As if his talent had been wrapt up in 't
Unthriftily, and now he went about
Henceforward to improve and put it out.

The pedants are a mongrel breed, that sojourn
Among the ancient writers and the modern;
And while their studies are between the one
And th' other spent, having nothing of their own;
Like sponges, are both plants and animals,
And equally to both their nature's false:
For whether 't is their want of conversation
Inclines them to all sorts of affectation,
Their sedentary life and melancholy,
The everlasting nursery of folly;
Their poring upon black and white too subtly
Has turn'd the insides of their brains to motley;
Or squand'ring of their wits and time upon
Too many things, has made them fit for none;
Their constant overstraining of the mind
Distorts the brain, as horses break their wind;
Or rude confusions of the things they read,
Get up, like noxious vapours, in the head,
Until they have their constant wanes, and falls,
And changes, in the insides of their skulls;
Or venturing beyond the reach of wit
Has render'd them for all things else unfit;
But never bring the world and books together,
And therefore never rightly judge of either;
Whence multitudes of reverend men and critics
Have got a kind of intellectual rickets,
And by th' immoderate excess of study
Have found the sickly head t' outgrow the body.

For pedantry is but a corn or wart,
Bred in the skin of judgment, sense, and art,
A stupified excrescence, like a wen,
Fed by the peccant humours of learn'd men,
That never grows from natural defects
Of downright and untutor'd intellects,
But from the over-curious and vain
Distempers of an artificial brain.

So he that once stood for the learned'st man,
Had read out little Britain and Duck Lane,
Worn out his reason, and reduc'd his body
And brain to nothing with perpetual study;
Kept tutor's of all sorts, and virtuosos,
To read all authors to him with their glosses,
And made his lacqueys, when he walk'd, bear follos
Of dictionaries, lexicons, and scholiasts,
To be read to him every way the wind
Should chance to sit, before him or behind;

Had read out all th' imaginary duels
That had been fought by consonants and vowels;
Had crackt his scull, to find out proper places
To lay up all memoirs of things in cases;
And practis'd all the tricks upon the charts,
To play with packs of sciences and arts,
That serve t' improve a feeble gamester's study,
That ventures at grammatic beast or noddy;
Had read out all the catalogues of wares,
That come in dry fats o'er from Francfort fairs
Whose authors use t' articulate their surnames
With scraps of Greek more learned than the Germans;
Was wont to scatter books in ev'ry room,
Where they might best be seen by all that come,
And lay a train that nat'rally should force
What he design'd, as if it fell of course;
And all this with a worse success than Cardan,
Who bought both books and learning at a bargain,
When lighting on a philosophic spell,
Of which he never knew one syllable,
Presto, begone, h' unriddled all he read,
As if he had to nothing else been bred.

The Tapestried Chamber.

A Tale.

By Sir W. Scott.

(Concluded from our last.)

„Most wretchedly, indeed, my lord," answered the general, in the same tone of solemnity; „so miserably, that I would not run the risk of such a night a second time, not only for all the lands belonging to this castle, but for all the country which I see from this elevated point of view.

„This is most extraordinary," said the young lord, as if speaking to himself, „then there must be something in the reports concerning that apartment." Again turning to the general, he said, „For God's sake, my dear friend, be candid with me, and let me know the disagreeable particulars which have befallen you under a roof, where, with consent of the owner, you should have met nothing save comfort."

The general seemed distressed by this appeal, and paused a moment before he replied.

„My dear lord," he at length said, „what happened to me last night is of a nature so peculiar and so unpleasant, that I could hardly bring myself to detail it, even to your lordship, were it not that, independently of my wish to gratify any request of yours, I think that sincerity on my part may lead to some explanation about a circumstance equally painful and mysterious. To others, the communication I am about to make might place me in the light of a weak-minded, superstitious fool, who suffered his own imagination to delude and bewilder him; but you have known me in childhood and youth, and will not suspect me of having adopted in manhood the failings and frailties from which my early years were free." Here he paused, and his friend replied: „Do not doubt my perfect confidence in the truth of your communication, however strange it may be, I know your firmness of disposition too well, to suspect you could be made the object of imposition, and am aware that your honour and your friendship will equally deter you from exaggerating whatever you may have witnessed."

„Well, then," said the general, „I will proceed with my story as well as I can, relying upon your candour; and yet distinctly feeling that I would rather face a battery than recall to my mind the odious recollections of last night."

He paused a second time, and then perceiving that Lord Woodville remained silent, and in an attitude of attention, he commenced, though not without obvious reluctance, the history of his night adventures in the Tapestried Chamber.

„I undressed and went to bed, so soon as your lordship left me yesterday evening; but the wood in the chimney, which nearly fronted my bed, blazed brightly and cheerfully, and, aided by a hundred exciting recollections of my childhood and youth, which had been recalled by the unexpected pleasure of meeting your lordship, prevented me from falling immediately asleep.

I ought, however, to say, that these reflections were all of a pleasant and agreeable kind, grounded on a sense of having, for a time, exchanged the labour, fatigues, and dangers of my profession, for the enjoyments of a peaceful life, and the reunion of those friendly and affectionate ties, which I had torn asunder at the rude summons of war.

„While such pleasing reflections were stealing over my mind, and gradually lulling me to slumber, I was suddenly aroused by a sound like that of the rustling of a silken gown, and the tapping of a pair of high-heeled shoes, as if a woman were walking in the apartment. Ere I could draw the curtain, to see what the matter was, the figure of a little woman passed between the bed and the fire. The back of this form was turned to me, and I could observe, from the shoulders and neck, it was that of an old woman whose dress was an old-fashioned gown, which, I think, ladies call a sacque; that is, a sort of robe completely loose in the body, but gathered into broad plaits upon the neck and shoulders, which fall down to the ground, and terminate in a species of train.

„I thought the intrusion singular enough, but never harboured for a moment the idea that what I saw was any thing more than the mortal form of some old woman about the establishment, who had a fancy to dress like her grandmother, and who, having perhaps (as your lordship mentioned that you were rather straitened for room) been dislodged from her chamber for my accommodation, had forgotten the circumstance, and returned, by twelve, to her old haunt. Under this persuasion, I moved myself in bed and coughed a little, to make the intruder sensible of my being in possession of the premises. She turned slowly round, but, gracious Heaven! my lord, what a countenance did she display to me! There was no longer any question what she was, or any thought of her being a living being. Upon a face which wore the fixed features of a corpse, were imprinted the traces of the vilest and most hideous passions which had animated her while she lived. The body of some atrocious criminal seemed to have been given up from the grave, and the soul restored from the penal fire, in order to form, for a space, a union with the ancient accomplice of its guilt. I started up in bed and sat upright, supporting myself on my palms, as I gazed on this horrible spectre. The hag made, as it seemed, a single and swift stride to the bed where I lay, and squatted herself down upon it, in precisely the same attitude which I had assumed in the extremity of my horror, advancing her diabolical countenance within half a yard of mine, with a grin which seemed to intimate the malice and derision of an incarnate fiend.“

Here General Browne stopped, and wiped from his brow the cold perspiration with which the recollection of his horrible vision had covered it.

„My lord,“ he said, „I am no coward; I have been in all the mortal dangers incidental to my profession, and I may truly boast, that no man ever saw Richard Browne dishonour the sword he wears; but, in these horrible circumstances, under the eyes, and, as it seemed, almost in the grasp of an incarnation of an evil spirit, all firmness forsook me, all manhood melted from me like wax in the furnace, and I felt my hair individually bristle. The current of my life-blood ceased to flow, and I sunk back in a swoon, as very a victim to panic terror as ever was a village girl, or a child of ten years old. How long I lay in this condition I cannot pretend to guess.

„But I was roused by the castle clock striking one so loud, that it seemed as if it were in the very room. It was some time before I dared open my eyes, lest they should again encounter the horrible spectacle. When, however, I summoned courage to look up, she was no longer visible. My first idea was to pull my bell, wake the servants, and remove to a garret or a hay-loft, to be ensured against a second visitation. Nay, I will confess the truth, that my resolution was altered, not by the shame of exposing myself, but by the fear that, as the bell-cord hung by the chimney, I might, in making my way to it, be again crossed by the fiendish hag, who, I figured to myself, might be still lurking about some corner of the apartment.

„I will not pretend to describe what hot and cold fever-fits tormented me for the rest of the night, through broken sleep, weary vigils, and that dubious state which forms the neutral ground between them. A hundred terrible objects appeared to haunt me; but there was the great difference betwixt the vision which I have described, and those which followed, that I knew the last to be deceptions of my own fancy and over-excited nerves.

„Day at last appeared, and I rose from my bed ill in health, and humiliated in mind. I was ashamed of myself as a man and a soldier, and still more so, at feeling my own extreme desire to escape from the haunted apartment, which, however, conquered all other considerations; so that, huddling on my clothes with the most careless haste, I made my escape from your lordship's mansion, to seek in the open air some relief to my nervous system, shaken as it was by this horrible rencounter with a visitant — for such I must believe her — from the other world. Your lordship has now heard the cause of my discomposure, and of my sudden desire to leave your hospitable castle. In other places I trust we may often meet; but God protect me from ever spending a second night under that roof!“

Strange as the general's tale was, he spoke with such an air of deep conviction, that it cut short all the usual commentaries which are made on such stories. Lord Woodville never once asked him if he was sure he did not dream of the apparition, or suggested any of the possibilities by which it is fashionable to explain apparitions — wild vagaries of the fancy, or deceptions of the optic nerves. On the contrary, he seemed deeply impressed with the truth and reality of what he had heard; and, after a considerable pause, regretted, with much appearance of sincerity, that his early friend should in his house have suffered so severely.

„I am the more sorry for your pain, my dear Browne,“ he continued, „that it is the unhappy, though most unexpected, result of an experiment of my own. You must know, that from my father and grandfather's time, at least, the apartment which was assigned to you last night, had been shut, on account of reports that it was disturbed by supernatural sights and noises. When I came, a few weeks since, into possession of the estate, I thought the accommodation which the castle afforded for my friends, was not extensive enough to permit the inhabitants of the invisible world to retain possession of a comfortable sleeping apartment. I therefore caused the Tapestried Chamber, as we call it, to be opened; and, without destroying its air of antiquity, I had such new articles of furniture placed in it as became the modern times. Yet, as the opinion that the room was haunted very strongly prevailed among the domestics, and was known also in the neighbourhood, and to many of my friends, I feared some prejudice might be entertained by the first occupant of the Tapestried Chamber, which might tend to revive the evil report which it had laboured under, and so disappoint my purpose of rendering it a useful part of the house. I must confess, my dear Browne, that your arrival yesterday, agreeable to me for a thousand reasons besides, seemed the most favourable opportunity of removing the unpleasant rumours which attached to the room, since your courage was indubitable, and your mind free of any preoccupation on the subject. I could not, therefore, have chosen a more fitting subject for my experiment.“

„Upon my life,“ said General Browne, somewhat hastily, „I am infinitely obliged to your lordship — very particularly indebted indeed. I am likely to remember, for some time, the consequences of the experiment, as your lordship is pleased to call it.“

„Nay, now you are unjust, my dear friend,“ said Lord Woodville; you have only to reflect for a single moment, in order to be convinced that I could not augur the possibility of the pain to which you have been so unhappily exposed. I was yesterday morning a complete sceptic on the subject of supernatural appearances. Nay, I am sure, that had I told you what was said about that room, those very reports would have induced you, by your own choice, to select it for your accommodation. It was my misfortune, perhaps my error, but really cannot be termed my fault, that you have been afflicted so strangely.“

„Strangely indeed!“ said the general, resuming his good temper; „and I acknowledge that I have no right to be offended with your lordship for treating me like what I used to think myself — a man of some firmness and courage. But I see my post-horses are arrived, and I must not detain your lordship from your amusement.“

„Nay, my old friend,“ said Lord Woodville, „since you cannot stay with us another day, which indeed I can no longer urge, give me at least half an hour more. You used to love pictures, and I have a gallery of portraits, some of them by Vandyke, representing ancestry, to whom this property and castle formerly belonged. I think that several of them will strike you as possessing merit.“ General Browne accepted the invitation, though somewhat unwillingly. It was evident he was not to breathe freely or at ease till he had left Woodville Castle far behind him. He could not refuse his friend's invitation, however, and the less so, that he was a little ashamed of the peevishness which he had displayed towards his well-meaning entertainer.

The general, therefore, followed Lord Woodville through several rooms, into a long gallery hung with pictures, which the latter pointed out to his guest, telling the names, and giving some account of the personages whose portraits presented themselves in progression. General Browne was but little interested in the details which the accounts conveyed to him. They were, indeed, of the kind which are usually found in an old family gallery. Here, was a cavalier who had ruined the estate in the royal cause; there, a fine lady who had re-instated it by contracting a match with a wealthy Roundhead. There, hung a gallant who had been in danger for corresponding with the exiled court at Saint Germain; here, one who had taken arms for William at the Revolution; and again, a third that had thrown his weight alternately into the scale of Whig and Tory.

While Lord Woodville was cramming these words into his guest's ear, „against the stomach of his sense,“ they gained the middle of the gallery, when he beheld General Browne suddenly start, and assume an attitude of the utmost surprise, not unmixed with fear, as his eyes were caught and suddenly riveted by a portrait of an old lady in a sacque, the fashionable dress of the end of the seventeenth century.

„There she is!“ he exclaimed, „there she is, in form and features, though inferior in demoniac expression, to the accursed hag who visited me last night.“

„If that be the case,“ said the young nobleman, „there can remain no longer any doubt of the horrible reality of your apparition. That is the picture of a wretched ancestress of mine, of whose crimes a black and fearful catalogue is recorded, in a family history, in my charter-chest. The recital of them would be too horrible; it is enough to say, that in yon fatal apartment incest and unnatural murder were committed. I will restore it to the solitude to which the better judgment of those who have preceded me had consigned it; and never shall any one, so long as I can prevent it, be exposed to a repetition of the supernatural horrors which could shake such courage as your's.

Thus the friends, who had met with such glee, parted in a very different mood — Lord Woodville to command the Tapestried Chamber to be unmantled, and the door built up; and General Browne to seek, in some less beautiful country, and with some less dignified friend, forgetfulness of the painful night which he had passed in Woodville Castle.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. No 16.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The mysterious Stranger; or The Bravo of Banff.

BY LEITCH RITCHIE.

Chapter I. — The Robber's Thumb.

We are about to enter a terra incognita. Does any one remember hearing or seeing a little, odd, un-English, un-Scotch monosyllable, spelling itself BANFF? An affirmative answer, we suspect, will only be given by young ladies, or young gentlemen, fresh from their geography, — who may call to mind, if they have particularly good memories, that Banff is the capital town of a county of the same name in Scotland. Farther than this not one in a million of our readers can go. Not a single association is called up by the sound. The „sleeping images of things" in the mind sleep on. It is not a word to conjure with. Try as you may, it will only resolve itself at least into its component letters; and you shall have nothing more for your pains than B, a, n, double f.

This is no less strange than it is true; for Banff, in addition to its being one of the most beautifully situated towns on the northern coasts of Scotland — which is pretty nearly the same as saying, on the face of the whole earth — is surrounded by all the charms which, like those of women, attract the spoilers of fashion, to desecrate and debase the very temple wherein they worship. Its chalybeate springs resemble, while they surpass, those of Tunbridge Wells; its walks, rides, and drives are unrivalled in the kingdom; the mighty and magnificent sea breaks upon its cliffs, or gambols on its golden sands; and the romantic Deveron plunges into the waste of waters by its side.

Banff, although cheerful and lightsome in its aspect, has yet a solitary look. It seems to stand apart, with a kind of prudish decorum, from the rest of the world; and this character attaches even to the inhabitants themselves. They consist in great part of that class which used formerly to be designated by the now obsolete term of „genteel people." Of this portion of the society some are wealthy, and some are small annuitants; but, in a place where the necessaries, and many of the luxuries of life, are singularly cheap, all are independent. The strife of rivalry is rarely to be seen in the countenance of Banff gentility. The residents have laid down their ledgers and taken to the journals; or they are honourable pensioners on their country; or families of small inherited fortune; or invalids who come to drink at the Hygeian springs, and brighten their pale cheeks with the breezes of the sea.

Owing to the circumscribed nature of the society, the Banffians are all well-known to each other. Yet, in this instance, familiarity does not broad contempt — but quite the reverse. Their social intercourse is carried on with a certain punctilio, which spreads an air of fashion over the whole community. They are strict inquirers into clans and families, and allow grudgingly his lawful place to Mammon. They are in fact a sort of exclusives in their way; and, in their inter-communication, bear some resemblance to a dress party.

At the time, however, when we take up the history of this community, Banff was frighted from its propriety by a series of daring robberies committed in the town and neighbourhood. The business commenced at Duff House, the elegant seat of Lord Fife; and, whether produced or not by the natural love of imitation which seems to govern mankind in matters of murder and marriage, a succession of similar exploits spread consternation through the district. Some people imagined that a gang of first-rate cracksmen had condescended to come all the way from London, the grand emporium of thievery; but no stranger of any distinction in appearance was seen in the neighbourhood, and the suspicion fell to the ground. That the robberies were committed by strangers, there could be no doubt; for it was observed, in some cases, that the best protected part of the house was chosen for attack. Force appeared occasionally to have been used; but in general entrance was effected either by an unfastened window, or some other means that did not involve the necessity of making too much noise. Noise, indeed, was usually heard; but never till the deed was accomplished. Then there was a grating of shoes, a stamping of feet, and a clapping of doors; as if the adventurers, flushed with success, and certain of escape, cared no longer for concealment. Such tokens of defiance, indeed, were the best means that could have been used to cover their retreat; for when the stillness of midnight was broken by sounds like these, the stoutest men sometimes lay quaking in bed, or were seized bodily by their wives, and kept prisoners of peace till all was over.

It was surprising, however, to see how bold the Banffians were in the day-time. Curses loud and deep were vented against those mysterious braves, whom no man had as yet seen. The most bloody-minded measures were talked of. Pistols were cleaned, primed, and loaded; swords and dirks sharpened; and one gentleman even proposed the formation of an armed constabulary force, and daily exercise on the Battery Green in all the manoeuvres of war. But these belligerent plans were successfully opposed by the half-pay officers, who remarked that regular military operations could be of no use in dark chambers, and narrow staircases; and at length an air of ridicule was thrown on the war party by the conduct of one of their leaders, who, on hearing some suspicious sounds at night, ran from his own solitary room into that of his sisters, exclaiming valiantly, „Haud me, or I'll fecht!“

As yet, we have said, the robbers had never been seen; but at length the fulness of time arrived when they were both seen and felt, and when blood flowed in the struggle. The circumstance of their choosing the house of Major Lovat for the object of attack proved, if proof were wanting, that they were indeed strangers in the district. The major whose name is well known in the wars of the Peninsula, was a man of unquestioned courage, and withal of a fierce, hot, and sudden temper. He was besides in the commission of the peace, and so active in his justiceship, that to him were owing the detection and punishment of almost all the great crimes that had been committed in the county since the peace. The major did not appear to share in the general excitation at this particular juncture. He could not be persuaded to take any measures of security which he had not been accustomed to; and even his man-servant, Franks, a fine-looking fellow, of well-known bravery — „although an Englishman,“ as the Banffians said — was not withdrawn from an out-house, where he had slept for some time in consequence of an overflow of visitors, who had now taken leave.

If Major Lovat was not so fierce as usual in manner, he was not less watchful. He lay with the door of his room ajar, and every now and then got up to listen. Sometimes he stood during the stillest part of the night at his chamber window, which commanded the back entrance to the house, and sometimes descended the staircase in his slippers to ascertain that all was right below. These precautions, however, were taken by stealth; and his daughter and the maids murmured as loudly as they durst at this supposed negligence, which they attributed to military pride.

Univ. Bibl.
München

One dark and stormy night — a night that seemed to have been contrived on purpose for the prowling robber — Major Lovat was as usual on the watch. He was confused, however, by the Babel of sublime or dismal sounds; in which the howling of the wind, the groaning of trees, and the roar of the waves breaking on the Bar *), mingled in a strange wild chorus. To ascertain what portion of the din was within, and what without the house was impossible; yet he could not divest himself of a sort of superstitious impression, that he had heard something which did not belong to the proper noises of the house. He could derive no assistance from his eyes, for the night was pitchdark; but as he endeavoured to pierce through the gloom below, while he stood at his window, a multitude of moving forms seemed to throng around the door.

Although aware that these must have been the effects of fancy, he yet determined to descend stealthily, and listen at the door. Wrapped in his night-gown, and armed with a drawn sword, the major groped his way almost to the bottom of the stairs; and then stopped short, threw back the folds of his gown, raised his sword, and bent forward in the attitude of springing, as he heard suddenly the well-known din which attended the departure of the plunderers. A distant door was shut with a force that shook the house, confused whispers rushed along the corridor, and many steps tramped and grated upon the floor. The din approached. Major Lovat bitterly regretted that he had not at once sprung forward, secured the back door, and thus made prisoners of the whole party. He knew that in a dark house a child might scare a whole band of robbers; and at any rate, if assistance was necessary, a single shout from the window would awaken his servant Franks. It was now too late however; for a door, communicating with the range of apartments on the opposite side of the hall, flew open, and a human figure treading heavily, as if in wantonness, rushed towards the door.

Major Lovat gained the spot in a single bound; and, aware that in the twofold darkness of the recess the enemy would become invisible, whirled his sword at random round his head. The robber did not enter within its sweep. He turned suddenly aside at the entrance of the recess which formed the porch, and vaulting like a harlequin upon a lofty window-seat, disappeared before the enraged major could strike at him more than a single blow. Whether this blow took effect or not, it was impossible for the present to ascertain. The gallant veteran stepped noiselessly and instantaneously back into the porch; and, grinding his teeth till he foamed at the mouth, waited the approach of the next.

He waited in vain; for the rest of the gang having no doubt heard the clang of the weapon, found another way out. The morning soon after broke, and the kitchen-wench, crawling gapingly to her early avocations, no sooner beheld the spectre-like figure of her master guarding the domains with a drawn sword, than she uttered a scream that brought down Miss Lovat and the maids in their night-gear.

After ascertaining—which he did with infinite mortification —that the whole party had escaped, the major proceeded to examine the window, and the circumjacent premises. The folding casement had been dexterously slipped from its hinges, with the fracture of only a single pane; and on the sill our veteran detected, with a growl of satisfaction — blood. This, however, might have been no more than the effects of the broken glass; and it was necessary to inquire into the state of affairs on the outside. On the pavement below the window, a much greater quantity of blood was visible. It did not meander along the stones in a narrow stream, like that which flows from a common cut; but lay here and there in broad and thick splashes. This was proof that an artery had been severed; and the major followed the track like a slot-hound, till it was completely lost in a jungle behind the paling. He was about to call Franks, and beat the bush from end to end, in hopes that the wounded man might have fallen from loss of blood; when a scream from Miss Lovat brought the anxious father to her side.

---

*) A sandbank at the mouth of the Deveron.

She was standing beside a pond at a little distance from the path, and gazing with horror and alarm at some minute object on the brink. It was a man's thumb. The daring villain, in the midst of the pain and danger of the wound, had had the presence of mind to throw away the severed member, lest at some future time it might appear as a witness against him, attempting, no doubt, to bury it in the pond, although he missed his purpose in the dark. The major stooped upon his quarry like a hawk; but presently, shaking his head —

„Get in with you, lassie,“ said he, „and a truce with your squeeling and skirling, for one morning. This is not the lad to lie down for the loss of a thumb; he is safe by this time I'll warrant you; and, by my honour, I should not be sorry for it, if we had only his arm or leg here. But a thumb! — a poor indemnification for a night's watching and may be as much as a year's pay in kind. Well, well — ‚half a loaf is better than no bread,‘ as Franks says;“ and the major, not at all so discontented as he appeared, carefully rinsed the thumb in the pond, and carried it triumphantly into the house.

It would not be easy to describe the state of agitation into which the people of Banff were thrown, when the news of this circumstance ran, while it was yet early morning, like wildfire through the town. The thumb was first magnified to a hand — an arm — a leg — a whole body; and then multiplied by fifteen or sixteen, till the inhabitants, flocking to the scene of action, expected to find Major Lovat's back-court strewed with the slain. Some of the families whose houses stood alone, talked of removing into the town; and many serving lasses actually left their situations, and sought shelter in their parent wynds and closes. Even Franks, Major Lovat's man, made his appearance in the parlour, great-coated, booted, gloved, and evidently prepared for a journey.

„I am come to take leave of your honour,“ said he, with the abruptness which in an English servant is called insolence.

„The —— you are! — and without warning?“

„You know, Sir, you make it a rule to give me warning at least ten times a day, and that is quite sufficient for my purpose.“

„The English of all this is, that you are afraid — I say that you are afraid, you rascal — afraid,“ spluttered the major, reddening with anger.

„I am neither a rascal nor a coward,“ replied Franks; „but I would rather take soldier's pay and die by fair fighting, than run a risk every night of being murdered in my bed for ten times the money. I have no notion of it, I assure you. It is not my trade. Till such time as you can contrive to have a proper police in your country, you need not expect an Englishman to live with you.“ By the time the fellow had finished his harangue, he contrived to be just at the door; for the major was occasionally apt to take the executive department of his justiceship into his own hands. Had the man been less impudent, he would most probably have been bribed to stay, by a handsome addition to his salary; for, being a smart, ready fellow, he had become almost necessary to his master. The only point in his character, indeed, which was at all objectionable, was an over-devotion — if such a thing be possible — to the fair sex. The serving lasses far and near were pulling caps, or rather rugging mutches for him; and since his arrival an unusual number of accidents had happened both to their reputations and persons.

The major, however, was at this time so much absorbed in the contemplation of his gain, that he had no time to bemoan his loss, or reflect either on the good or bad qualities of Franks. The thumb lay upon a towel on the table before him, and the room during that entire day was crowded by visitors, who had come to inspect it, and inquire into the real history of the capture.

The thumb was not an ill-shaped thumb. It had certainly not been a hard-working thumb; but on the contrary was fair and smooth, and the nail well shaped, somewhat long, and carefully pared. It was in short rather a gentlemanly thumb, and only distinguished from other thumbs of the class by the scar of an old wound. When the visitors had all retired — which they took care to do before the shades of evening had fallen, the major wrapped the relic in cotton, impregnated with brandy, spices, and perfumes; and, in spite of Miss Lovat's entreaties, placed it on the mantel-piece, as a trophy and an ornament. From hence it was taken for many a day after to be shown, again and again, to the admiring visitors; and for some time the all-absorbing topic of conversation, both in this house and in the town of Banff, was the Robber's Thumb.

Chapter II. — The Bridge of Alva.

The exploit of Major Lovat, detailed in the preceding chapter, seemed to have turned, or at least stopped, the fortune of the war. When the agitation of the public mind began to subside, and the Banffians were no longer haunted by the daily reality and nightly vision of the Thumb, they discovered, with renewed wonder, that since the capture of that important member, not a single robbery had been committed in the neighbourhood. This proved, that the thumb had been the personal property of the chief of the banditti; and the inhabitants, sure of at least a respite, gradually returned to their usual habits and feelings.

It was with something like shame, indeed, that the fashion of Banff reflected on the republican freedoms, and revolutionary intimacies, they had been led in a moment of common danger into sanctioning, and on the consequent disorders that had well nigh overturned the whole fabric of genteel society; and they immediately began, as if by preconcerted agreement, to retreat behind the circumvallations of their punctilios, ceremonies, and decorums.

Only one arrival, they found, had been placed on the list during the anarchy; and the usual steps were of course taken to ascertain who and what the stranger was, whence he had come, and what were his family, quality, estate, profession, fortune, name. To not one of these inquiries could any answer be obtained. The stranger still resided at the Royal Oak inn, where he was only known as Number 9. He was a man rather under than over thirty — tall — well-looking — pale, as if from recent illness — and his left arm was in a sling, the hand bound with a black silk handkerchief. He did not seek acquaintances; he did not attend the coffee-room; he did not go to church; he did not bathe; he did not drink the waters. What then had he come here for?

All this was very perplexing — not to say suspicious. Consultations were repeatedly held as to the grade of society in which he ought to be placed; but no decision could be come to. He was a gentleman, no doubt, in manner and mode of living; but where were his credentials? Was it gentleman-like to come to such a place as Banff without a single introduction, or without at least announcing his name, and demanding the respect to which he was entitled by his wealth and quality? In vain Mr. Cooper, who was at that time a sort of master of the ceremonies, endeavoured to inveigle him into conversation and disclosure: he took nothing by his motion. The stranger's reserve was at length felt as a public insult, and one dowager, who shall be nameless, even declared at Major Lovat's house, that he ought be called to account by the gentlemen.

„I tell ye what, laddies," said Mr. Thom, a retired merchant — „My private opinion is, that the best way to unfauld the mystery would be to unfauld the chief's hand. I would like to ken what he has got — or rather what he has not got under yon black dud!" — and Mr. Thom turned a significant look towards the mantelpiece whereon reposed the robber's thumb.

This strange hint sent a kind of thrill through the company, and was followed by a profound silence which lasted for upwards of a minute. The idea, however, was too sudden and too extravagant to be entertained for more than a minute; and at length, as if ashamed of the injustice they had committed in their thoughts, some of the gentlemen began to banter Mr. Thom on his sagacity, declaring that he ought himself to have the slaying of the giant, and to assume from that moment the honourable name of Tom Thumb!

„Aweel, aweel,“ replied Mr. Thom, looking rather grave than angry — „Never heed — we'll see!“

The young ladies in the mean time, who form every where a separate power within the state, were not less busy in discussing the same subject. At first they were unanimous in the stranger's favour. He was so handsome, so tall, so pale, so melancholy! But as every day he continued to pass them by without so much as bestowing a glance on their beauty, it was only natural that they should detect some flaws in the picture. Not satisfied, however, with charging him simply with bad taste, which they might justly have done, they went a step further than perhaps they were entitled to do, even by the law of presumptive evidence. He arrived, said they, a day or two after Major Lovat's exploit — pale and faint, as if from loss of blood, and with his hand concealed by a bandage. But moreover, on enquiring in the traveller's room what was the cause of the hurry and the agitation in the street, when he was answered, that „the folks were in pursuit of a man who had gotten his thumb cut off,“ he rose up in evident trepidation and retired to his own apartment! The last mentioned fact was indeed remarkable, and had been repeated at the time by witnesses who never dreamed of the conclusion that might be drawn from such premises.

„And now, Marian,“ said Miss Thom, the daughter of the wealthy ex-merchant, „put all thae points together, and see what ye'll make of them?“ The lady addressed was Miss Marian Lovat, only child of our friend the Major, and ostensible head of the very small minority of spinsters still in favour of the stranger. She was about nineteen years of age, and the reigning beauty of Banff, but was thought to be somewhat odd in her tastes and temper. The fiery particles in her father's composition burned in the daughter's, but with a lambent flame rather than a red heat; and his rude soldier-like generosity was in her a high and holy enthusiasm which is quite incomprehensible to common souls. Marian, in short, was romantic in the finest sense of the word, which conveys the idea of something opposite to worldly-minded. The effect produced by the late occurrences on sensibilities like hers, had been exciting in the highest degree; and now, when she was called upon to feel, in a case somehow or other connected with the former, she abandoned herself to the instincts of her heart with a dangerous eagerness. We do not mean to say, that our youthful heroine was insensible to the manly beauty of the stranger. On the contrary, like all the really good and pure, she was an enthusiastic admirer of beauty whether physical or moral. The sourest Cameronian that ever sung the Psalms of David, with his bible kept open on his knee by his naked sword, would have preferred for his temple of worship some sweet and blooming valley to the naked rock or howling waste. Ugliness should be tolerated from pity, but beauty admired from the instinct which is the bond of union between the soul of man and its Creator.

If Marian, however, had admired the stranger under different circumstances, she would have admired him like a fine picture or a magnificent landscape. As it was, her heart was brought into play as well as her taste. Her generosity was appealed to; her pity awakened; and at last, when the jeers of her companions had taught her to suspect even her holiest feelings, it was with rising colour and unsteady step she passed by in the street the silent object of her speculations.

„What do I make of them?" said she, in reply to Miss Tom's question — „Coincidences — nothing more. We are altogether unacquainted with the stranger's history, and therefore unable to reason on his looks. As for his hand, it may either have been hurt in a duel or by accident; and in a few days, when the wound gets well, and the bandage is removed, you will blush for your uncharitableness."

„He is a robber, I tell ye," said Miss Thom, violently — „He is the robber; and his thoom lies at this moment on your father's brose! Take care, Mirren Lovat, take care of what you are about! More than me noticed your colour come and go yesterday, as you passed him in the street; and what [illegible] waur, more than me noticed that after ye gaed by he stood stock still — for the first time that he has given one of us a glance — and glowred after ye as if ye had been a speerit! Remember, Mirren Lovat — remember lass — this is no Venice!" Few of the young ladies could refrain from tittering at the allusion with which the outspoken Miss Thom concluded her oration. They had all been reading Lewis's popular romance; and they whispered one to the other in a tone not inaudible to our heroine — the BRAVO'S BRIDE! Marian was unable to restrain either her tears or her temper. The reply wrung from her vexed spirit may be given in such matter of fact pages as ours, but would have wholly unfitted her for a heroineship of romance.

„You vulgar — low-minded — ignorant — impudent cutties!" was her exclamation, broken by sobs, as she turned indignantly away, and walked home alone to her father's house.

The feuds of young ladies, it is to be presumed, are not usually of long duration; for we have it on record that Miss Thom and some of her party, on the next day but one, walked arm in arm with Marian Lovat to the bridge of Alva.

It will scarcely be possible to convey to the Southron reader any adequate idea of this magnificent spot. When he learns that it forms part of the pleasure-grounds of Lord Fife, his imagination, busy with the quiet loveliness of his parks at home, or their grotesque attempts at the natural sublime, will be unable to take hold of the scene which we would fain present to it. The bridge, of a high arch, reminds one, as Sir Thomas Dick Lauder justly observes, „more of a Roman work than any thing of modern times." It is thrown over the Deveron at a place which more nearly resembles a Swiss or Tyrolese valley, than the entrance to a nobleman's policies. The far-travelled river has wandered for some time through an open and comparatively level country; and even when it suddenly enters the narrow chasm of precipitous cliffs, crowned with funeral pines, it plunges with a sullen dignity into the abyss, its contortions visible only in noiseless whirls, or in flashes of foam that rise through the dark waters no higher than the surface — like feelings bursting from some tortured bosom even to the lip, and there choked by pride. The grey-headed jack daw, and the hermit raven, celebrate the consummation with hoarse cries; and the heron dips his wing in the flood, as he sweeps across to roost among the firs of Mount Coffer. Sullen, yet swift, and heaving with „inarticulate throes," the Deveron flings itself headlong beneath the arch, and emerges into a wide basin, black, deep, and gloomy, tracked with white flakes that show the sweep of the channel, and surrounded by precipices crowned with groves.

This is the spot sacred to the Banffian Cupid. Half hidden among these rocks and woods are the walks of love. Often, in the gloaming, you may see a whispering pair stealing slowly and lingeringly through the shade. A manly arm is pressed fondly but gently, as they walk, round a maiden waist, and a blooming, blushing cheek is bent sidelong towards the taller shoulder, that not one breath of the murmured tale may be lost. Now they hesitate; they pause — not simultaneously, but one compelled by a tender beseeching force. Her head hangs down. The whisper is renewed, more energetically in itself, yet melting more softly in her ear, till the spell of love is complete. Then their hands are clasped, and their faces raised to heaven. Do you recognise them now? Name them not if you do

— O never name them, even to your own heart! Consider them but as abstractions of the best and brightest and holiest things in our nature. They are images — pictures — dreams — prophecies, or memories. All you must know of them personally is, that they are a youth and a maid, and that

They both are young, and one is beautiful!"

There is a turretted seat among the craigs of Alva, where many of these votaries have carved their initials, each pair enclosed within a mutual heart. „The last time I was there,“ writes a friend who is well acquainted with the place and people, „I perused these memorials with a melancholy interest. Some of the love-pilgrims of Alva are dead, some far away in foreign lands, some married to strangers; but not in one instance have their names been united otherwise than by the rude sculptured heart that encloses their initials.“

On the lofty bridge of Alva, which overlooks the region we have attempted to describe, stood Marian Lovat and her friends. Both the beauty and sublimity of the place are essentially of a melancholy character; and it is no wonder that their imagination, steeped in the mysteries of the time, should have conjured up only the darker associations that haunt the glen. They talked of an unhappy girl named Eppie Imlach, whose fate still draws tears from the women and curses from the men. It is one of those revolting stories — of seduction, followed by brutal murder — which sicken while they sadden; and the voices of the young ladies sunk into a whisper as they dwelt on the tragedy.

„Gude be about us!“ cried Miss Thom, suddenly.

„It was here, on this very spot where I now stand, that the fiend Morrison waited for the trysted coming of his victim! Eh! what's that?“ — and with a scream, repeated unconsciously by her companions, she darted along the bridge. When the terrified girls turned round to look for the cause of terror, they saw standing behind them — the mysterious stranger; and, partly in shame, partly in fear, partly in affectation, they sprang after their friend — all except Marian.

„I fear I have alarmed you, madam,“ said the stranger, touching his hat — „although I scarcely know how.“

„It was we rather,“ replied Marian, attempting to smile while she blushed with shame and vexation, „who must have alarmed you. The truth is, we were talking of a deed of horror of which this spot is the scene — and you appeared the moment we had named the murderer.“ The stranger turned pale — he staggered, as if about to faint, and leant against the parapet.

„You are ill!“ said Marian.

„It is nothing — I am now better — I am now well. And has murder, indeed, been here? This is a strange country! Every tree has its legend — every rock its story. You are never at rest either in good or evil. Every face I meet beams either with love or scorn.“

„Why, I thought you had been —“ but Marian stopped and blushed. She was about to forget that he was a stranger!

„I am from the south,“ said he, without appearing to notice her embarrassment, „and never was in Scotland before. Do you not observe it in my accent?“

„There are now so many of our Scottish youths,“ replied Marian, „educated in England, that the test has become difficult.“ They had by this time walked on, as if unconsciously, side by side, in the direction of the town, and found themselves winding among the romantic walks by the river side. They were both silent for some time, Marian in a flutter between pleasure and embarrassment, and the stranger apparently absorbed in thought.

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. № 17.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The mysterious Stranger; or The Bravo of Banff.

BY LEITCH RITCHIE.

(Continued from our last.)

„Look there!" he exclaimed suddenly, while the fine melancholy of his face was brightened by enthusiasm. „What a spot for a robber's den! Have you a taste for robbery?" A taste for robbery! Marian started; but the next moment, as if ashamed of her folly, constrained herself to reply.

„We have robber-stories too. Are you aware that we are approaching the town where the famous Macpherson was executed a century ago?"

„I was not. O do not let us approach nearer yet, for before entering we must separate. Pray sit down on this bank, and tell me the story of Macpherson." Marian, knowing little of the world, did not feel that there was any absolute impropriety in complying: but before she had made up her mind, her hand was taken by the stranger, and she found herself seated beside him on the bank.

„I have little to tell," said she, determining at all events not to sit long. „Macpherson, who had for some time been the terror of the country side, was at length taken by an ancestor of the present Lord Fife, and lodged in the prison of Banff *). He had not only a 'taste for robbing,' it seems, but a taste for music, and amused his prison-hours by composing his own dead march. He played the piece on his way to execution, and on arriving at the gallows-tree, held up his favorite violin, and offered it to any one who dared accept of the outlaw's gift. Not a hand was stretched forth, but all shrunk back. With a swelling heart he broke the instrument on his knee; and in another moment Macpherson was no more.

„Go on — go on," said the stranger breathlessly.

„I have done," replied Marian, blushing, and half-rising, for she saw that his eyes were riveted on her face with an expression of devout admiration.

„One moment!" continued he — „Has the march been preserved?"

„I do not know. A ballad was soon after published, and sung to the music. The ballad was altered by Burns, and is given in his works with the title of 'Macpherson's Farewell.'"

„Will you repeat the words? — and then, a thousand thanks — and my farewell."

Marian sung the ballad, and when it was concluded, she rose hastily, for she saw with surprise that the shadows of twilight were beginning to fall.

---

*) The two-handed sword of this noted robber is still preserved at Duff House.

„Are you afraid?" demanded the stranger — „Do you fancy me to be a robber?"

„How can I tell?" replied she pertly, as she slackened her pace, in expectation that he was about to clear the mystery that enveloped him. He seemed to feel this. Was he as ignorant then, as she had hitherto believed, of the suspicions to which he was subjected? His face she fancied grew paler, and he sunk into melancholy abstraction. She at length broke silence as they reached Colley road, which led to Major Lovat's house.

„I would not have you think worse of me," said he, „than — than —" and he paused so long, and in such evident agitation, that Marian at last, to break through the awkwardness, was constrained to say —

„I seek not to know your secrets, Sir, — good evening." As she turned away, however, he seized her suddenly by the hand, and repeated in a deep but clear whisper the words of the ballad —

„Marion, a nameless life I lead,
A nameless death I'll die —
The fiend whose lanthorn lights the mead,
Were fitter mate than I!"

and pressing her hand convulsively, disappeared in an instant.

Chapter III. — Agitation.

„Yet sure the Brignal banks are fair,
And Greta woods are green,
I'd rather rove with Edmund there
Than reign our English queen!"

„How do you like the air, Janet?" asked Marian Lovat, when she had finished the burthen. The two companions were sitting alone, and Miss Thom had been gazing for some time past, with surprise and uneasiness, in the other's face.

„How do I like the air, Marion?" said she. „The air is well enough — but why do ye sing so loud, and look so wild, and speer *) at me with a suddenness that is enough to make a body jump! Ye are no weel Marion: — there's a flush on your cheek, and a glare in your eye, and I misdoubt me, fever in your blood and in your brain! Ye have no been weel ever since that weary walk to the brig of Alva; but ye were aye so eager that ye'll no acknowledge that ye got a fright at the sudden apparition of the stranger, and the shreigh we gave when we saw him, that has settled on your spirits. Go to your bed, lassie, and first pray, and then sleep, and ye'll be weel the morn. Go to your bed," added Miss Thom, while the tears came into her eyes — „and I'll never vex you again, Marion, and never argue and flyte *) with you so long as I live, and never — never — never more call you the Bravo's Bride!" Marian attempted to laugh; but the next moment she rose suddenly, and throwing her arms round her friend's neck, hid her face in her bosom, and burst into tears. Miss Thom wept for company; but in spite of the promise she had just made, flyted all the while.

„Hoot!" said she, „What for are ye greeting? ) It's nothing but mysteries — Get up, ye tawpie! ) I declare I thought ye had more sense!"

„It is only weakness," said Marian, faintly.

„That is just what is astonishing to me! I never saw you greet before, except when your mother was called home."

„I will do what you advise, dear Janet; I'll go to bed, and try to pray, and —"

„Try to pray! Goodness be about us! Heard ever anybody the like of that?"

„I will pray," said Marian faintly — „and I'll try to calm my spirits — and perhaps" (with a deep sigh) „I shall be well in the morning."

This little scene took place many days after Marian's first interview with the stranger. The second meeting had been quite as accidental as the first, the third less so, the fourth — but why explain what everybody understands? Who cannot picture to themselves the short, easy, and natural stages of such an intercourse? — and yet there were some points in it far from common. Marian felt that she loved, and was beloved — yet no word of warning — no blessed hope had ever passed the stranger's lips! There was between them — in all things but one — the confidence of love. Their eyes conversed; their souls mingled, their very air, and gestures — the slightest working of the features, were as the words and signs of an intelligible language.

---

*) fragen.

*) schelten. ) weinen. ) thörichtes Mädchen.

There was an enthusiasm in the stranger's character, which it would have been difficult for a girl like Marian to resist; but there was also a certain something in his air which, while it invited familiarity, brooked no intrusion. He seemed to be naturally frank and open; but the circle of his confidence was limited and impassable, and an inquiry which even pointed beyond either roused him to fierceness, or plunged him into the deepest melancholy. He abhorred the past; he dreaded the future; he lived only for the present. His thoughts, although not habitually gloomy, were familiar with murder, and he seemed, in his own language, to have „a taste for robbery."

But on the other hand, his information was so extensive, and his sentiments so noble and generous, and so deeply tinged with those golden hues of romance which were the prevailing colour of her own character, that Marian, when walking by his side was often haunted by the beautiful melody —

If thou'lt be mine, the treasures of air,
Of earth, and sea, shall lie at thy feet;
Whatever in fancy's eye looks fair,
Or in Hope's sweet music is most sweet,
Shall be ours, if thou wilt be mine, love!

Bright flowers shall bloom wherever we rove,
A voice divine shall talk in each stream,
The stars shall look like worlds of love,
And this earth be all one beautiful dream,
In our eyes — if thou wilt be mine, love!

But, in the meantime, the suspicions that had so oddly attached to the stranger from his very first appearance at Banff, gained ground daily. A thousand little circumstances appeared, which although individually trifling, formed in their union, a body of at least presumptive evidence. Mr. Thom, who was the zealous agent of the secret trial that was going on, at length bethought himself of the serving lasses, who had left their situations at the time of Major Lovat's conflict with the robber. These, who were in number three, had all left the town immediately after; but one had lately returned in bad health — and Mr. Thom, who was in the commission of the peace, as well as his friend the major, did not hesitate to arrest her on suspicion. The poor girl was so much terrified, that she fainted on being introduced to the magistrate. Her evidence, however, was important, inasmuch as she confessed having seen one of the robbers one night that her master's house was stripped of a quantity of plate, and her description of his person tallied so completely with that of the stranger, even to the minutest particulars of dress, that there was no longer any doubt. The only extraordinary thing was that the man should have remained so long in the scene of his exploits; but this species of infatuation is frequently observed even among experienced and hardened villains. The warrant for his arrest was regularly prepared; but before serving it, Mr. Thom, with Scottish caution, sent out the witness, under charge of one of the officers, to take a view of the party, as if accidentally. The result was, that she „thought he was the man, but couldna and wouldna swear till him." On being asked why she had never before avowed having seen the robber, her reply was, that she had been advised by a friend to conceal it, as she might otherwise get herself into trouble. Who was this friend? With some hesitation (accounted for by a flirtation that had been between them) she named Mr. Francis, Major Lovat's servant. The warrant was of course cancelled.

We may imagine what were the feelings of Marian when, day after day, this interesting and tormenting subject was canvassed before her. Frequently she repaired to the romantic walks round Duff House, where the stranger passed the greater part of the day, for the very purpose of warning him of the degrading rumours that filled the town. But on these occasions, as the word rose to her lip, her heart seemed to die within her, and she remained mute. She dreaded to ask herself, whether it was owing to a fear of wounding his noble spirit, or to a worse and more terrible apprehension, that her silence was owing.

Miss Thom's visit had been paid for the express purpose of carrying her the news of the warrant being issued for the stranger's apprehension; she having run out in the midst of the proceedings, with the natural love of young ladies for disseminating information. Marion, however, was evidently unwell; and Miss Thom judiciously resolved to avoid exciting her by any tale of the kind; but unfortunately, she delivered it by way of some indemnification, to one of the maids, as she passed through the hall; and the latter ran at once to her mistress to relieve herself of the burthen. Marion neither screamed nor fainted: she said that she felt better, and, instead of going to bed, that she should take a walk. She threw on her shawl and bonnet; walked leisurely along the road till she was out of sight of the house; and then flew with the speed of the wind towards the Craigs of Alva.

The stranger was gazing over the parapet of the bridge, when she stood by his side with the suddenness of an apparition.

„Good Heaven! what is the matter?" he exclaimed with a start — „you are flushed — panting!" —

„Think not of me!" said Marion, „I come to talk of you. There is no time for ceremony. I have only to ask you — without preface — without comment — are you aware that there is a warrant for your apprehension in town?" The stranger stood thunder-struck for an instant, and grew deadly pale; but immediately recovering his composure, he said in a low, calm tone—

„Let them come then — I shall not be taken alive!"

„Man — tell me what you fear!" said Marion, grasping him by the arm, and fixing her eyes wildly and even fiercely on his face.

„The gallows."

„I will not believe it!" she shrieked — „it is impossible that you can be —"

„But I am! — all you fear and worse than you fancy — guilty — miserable — lost!" She fell senseless at his feet.

When she recovered from her trance, he was hanging over her distractedly, and her awakening ear was filled with exclamations that could only have burst from a heart full of love and despair.

„Was it a dream?" said she, opening her eyes — „oh, say that it was a dream!"

„Dream for one day longer," replied he, raising her, and suddenly assuming a cold, stern, and even haughty demeanour — „Your information was premature; at the worst it was but prophetic, and I have yet time to prepare. Adieu for the present."

Even this interview, strange to say, did not throw any light on Marion's perplexity — if we should not rather say, that she continued wilfully to shut her eyes. That some calamity had befallen him, the effect of youthful indiscretion, which his own sensibility, and perhaps even the letter of the law magnified to a crime, she had long suspected: and hence arose what she was determined to believe the equivoque of the scene. His manner at parting more especially, she thought, had been full of a sullen dignity, which a pitiful, skulking robber — a nightly thief — could not have assumed, were it to save his ignoble neck. At any rate she was of opinion — somewhat late indeed — that it was now full time to ascertain his real character; and she solemnly resolved that if, after the lapse of another day, he did not redeem his implied pledge by revealing himself, she would never more return to the bonnie banks of the Devon and the Craigs of Alva.

When she reached home, however, it was not without consternation that she found that the warrant had been actually filled up, but afterwards destroyed. Was it still possible to imagine, that there had been any equivoque in their conversation? Did it not appear, only too plainly, that the stranger was completely aware of the proceedings that were going on against him? Could his knowledge of her mistake have proceeded from anything, but a secret league and understanding with the witness, on whose simple word his liberty and perhaps his life depended?

The next morning, being called into town on some family matters, she learnt that the mail had arrived unusually soon, and she therefore waited a few minutes to inquire for letters. Among the despatches was a newspaper; which as soon as she got into the cross-road that served as an avenue to her father's house, she unfolded and began to read. Her thoughts however were absent, and ever and anon she raised her head to look in the direction of the main road which led towards their favourite walk. Soon her heart beat, and her cheeks grew pale, for she saw the stranger. She lingered a while to observe whether he meant to approach her; but he was walking rapidly in the direction of the town. The next moment, however, he appeared to change his intention, and came bounding towards her.

„Can it be," he said, „that the mail has already arrived?"

„Yes, this is a paper of to-day." He snatched it out of her hands, and turned it over with tremulous eagerness. His face was flushed, and covered with perspiration; his hand shook, and his knees seemed to bend beneath him. But the next moment the colour faded from his cheeks; the moisture stood in large drops upon his brow, like beads of ice on white marble; and his eyes, fixed with an expression of horror upon the paper, appeared to be riveted there by a spell. Marion approached, till she was close beside him, and took the paper out of his hand without uttering a word; having first distinctly observed (as she thought) the paragraph which produced his extraordinary emotion.

„Miss Lovat," said the stranger, solemnly, „you must dream no more!" He gazed for a moment mournfully on her face; and then sinking upon his knee, took her hand, and pressed it to his lips. Marion was at once surprised and affected. She did not withdraw her hand, and the stranger seemed to want resolution to give it up. But the struggle was at length over; a few scalding tears mingled with his long last kiss; and, rising hastily, he withdrew, and was soon out of sight.

Marion, at that moment, and on that spot, could not trust herself to read the fateful paragraph; but, keeping her finger still pressed convulsively on the place, hurried home, and locked herself in her own room. On unfolding the newspaper; the paragraph, when at length read, ran as follows:

„Reward of five hundred pounds. Whereas the gang of housebreakers, names unknown, who committed in Warwickshire, two years ago, the offences specified below, and who were supposed to have gone to America, are now ascertained to be lurking in the north of Scotland. It is believed that they can be identified with the Banff robbers of August last. Their leader is now a man of about thirty years of age, tall, handsome, and genteel looking. One of his hands is always concealed either by a glove or a black silk handkerchief, and there is the scar of an old wound on one of his thumbs. A reward of five hundred pounds is hereby offered," etc. etc.

Marion was seen soon after, by one of the servants, examining minutely the robber's thumb, which still remained in its place upon the mantelpiece; and the circumstance excited observation from its being known that, so far from touching it, she had hitherto covered her eyes with her hands whenever it was produced. When the servant re-entered the room she found her mistress lying senseless on the carpet. The family, it may be supposed, was greatly alarmed; but when Marion awoke from her fit, as it was termed, she seemed to have suffered so little injury, that the preparations were not interrupted for entertaining that evening a large party.

Chapter IV. — The Discovery.

The hour of feasting came, the house was lighted up, and all was brilliance, merriment, and confusion. Some of the guests, who had come from a distance, were to remain all night; and the tramp of horses and rumbling of carriage-wheels, as they arrived, with calling voices, and lights wandering from room to room, and flitting among the out-offices, gave a character of animation to the scene such as had rarely been witnessed at Banff. Marion never looked so beautiful as on that night; but the flush on her cheek was so high, and the brilliance of her eye so dancing, that the guests were struck with a kind of wonder distinct from admiration. She was gay to extravagance; and laughed and talked without ceasing; but once was observed to pause in the midst, and press her hand upon her brow with a wild and terrified look.

„Did I no tell ye, Marion," said Miss Thom, looking fondly and delightedly on her lovely face — „did I no tell ye, that ye would be weel the morn!"

„Yes — yes," replied Marion, hurriedly — „I remember — but let us laugh now. Where is the use of looking as if a rope — hush! hush! — let us be merry!" and she laughed so wildly that some of the company turned round to look at her in surprise.

„Mirren, dear," said Miss Thom, with an alarmed look, as she put her arm round her neck — „Come here, I want to speak to ye. Ye are no weel yet! Try and compose yourself; go to your bed; and greet, Mirren, greet if ye like — but dinna laugh again!" Marion, however, sprung from her side to join the dancers, who had now formed their sets. But Miss Thom, after whispering with some of the older guests, ordered the music to cease; and Major Lovat, putting his arm round his daughter's waist, led her out of the room. Marion yielded without a word. Her head drooped upon her bosom; the flush faded from her cheek; the light died in her eye; and, when she turned round at the door, in obedience to a whisper from her father, to curtsey a general good night, she was as wan, and still, and ghastly as a corpse. The guests departed unceremoniously after; the lights were extinguished; and the house of feasting sunk into silence and darkness.

Major Lovat did not undress that night. He was uneasy about his daughter, and stole on tiptoe to her room door, every now and then, to listen. In one of these excursions he was surprised, in the midst of the profound stillness of the hour, to hear a distant footfall. The sound came apparently from a closet where the plate was kept. It was repeated; the door of the closet he saw, by a passing glimpse of the moon, was open; and the old soldier forgetting everything but victory and vengeance, shouted, „Thieves! Thieves!" in a voice of thunder, and sprung forward like a tiger.

The cry of her father fell upon Marion's half-conscious ear; and, springing from her bed, she rushed out into the passage, and flew like lightning after him. At the moment a figure darted from the plate-closet; and, eluding Major Lovat, vaulted through an open window and disappeared.

„The stranger!" screamed Marion — „the stranger! the stranger!" and fell all her length upon the floor.

Mr. Thom's plans were not absolutely ripe; and even after seeing the advertisement in the newspaper, he contented himself with setting a watch upon the motions of his future prisoner. After this daring attempt, however, which explained the cause of the infatuated man's lingering so long in scenes where he must have known that every step was dangerous to his life, it was impossible to hesitate. At any rate, although Major Lovat had seen the robber too suddenly and too indistinctly to be able to recognize him, his daughter, who had at once identified him with the stranger, would in all probability, by the time his trial came on, be well enough to give her testimony. This, in fact, was the grand link that was wanting in the evidence, and, together with the vast body of presumptive proof, could not fail to lead to conviction. The stranger, who appeared to have considered himself secure from detection by the darkness of the preceding night, was accordingly arrested, as he sat at breakfast in the inn, quietly reading the newspaper, which had just arrived by the mail.

It is impossible to describe the excitement which prevailed in the town of Banff as soon as this decisive step became public. Business was totally suspended; hurrying groups were seen flocking from all quarters through the streets; and by the hour of noon, the house of Major Lovat, where the prisoner was to be examined previous to committal, was surrounded by a dense crowd of men, women, and children. The local magistrates, and the principal gentry of Banff, ladies as well as gentlemen, were assembled in the dining-hall; when a storm of mingled hooting, yells, groans, and cheers from the populace without, proclaimed the arrival of the hero of the scene, handcuffed and strongly escorted.

From the instant he had been arrested, a very curious change had taken place in the demeanour of this remarkable person. Instead of the grave, melancholy, anxious expression his features had worn before, they were now lighted up by a feeling that might have been taken, by an observer ignorant of the circumstances, for joy. His step was elastic, his eye bright and steady, and his bearing bold and free.

„He will dee hard, yon chap!" remarked some of the crowd, as he passed through them.

„Ay, ay, he's game till the back bone!" replied another.

„He's a brave fellow and a bonnie," said the women, — „and shame fa' the loon who would crow over a fallen foe! through, cummers, for the bonnie and braw! Hurra!" and as he entered the house, the noises of disapprobation were drowned in cheers.

The prisoner's handcuffs were taken off; he was placed standing at the bottom of the table, in front of the magistrates; and the business commenced. We do not, however, pretend to give it in detail, or in proper order; being only anxious to state what was elicited in the course of the examination, which embraced a variety of charges.

The advertisement was read, and the description found to tally with the appearance of the prisoner.

Miss Lovel's maid stated that she had found a copy of the advertisement (now produced), which appeared to have been cut out of a newspaper in her mistress's room; and that she had gathered from what Miss Lovel, who was now ill of a fever, said at the time, that the stranger had been deeply agitated when he saw it. Here the prisoner appeared to lose his self-possession for a moment, and grew exceedingly pale.

The landlord of the inn declared that the prisoner had paid his bill yesterday up to the present moment, informing him that it was exceedingly probable he should leave Banff early in the morning. He had been out the whole night, and did not return till day-break.

The persons employed by Mr. Thom to watch the stranger's motions, stated, that they had seen him prowling about Major Lovel's house the greater part of the night. They lost sight of him, however, the time of the attempt at robbery, having followed to some distance another person, whom they at last discovered was not their man.

Mr. Thom's female witness said the prisoner resembled in a remarkable manner the robber she had seen in her master's house; but that, owing to the state of alarm she was in at the time, she had not observed him with sufficient distinctness to be able altogether to swear to his identity.

Major Lovel stated, that he does not see very well without the aid of an eye-glass; but that his impression, of figure, height, and general appearance, was, that the prisoner and the man who had attempted to rob his house the night before were the same individual. His daughter, who laboured under no weakness of eye-sight, had identified him at once — (Here the prisoner started, uttered some angry exclamation, and grew alternately red and pale). She was at present too unwell to bear the excitation of questioning on such a subject, but he hoped she would be able to give her evidence on oath at the trial to which he had now no doubt they would send the prisoner.

Major Lovel then described the conflict he had had some time ago with a robber; declared his conviction that that individual was the same whom he had seen last night, and whom he now saw before them; and finally produced the dead thumb.

(To be continued in our next.)

The Last Man.

All worldly shapes shall melt in gloom,
  The sun himself must die,
Before this mortal shall assume
  Its Immortality!
I saw a vision in my sleep,
That gave my spirit strength to sweep
  Adown the gulph of Time!
I saw the last of human mould,
That shall Creation's death behold,
  As Adam saw her prime!

The sun's eye had a sickly glare,
  The Earth with age was wan,
The skeletons of nations were
  Around that lonely man!
Some had expired in fight, — the brands
Still rusted in their bony hands;
  In plague and famine some!
Earth's cities had no sound nor tread;
And ships were drifting with the dead
  To shores where all was dumb!

Yet, prophet-like, that lone one stood,
  With dauntless words and high,
That shook the sere leaves from the wood
  As if a storm pass'd by,
Saying, we are twins in death, proud sun
Thy face is cold, thy race is run,
  'Tis Mercy bids thee go.
For thou ten thousand thousand years
Hast seen the tide of human tears;
  That shall no longer flow.

What though beneath thee man put forth
  His pomp, his pride, his skill;
And arts that made fire flood and earth,
  The vassals of his will; —
Yet mourn I not thy parted sway,
Thou dim discrowned king of day:
  For all those trophied arts
And triumphs that beneath thee sprang,
Heal'd not a passion or a pang
  Entail'd on human hearts.

Go, let oblivion's curtain fall
  Upon the stage of men,
Nor with thy rising beams recall
  Life's tragedy again
Its piteous pageants bring not back,
Nor waken flesh, upon the rack
  Of pain anew to writhe;
Stretch'd in disease's shapes abhorr'd,
Or mown in battle by the sword,
  Like grass beneath the scythe.

Ev'n I am weary in yon skies
  To watch thy fading fire;
Test of all sumless agonies,
  Behold not me expire.
My lips that speak thy dirge of death —
Their rounded gasp and gurgling breath
  To see thou shalt not boast.
The eclipse of Nature spreads my pall, —
The majesty of Darkness shall Receive my parting ghost!

This spirit shall return to Him
  That gave its heavenly spark;
Yet think not, sun, it shall be dim
  When thou thyself art dark!
No! it shall live again, and shine
In bliss unknown to beams of thine,
  By Him recall'd to breath,
Who captive led captivity,
Who robb'd the grave of Victory, —
  And took the sting from Death!

Go, sun, while Mercy holds me up
  On nature's awful waste
To drink this last and bitter cup
  Of grief that man shall taste —
Go, tell the night that hides thy face,
Thou saw'st the last of Adam's race,
  On Earth's sepulchral clod,
The dark'ning universe defy
To quench his Immortality,
  Or shake his trust in God.

Thomas Campbell.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 18.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The mysterious Stranger; or The Bravo of Banff.

BY LEITCH RITCHIE.

(Concluded from our last.)

A scene took place at this moment among the audience, who seemed to feel the most intense curiosity to see the prisoner. He appeared to be puzzled with amazement at the sight of the thumb, which, the reader is aware, the robber had cast, as he imagined, in the pool.

„Does the devil no ken his ain thumb?“ remarked some one in the crowd, and a slight titter ran through the room; but this indecency was instantly repressed by the magistrate. The black silk handkerchief was then unwrapped from the prisoner's hand; and, as every one present expected, it was found to be minus the thumb!

At this close of the accusation there was a silence for some minutes in the hall, which partook of the character of awe. Even Mr. Thom, now that his favorite object appeared to be accomplished, was struck with a kind of remorse; and his daughter, and many of the ladies — especially those who had been most violent against the stranger — were so overcome by their feelings that they sobbed aloud.

In the midst of the stillness of the moment, the audience were electrified by the sound of singing in the next room; and Major Lovat got up in agitation from his seat as he recognised his daughter's voice. The strain rose shriller and shriller —

„Yet sang she Brignal banks are fair,
And Greta woods are gay;
I wish I was with Edmund there,
To reign his queen of May—“ and Marian Lovat, with dishevelled hair, and distracted eye, rushed, like another Ophelia, into the hall.

„Have you slain him?“ she shrieked, as the sight of the crowd and the array of justice touched the jarring chords of memory — „Monsters, have you murdered him? He is innocent — he is innocent! —“ and at the moment getting a glimpse of the stranger, she sprung forward with a wild scream, and threw herself into his arms and hid her face in his bosom.

„Look up!“ cried he, „my love — my life — my Marian! With an angel's lips you speak the words of an angel. I am innocent! I am innocent! — and the powers of hell shall not prevail against me!“

While this extraordinary scene was going on, Major Lovat stood rooted to the spot by shame, rage, and wonder.

„Remove the woman!“ he at last shouted in a voice of thunder; and Marian, whose senses appeared to have been restored by the shock she had sustained, was received into the arms of

II. Jahrgang.

Miss Thom, and her other companions, who crowded round her to screen her from the gaze of the company, although they did not, or could not, remove her from the room.

„Has the prisoner any witnesses — or anything to say?" demanded Major Lovel, sternly. The stranger was about to speak, when a man suddenly stepped out before him. It was Franke — great-coated, booted, and gloved as he had been when he last appeared before his master.

„Being on my way to Aberdeen," said he, „to take my passage for America, I could not pass by without paying my duty to your honour. With regard to the present case, having been a soldier, like yourself, and familiar with cuts and wounds, I can speak to a point which I think has escaped you, owing to the weakness of your eyesight. The thumb which the prisoner wants is a left-hand thumb; while the thumb which your honour took so neatly from the rascal who could not rob you, but who robbed me of a good place, is a right-hand thumb!" This announcement excited much confusion; which ended, when a surgeon was called forward and confirmed the fact, in a general cheer. So complete a revolution had taken place in Mr. Thom's feelings, that he jumped forward, and shook Franke heartily by the hand; but the latter, who did not seem much gratified by the familiarity, took the earliest opportunity of getting out of the crowd, and was seen no more.

„Gentlemen," said the prisoner, „in defending myself from this extraordinary charge, I shall not detain you many minutes; but there is one thing which I do not clearly understand. Will you do me the favour of allowing me to look at the newspaper advertisement said to have been found in Miss Lovel's room?" It was handed to him; and, after glancing it over, he turned the back of the fragment. „It is needless," continued he, „to explain how this mistake occurred, but my agitation was caused by this, not the other side of the paper; and, although it is here somewhat damaged by scissors, I can repeat the paragraph from memory. „Sir William B—— has not yet recovered speech, and is not expected to live twelve hours; the situation, therefore, of Mr. ——, the heir of Lord H——, is a critical one. The duel was fought under peculiar circumstances, and on the spur of the moment; and so great is the want of witnesses throughout the whole transaction, that, in addition to his remorse for taking away the life of a companion in so trivial a quarrel, and the loss of his thumb, which was amputated in consequence of his wound, large odds are offered at Brookes's that Mr. ——, one of the most promising members of the aristocracy, will swing on the scaffold!" When he had concluded, a shout rose from the audience that might have awakened the dead.

„Do you hear, Marion?" said Miss Thom, her voice broken by sobbing — „Do you understand, my poor lassie?" Marion kissed her friend's cheek, and pressed her in her arms.

„Your sympathy with me, ladies and gentlemen," resumed the stranger, „is very gratifying," — and his voice faltered — „very delightful to my feelings; and it encourages me to think that you will not be displeased to hear the paragraph, which this morning gave a new turn to my spirits: „Sir William B——, strange to say, is in a fair way of recovery. The case took an almost miraculous turn at the moment when it was expected to terminate in death. He has recovered his speech, and completely absolves his antagonist from any thought of dishonour. Mr. —— in the meantime is supposed to have taken refuge in Banffshire; but all the country papers in the kingdom are requested to copy this paragraph, that wherever he is, he may at once return to his anxious friends, and to the society which he adorns!" And now, gentlemen, all I have to add is, that as Lord Fife, whom I have the honour of knowing personally, is expected to-day at Duff House — perhaps is already arrived — I shall very speedily be able to offer you a satisfactory confirmation of my story."

„There's nae need — there's nae need!" cried Mr. Thom —" we're a' fules, every ane of us. Mr. — Sir — my lord! — and noo ye maun just dinner wi' me and my brither fules! and forget it a'."

„Forgive my warmth," said Major Lovat, extending his hand — „but, by my honour, there is another subject on which you and I must have a prorogation by and by. In with ye, lasses — in with ye. Friends and neighbours, adieu. Ay, ay — straight away — up with it — hurra! hurra! hurra!"

That evening, after dinner, when Mr. Thom began to look wise and talk oracularly, he said apart to Major Lovat —

„What do you think I found when I shook the fellow Franks by the hand? That he has one mair thoum than your daughter's joe! And who do ye think has eloped frae the town today? The jaud who did a' but swear to the identity of the stranger and the thief! And what do you think she confessed afterhand? That Franks himsel' was the Brace o' Beef!"

„And what do you think," said the Major, „was put into my hand two minutes ago? Have you speculation enough in your eyes to read? No: then let me put on my specs and try."

„Major,

„Being now fairly out of your clutches, and being willing to save the present or any future prisoner, when it can do myself no harm, I avow myself to be the sole author of the Sandshire robberies. The opportunities were obtained by means of gallivanting; but the ladies themselves were ignorant, till too late, of the use I made of their good nature. My gratitude would have secured you from any attempt, had I not been provoked to it by the taunts of one of my dearies, who reproached me with attacking other people's property when I dared not lay a finger on that of the brave and fiery Major Lovat. Finding myself here accidentally the other night, I made a second attempt, partly out of pique for the loss of my thumb: but I do assure you — and having assured you I care not a straw whether you believe it or not — that if I had succeeded in carrying off the spoil, I should have sent it back to you next day, with the compliments of your loving friend and servant,

FREDERICK FRASER."

All we have to add is, that the prorogation with which the stranger was threatened by Major Lovat, was duly gone into, and ended in the young couple being sent for trial, handcuffed together, and transported.

The Bell of St. Regis.

When Canada was in possession of the French, a Catholic priest named Father Nicholas, having assembled a considerable number of the Indians whom he had converted, settled them in the village which is now called St. Regis, on the banks of the St. Lawrence. The situation is one of the most beautiful on that noble river, and the village at this day the most picturesque in the country. The houses, high roofed and of a French appearance, are clustered round the semicircle of a little bay, and on a projecting headland stands the church, with its steeple glittering with a vivacity inconceivable by those who have not seen the brilliancy of the tin roofs of Canada contrasted in the sunshine with the dark woods.

This little church is celebrated for the legend of its bell.

When it was erected, and the steeple completed, father Nicholas took occasion, in one of his sermons, to inform his simple flock that a bell was as necessary to a steeple as a priest is to a church, and exhorted them, therefore, to collect as many furs as would enable him to procure one from France. The Indians were not slack in the performance of this pious duty. Two bales were speedily collected and shipped for Havre de Grace, and in due time the worthy ecclesiastic was informed that the bell was purchased and put on board the Grand Monarque, bound for Quebec.

It happened that this took place during one of those wars which the French and English are naturally in the habit of waging against one another, and the Grand Monarque, in consequence, never reached her destination. She was taken by a New-England privateer and carried into Salem, where the ship and cargo were condemned as prize, and sold for the captors. The bell was bought for the town of Deerfield on the Connecticut river, where a church had been recently built, to which that great preacher, the Rev. John Williams, was appointed. With much labour, it was carried to the village, and duly elevated in the belfry.

When Father Nicholas heard of this misfortune, he called his flock together and told them of the purgatorial condition of the bell in the hands of the heretics, and what a laudable enterprise it would be to redeem it.

This preaching was, within its sphere, as inspiring as that of the hermit Peter. The Indians lamented to one another the deplorable unbaptized state of the bell. Of the bell itself they had no very clear idea; but they knew that Father Nicholas said mass and preached in the church, and they understood the bell was to perform some analogous service in the steeple. Their wonted activity in the chase was at an end; they sat in groups on the margin of the river, commenting on the calamity which had befallen the bell; and some of them roamed alone, ruminating on the means of recovering it. The squaws, who had been informed that its voice would be heard farther than the roaring of the rapids, and that it was more musical than the call of the whip-poor-will in the evening, moved about in silence and dejection. All were melancholy, and finely touched with a holy enthusiasm; many fasted, and some voluntarily subjected themselves to severe penances, to procure relief for the captive, or mitigation of its sufferings.

At last the day of deliverance drew near.

The Marquis de Vaudreuil, the governor of Canada, resolved to send an expedition against the British colonies of Massachusetts and New Hampshire: the command was given to Major Hertel de Rouville; and one of the priests belonging to the Jesuit's College at Quebec informed Father Nicholas, by a pious voyageur, of the proposed incursion. The Indians were immediately assembled in the church; the voyageur was elevated in the midst of the congregation, and Father Nicholas, in a solemn speech, pointed him out to their veneration as a messenger of glad tidings. He then told them of the warlike preparations at Quebec, and urged them to join the expedition. At the conclusion, the whole audience rose, giving the war-whoop: then simultaneously retiring to their houses, they began to paint themselves with their most terrible colours for battle, and, as if animated by one will at their council fire, they resolved to join the expedition.

It was in the depth of winter when they set out to unite themselves with De Rouville's party at the fort of Chambly. Father Nicholas, with a tall staff and a cross on the top of it, headed them; and, as they marched off, their wives and children, in imitation of the hymns which animated the departures of the first crusaders under the command of Godfrey de Boulogne, chanted a sacred song which the holy father had especially taught them for the occasion.

They arrived at Chambly, after a journey of incredible fatigue, as the French soldiers were mounting their sleighs to proceed to Lake Champlain. The Indians followed in the track of the sleighs, with the perseverance peculiar to their character. Father Nicholas, to be the more able to do his duty when it might be required, rode on a sleigh with De Rouville.

In this order and array, the Indians, far behind, followed in silence, until the whole party had rendezvoused on the borders of Lake Champlain, which, being frozen, and the snow but thinly upon it, was chosen for their route. Warmed in their imaginations with the unhappy captivity of the bell, the Indians plodded solemnly their weary way; no symptom of regret, of fatigue, or of apprehension, relaxed their steady countenances; they saw with equal indifference the black and white interminable forest on the shore, on the one hand, and the dread and dreary desert of the snowy ice of the lake, on the other.

The French soldiers began to suffer extremely from the toil of wading through the snow, and beheld with admiration and envy the facility with which the Indians, in their snow shoes, moved over the surface. No contrast could be greater than the patience of Father Nicholas's proselytes and the irritability of the Frenchmen.

When they reached the spot on which the lovely and pretty town of Burlington now stands, a general halt was ordered, that the necessary arrangements might be made to penetrate the forest towards the settled parts of Massachusetts. In starting from this point, Father Nicholas was left to bring up his division, and De Rouville led his own with a compass in his hand, taking the direction of Deerfield. Nothing that had been yet suffered was equal to the hardships endured in that march. Day after day the Frenchmen went forward with indefatigable bravery, — a heroic contrast to the panics of their countrymen in the Russian snow-storms of latter times. But they were loquacious; and the roughness of their course and the entangling molestation which they encountered from the underwood, provoked their maledictions and excited their gesticulations. The conduct of the Indians was far different; animated with holy zeal, their constitutional taciturnity had something dignified — even sublime, in its sternness. No murmur escaped them; their knowledge of travelling the woods instructed them to avoid many of the annoyances which called forth the pestes and sacres of their not less brave but more vociferous companions.

Long before the party had reached their destination, Father Nicholas was sick of his crusade; the labour of treading the forest had lacerated his feet, and the recoiling boughs had, from time to time, by his own inadvertency in following too closely behind his companions, sorely bruised, even to excoriation, his cheeks. Still he felt that he was engaged in a sanctified adventure; he recalled to mind the martyrdoms of the saints and the persecutions of the fathers, and the glory that would redound to himself in all after ages, from the redemption of the bell.

On the evening of the 29th of February, 1704, the expedition arrived within two miles of Deerfield, without having been discovered. De Rouville ordered his men to halt, rest, and refresh themselves until midnight, at which hour he gave orders that the village should be attacked.

The surface of the snow was frozen, and crackled beneath the tread. With great sagacity, to deceive the English garrison, De Rouville directed, that in advancing to the assault, his men should frequently pause, and then rush for a short time rapidly forward. By this ingenious precaution, the sentinels in the town were led to imagine that the sound came from the irregular rustle of the wind through the laden branches of the snowy forest; but an alarm was at last given, and a terrible conflict took place in the streets. The French fought with their accustomed spirit, and the Indians with their characteristic fortitude. The garrison was dispersed, the town was taken, and the buildings set on fire.

At daybreak all the Indians, although greatly exhausted by the fatigue of the night, united in a body, and requested the holy father to conduct them to the bell, that they might perform their homage and testify their veneration for it. Father Nicholas was not a little disconcerted at this solemn request, and De Rouville, with many of the Frenchmen, who were witnesses, laughed at it most unrighteously. But the father was not entirely discomfited. As the Indians had never heard a bell before, he obtained one of the soldiers from De Rouville, and despatched him to ring it. The sound, in the silence of the frosty dawn and the still woods, rose loud and deep; it was, to the simple ears of the Indians, as the voice of an oracle; they trembled, and were filled with wonder and awe.

The bell was then taken from the belfry, and fastened to a beam with a cross-bar at each end, to enable it to be carried by four men. In this way the Indians proceeded with it homewards, exulting in the deliverance of the „miraculous organ." But it was soon found too heavy for the uneven track they had to retrace, and, in consequence, when they reached their starting point, on the shore of Lake Champlain, they buried it, with many benedictions from Father Nicholas, until they could come with proper means to carry it away.

As soon as the ice was broken up, Father Nicholas assembled them again in the church, and having procured a yoke of oxen, they proceeded to bring in the bell. In the meantime all the squaws and papooses had been informed of its marvellous powers and capacities, and the arrival of it was looked to as one of the greatest events „in the womb of time.“ Nor did it prove far short of their anticipations. One evening, while they were talking and communing together, a mighty sound was heard approaching in the woods; it rose louder and louder; they listened, they wondered, and began to shout and cry, „It is the bell!“

It was so. Presently the oxen, surrounded by the Indians, were seen advancing from the woods; the beam was laid across their shoulders, and, as the bell swung between them, it sounded wide and far. On the top of the beam a rude seat was erected, on which sat Father Nicholas, the most triumphant of mortal men, adorned with a wreath round his temples; the oxen, too, were ornamented with garlands of flowers. In this triumphal array, in the calm of a beautiful evening, when the leaves were still and green, and while the roar of Le longue Sault rapid, softened by distance, rose like the hum of a pagan multitude rejoicing in the restoration of an idol, they approached the village.

The bell, in due season, was elevated to its place in the steeple, and, at the wonted hours of matins and vespers, it still cheers with its clear and swelling voice the solemn woods and the majestic St. Lawrence. GALT.

The Spanish Brigand.

A short time after the French war, and the restoration of Ferdinand VII., whose conduct made many of the loose guerilla parties continue out in the country as brigands, an English merchant arrived one evening at a small mean town, at the foot of the Sierra Morena. In the posada of the place where he took up his lodgings for the night, he met a Spaniard of a commanding figure and of a sharp, intelligent, but amiable countenance. Much struck with his appearance, the Englishman entered into conversation with him, and was still more delighted by his frank, spirited style of address and talking. Before supper was ready, the two had established that sort of traveller-intimacy which is not perhaps the less delightful because it must finish in a few hours, and the parties, in all probability never meet again; and when the meal was served, they sat down to it together, each, apparently, anxious to know more of the other. They conversed together during the progress of the supper, and long after it was over, until the sinking and flickering lamps on the table warned the Englishman it must be time to retire to rest. As he rose to do so, the Spaniard, with all his former frankness and gentlemanly manner, asked him which way his road lay on the morrow. The English merchant replied, across the Sierra Morena, and indicated the road he meant to take. The Spaniard, shaking his head, said he was sorry for this, as he had reasons to suspect that that very road at that very moment was beset by robbers, from whose numbers and activity there was no escape. The Englishman confessed that this was unpleasant news, particularly as the affairs that called him towards Madrid were urgent. „But cannot you stay where you are a day or two?“ replied the Spaniard; „by that time they may have shifted their ground, and you may pass the mountains without meeting them.“ The Englishman repeated that his business was urgent, said he was no coward, that he had hitherto travelled in Spain without any misadventure, and hoped still to do so. „But my good Senor,“ replied the Spaniard, „you will not cross the mountains to-morrow without being robbed, take my word for that!“ „Well, if it must be so, let them rob me,“ said the English merchant; „I have little money to lose, and they will hardly take the life of an unarmed and unresisting man!“ „They have never been accustomed so to act — let it be said to the honour of the band, they are not such cowardly assassins,“ replied the Spaniard, who was then silent, and seemed to be musing to himself. The Englishman was beginning to call up one of the servants of the posada, to show him to his resting-place, when his companion, raising his hand, said, „Not yet, Senor, not yet! Bueno!“ and he continued in an undertone, „It was my fortune, some time since to have to cross the Sierra Morena alone, like you; it was occupied then, as now, by the Salteadores; but I met a man, also alone, as you have met me, who said he had rendered the captain of the band some service, and that he could give me a pass which would cause my person and my property to be respected by the robbers, and enable me to cross the mountains with perfect safety.“ „A much better thing this than a king's passport,“ said the astonished Englishman. „Pray what was it? and did it succeed?“ „It was only a button,“ replied the Spaniard; „it did all that had been promised, and perhaps it has not yet lost its charm: I will give it you, here it is!“ After searching in his pocket, the Spaniard produced a curiously filigreed silver button, and placed it in the hands of the Englishman, begging him to be careful of it, and to present it to any robbers that might attack him in the Sierra. „But were you really attacked on your journey?“ inquired the merchant. „The button was respected by all the robbers I met, and I believe I saw them all,“ said the Spaniard; „but ask no more questions, and take care of the button! to-morrow you will see whether it has lost its charm.“ With many thanks, the Englishman took his leave, and went to bed. On the following morning, when he continued his journey, the silver button ran in his head for some time. But it was not until noon, as he was toiling up one of the most rugged of the mountain paths, that he had the opportunity of trying its virtue. There his guide, who rode before him, was suddenly knocked off his mule by a blow from the butt-end of a musket, and the next instant three other guns were levelled at the Englishman's breast, by men who stepped from behind a rock. The attack was so sudden, that his ideas and recollection were disturbed, and he put his hand into his pocket, brought out his purse, and delivered it to the robbers, who were calling him all sorts of opprobrious names, before he thought of his silver button. But when the recollection came to his mind and he produced it, much doubting of its efficacy, the oaths of the Salteadores were stopped at once, as though a sacred relic had been held before their eyes; they returned him his purse, earnestly entreating his pardon for all that had happened, and informed him that it was their bounden duty to see the bearer of that button safe across the mountains. Accordingly, on went the merchant with the brigands for his guard, he blessing the silver button, and they showing him every possible attention and respect. On their way they met with other robbers, which proved how formidable was the band, and how impossible it would have been to escape them without the charmed button. At length they came to a low, solitary house in a wild dell, far away from the beaten path across the Sierra, which they had abandoned for rocks that seemed never to have been trodden. Here the merchant was told he might stop and refresh himself. Nothing loath, he dismounted, and turned to the door, when his companion at the posada of the preceding evening — the donor of the magical button, met him on the threshold, with the words and gestures of an hospitable welcome. His dress was changed — he now wore a splendid kind of uniform, the jacket of which was of velvet, embroidered with gold; but the Englishman recognised his commanding figure and impressive countenance in an instant, and gave him his hand as a friend. „I got here before you,“ said the captain of the banditti, for such in fact was the donor of the button, „and have prepared a good dinner for you, being very certain, that what I gave you last night would bring you in safety under my roof.“ The Englishman expressed his gratitude, and they sat down to dine. The bandit's dishes were savoury and good, and his wine was better. As the wine warmed the Englishman, he again expressed his gratitude, and then ventured to say how astonished he was that a person of his host's manners, and one capable of such kind and generous feelings and actions, could lead such a kind of life. The robber drew his hand across his dark brow and fiery eyes, and said, „There are times when thieves and traitors thrive in the royal court and the offices of government, and honest patriots are driven to the highway. As a guerilla, I shed my blood for my country; for my king, who, when he returned, would have left me to starve or to beg! But no matter — this is no business of yours. I met you, liked your manners, and have saved you! — that is enough! say no more!" The Englishman of course desisted, and soon after rose to take his leave. The captain, who recovered his good humour, told him he should have an escort yet a little farther, and he put in the route he wished to follow. The merchant would then have returned the silver button, but the robber insisted on his keeping it. „You, or some friend of yours, may have to pass this way again," said he, „and whoever has the button to produce, will be respected as you have been respected! Go with God! and say nothing as to what has happened between you and me and mine! Adios!" The merchant's farewell was an earnest and cordial one. Guided by the brigands, he soon reached the beaten road on the opposite side of the mountains, and would there have given them some money for the trouble he had caused them. They said they had their captain's strict commands against this — they would not accept a real, but left him, wishing him a happy journey. Some time — I believe some years after this adventure — the English merchant heard with deep regret that the Spanish robber-chief, whom he described as being one of the handsomest men he ever beheld, had been betrayed into the hands of government, and put to a cruel and ignominious death.

[illegible].

The wounded Eagle,

by Mrs. Hemans.

Eagle! this is not thy sphere!
Warrior-bird, what seek'st thou here?
Wherefore by the fountain's brink
Doth thy royal pinion sink?
Wherefore on the violet's bed
Lay'st thou thus thy drooping head?
Thou that holdst the blast in scorn,
Thou, that wearest the wings of morn!

Eagle! wilt thou not arise?
Look upon thine own bright skies!
Lift thy glance — the fiery sun
There his pride of place hath won,
And the mountain lark is there,
And sweet sound hath fill'd the air.
Hast thou left that realm on high? —
Oh it can be but to die!

Eagle, eagle! thou hast bow'd
From thine empire o'er the cloud!
Thou that hadst ethereal birth:
Thou hast stoop'd too near the earth,
And the hunter's shaft hath found thee,
And the toils of death have bound thee!
Wherefore didst thou leave thy place,
Creature of a kingly race?

Wert thou weary of thy throne?
Was the sky's dominion lone?
Chill and lone it well might be,
Yet that mighty wing was free!
Now the chain is o'er it cast,
From thy heart the blood flows fast.
Wo for gifted souls and high!
Is not such their destiny?

On Love, by Byron

Love is too great a happiness
For wretched mortals to possess;
For could it hold inviolate
Against those cruelties of Fate
Which all felicities below
By rigid laws are subject to,
It would become a bliss too high
For perishing mortality,
Translate to earth the joys above;
For nothing goes to heav'n but love.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 19.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Mackenzie.

Heinrich Mackenzie, ſeiner Zeit einer der beliebteſten engliſchen Romanſchriftſteller, ward 1745 in Edinburg geboren, ſtudirte auf der Univerſität ſeiner Vaterſtadt und ging dann nach London, wo er während einer Reihe von Jahren verweilte. Nach Edinburg zurückgekehrt, ward er Anwalt der Krone und ſpäter Steuercontrolleur von Schottland. Er ſtarb vor einigen Jahren in hohem Alter. Einfach wie ſein Leben, waren auch ſeine ſchriftſtelleriſchen Leiſtungen, voll Geſchmack und Nettigkeit, würdig und gehalten, aber keineswegs reich an Erfindung und Wechſel der Farben. Edlere Sentimentalität iſt die Aufgabe, die der Verfaſſer ſich geſtellt hat, und man muß ihm das Lob geben, daß er dieſelbe mit Zartheit und Wärme zu löſen verſtand. — Das Wohlwollen, das ihn durch das ganze Leben begleitete, ſpricht ſich auch in ſeinen Schriften deutlich aus und wirkt freundlich und feſſelnd auf den Leſer. — Seine Charaktere ſind gut durchgeführt, er verſteht es, die Situationen anziehend darzuſtellen und paſſend mit einander zu verbinden, einzelne Schilderungen in ſeinen Werken erſcheinen als wahre Meiſterwerke und werden als Muſter eines klaren, durchſichtigen, doch keineswegs kalten Styls ſtets ihre Geltung behalten, wenn ſie auch den überſättigten Leſer unſerer Tage nicht ſo anſprechen, wie ſie es früher thaten, wo man noch Geſchmack an Einfachheit und künſtleriſcher Ruhe fand. — Sein Man of feeling (der Gefühlvolle) iſt eine Art engliſchen Werther's und obgleich milder und gemäßigter als die bewunderte Leiſtung unſeres großen Dichters, in ſeiner Weichherzigkeit doch nicht minder gelungen als dieſe. — Kränklicher äußert ſich Mackenzie's Sentimentalität in ſeinem zweiten Romane, Julia de Roubigné, da er ſich zu ſehr darin gefällt, den Jammer zu häufen und mit trüben Farben zu malen. — Zu ſeiner dritten größeren Arbeit, dem Man of the world (der Weltmann) reichten ſeine beſchränkten, mehr auf feiner Subjectivität als auf poetiſcher Schöpferkraft beruhenden Mittel nicht völlig aus, da es hier gilt, einen bedeutenden Charakter in ſeinen Verhältniſſen zum Leben und der Welt zu zeichnen und die Begebenheiten ſo zu erfinden und um ihn zu gruppiren, daß er wirklich markant hervortritt. Dieſes Buch leidet daher mitunter an Längen, obwohl es hin und wieder ſehr glückliche Parthieen enthält. — Ganz vortrefflich ſind dagegen mehrere kleinere Erzählungen Mackenzie's und unter dieſen zeigt ſich namentlich Louiſa Venoni, die wir hier mittheilen als eine der rührendſten und lieblichſten, welche die engliſche Literatur aufzuweiſen hat. M. verſuchte ſich auch mit Erfolg in Balladen nach Art der älteren engliſchen Minſtrels.

Louisa Venoni.

By Henry Mackenzie.

If we examine impartially the estimate of pleasure which the higher ranks of society are apt to form, we shall probably be surprised to find how little there is in it either of natural feeling or real satisfaction. Many a fashionable voluptuary, who has not totally blunted his taste or his judgement, will own, in the intervals of recollection, how often he has suffered from the insipidity or the pain of his enjoyments; and that if it were not for the fear of being laughed at, it were sometimes worth while, even on the score of pleasure, to be virtuous.

Sir Edward , to whom I had the pleasure of being introduced at Florence, was a character much beyond that which distinguishes the generality of English travellers of fortune. His story was known to some of his countrymen who then resided in Italy, from one of whom, who could now and then talk of something besides pictures and operas, I had a particular recital of it.

He had been first abroad at an early period of life, soon after the death of his father had left him master of a very large estate, which he had the good fortune to inherit, and all the inclination natural to youth to enjoy. Though always sumptuous and sometimes profuse, he was observed, however, never to be ridiculous in his expences, and, though he was now and then talked of as a man of pleasure and dissipation, he always left behind him more instances of beneficence than of irregularity. For that respect and esteem in which his character, amidst all his little errors, was generally held, he was supposed a good deal indebted to the society of a gentleman, who had been his companion at the university, and now attended him rather as a friend than a tutor. This gentleman was, unfortunately, seized at Marseilles with a lingering disorder, for which he was under the necessity of taking a sea voyage, leaving Sir Edward to prosecute his intended tour alone.

Descending into one of the vallies of Piedmont, where, notwithstanding the ruggedness of the road, Sir Edward, with a prejudice natural to his country, preferred the conveyance of an English hunter to that of an Italian mule, his horse, unluckily, made a false step, and fell with his rider to the ground, from which Sir Edward was lifted by his servants with scarcely any signs of life. They conveyed him upon a litter to the nearest house, which happened to be the dwelling of a peasant rather above the common rank, before whose door some of his neighbours were assembled at a scene of rural merriment, when the train of Sir Edward brought up their master in the condition I have described. The compassion natural to his situation was excited in all; but the owner of the mansion, whose name was Venoni, was particularly moved with it. He applied himself immediately to the care of the stranger, and, with the assistance of his daughter, who had left the dance she was engaged in with great marks of agitation, soon restored Sir Edward to sense and life. Venoni possessed some little skill in surgery, and his daughter produced a book of receipts in medicine. Sir Edward, after being blooded, was put to bed, and attended with every possible care by his host and family. A considerable degree of fever was the consequence of his accident; but after some days it abated, and in little more than a week he was able to join in the society of Venoni and his daughter.

He could not help expressing some surprise at the appearance of refinement in the latter, much beyond what her situation seemed likely to confer. Her father accounted for it. She had received her education in the house of a lady, who happened to pass through the valley, and taking shelter in Venoni's cottage (for his house was but a better sort of a cottage), the night of her birth. „When her mother died,“ said he, „the Signora, whose name at her desire, we had given the child, took her home to her own house; there she was taught many things, of which there is no need here; yet she is not so proud of her learning as to wish to leave her father in his old age; and I hope soon to have her settled near me for life."

But Sir Edward had now an opportunity of knowing Louisa better than from the description of her father. Music and painting, in both of which arts she was a tolerable proficient, Sir Edward had studied with success. Louisa felt a sort of pleasure from her drawings, when they were praised by Sir Edward, which they had never given her before; and the family concerts of Venoni were very different from what they had formerly been, when once his guest was so far recovered as to be able to join in them. The flute of Venoni excelled all the other music of the valley; his daughter's lute was much beyond it; Sir Edward's violin was finer than either. But his conversation with Louisa — it was that of a superior order of beings! — science, taste, sentiment! — It was long since Louisa had heard those sounds; amidst the ignorance of the valley it was luxury to hear them; from Sir Edward, who was one of the most engaging figures I ever saw, they were doubly delightful. In his countenance there was always an expression, animated and interesting; his sickness had overcome somewhat of the first, but greatly added to the power of the latter.

Louisa's was not less captivating, and Sir Edward had not seen it so long without emotion. During his illness he thought this emotion but gratitude; and when it first grew warmer he checked it, from the thought of her situation, and of the debt he owed her. But the struggle was too ineffectual to overcome, and of consequence increased his passion. There was but one way in which the pride of Sir Edward allowed of its being gratified. He sometimes thought of this as a base and unworthy one; but he was the fool of words which he had often despised, the slave of manners he had often condemned. He at last compromised matters with himself; he resolved, if he could, to think no more of Louisa; at any rate to think no more of the ties of gratitude or the restraints of virtue.

Louisa, who trusted to both, now communicated to Sir Edward an important secret. It was at the close of a piece of music which they had been playing in the absence of her father. She took up her lute and touched a little wild memory of her mother. „That," said she, „nobody ever heard except my father; I play it sometimes when I am alone, and in low spirits. I don't know how I came to think of it now; yet I have some reason to be sad." Sir Edward pressed to know the cause; after some hesitation she told it all. Her father had fixed on the son of a neighbour, rich in possessions, but rude in manners, for a husband. Against this match she had always protested, as strongly as a sense of duty and the mildness of her nature would allow; but Venoni was obstinately bent on the match, and she was wretched from the thoughts of it. — „To marry, where one cannot love — to marry such a man, Sir Edward!" — It was an opportunity beyond his power of resistance. Sir Edward pressed her hand; said it would be profanation to think of such a marriage; praised her beauty, extolled her virtues, and concluded by swearing that he adored her. She heard him with unsuspecting pleasure, which her blushes could ill conceal. Sir Edward improved the favourable moment; talked of the ardency of his passion, the insignificancy of ceremonies and forms, the inefficacy of legal engagements, the eternal duration of those dictated by love: and, in fine, urged her going off with him, to crown both their days with happiness. Louisa started at the proposal. She would have reproached him, but her heart was not made for it; she could only weep.

They were interrupted by the arrival of her father with his intended son-in-law. He was just such a man as Louisa had represented him, coarse, vulgar, and ignorant. But Venoni, though much above his neighbour in every thing but riches, looked on him as poorer men often do on the wealthy, and discovered none of his imperfections. He took his daughter aside, told her he had brought her future husband, and that he intended they should be married in a week at farthest.

Next morning Louisa was indisposed and kept her chamber. Sir Edward was now perfectly recovered. He was engaged to go out with Venoni; but before his departure he took up his violin, and touched a few plaintive notes on it. They were heard by Louisa.

In the evening she wandered forth to indulge her sorrows alone. She had reached a sequestered spot, where some poplars formed a thicket upon the banks of a little stream that watered the valley. A nightingale was perched upon one of them and had already begun his accustomed song. Louisa sat down upon a withered stump, leaning her cheek upon her hand. After a little while the bird was scared from its perch, and flitted from the thicket. Louisa rose from the ground, and burst into tears. She turned — and beheld Sir Edward. His countenance had much of its former languor; and when he took her hand, he cast on the earth a melancholy look, and seemed unable to speak his feelings. „Are you not well, Sir Edward?“ said Louisa, with a voice faint and broken. — „I am ill, indeed,“ said he, „but my illness is of the mind. Louisa cannot cure me of that. I am wretched; but I deserve to be so. I have broken every law of hospitality, and every obligation of gratitude. I have dared to wish for happiness, and to speak what I wished, though it wounded the heart of my dearest benefactress; — but I will make a severe expiation. This moment I leave you, Louisa! I go to be wretched; but you may be happy, happy in your duty to a father, happy! it may be, in the arms of a husband, whom the possession of such a wife may teach refinement and sensibility. — I go to my native country, to hurry through scenes of irksome business or tasteless amusement; that I may, if possible, procure a sort of half oblivion of that happiness which I have left behind, a listless endurance of that life which I once dreamed might be made delightful with Louisa.“

Tears were the only answer she could give. Sir Edward's servants appeared with a carriage, ready for his departure. He took from his pocket two pictures; one he had drawn of Louisa, he fastened round his neck, and kissing it with rapture, hid it in his bosom. The other he held out in a hesitating manner. „This,“ said he, „if Louisa will accept of it, may sometimes put her in mind of him who once offended, who can never cease to adore her. She may look on it, perhaps, after the original is no more; when this heart shall have forgot to love, and ceased to be wretched.“

Louisa was at last overcome. Her face was first pale as death; then suddenly it was crossed with a crimson blush. „Oh! Sir Edward!“ said she, „What — what would you have me do?“ — He eagerly seized her hand, and led her, reluctant, to the carriage. They entered it, and driving off with furious speed, were soon out of sight of those hills which pastured the flocks of the unfortunate Venoni.

The virtue of Louisa was vanquished; but her sense of virtue was not overcome. Neither the vows of eternal fidelity of her seducer, nor the constant and respectful attention which he paid her during a hurried journey to England, could allay that anguish which she suffered at the recollection of the past, and the thoughts of her present situation. Sir Edward felt strongly the power of her beauty and of her grief. His heart was not made for that part, which it is probable he thought it could have performed: it was still subject to remorse, to compassion, and to love. These emotions, perhaps, he might soon have overcome, had they been met by vulgar violence and reproaches; but the quiet and unupbraiding sorrows of Louisa nourished those feelings of tenderness and attachment. She never mentioned her wrongs in words; sometimes a few starting tears would speak them; and when time had given her a little more composure, her lute discoursed melancholy music.

On their arrival in England, Sir Edward carried Louisa to his seat in the country; there she was treated with all the observance of a wife; and, had she chosen it, might have commanded more than the ordinary splendour of one. But she would not allow the indulgence of Sir Edward to blazon in equipage and show, that state which she wished always to hide, and, if possible, to forget. Her books and her music were her only pleasures, if pleasures they could be called that served but to alleviate misery, and to blunt for a while the pangs of contrition.

These were deeply aggravated by the recollection of her father: a father left in his age to feel his own misfortunes, and his daughter's disgrace. Sir Edward was too generous not to think of providing for Venoni. He meant to make some atonement for the injury he had done him, by that cruel bounty which is reparation only to the base, but to the honest is insult. He had not, however, an opportunity of accomplishing his purpose. He learned that Venoni, soon after his daughter's elopement, removed from his former place of residence, and, as his neighbours reported, had died in one of the villages of Savoy. His daughter felt this with anguish the most poignant, and her affliction for a while refused consolation. Sir Edward's whole tenderness and affection were called forth to mitigate her grief; and after its first transports had subsided, he carried her to London, in hopes that objects new to her, and commonly attractive to all, might contribute to remove it.

With a man possessed of feelings like Sir Edward's, the affliction of Louisa gave a certain respect to his attentions. He hired her lodgings separate from his own, and treated her with all the delicacy of the purest attachment. But his solicitude to comfort and amuse her was not attended with success. She felt all the horrors of that guilt which she now considered as not only the ruin of herself, but the murderer of her father.

In London Sir Edward found his sister, who had married a man of great fortune and high fashion. He had married her because she was a fine woman and admired by fine men; she had married him, because he was the wealthiest of her suitors. They lived as is common to people in such a situation, necessitous, with a princely revenue, and very wretched amidst perpetual gaiety. This scene was so foreign from the idea Sir Edward had formed of the reception his country and friends were to afford him, that he found a constant source of disgust in the society of his equals. In their conversation fantastic, not refined, their ideas were frivolous, and their knowledge shallow; and with all the pride of birth and insolence of station, their principles were mean, and their minds ignoble. In their pretended attachments, he discovered only designs of selfishness; and their pleasures, he experienced, were as fallacious as their friendships. In the society of Louisa he found sensibility and truth; her's was the only heart that seemed interested in his welfare: she saw the return of virtue in Sir Edward, and felt the friendship which he shewed her. Sometimes, when she perceived him sorrowful, her lute would leave its melancholy for more lively airs, and her countenance assume a gaiety it was not formed to wear. But her heart was breaking with that anguish which her generosity endeavoured to conceal from him; her frame, too delicate for the struggle with her feelings, seemed to yield to their force; her rest forsook her, the colour faded in her cheek, the lustre of her eyes grew dim. Sir Edward saw those symptoms of decay with the deepest remorse. Often did he curse those false ideas of pleasure which led him to consider the ruin of an artless girl who loved and trusted him, as an object which it was luxury to attain, and pride to accomplish. Often did he wish to blot out from his life a few guilty months, to be again restored to an opportunity of giving happiness to that family, whose unsuspecting kindness he had repaid with the treachery of a robber and the cruelty of an assassin.

One evening while he sat in a little parlour with Louisa, his mind alternately agitated and softened with this impression, a hand-organ, of a remarkably sweet tone, was heard in the street. Louisa laid aside her lute and listened; the air it played was one of her native country; and a few tears, which she endeavoured to hide, stole from her on hearing them. Sir Edward ordered a servant to fetch the organist into the room; he was brought in accordingly, and seated at the door of the apartment.

He played one or two sprightly tunes, to which Louisa had often danced in her infancy: she gave herself up to the recollection, and her tears flowed without control. Suddenly the musician, changing the strain, introduced a little melancholy air, of a wild and plaintive kind. — Louisa started from her seat and rushed upon the stranger. — He threw off a tattered coat and black patch — it was her father! — she would have sprung to embrace him, he turned aside for a few moments, and would not receive her into his arms. But nature at last overcame his resentment; he burst into tears, and pressed to his bosom his long-lost daughter.

Sir Edward stood fixed in astonishment and confusion. — „I come not to upbraid you,“ said Venoni, „I am a poor, weak old man, unable for upbraidings; I am come but to find my child, to forgive her, and to die! When you saw us first, Sir Edward, we were not thus. You found us virtuous and happy; we danced and we sung, and there was not a sad heart in the valley where we dwelt. Yet we left our dancing, our songs, and our cheerfulness; you were distressed and we pitied you. Since that day the pipe has never been heard in Venoni's fields; grief and sickness have almost brought him to the grave; and his neighbours, who loved and pitied him, have been cheerful no more. Yet methinks, though you robbed us of happiness, you are not happy; — else why that dejected look which, amidst all the grandeur around you, I saw you wear, and those tears which, under all the gaudiness of her apparel, I saw that poor deluded girl shed?“ — — „But she shall shed no more,“ cried Sir Edward, „you shall be happy, and I shall be just. Forgive, my venerable friend, the injuries which I have done thee; forgive me, my Louisa, for rating your excellence at a price so mean. I have seen those high-born females to which my rank might have allied me; I am ashamed of their vices, and sick of their follies: profligate in their hearts amidst affected purity, they are slaves to pleasure without the sincerity of passion, and with the name of honour are insensible to the feelings of virtue. You, my Louisa! — but I will not call up recollections that might render me less worthy of your future esteem. — Continue to love your Edward but a few hours, and you shall add the title to the affections of a wife; let the care and tenderness of a husband bring back its peace to your mind, and its bloom to your cheek. We will live for a while the wonder and envy of the fashionable circle here; we will restore your father to his native home; under that roof I shall once more be happy; happy without alloy, because I shall deserve my happiness. Again shall the pipe and the dance gladden the valley, and innocence and peace beam on the cottage of Venoni.“

Miss Smith „at Home;“ or More Smiths!

By W. H. Wills, Esq.

Napoleon described us as a nation of shopkeepers; a community of „Smiths“ would have been a more appropriate designation; and, as at least a tithe of the king's subjects claim that title, one of the greatest misfortunes it is possible to be born with — except, perhaps, a taste for authorship — is to possess it.

To be a „Smith“ in this „iron age“ of railroads and steam-engines, is to form an integral fraction of one enormous whole — to be included in a general rule of which „Jones,“ „Williams“ and „Thompson“ are the exceptions — to have, in short, a distinction without a difference. The word ought to be struck off the list of nouns proper, for there is nothing substantive in it; it is an indefinite expression that symbolises no one individual, for it means quite a tenth of every body. If a place could be found of sufficient extent, a meeting of „Smiths“ ought to be convened to petition for a change of name by letters patent; and the whole congregation, European and Colonial — white-Smiths and black-Smiths — might be gazetted under the denomination of Legion; for „of a truth they are many.“

„Plurals,“ says Longinus, in the 18th chapter of his treatise on the sublime, „impart magnificence; and copiousness of number gives to the style emphasis and grace.“ What a „magnient" — what a sublime theme for pen of poet or pencil of painter, must be the name of Smith! — too elevated, too over-whelming for our weak powers; so we must commit the palpable bathos of descending to the insignificant consideration of „one Smith."

Mr. Unit Smith was a man by himself. He eat by himself, slept by himself, and would have died by himself, but for an accidental marriage. He had been blessed with a father (a very lucky thing for a Smith) who left him „alone in his glory," with five hundred a year. With this he retired to a lonely house at Hammersmith, where his whole establishment consisted of a buxom cook, whom he engaged without a character, because she described herself as a „lone woman."

A year had not elapsed before — to his consummate chagrin — he began to have neighbours. He was like the heroine in Marmion, who was bricked up in the recess of a convent; for people would persist in building close around him. But what was worse, these neighbours were uncommonly genteel folks, who had „retired" from the city, and having no business of their own, looked after the concerns of those about them. They were not a little scandalized to find that Mr. Unit Smith's habitual love of solitude and laziness had partially left him; for he had not only become a husband, but was on the eve of being a father also. Molly the cook having no great desire to retain her maiden name of „Scruggs," longer than she could help, was likely to add, besides herself, another being to the already overgrown list of „Smiths."

Poor Molly lived just long enough to present her new-wed spouse with a daughter. It is to be feared that the only impression the departure of his wife made upon Mr. Smith, was the necessity of guarding against accidents in future. He therefore engaged a man-servant, whose chief recommendations were deafness and taciturnity.

His new relation did not wean him from his desire for solitude. She was never at home, for from the nurse she passed to the school-mistress, and from school to the „private governess;" who, it was agreed, should finish her education on the continent.

The time at length arrived when Miss Julia Smith could remain no longer from her paternal roof. — The young lady had not sojourned in France and Italy without acquiring a taste for company; and having completely established a will of her own in her father's house, determined, with every regard for consistency, to celebrate her return from abroad by an „AT HOME."

She had no acquaintance but Mrs. Diggory Smith, whose daughter she had met in Paris; and who gave her a list of the names of her visiting acquaintances, to whom the indefatigable Julia issued cards of invitation.

Conceive Mr. Unit Smith's horror, on learning, from his man Jacob Post, the particulars of his daughter's proceedings! The thought that he, whose whole life was devoted to remaining a private — very private gentleman, should have his doors thrown open to the public, was perfectly terrifying! To prevent the catastrophe was impossible; for constitutional inactivity, and uncompromising gout, prevented his taking „active" measures of any kind. He was confined to his easy chair and fastened like a martyr tied to the stake — the flames were igniting around him, and he had no power to arrest their progress, for not all his expostulation could alter one jot of Miss Julia's determination to „flare up!"

By an hyperbole quite pardonable in notes of invitation, the once lonely cottage was elevated to the dignity of a mansion; the trim but narrow entry was no longer a passage, but a hall; the closet, down three stairs at its extremity—hitherto sacred to pickle-pots and soft soap, was made a cloak-room; the parlours, deprived of their folding doors, enlarged to a grand salon à manger; and the drawing-rooms were to be furnished forth with all „appliances and means to boot" (chalked floors, fiddlers, etc.) for a salon de danse!

For some time before the eventful Monday evening divers charwomen were hired at an expense of eighteen-pence a day and their victuals; the greengrocer was called upon to redeem the pledge made upon a green board with gilt letters exhibited in his window, of „Music provided for balls, and evening parties attended;" while these arrangements were completed by the engagement of a lank personage, dressed in scratch wig, long white waistcoat, short black coat, and worsted tights — to „announce the names."

The day arrived; and to Miss Smith's great satisfaction all the preparations were consummated with astonishing exactness. The home-made jellies and blanc-mangers „turned out beautiful;" not a single failure occurred to the custards; Julia's new white satin frock, turned up with blonde lace, fitted to a thread; and the chinaman was gratified with his „glass lent on hire." But what afforded the fair hostess most pleasure was the fact, that few of her „invites" had been negatived; and she confidently expected the entire élite of Hammersmith, the fashionables of Turnham Green, with a sprinkling of the haut ton of Old Brentford! A friend of a friend of Mrs. Diggery Smith, — no less a personage than the celebrated author of fifteen celebrated melodramas, — had consented to be lionized, and the tiger of Doctor Tweedum was promised, to keep „clear away" the supper.

Who can describe Miss Smith's feelings while dusting her father's best china? The appointed hour was at hand. She trembled, at the luminous rush of a family slop-basin, as if the crisis of her fate was approaching. Every vehicle that passed the house, from Hickson's Regulation to Cloud's 'Buss, stopped, she imagined, at her door. She hastened to the canterbury, and placed on her piano the songs and pieces — amounting in number to sixty odd — that were „inscribed to Miss Smith," all which had been lent her by her neighbourly namesake, who had bought them up from the trade. Every thing was now ready, — even Mr. [illegible] Smith, whom his man Jacob wedged into a recess upon his easy chair, like a half recumbent statue in the aisle of a cathedral, — though his well-stuffed footstool, flannel-bound feet, and diminished looks, gave him a much greater similitude to a cross old gentleman troubled with the gout.

To do our heroine justice, her travel and education had not been thrown away. She received her guests with the dignity of an experienced matron; and although she had never previously set eyes upon most of them, greeted all with the heartiness and apparent affection of long-tried friendship. Thus the entrées were managed to a miracle. One blunder certainly occurred. Mr. Socrates Snape, the apothecary, being too much of a philosopher to deem the common usages of decent society worthy of his superlative cognoscence, complained, on entering the room, of having been grossly insulted at the bottom of the stairs by a fellow in a long white waistcoat, whose impertinence went so far as to ask, without preface or preliminary, „What was my name? An insolent rascal!"

„Mr. Gregory Jinks!" shouted he of the worsted tights; and, as if the unconscious lackey had uttered an irresistible piece of waggery, the whole room was convulsed with laughter!

Every coterie has its buffoon. Mr. Gregory Jinks was the droll of Hammersmith. He could not open his mouth without exciting a degree of risibility amongst his particular friends, that would have made the fortune of a comedian. So completely had his imitations of the crowing of cocks, the frying of beefsteaks, and the sibilations of saw-pits, gained for him the character of a first-rate humourist, that no one could possibly suspect him of a moment's gravity. He once „set the table in a roar," by describing how an intimate friend got drowned in the Thames; and, on another occasion, related the particulars of having been himself run over by a coach and six, till the eyes of his auditory ran over with laughter. His facetiousness was not confined to mere parts of speech, Mr. Jinks was also an extensive practical joker.

(To be continued in our next.)

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Die Postämter versenden die Nummern wöchentlich, die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnement-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monate 1 Thlr. [illegible] Die [illegible] 26 Nummern [illegible]. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Postämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 20.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. L. L. M.

Miss Smith „at Home!" or More Smiths!

By W. H. Wills, Esq.

(Continued from our last.)

He never „made one" of a waterparty without providing himself with a gimlet; administered cayenne pepper and Chili vinegar at pic-nics, and always kept a good stock of detonating balls and exploding cigars, for the use of his most esteemed friends: — in short, Mr. Gregory Jake was, to the revels of Hammersmith, what Liston is to the Olympic games.

The assembled group had got to that part of such entertainments which always takes place after most of the company has arrived, and immediately before the coffee is brought in. This consists of an unbroken, embarrassing silence. The titter on Jake's entrance had subsided; many young ladies looked upon the carpet, — not, be it understood, to discern where it was most worn, but because they were afraid to look up. Old Smith gazed round the room with an expression of mute despair; and Mrs. Diggory Smith, the voluminous dowager, was motioning her youngest daughter to pull her frock over her shoulders, — when the door silently opened, and a grave figure stalked into the apartment with the solemnity of an undertaker. He was habited in black; his black hair gracefully curled over the collar of his black coat à la Paganini; his black cane was ornamented with a huge black tassel, and his left hand, incased in a black glove, was adorned with a white pocket-handkerchief. This apparition looked mournfully at the pleasure-party, and seated himself on a vacant chair beside Mrs. Diggory Smith's second daughter, Miss Seraphina Celia Smith.

The silence was soon broken, — not with a rude and sudden shock, but by a gradual progression, like the crescendo movements of Rossini's overtures — commencing with soft whispers, gaining volume in murmurs, and ending with unequivocal articulate sounds. The new visitor had evidently created a great sensation, which was developed in a general desire to know who the illustrious individual could be? The whole circle formed a chain of conversation and surmise. Each inquired of his neighbour, and whoever was neighbourless, consulted his opposite friend in expressive pantomime. The hostess was eagerly looked for, to satisfy this overwhelming curiosity, but she was in the kitchen supplying the coffee-cups with silver spoons, and giving out the silver salver.

Tea actually passed off without the name of the mysterious stranger transpiring. He was very attentive to his fair neighbour, who delighted in being called a „bluestocking," because she was in the habit of perpetrating songs and scribbling „Impromptus." Mrs. Diggory Smith looked benignantly on the enraptured pair; and, like a prudent mamma, left them to themselves.

Out of the forty-odd persons assembled at Miss Smith's „at home," there was a due proportion of „Smiths:" for Mrs. Diggory Smith had a great many cousins and nephews, married and unmarried, who of course were among the guests, — and no small confusion was the consequence. When Miss Smith was asked to sing, a whole flight of nightingales attempted to perch upon the music-stool; and Miss Smith, Mrs. Diggory's eldest girl, possessing the greatest activity and the worst voice, inflicted the maximum of torture upon those present, who were learned in quavers and crotchets. Now Miss Julia Smith, the young hostess, really sang very agreeably; with some feeling, and without pretension. On one occasion she was fortunate enough to rescue her piano from the remorseless thumps of her rival and namesake. She warbled a ballad with such exquisite simplicity, and accompanied it with so much taste, as to make a deep impression on the heart of Jack Johnstone, who happened to be in the close vicinity of Mrs. Diggory Smith — the pianoforte intervening to prevent his seeing the fair vocalist. „Who is that charming girl?" he asked of his friend Jinks.

„Why, don't you know? — Miss Smith to be sure!" replied the joker, as he tripped over to let off a Waterloo cracker under the nose of the sleeping Mr. Call Smith.

Johnstone turned to Mrs. Diggory for further information. „Which lady was it who sang so sweetly?" he inquired.

Of course the dowager knew only of one lady who had sung sweetly, so she answered with conscious pride, „My daughter, sir."

„What, Miss Smith?"

„Yes, sir, she is my eldest — but Seraph, my second girl — she, sir, she is the singer! I wish she was not so busy with that strange gentleman in black, or you should hear her — she is a real genius, sings her own songs, and plays her own music. Ah! sir, she is —

„The devil incarnate!" exclaimed old Smith, rubbing his nose with great violence. „Jacob," he inquired of his man, whose orders were to keep behind his high chair, „who did it?"

Jacob Post pointed to Jinks.

„Knock him down!" continued the indignant old gentleman, quietly resuming his nap. Jacob did as he was bid!

Never did poor Gregory pay so dearly for one of his „good things:" he lay on the floor completely stunned. Some of the ladies fainted, others screamed, and all who had been lucky enough to get partners for the prospective dance, rushed, in the greatest alarm, to the ball-room, while Julia busied herself with great adroitness to make apologies. As such adventures were not new to the merry-andrew, he speedily recovered his senses and his good humour, and harmony was restored.

During the bustle which attended the settling of the elders to cards, it happened that Jack Johnstone, who was on the look-out for some fair one to escort to the dancing-room, encountered, among the maze of chairs, sofas, and card-tables, the „full face" of Julia Smith. An instantaneous recognition ensued on both sides. The lady blushed deeply: the gentleman stammered, and kicked over a footstool.

„Bless me!" exclaimed Julia, in a half whisper. „Good heavens, she here!" thought Johnstone; but suddenly recollecting himself, he thrust out his elbow with a precipitancy quite fatal to poor Julia's side. He did not knock her down, to be sure, thanks to the door-post for supporting her. „Will you allow me the honour?" he stuttered, undismayed by his awkwardness. Julia mechanically took his arm. She trembled.

„A very close evening, miss," remarked Johnstone, sighing.

„We shall find the drawing-rooms much cooler," replied the lady, with simplicity.

Her almost demented companion looked round, and, to his astonishment, discovered that he had so utterly lost his senses, as to have brought Julia into the confines of the cloak closet, instead of conducting her to the dancing-room. Suddenly his temporary insanity took a new turn. He dropped on one knee.

„Julia!“ he ejaculated, passionately kissing her hand, „I can retain this mask of secrecy no longer. Tell me how, why, do I meet you here? I am bewildered with the unexpected delight of beholding you again.

Miss Smith broke away from her detainer.

„Stay! stay! I implore you, he continued. „I never dared to express the deep love I have felt for you from the first moment! When I might have done so, I felt that it would have been presuming on a short acquaintance. You granted me permission to commence a correspondence. You seemed to take an interest in the event of my law-suit, which makes or beggars me for ever: grateful for such kindness, I — —

„Mr. Johnstone,“ interrupted Julia, „you need not detain me. If you would refer to the folly we were — I mean that I was guilty of at Paris, I would wish to forget it. You evidently have done so long since!“

„Never as I hope for mercy! I wrote —

„Wrote?“

„My letter was unanswered!“

„Wrote? To me?“

„To you.“

All further explanation was impracticable. The plaintive voice of the romantic Seraphine Celia Smith was heard near the door, pouring into the mysterious stranger's ear the balm of consolation.

„Why not hope for the best?“ she whispered.

„Hope? Hope and Julius St. Cyril de Montfort are strangers. I have struggled up the steep Parnassus of fame — have reached its summit — can look down from its envied eminence — and say, I have written as many dramas as the immortal bard of Avon; yet one other ambition have I to satisfy.“

„And that —?“ breathed the expectant Celia, eagerly.

„Is for you,“ answered Julius St. Cyril de Montfort; „deign but to hear those vows repeated, I so fervently uttered during our first meeting in Kensington Gardens —“

„Nay, nay, that cannot be,“ murmured Seraphine, returning her lover's ardent glance.

„I swear by all the — — but hark, that noise —“

Johnstone, during the agitation of this „closet scene,“ had murdered — not a Polonius — but a bran new beaver, by knocking it down and treading thereon. The noise scared the romantic pair into the parlour. Julia and her lover soon followed.

„Ah! Seraph, my dear, here you are at last,“ said Mrs. Diggery, „we are all dying to hear you sing.“

„Indeed, mamma, I am not in spirits.“

„That beautiful „farewell“ you composed the other day after your walk in Kensington Gardens, do try that.“

„It will be useless, indeed, ma'; without the „fragment“ no one would understand it.“

„Well, but I dare say you can remember that too, child: I'm sure Dr. Twoteam will be charmed do hear it.“

„Delighted,“ answered the doctor, with a look of thunder.

Having collected a tolerably large audience, Miss Celia very deliberately pulled a paper out of her reticule, and, despite the occasional thumping over-head, which proved that „the votaries of Terpsichore“ were tripping it on the „light fantastic toe,“ commenced:

Miss Seraphine Celia Smith's MS.

„'Twas evening. The moon shed her resplendent lustre; — a congeries of brilliant constellations illumined the blue vault of heaven. He came — his brow was darkened with a frown — a mighty torrent of tempestuous emotions swept over his manly bosom. There was a sound — a female form appeared — a cry of joy succeeded; and, in another instant, the lovely Juliana Marianna Montmorency was in the arms of her affianced lover! O! what a simple, original, indivisible gush of pure delight electrified their tender hearts! They wept for joy; but short his happiness was — evanescent as the summer cloud — durationless, as the winter sun. The rival of Julien St. Clair sprung like a tiger from his hiding place; he tore the enraptured pair asunder. The lover drew his weapon. They fought — the conflict was long and desperate — and — fatal night! — the green received the lifeless form of the devoted Julien. His rival approached the terrified Juliana. Detested as he was, he did not fail to pour a heterogeneous homily of amorous amalgamations into her unwilling ear. She fled — her destroyer would have pursued — she reached the halls of her father, and pouring forth her woes in a strain of impassioned poetry, sank into the neighbouring brook „to rise no more.“ She expired like Ophelia, and „died in song.“ These were her warblings:

Farewell ye purling ponds and brooks,
Ye buttercups and daisies;
Farewell ye stately oaks, and rooks
That caw within your mazes.
Ye doves and singing birds adieu,
The nightingale and linnet;
Farewell, O! wood of grassy hue,
And all the cattle in it.

Farewell ye flowers of the stream,
Ye lilies and bullrushes;
Farewell my garden fair, that teems
With scent, and roses' blushes;
Adieu, my home, and loved alcoves,
My native soil and air,
Adieu ye walks and shady groves,
And Julien St. Clair."

When the auditory had recovered of the effects of this poetic composition, the whole party emigrated from the parlours to the drawing-room, to give time for the people below to „lay the supper things.“ Johnstone took a favourable opportunity of speaking to Mrs. Diggery Smith, who happened to be seated alone in one corner of the room.

„Madam!“ he began with evident confusion; „I trust you will excuse my addressing you on a subject of some delicacy: but your daughter, ma'am —“

„Which, sir?“ inquired the old lady, edging up to Johnstone with the anxious smile of an angler who has just felt a most promising nibble.

„The young lady whom I met in Paris; the [illegible], as I understood you, who sang the song I inquired about.“

„Indeed, sir! Then you are the gentleman who wrote the romantic letter from Lyons. Why, sir, you must have fallen in love with her at first sight!“

„Not quite so suddenly, madam,“ answered Johnstone, smiling; „I certainly had not the pleasure of seeing her very often; yet, madam, she made an impression which I now feel can never leave me.“

„But Mr. — a — a — “

„John Johnstone, Ma'am.“

„Yes, Mr. Johnstone, she read your letter to me and wondered who it could come from. But really, sir, you'll excuse her. My girls have so many admirers that, poor things, they can't always call to mind those who may be worthy their remembrance.“

Johnstone began to think it was barely possible that she, „his bright particular star,“ might turn out an errant coquette.

„All the influence a mother possesses, Mr. Johnstone, shall be yours. I think your letter stated something relative to a family estate you were at law about,“ progressed the dowager, taking her companion by the hand with all the affection of a mother-in-law.

„Yes, ma'am, the case will be decided on Thursday; and I am happy to add, with every prospect of success for myself. The villain who has for so long deprived me of my family rights absconded, and in my endeavours to overtake him I had the happiness of meeting Miss Smith. The rascal is, I am sorry to add, a namesake.“

„Our's is not a very uncommon name, but he can be no relation, I can assure you.“

„Indeed, madam, I could never suspect that a man, base enough to forge the codicil of a will, could claim kith or kin with a person so lovely, so innocent, so virtuous as your daughter.“

„I will speak to her at once on your behalf, Mr. Johnstone;“ and with the utmost impatience did the husband-hunting dame hasten to seek her daughter.

Mrs. Diggery found „Bella“ in most lover-like propinquity to the philosophical Snaps. When passed between the mother and daughter, may be gathered from the fact of poor Socrates being most remorselessly cut for the rest of the evening, by her to whom he had only five minutes previously proposed, and by whom he was just two minutes before unequivocally accepted.

Johnstone was greatly perplexed to find a reason for Miss Smith's apparent denial of the receipt of his epistle, when her mother (as he imagined), informed him that she had not only received it, but was guilty of the deceit of pretending to wonder by whom it was written. His cogitations were cut short by the announcement of supper.

At the table, Johnstone's friend Jinks might be in his glory. There „all appliances and means to boot“ for the perpetration of his jokes — practical and verbal — were before him. On this occasion he was, however, unusually unhappy; his smiles were nipped, like a frost-bitten rose, in the bud. A glance at the head of the table, where sat the cross-looking host with his powerful shadow in the person of Jacob Post stationed behind his chair, never failed to congeal the glowing fancies of his facetious brain. He helped the ladies to tongue, without his accustomed joke concerning the garrulity of the fair sex — saw several persons take wine, without inquiring, like Pierre — „what wine-ing monk art thou?“ and when he asked for porter forgot to make the usual allusion to his bier. The brawny fist of Jacob had knocked his best bits out of his head; he was, to use a favourite expression of his own — „dumb as an oyster.“

This Hammersmith symposium — unlike each of those described by Xenophon — passed over in a manner that quite reconciled Mr. Ugis Smith to the rest of the evening; scarcely a word was spoken. The only approach to a sensation was produced by Dr. Tweezum, who being blessed with a pleasing obliquity and a pair of spectacles — solicited, without apparent reference to any individual lady „the honour of taking wine with Miss Smith.“ Never was heard such a jingling of goblets and gurgling of wine since the marriage feast „in Cana of Galilee.“ Every Miss Smith at the table thought herself especially happy in being singled out for the compliment of one who wrote himself L.L.D. „in any bill, warrant, quittance, or obligation.“ The mistake was not easily rectified, and a great many Miss Smiths thought themselves ill used, and spoke to their brothers.

As for Mr. Socrates Snaps, his thoughts were sufficiently occupied by the extraordinary alteration of his „ladye-love's“ sentiments towards him. His philosophy was unable to solve the problem. A little light, however, entered his unhappy mind by noticing the attentions paid her by Johnstone. The fact was, when our hero (Johnstone is our hero, although we forgot to give him a formal introduction) was in Paris, he frequently met Miss Julia Smith and her namesake together, and naturally concluded they were sisters. He was not undeceived on that subject; for his private interviews with his fair enslaver in France were few, on account of the terribly sharp eyes of Julia's governess. When he got Jinks's invitation to join him in a bourgeois entertainment, he little imagined with whom he should meet. Vexed and dissatisfied at Julia's implied denial of the receipt of his epistle, he determined to seek revenge in the most violent attentions to the daughter of Mrs. Diggory Smith, whom he imagined to be Julia's sister.

The old lady looked round with the utmost satisfaction; her dear Seraphina Celia and Mr. Julius St. Cyril de Mountfort, were sighing, and ogling, and nudging each other with delightful perseverance; while the „young man with the family estate,“ and „her eldest,“ were getting on charmingly. Snaps noticed Johnstone's preliminary civilities undismayed; the whisper, soft as it was, and tender as it seemed to be, did not alarm him much; but when his rival proceeded to the extremity of detaining his fair one's willing hand to give it a perfectly visible squeeze, the mind of Mr. Socrates Snaps was made up!

By a „singular coincidence,“ the fair hostess at the same moment abruptly gave the signal for the general exit of her lady visitors, by leaving the table. Mr. Horatio Snaps buttoned his coat with the utmost vehemence, and retired also.

When he was fairly out of hearing, Jinks rose, with a gravity he knew very well how to assume, and proposed the health of Mr. Snaps and the rest of the ladies." As this was meant for a jeu d' esprit on the chop-fallen inamorato's ill-timed retreat, an uproarious three-times-three was the consequence. Poor old Unit Smith was in a perfect agony; he could not in conscience require his man Jacob to knock down Jinks a second time, as he was only particeps criminis in the uproar, and to play at skittles with the whole company would be impossible; so putting both hands to both ears, he hobbled out of the room with the utmost haste. His departure was hailed with „one cheer more," proposed by Jinks, the vent-peg of whose facetiae seemed to fly out with the host: for, after he had left the room, Gregory's wit „flowed fast and furious."

The next toast was the health of „Mr. John Johnstone," accompanied with a hope of success in the forthcoming trial. In returning thanks, Johnstone trusted that the good wishes of his friends might be realized, as much for his own sake as for exposing the villanies of one of the greatest scamps that ever disgraced the profession — Mr. Samuel Smith! Johnstone then sat down.

„Mr. Samuel Smith!" echoed Dr. Tweezum, „my most intimate friend."

„Mr. S. Smith?" iterated Mr. Julien St. Cyril de Mountfort, the most talented — 'first robber' — in the profession."

„Mr. S. Smith?" reiterated another Mr. Smith, „my brother, the conveyancer."

Glad to escape from the fumes of ill-made punch; or, possibly, overpowered by the corruscations of Jinks's brandy-and-water seasoned wit — Johnstone retired to muse over the wayward fate that brought him so near success in his temporal, or rather, legal matters, and gave so severe a disappointment to him in his love affair; for, to do him justice, the image of Julia had, since his adventure to Paris, been present to his thoughts while contemplating the possibility of obtaining his fortune. It was indeed always his intention to seek out the lady, and declare himself, immediately the issue of his cause was determined.

When at the foot of the stairs, he observed that a garden-door stood invitingly open; and as a little fresh air was not to be refused, he soon found himself among the shrubs, „chewing the cud of sweet and bitter fancies." He was not long in discovering, between the trees, the flutterings of a white dress, and a nearer view convinced him that its wearer was Julia Smith.

(To be concluded in our next.)

A Highland Anecdote.

The same course of reflection which led me to transmit to you the account of the death of an ancient borderer, induces me to add the particulars of a singular incident, affording a point which seems highly qualified to be illustrated by the pencil. It was suggested by the spirited engraving of the Gored Huntsman, which adorned the first number of your work *), and perhaps bears too close a resemblance to the character of that print to admit of your choosing it as a subject for another. Of this you are the only competent judge.

The story is an old, but not an ancient one; the actor and sufferer was not a very aged man, when I heard the anecdote in my early youth. Duncan, for so I shall call him, had been engaged in the affair of 1745, with others of his clan, and was supposed, by many, to have been an accomplice, if not the principal actor in a certain tragic affair, which made much noise a good many years after the rebellion. I am content with indicating this, in order to give some idea of the man's character, which was bold, fierce, and enterprising. Traces of this natural disposition still remained in Duncan's very good features, and in his keen gray eye. But the limbs, like those of the aged borderer in my former life, had become unable to serve the purposes and obey the dictates of his inclination. On the one side of his body he retained the proportions and firmness of an active mountaineer; on the other he was a disabled cripple, scarcely able to limp along the streets. The cause which reduced him to this state of infirmity was singular.

---

*) This article was written for the Keepsake.

Twenty years or more before I knew Duncan, he assisted his brothers in farming a large grazing in the Highlands, comprehending an extensive range of mountain and forest land, morass, lake and precipice. It chanced that a sheep or goat was missed from the flocks, and Duncan, not satisfied with despatching his shepherds in one direction, went himself in quest of the fugitive in another.

In the course of his researches, he was induced to ascend a small and narrow path, leading to the top of a high precipice. Dangerous as it was at first, the road became doubly so as he advanced. It was not much more than two feet broad, so rugged and difficult, and at the same time so terrible, that it would have been impracticable to any but the light step and steady brain of a Highlander. The precipice on the right rose like a wall, and on the left sunk to a depth which it was giddy to look down upon; but Duncan passed cheerfully on, now whistling the Gathering of his Clan, now taking heed to his footsteps, when the difficulties of the path required caution.

In this manner he had more than half ascended the precipice, when in midway, and it might almost be said, in middle air, he encountered a buck of the red-deer species, running down the cliff by the same path in an opposite direction. If Duncan had had a gun, no rencontre could have been more agreeable; but as he had not this advantage over the denizen of the wilderness, the meeting was in the highest degree unwelcome. Neither party had the power of retreating, for the stag had not room to turn himself in the narrow path, and if Duncan had turned his back to go down, he knew enough of the creature's habits to be certain that he would rush upon him while engaged in the difficulty of the retreat. They stood, therefore, perfectly still, and looked at each other in mutual embarrassment for some space.

At length the deer, which was of the largest size, began to lower his antlers, as they do when they are brought to bay, and are preparing to rush upon hound and huntsman. Duncan saw the danger of a conflict in which he must probably come by the worst, and as a last resource stretched himself on the little ledge of rock which he occupied, and thus awaited the resolution which the deer should take, not making the least motion, for fear of alarming the wild and suspicious animal. They remained in this posture for three or four hours, in the midst of a rock which would have suited the pencil of Salvator, and which afforded barely room enough for the man and the stag, opposed to each other in this extraordinary manner.

At length the buck seemed to take the resolution of passing over the obstacle which lay in his path, and with this purpose approached towards Duncan very slowly, and with excessive caution. When he came close to the Highlander, he stooped down as if to examine him more closely, when the untameable love of sport, peculiar to his country, began to overcome Duncan's fears. Seeing the animal proceed so gently, he totally forgot the dangers of his position, and with one hand seized the deer's horns; whilst with the other he drew his dirk. But in the same instant the buck bounded over the precipice, carrying the Highlander along with him. They went thus down upwards of a hundred feet, and were found the next morning on the spot where they fell. Fortune, who does not always regard retributive justice in her dispensations, ordered that the deer should fall undermost, and be killed upon the spot, while Duncan escaped with his life, but with the fracture of a leg, an arm, and three ribs. In this state he was lying on the carcass of the deer, and the injuries which he had received rendered him for the remainder of his life the cripple I have described. I never could approve of Duncan's conduct towards the deer in a moral point of view, (although, as the man in the play said, he was my friend) but the temptation of a hart of grease, offering as it were, his throat to the knife, would have subdued the virtue of almost any deer stalker. Whether the anecdote is worth recording, or deserving of illustration, remains for your consideration. I have given you the story exactly as I recollect it.

W. Scott.

Battle of Waterloo.

There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Belgium's capital had gathered then
Her beauty and her chivalry, and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;
A thousand hearts beat happily; and when
Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes looked love to eyes which spake again,
And all went merry as a marriage-bell;
But hush! hark! — a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

Did ye not hear it? — No; 'twas but the wind,
Or the car rattling o'er the stony street:
On with the dance! let joy be unconfin'd;
No sleep till morn, when youth and pleasure meet
To chase the glowing hours with flying feet —
But, hark! — that heavy sound breaks in once more,
As if the clouds its echo would repeat,
And nearer, clearer, deadlier than before!
Arm! arm! it is — it is — the cannon's opening roar!

Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago
Blushed at the praise of their own loveliness:
And there were sudden partings, such as press
The life from out young hearts, and choking sighs
Which ne'er might be repeated — who could guess
If ever more should meet those mutual eyes,
Since upon night so sweet such awful morn could rise!

And there was mounting in hot haste; the steed,
The mustering squadron, and the clattering car,
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war,
And the deep thunder, peal on peal afar;
And near, the beat of the alarming drum
Roused up the soldier ere the morning star;
While thronged the citizens with terror dumb,
Or whispering with white lips — “The foe! They come! they come!”

And Ardennes waves above them her green leaves,
Dewy with nature's tear-drops, as they pass,
Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
Over the unreturning brave, — alas!
Ere evening to be trodden like the grass,
Which now beneath them, but above shall grow
In its next verdure, when this fiery mass
Of living valour, rolling on the foe,
And burning with high hope, shall moulder cold and low.

Last noon beheld them full of lusty life,
Last eve in beauty's circle proudly gay,
The midnight brought the signal-sound of strife,
The morn, the marshalling in arms, — the day,
Battle's magnificently stern array!
The thunder-clouds close o'er it, which when rent,
The earth is covered thick with other clay,
Which her own clay shall cover, heaped and pent,
Rider and horse, — friend, foe, — in one red burial blent!

Byron.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nr. 21.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Miss Smith „at Home;“ or More Smiths!

By W. H. Wills, Esq.

(Concluded from our last.)

Women are, to a man, (as a reporting friend once observed) great casuists. Their curiosity is so restless, that if they cannot account for effects by any real data, they set to work and build up facts of their own, out of their imaginations. By this process did Julia believe — although we will not be answerable for the precise phraseology in which the thought presented itself to her delicate mind — she concluded, that some „d—d good-natured friend“ had informed her lover of the low origin of her mamma; hence his sudden, unequivocal, and somewhat uncalled-for display of attention to her rival, and change of manner towards herself. These were her thoughts, when the subject of them presented himself.

Again did the lady tremble; but the gentleman's embarrassment had entirely left him; his demeanour was cold and constrained, and formed a bitter contrast to his passionate manner in the closet.

„I trust, Miss Smith, you will excuse my seizing so favourable an opportunity of again adverting to our former „friendship,“ began Johnstone, in a tone that seemed to strike a chill to poor Julia's heart: „when I asked permission to be allowed to write to you, it was no idle request. I availed myself of it the moment I imagined you had arrived in England, and were free from the surveillance of your governess.“

„Your letter was never received, sir,“ answered Julia, with the least possible betrayal of her great anxiety.

„I dare not say to a lady one word that would bear the construction of a direct contradiction,“ was the reply: „but really, Miss Smith, the only principal member of your family I have yet had the honour of knowing, has actually repeated a portion of the contents of my epistle.“

„I cannot understand this: my father would, I am sure, never open my letters, and —“

„Possibly your father would not; but there is, I am sorry to add, another obstacle to your proving the non-receipt of my communication.“

„Another obstacle?“

„Another bar which prevents me from renewing those vows I so lately made, in the person of —“ „Whom?“ exclaimed the almost breathless girl.

„Your mother, madam!“ answered Johnstone, bitterly.

Julia instantly burst into tears, and would have inevitably fallen, had not her companion promptly supported her. Johnstone conducted the nearly insensible girl into the house, where a not very coherent story, about having found her overcome with the fatigues of the evening in the ball, lulled all suspicion of what had passed in the garden.

The indisposition of the hostess caused a general ,,break up.'' Johnstone, with the proverbial ill-temper of a gentleman crossed in love, left the house with the utmost haste, to the utter consternation of Mrs. Diggory Smith, who had not had an opportunity of giving him her address. Jinks took such good care of the bottle as to become totally unable to take care of himself, and vociferated for the recreant Johnstone with might and main. Mr. Julien St. Cyril de Mountfort dropped a word or two into the delighted ear of Miss Seraphine Celia Smith, about the ,,sweet sorrow'' of parting, and Dr. Tweezum shook all the powder out of his wig in ,,fie, fieing'' the excesses of divers gentlemen who laboured woefully under the influences of certain evil, though excusable spirits.

The next morning found Johnstone at his chambers, ruminating, over a cup of coffee, upon the least troublesome method of committing suicide. After coming to the determination of deferring the ,,rash act'' until his cause was tried, he found, on opening a letter which his laundress had just brought, that the writer, Mr. Socrates Snaps, would in all probability save him unnecessary trouble. The note ran thus: —

,,Sir, — Having been informed by Mr. Gregory Jinks of your address, I lose no time in acquainting you of my engagements with Miss Smith, of Hammersmith; and unless you withdraw the pretensions to that lady, which I am told you advanced last evening, I shall require that satisfaction usually expected from one gentleman by another.

,,Your's, etc.

,,Socrates Snaps.''

,,So,'' thought Johnstone, on laying down the epistle, ,,Julia's conduct is easily accounted for; she would not acknowledge me or my letter, on account of her penchant for this rascally surgeon. I shall just present my compliments to Mr. Snaps, and tell him he is in error; my pretensions are already withdrawn.''

This was no sooner said than done; and the messenger, who waited, was speedily dispatched with an answer.

Another letter made its appearance. Its contents were; —

,,102, Basement, Lincoln's Inn.''

,,Sir, — My brother informs me that last evening, in the presence of several persons, you characterised me ,,as one of the greatest scamps in the profession.'' If you do not retract these words by five and twenty minutes to three this afternoon, I shall commence an action for slander forthwith.''

,,Your's, etc.

,,Samuel Smith.''

,,Another letter — twopence, please sir,'' exclaimed the laundress, before poor Johnstone had quite finished reading the above.

,,Theatre-royal, Adelphi.''

,,Sir, — Understanding from my friend, Julien St. Cyril de Mountfort, Esq., author of ,,The Murdered Murderer, or the Fatal Bill-hook,'' and several popular dramatic compositions, that you spoke of me as ,,one of the greatest scamps in the profession,'' I beg to acquaint you, that although I have been playing the first business in the robber and villain line for the last ten years, such an imputation was never cast upon me before; and I can take nothing less than a public apology in the newspapers for so great and unfounded a calumny.''

,,Your's,

,,Smith.''

,,Please to direct to the stage-door.''

When the paper-beleaguered Johnstone had quite done laughing at the ridiculous mistakes the name of ,,Smith'' entailed, not only upon its owners, but those unlucky enough to know them, he heard his risibility echoed by the well-known cachinnation of his friend Jinks, — five minutes conversation with whom converted him from the most miserable to the happiest of men.

His friend gave him the whole history of the Smith's of Hammersmith, accompanied with imitations of the peculiarities of each member of each family. Johnstone remembered that he had directed his love letter to Julia „to Miss Smith, Hammersmith;“ and as it came before her arrival in town, of course it was taken to the house of Mrs. Diggory Smith.

In a month Johnstone completed his happiness: he won a wife and a law-suit during that time, which last completely cleared up the mistakes of the injured conveyancer and the indignant actor.

The last time Miss Seraphine Celia Smith was seen, it was in a strolling company, in which she acted under the name of Mrs. Julien St. Cyril de Mountfort. As for her sister, she, in spite of Mr. Socrates Snaps, remains a spinster, and her mamma particularly wishes us to intimate, to any young gentleman with a „family estate“ in perspective, that that „Miss Smith“ is always to be found At Home.

The Charitable Bazaars of Dublin.

It has been said by a classic authority, that force without judgment is overthrown by its own impetus; and the proposition is equally true of virtue. To do good to mankind is less facile than moralists suppose. It requires something more than a mere animal impulse; and there is much ground for doubting whether the world (at least the British world), does not suffer more from the impertinent interference of mistaken benevolence, than from the direct attacks of selfishness and malice on its order and happiness. Charity, more especially (though, in a well ordered state, a duty whose exercise is limited within a narrow and comprehensible sphere), becomes, under a government replete with abuses and fertile in factitious misery, a science requiring as much patient research, and as large a grasp of intellect, as any other department of politics. To be charitable on an extensive scale, is to legislate for the poor; and man, in his domestic capacity (whatever may be thought of him as a citizen or a subject), is an animal made to think and to act for himself.

In the British empire, where every class of society is more or less dislocated, where the rewards of industry are subject to frequent revolutions, and where life is sustained by the most painful efforts, errors in the direction or energy of the charitable are doubly fatal. They are not only a waste of the scanty and insufficient resources of the multitudinous poor, a destruction of so much of the materials of happiness, but they are a direct and positive evil, deranging the economy of the lower orders, harassing them by needless and galling dictation, and destroying in their bosoms the principle of independence, without which there can be no virtue.

An high estimate of pecuniary charity in the scale of virtues is the result of incivilization, and a testimony of the barbarity of the governments where it prevails. Where the people are well governed and prosperous, the field for the exercise of this virtue is necessarily limited; but wherever great and terrible inequalities in human condition subsist, charity is a necessary supplement to the defective institutions, out of which they arise. In the christian world, where pecuniary liberality is dignified as a theological virtue, charity stands in the place of many more serviceable and important duties; and much of that energy which should be given to the improvement of the political and statistic condition of the country, is wasted in a vain attempt to bolster up bad systems, and to avert by eleemosynary efforts the miseries and vices accumulated by misrule. The high and influential classes are especially prone to fall into this error. Too moral and too religious to be satisfied with the wretchedness by which they are surrounded, yet too selfish, perverse, or indolent to attempt a thorough removal of its causes, they satisfy their consciences by attempting to relieve in detail the sufferings, which their privileges and pretensions produce in the gross; and when they have beallowed a small percentage of their overgrown fortunes upon the wretches whom their monopoly of power has impoverished and wronged, they flatter themselves that they have done all which human sympathy or divine injunction requires at their hands.

This description of charity has been well described by a popular writer, as „other-worldly-mindedness;" and no where is it more sensitive and alive than among the aristocracy of Ireland, — a country where mendicity is national, and where religious Quixotism is carried to the fever point of exaltation and excess. Unfortunately this fiery and rampant zeal is utterly deficient in knowledge; and there is more waste of money in the city of Dublin, more direct provocation of misery by ill-contrived attempts to relieve distress, more misdirected energy, than would, if properly applied, remove, ten times over, all the pauperism of a wholesomely constituted society of the same bulk.

In a country so teeming with an unemployed population as Ireland, it certainly is not an easy matter to give a proper direction to public feeling, and to avoid falling into dangerous errors; and though it is necessary to signalise the more flagrant and mischievous abuses, and to ridicule an all pervading folly, by which society suffers so deeply, yet it must be confessed that the individuals, who come under the lash are not without some excuse. If their presumption and self-conceit are absurd and baneful, their intentions at least are often the purest and the best.

The sphere of charity, its productive power of good, being closely confined to the relief of those fortuitous evils to which the lower classes must ever be exposed, even in the best regulated societies, the moment it is applied to large categories of persons, as a remedy for permanent abuses, it becomes an unmanageable and equivocal agent of happiness, interfering with independent labour, disturbing its market, and rendering occupation precarious, and its reward fluctuating. The means which a nation possesses of employing its population are definite; and charity, in giving them a new direction, does not increase the sum; on the contrary, in so far as the process is forced and unnatural, it tends to diminish that sum by waste and mismanagement. Most of the charitable efforts which daily succeeded each other for the employing poor of Ireland, are but the pouring money out of one pocket, to place it in another; and if certain individuals are put to work in a new direction by the process, an equal number are inevitably thrown out of employment in some unobserved department.

This evil attaches with particular severity and mischievous effect to those associations of good and pious ladies, who either work themselves for the benefit of the poor, or find employment for them in charitable asylums, where they are enabled to under-sell and drive out of the market all competitors who are thrown upon their own resources. The money which is collected by the sale of needle and fancy work thus performed, is a direct robbery of the sempstresses, who, in garrets and in cellars, strive to exist by unwearied labour. The cheap repositories that vend articles of taste, fabricated in Magdalen asylums and receptacles for the destitute, not only severely injure the shopkeeper, who pays rent and taxes for the service of the public, but, through him, strikes despair into the bosom of a large class of helpless females, who avail themselves of accomplishments, acquired in happier circumstances, to support themselves in independence, by the only means which the perverse exclusion of women from their natural employments has left open to them. It is no justification of such establishments, that they sell only inutilities, calculated to catch a certain portion of loose cash, which otherwise would be lost to benevolence. The manufacture of inutilities, no less than that of articles of prime necessity, is the property of the working poor, — a property with which the public cannot tamper, without producing a certain evil, that is never compensated by the uncertain and delusive good expected from the process.

Among the many idle, delusive, and extravagant amusements, invented by that [illegible] of Grand Caliphs, Louis the XIVth. not the least remarkable were the shops opened in the saloons of Versailles, and kept by the king's mistresses, or the princesses of the blood, attended by cavaliers, who, though officiating as shop-boys, were chosen according to their rank and office. In these magazines, toys, trinkets, and jewels of immense value, were distributed at counters, attended by the greatest beauties and most distinguished personages at the court; and if the cupidity of the courtiers found its account in this prodigality, coquetry lost nothing by the assumption of a character which added the naiveté of the bourgeoisie to the graces of dignity and refinement. Madame de Maintenon dwells with emphasis on the fascinations of these illustrious shopkeepers, and the elegance which presided over their counters.

The bazaars, called charitable, which, for some successive seasons have been opened in Dublin, have in their details been modelled somewhat after the manner of these comptoirs of Versailles. The market is generally held in some very public place; either at the Rotunda (a room consecrated to all public purposes), or in a hotel or tavern. The stalls are raised on either side; the shops are kept by ladies of the highest rank in the Irish world of fashion and charity. The work disposed of is their own; their customers are the public at large, who are admitted on paying a shilling. The profits of the sale, of course, go to charity, sometimes at home — too often foreign, — the conversion of Jews, or the gathering of the stray sheep of Otaheite or Hindostan. The articles produced to extort the benevolence of the customer, address themselves rather to his taste. They are multifarious; and if variety could compensate for want of ingenuity and of skill, there would be nothing to wish for in the bazaars of the charitable ladies of Dublin: — worsted stockings, to fit Irish giants, — bead purses, threaded by fairy fingers, — frizettes for the head, woven of horsehair, — and slippers of hemp for the feet, as fatiguing as the tread mill, — hearth rugs as rugged „as a Russian bear," — and pillows of lavender, not much smoother, — old jelly and stale cakes, which have figured at more than one tea and card soirée, — and ornaments in every form, that can be produced by paste and paper, and daubed by paint, — from a pagoda to a pincushion, — of just that description which a woman of taste consigns to her housekeeper's room, and the housekeeper in turn, bestows on the still room, as fit for nothing but to preserve dust, and afford lurking places for spiders.

Meantime if criticism looks on with her „eye malign askance," in its lounge up the long line opened between the repositories of trash, there are many whose susceptibility supplies the place at once of taste and of charity, and the bazaar is the great resort of all the désœuvrés of one sex, and of all the saints of the other. Among the most distinguished of the first, are the military elegants of the garrison; among the latter, are some of the highest and prettiest of the aristocracy. Placed behind piles of pincushions, each having a moral in miniature stuck on its silken surface, or behind an outwork of paper screens, consecrated by the Lord's prayer and the commandments, stands the fair trader, with a look „sober, steadfast, and demure," and an air of gentle solicitation, like that of the venders of royal effigies at the gate of the Tuileries, who cry, from morning till night, „Voyez, Messieurs, voyez la famille royale de France, et la Princesse Caroline, tous pour deux sous." *).

I was one day much amused by observing a little scene of this sort. The finest eyes I ever saw, were doing the honours of a charitable counter, to the very best of their ability, „A bonnes enseignes, bon vin." A young and gallant hussar, whose attention had wandered from stall to stall, with undefined charity, was at last attracted by the „voyez, messieurs," of the eyes alluded to. The petit commerce once begun, it was difficult to say which party threw most enterprise and speculation. Flytraps were shut and opened, with suitable comments on flies and traps; tablets were displayed, whose inscripthose were only to be breathed upon, to become, like good impressions, indelible; Adam and Eve, with the tempter in the tree, worked on a footstool in tent stitch, were not without allusion and edification; and the history of „Theresa Tidy" was recommended as a souvenir for absent sisters, with an air which proved that saints, as well as hussars, can be good disciplinarians. The choice was at length made. It fell upon a bunch of violets, reared by the fair hands of the vender for charitable purposes. The young hussar drew it from its vase, „all dripping with dew," breathed its essence, looked full in the eyes of the belle jardinière, paid his sigh and his sovereign, and — was elbowed on by a new chaperon, whose aid-de-camp's uniform gave him superior claims on the attention of the charitable bazaarist.

---

*) „Here, gentlemen, here is the whole royal family of France and the Princess Caroline, all for a penny."

As I left the door of Morrison's tavern, where the scene passed, the young hussar stood waiting for his cab. A naked, shivering little girl, with a bunch of wall-flowers (stuffed with grass „to make a show,") in her dirty hands, came „between the wind and his nobility;" and with the usual supplicatory drawl of Irish mendicity, solicited his attention, according to its most approved formulary: „The Lord powr (pour) a blessing on your beautiful honour, Sir, and buy them iligant wall-flowers for an half-penny from a fatherless orphant, that hasn't broke her fast this day, God help her." His „beautiful honour" heard her not, or valued not the liquid blessing of Heaven at the price the supplicant put upon it. He held his violets to his nose. His thoughts were behind the counter of the bazaar, and his foot on the step of his cab *). After a moment's hesitation, he returned to the bazaar, and the half-penny worth of wallflowers fell to my lot.

While ignorant benevolence, and mistaken charity, fancy they are serving the great cause of humanity, by promoting institutions which are, in fact, directly opposed to their laudable intentions, low cunning and self-love take advantage of the circumstance, by joining in a work which produces a temporary intimacy and equality between the little and the great. Many, who have no other means of getting on in society, find, in the charitable repositories, bazaars, and poor-shops, a means of introduction to the aristocrats (for even dear Dublin has its bel air), of acquaintance with the Countess of this, and the Marchioness of the other, the long desired objects of all their struggles, hopes, and desires. Among a people essentially vain and ambitious, this sort of connexion draws in a vast number of subscribers, contributors, and labourers, to all schemes of mistaken benevolence, or quackish meddling; and the peculiar notions of the catholics, on the necessity of a constant practice of charity, complete the sums requisite for their mischievous success.

On the privations and sufferings inflicted on the respectable and laborious poor, by such interference with the branch of industry upon which they almost exclusively rely, it would be easy to say some eloquent things; for it is difficult to enter deeply and warmly into any subject, and not to treat of it effectually. There is no muse like being in earnest. But here is a little document, worth all that practised authorship could give on the subject, however deeply felt, or well studied. It is a letter from some poor sufferer, written in all the simplicity and integrity of conscious injury. I give it, with the too flattering letter in which it was inclosed, and which (having received it this morning, March 29th 1829), directed my thoughts to the composition of this brief article. Having allied myself, from my earliest youth, to the oppressed party of my country, I have never enjoyed there but one distinction. The suffering and the unfortunate of all creeds have honoured me, by claims on my sympathy, which, alas! is frequently all I have to bestow; and I have, for many years back, been in the habit of receiving applications from the wretched (a painful preeminence), which have included the details of almost every species of misery which flesh is heir to, from the despair of the condemned convict, who has written to me from his cell, to the indignant repinings of neglected genius, and the eloquent recital of „all the wrongs, which patient merit from the unworthy takes."

---

*) [illegible]

But to the letter, and the simple statement of the distressed female, suffering from the ladies' charitable bazaar, which I give exactly as I received it: —

To Lady Morgan, Kildare-street, Dublin.

„Without presuming the Irish heart of your ladyship to be at all concerned in the pernicious custom? — the enclosed alludes to, it is very humbly submitted to your kind consideration — as one looked up to — as well in national pride — as the kindness of your disposition towards every individual of your country — and as it appears the press (the best medium of rectifying public evils) will not receive it — your general opinion — of the mischief it records — may go far in serving — a class of poor individuals (your countrywomen) labouring under the hardship it details — and layd before your ladyship — by one of the oppressed sufferers — who has the honour to be"

„Your Ladyship's
„Most obedient humble servant,
„A distressed Female."
„Dublin, March 20th, 1829."

„To the Ladies of the late Bazaar, and those generally of Dublin."

„Ladies,

„However painful in laying before you in this public manner evils brought on a numerous class of persons through inadvertency and want of consideration (as hunger will break through stone walls) — it is necessary, in addition to many hints you have already had laid before you, to now enter into a more particular detail of the misfortune visited on many, by your establishing bazaars and other shops, to be met with in many parts of Dublin, for the sale of ladies' works; nor are you to suppose in doing so, it is intended to convey any idea of your but laudably working for yourselves or families, or contributing to such charities as you may desire to be interested in; but in doing so, permit me to say, you should put your hands in your pockets, and by no means interfere with the bread of others, as you manifestedly have done. You will please to recollect that besides the more common and industrious classes of society, there are many respectable, well educated females, reduced, from misfortune, and not fault, to the necessity of earning their bread by the work of their hands; inferior in taste, ingenuity, and acquirements, to none of their country women! now thrown on the world for want of a usual emporium for the sale of their labour; wrought probably in filial piety for the humane and dutiful purposes of assisting an aged father or mother perishing in silent misery. For your bazaars, and from the glut of work they accumulate, prevent even shopkeepers from taking any off their hands, from the impossibility of disposing of it, as well as others purchasing those articles of taste and ingenuity, these unhappy people were wont to earn subsistence by. And really, ladies, where females are concerned, I would put it to your kind consideration, if it is consonant to the generous feelings of our soil, to thus open the flood-gates of vice, as a probable mode of preventing starvation, encreasing female crime, and multiplying mendicity, in the current of misery and want."

„Our unfortunate country labours under the severe oppression of considerable absenteeism; but how despairingly must it indeed be felt, if those our residents, blessed with rank and fortune, lend their aid to increase distress in any part of the community, for the benefit of a good cause; let the object be what it may, nothing can be called charity, that uncharitably takes bread from the mouths of many."

„And although excuses may be made for ladies of high consideration not being sufficiently acquainted, either with the nature of the trading world, or desperate state of the poor, none can for those (some now holding titles) who have been indebted in a great measure for their present good fortune, to the benefit of fair trade, and support of the poor; swallowing Lethean drafts and standing behind a bazaar table, inficting in the articles they sell, misery and want on several poor creatures, their country-women.

„Your last bazaar, it is understood, not only netted a considerable sum of money by what it sold, but has left a great quantity of ladies' work yet to be disposed of; and which, notwithstanding the piety and charity of the worthy females concerned, is now at their desire, to be got rid of by a LOTTERY; as well in the teeth of the acts of the legislature, as truly encouraging a species of gambling: as destructive a vice as ever (in its avaricious propensities) seized on the human heart; and this being under the description of little-go's, becomes subject to magisterial interference. All this shews the quantity of work you ladies have set up against the poor and industrious fair trader, whose hands is his or her support, and which, evidently, you are not borne out in any interference with for any object whatsoever; or to lay the foundation of your charities, at the expense of the poor.

„And it is presumed, from the non-attendance of our gracious vice-queen at your bazaar, that though a stranger to our country, she has had that consideration in the benevolence of her heart, which, either through inadvertency or the fashion of the day, appears to have escaped yours. And believe the want of emporium for sale of female works, has occasioned much trouble to her grace, by many of those starving creatures who have had no other hope of trying to get their productions off their hands, has led them to seek that commiseration from the stranger, which they have failed to receive at home. So contrary is all this to the natural goodness of heart, so wound up in our national female character, that it is indeed with pain it is adverted to, and is only attributed to the inordinate desire of doing good; having in the impulse of the moment, banished that more general, reflecting, and feeling consideration. Your hearts, when thus strongly appealed to, will, I am convinced resolve in the charity and benevolence, so characteristic in the fair daughters of Erin.

„Whose obedient servant I am,
„PENELOPE,
„Dublin, 23*d March*. „Out of work."
„Editor," etc. etc. etc.

LADY MORGAN.

Autumn.

Oh! there's a beauty in the dying year!
'T is sweet, at quiet eventide, to gaze
Upon the fading hills, when the dun haze
Hangs like a pall above old Autumn's bier.

Those ancient woods! how beautiful in death!
For, see, the vivid green hath left the leaf,
And brighter hues are there; yet they are brief, —
Their pomp will vanish at the cold wind's breath.

There is a breeze amid the leaves! it swells,
Far in the solemn wood-paths, like the peals
Of music o'er the waters. Hark! it steals,
Sweet, as the distant sound of evening bells.

It is the voice of Autumn! — the low dirge
Sung mournfully within its ruined halls.
It stirs the fallen leaves, and sadly falls
On the hushed air, like whispers from the surge.

The summer-birds have sought a sunnier shore; —
They lingered till the cold, cold wind went in
And withered their green homes, — their merry din
Is mingling with the rivulet's song no more.

Rich flowers have perished on the silent earth
Blossoms of valley and of wood, that gave
A fragrance to the wind, have found a grave
Upon the scentless turf that gave them birth.

Pale, faded year! thy dying hour hath come!
Oh! there are crowds, that with a joyous brow
Welcomed thy birth, whose mirthful voices now
Are hushed in the long silence of the tomb!

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 22.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. L. M.

The O'Connors and M'Carleys: or, the Humours of an Irish Fair.

At somewhere about the distance of a quarter of a mile from the little town or rather village of —, in the north of Ireland, there lies a small common of from six to eight acres in extent. This piece of ground has been for centuries, I believe, the scene of an annual fair, in which some business is done, but infinitely more mischief. It is, in short, the scene of more battles than bargains, and of more kicking than kissing.

It was my good fortune to be in the neighbourhood of this celebrated spot on one of those splendid occasions alluded to, and I determined to avail myself of the opportunity to witness a scene where I was led to believe, I should see so beautiful a development of the united effects of love, liquor, and liberty as any man of a truly philanthropic disposition, such as mine is, could desire.

Full then of delightful anticipations, excited by the prospect of seeing a row upon a great scale — to me one of the most delicious things in nature — I hastened to the scene of action early in the forenoon, and shall now attempt to describe what I saw and heard on the very impressive occasion alluded to.

On the great day in question, one side of the common was occupied by a range of tents composed of old blankets, fragments of deal, and tattered canvass, with the name of the proprietor painted on a board surmounting each door, or opening, which gave access to the interior. One of these, with its owner, we shall select for special description as a fair average sample of the whole. This is the tent, then, as its sign bore, of „Daniel O'Grady, dealer in all sorts of liquors" — which, however, the reader may as well observe by the way, meant after all, nothing but whiskey; for no other liquor had Daniel ever dealt in during the whole course of his valuable existence, although he had been in the trade ever since he was the height of a Sligo firkin.

Dan himself was a stout, active, lively, bustling little fellow, and had all the appearance of being one who could handle a wattle should occasion require it, and such occasions often came in his way, with pretty considerable effect. Indeed, the breadth of his shoulders, the suppleness of his limbs, and the fierce expression of his lively eye, showed clearly that he had been destined by nature from his cradle to excel in the use of that truly national weapon the shillelah *).

On the occasion of which we speak, Dan was dressed in a pair of „spick and span new," subcotton breeches, a red waistcoat, a long coat of grey cloth, and, to complete the respectability of his entire man, there was a „neat Barcelona tied round his neat neck." His breeches, however, which were of course meant to be tied at the knee, were not secured at these particular points; and thus, the ribands by which that duty should have been performed were left dangling round his legs, or might be seen streaming from behind him as he hurried about making preparations for the business of the day. Dan's stockings too, as a necessary consequence of this neglect, were left at liberty to wrinkle downwards; and although he frequently gave them a hasty pull up as he ran to and fro, they never could be kept above a minute or two more than half-leg high, leaving the other half exposed in primitive nakedness.

---

*) ein Stock.

Dan, when I first took him under my special observation, was busily employed, with the assistance of an active little girl, in making various arrangements and preparations in his tent for the approaching event, and occasionally holding converse with his coadjutor; — a little of which I overheard.

„Where's the big bottle with the whisky, Judy?" he said, addressing the lassie, who was intently occupied in placing several long forms around the interior of the tent for the accommodation of the expected customers.

„I never seen it," replied Judy.

„You never seen it, you little spalpeen you," said Dan, suspending the operation of wiping glasses in which he had been busily engaged; his fears for the fate of the big bottle greatly increased by the denial of his handmaiden of all knowledge of it.

„Wasn't it your own two hands, now, that brought it to the tint, so how can you be after saying you never seen it, tell me that?"

„Then to be sure if I brought it," replied Judy, „wouldn't I be after putting it in some safe place behind the basket of bread in the corner there?" pointing to the place of safety which she spoke of, where, in truth, the missing article was found, to the great joy of Dan's heart, whole and sound.

Judy had, at the moment she was first questioned by her master, totally forgotten where she had placed the bottle, and had, therefore, to avoid all further trouble on the subject, decided on the instant to deny all knowledge of it; but her recollection returning, she had taken the ingenious method described of getting out of the scrape.

„Quick, Judy, quick wid you now!" exclaimed Dan, shortly after, as he stood towel in hand at the door of his tent, eyeing with a look of great satisfaction the increasing bustle of the fair, and at the same time industriously persevering in the occupation of wiping glasses. „Quick, now Judy, quick wid you," he said, urging on the exertions which Judy was making inside the tent to fit it for the reception of genteele company: „There's Pat Duggan and a dozen more of them, and they'll be all here in a bundle like a drove of sucking-pigs, and every one of them as dry as a piece of half-burnt turf. — Stand out of the way you there, with your dirty wheel of fortune, and don't be after blocking up the passage to the tint!" exclaimed Dan, now addressing a tall, raw-boned fellow, in a tattered great-coat, or trusty, as it is more poetically called in Ireland, who, with one of those machines named after the fickle goddess, was about to take up his ground directly in front of Dan's establishment. „Can't ye go to the other side of the Common wid ye," he added; „the proper place for all them sort of roguerie."

„My eye, Dan," replied the other, nodding his head significantly, and at the same time sulkily preparing to decamp with his machine, knowing that he was on forbidden ground, „My eye, Dan, but I'll mind this, or my name's not Cornelius O'Flagherty. I'll may be come across ye afore night-fall yet, when there's more fun than favour going, more kicks than ha'pence."

„Thin mind, thin mind, ye ould scarecrow," replied the burly Daniel O'Grady, who understood, and rightly, Cornelius's enigmatical language to mean, that when the usual blow-up took place at the conclusion of the fair, he would take an opportunity of clearing scores with him.

„This minnit, ye ould pratee-scraper!" exclaimed Dan, laying down his towel and the glass which he had been wiping with it, then throwing off his coat, and advancing towards Cornelius in a highly scientific attitude.

At this critical moment, however, several friends of the parties who had been drawn to the spot by the appearance of a row successfully interfered in preventing the threatened breach of the peace, by prevailing on Dan to return to his duties, and on Cornelius to leave the ground without saying more about the matter — „at least," as they said, „in the meantime;" a caveat which was intended as an opening for the belligerents to resume and decide the dispute at the usual period when this sort of count and reckoning for standing scores was reserved to. The truth is, that the quarrel between Dan and Cornelius had been premature; there was no corresponding spirit yet abroad; and it was, therefore, reserved by their friends as a sort of bonne-bouche for the afternoon's entertainment — and not a little delighted were they to find that they had secured at least one row, which they could at any time call into existence. It was something to look forward to.

One side of the Common, we have said, was occupied by whisky-shops. The other was appropriated to hucksters, itinerant dealers in the various merchandises of cutlery, cotton goods, etc., etc., and the Pharo tables and rouge-et-noirs of the canaille, such as wheels of fortune, lotteries, the thimble, and the loop. Business here had already commenced, and at least a dozen fellows, „all in a row," mounted on barrels and stools, might be seen, and heard too, offering their various commodities to sale in the choicest flowers of oratory, and with a volubility of tongue that absolutely looked like inspiration.

As in the case of Dan, I shall select one of these gentlemen as a specimen of the whole, and this honoured individual shall be Jemmy Flynn, a well known itinerant vendor of the manufactures of Sheffield. Jemmy was a little man, rather corpulent than otherwise, about 50 years of age, with a sallow complexion, and a devil of an eye in his head. He had been nearly forty years in the trade, for he had commenced business when he was a boy of eight, with three pen-knives, a dozen of brass [illegible], a tasty pair of ear-rings made of the same rare and precious metal, and thirteen papers of pins. „There's a knife for you, ladies and gentlemen," said Jemmy, holding up the instrument of which he spoke, and which was a small pen-knife, with a deer's horn handle. „There's a knife for you, that never a one o' you, though you were to live a thousand years, and buy five hundred pen-knives every day, would ever fall in with the fellow of it. It's none of your thin delicate articles made out of the refuse of the workshop by a little hungry apprentice boy no bigger than a clothes-brush. No, no, this blade, ladies and gentlemen," continued the orator, „is the right article. It is made of the same stuff with the famous Damascus blades, which it is well known will cut any thing a mile off, and go through a bar of iron as if it were a roll of fresh butter, and so sharp that they'll shave you as clean as a skinned potatoe just by looking at them. This blade, ladies and gentlemen, little as you may think it, has been tempered in a fiery furnace seven times heated, that consumed a hundred tons of coals every five minutes, and roasts three firemen to death every day in the week except Sunday."

Thus spoke Jemmy Flynn, and in a somewhat similar strain, thus spoke also, his brethren in the trade of hyperbole and puffing.

At one end of the common, however, the real business of the fair had begun. There, a little shaggy, worn-out pony, blind of an eye, and absolutely overwhelmed, or rather smothered, by the prodigious quantity of long, clotted, uncombed hair with which it was overgrown, was apparently on the eve of finding a purchaser. The price asked for the „baste," was fifteen shillings, and it was declared, that not a ha'p'th would be abated. The price offered, and which was certainly as much as the animal was worth, was eight and sixpence and a noggin of settlement.

The object of the debate was, at this stage of the business, surrounded by at least a score of long, lank fellows; most of them rather elderly men, all habited in the favourite frieze, many of them having no fewer than three of these beloved garments on at the same time — and they would have put on a dozen if they had had them, however hot the weather might be.

The crowd that now enclosed, and wholly shut out, little Balgruddery, so the pony was called, from the light of day — for he scarcely reached the knees of any of those by whom he was surrounded — was composed of the friends of the intending purchaser, and of the proprietor of the miserable animal, whose merits and defects were as noisily and clamorously discussed as if he had been a „Tartar of the Ukraine breed," and worth his weight in gold. Into this discussion the whole party, talking at once, entered as keenly, and with as much earnestness and vociferation, as if every one of them had a deep interest at stake in the proceedings which were going forward. At length it was agreed on all hands that Balgruddery should be put through his paces, to exhibit at once his speed and proportions. With this view the crowd opened with a tremendous shout, and the little shaggy animal rushed forth under the stimulating influence of a huge shillelah, with which his owner — a tall, ragged ferocious looking fellow — ever and anon unmercifully belaboured him, every blow threatening to divide him in two. The pony being held short by the head by the straw rope with which he was secured, Balgruddery and his owner now set off together at a round trot over the common, pursued by a mob composed of the friends of both parties, buyer and seller, screaming and shouting as if their lives depended on the result; and each running as fast as his load of tattered clothes and outspread frieze would permit.

„Touch up his hind-quarters, Teague," shouted out one of the pursuers, and one evidently of the seller's party.

„There he goes, by St. Patrick, all the same as if he had wings," screamed out another.

„See how beautifully he steps over the ground!" exclaimed a third.

„Keep him to it, Teague, keep him to it, that's a jewel," roared out a fourth.

„Don't be after bating him so hard, Teague," shouted one of the opposite party, „you're making him go faster than he's able,, and that'll be seen of it."

„His hind legs are as bowed as a pot-hook," remarked a second.

„He can't trot a bit faster than my ould grandmother," bawled out a third.

The expression of these contradictory opinions gradually increased in vehemence and frequency, until the whole resolved itself into one tremendous and unintelligible babel, that threatened every moment to terminate in a general fight. This, however, did not occur. The race was at length run, and Balgruddery and his train returned to the spot from whence they had set out. Here the poor harassed animal was subjected to another test of the soundness of his condition. Five or six of the intended purchaser's party seized him by the head, raised his rough, shaggy snout, and tore open his jaws, to inspect his teeth; when, lo! every tooth in his head fell out, and dropped at the feet of the inspectors. The truth was, that having lost all his own teeth, his owner had taken the liberty of supplying him with a new set, an operation not unfrequently practised in certain counties in Ireland.

On the discovery of the trick, the friends of Balgruddery's intending purchaser, set up a shout of execration.

„Ah! what a devil of a rogue you are now Teague," said one.

„Are these your grandmother's teeth, Teague?" inquired another, stooping down, and lifting up a couple of tusks like a pair of pocket pistols. „My eye, what a set of powerful grinders the dacent ould omen must have had."

These reflections on his integrity Teague bore with inimitable grace; and in no other way rewould them, than by endeavouring to pay his compliments back in their own coin.

As the defect just discovered in [illegible], lessened his value at least one hundred per cent, five shillings, instead of eight and ninepence, was now offered for him, and finally accepted, which closed this particular portion of the business of the day.

At length that great epoch in an Irish fair — that period in which all the delights of the day were to be summed up in one charming scene of anarchy — arrived. Evening came on, and with it, certain impressive indications of the impending storm. Great events, however, have frequently very small beginnings.

„Here's the very man I wanted to meet with," said Phelim M'Carty, a stout little fellow, who had a few minutes before sallied out of a tent where he had been making a thirteener or two. „Here's the very man I wanted," he said, with a shout and a flourish of his shillelah, to which he added a graceful caper or two as he spoke, that showed he was in beautiful spirits, and ready either for love or murder.

The person whom Phelim addressed, was nearly a counterpart of himself. Patrick O'Connor wasn't a lad to be trifled with. He could handle a twig with any man of his inches in the county, and would'nt at any time give a ha'perth to choose whether it should be a black eye or a noggin, bloodshed or whisky. Patrick was also provided with a pretty tolerable switch, and was, moreover, at this particular moment under the benign influence of some fifteen glasses of „mighty illigant" (whisky), which he had fallen in with in the course of the day; so that a meeting in all its circumstances more favourable for the views of both parties, could scarcely have taken place. It is almost unnecessary to add, that these views had been for some time directed towards a row; for a cause for which they had trusted to providence and their own good luck. In truth, it so happened, that both of them at the moment of their meeting, were anxiously on the look-out for a duel.

Patrick, indeed, had for some time previously made an ineffectual attempt to get some one to quarrel with him, by trailing his trusty, — the usual provocative to battle in such cases, — which he had thrown off for the purpose, behind him. Dragging the garment after him by one of the sleeves with his left hand, and flourishing his shillelah in his right, he traversed the fair from one end to the other, calling upon any one to touch it at his peril, and challenging to mortal combat any man who should dare but to tread on it with the point of his toe.

It was, therefore, in this attitude, with the sleeve of his trusty in one hand and his sprig in the other, that Patrick encountered Phelim. Both instantly saw, with inexpressible delight, that they had at length fallen in with the very thing they wanted.

„Ah! Phelim, my jewel!" exclaimed Patrick with an expression of extreme felicity in his countenance, and giving a harmonizing flourish with his shillelah as he spoke, „And am I now just the man ye wanted?"

„Faith, my brush of a boy, and that you are."

„And pray now, my darling, what is it you might be wanting with Patrick O'Connor?" inquired the latter.

„Nothing in the universal world," said Phelim, „only to take a little of the orange blood out o'ye, as I'm told there's a small drop of it about ye, for all your blarney, Patrick — that's all."

„D'ye see my trusty on the ground there, Phelim?" said Patrick.

„To be sure I do," rejoined his antagonist.

„Well, then, my jewel, just do me the favour to put your ugly fore-foot on it."

„There, and be damned to you," replied Phelim, at the same instant planting his foot on the soiled and draggled garment — an act of temerity which was instantly followed by a well-directed blow from Patrick's shillelah, that nearly „grounded" his antagonist at the very outset. In a second, however, the latter had sufficiently recovered from the effects of his friend's obligation to return it with even superior cordiality.

„By the Holy Cross I'll make devil's meat of you!" shouted Patrick, as he flourished his weapon in the air.

„An' that's more than any man of your size in the country can do," retorted Phelim, „and bother me if I don't knock the conceit out of you." And to it they went again with a vigour and glee that showed plainly enough, that the pastime was one after their own hearts.

These two fortunates, however, were not long permitted to engross to themselves the whole pleasures of the fight. It was too great a luxury for any single couple to enjoy exclusively, and, accordingly, ere many minutes had elapsed, the row between Phelim M'Carty and Patrick O'Connor was shared by nearly a hundred friends.

On the very first appearance of a set-to between these worthies, a crowd had gradually gathered to the spot, attracted by the exhilarating prospect of a dust.

For some time the ring which had been formed around the combatants was tolerably well kept; and „Down with him, Phelim! Lay into him illegantly now, for the honour of Antrim! Wipe away the cobwebs from about him, Patrick! That's it, my jewel, dust him cleanly, rub him down handsomely!" was shouted out on all sides by the friends of either party. At length, however, the temptation to join in the frolic became too great to be resisted. The ring, after being repeatedly squeezed out of shape, and so contracted as to leave barely sufficient room for the shillelahs of the combatants, was fairly closed — and then the only thing wanting to make the row general amongst the friends of the parties was accomplished, namely, bringing them into personal contact with each other.

This, then, had no sooner taken place, than such a scene presented itself as perhaps could be nowhere witnessed out of Ireland.

In an instant, a hundred shillelahs were seen waving over the dark, dense mass of combatants beneath, and every second descending on the head of some luckless wight, either friend or foe, as chance might direct — for in this particular no great discrimination appeared to be exercised. Being by far too closely wedged together to permit of any thing like a scientific use of their weapons, the fight consisted merely in a rapid and thick ascent and descent of cudgels. In many instances, however, this constraint on the use of the national weapon, which, of course, was greatest near the centre of the hubbub, had induced the belligerents to take to their fists; and, wherever this change of offensives took place, black eyes and bloody noses prevailed over all other apparent effects of the fray.

Nor was the reckless glee which seemed to prevail amongst the combatants, their loud shouts of vengeance and threats of total annihilation to all around them, their singular oaths and imprecations, the least remarkable part of the extraordinary scene.

„Blood and blazes!" shouted out one as he furiously collared an enemy, or what was the same thing, one whom he thought so.

„Who is't that says black is the white of my eye?" inquired another, a new-comer, who with many besides was eagerly hurrying into the midst of the fray, and seemingly regretting that so much had been lost of it.

The row was now approaching its height; fists and shillelahs were plying vigorously in all directions: and murder, wounds, and confusion seemed to be carrying the day. New-comers were constantly arriving too, to increase the number of combatants, and the battle itself was gradually extending over the whole ground occupied by the fair. In fact, hundreds were now engaged on all sides who cared nothing for the original cause of the contest, and who did not know, or stop to inquire, why or wherefore they came to take a share in it.

Women and children were now heard screaming, and seen scampering away from the scene of action, in all directions. Tents were torn to pieces, stalls were overturned and trodden under foot. In short the row, in all its bearings and circumstances, was perfectly unexceptionable.

As all human enjoyments, however, are but of short duration, to this delight and glory of every true-born Irishman at length passed away. The combatants became exhausted, the darkness of night fell upon the field, the din of battle was hushed; but there was not a man there who did not retire from the scene of strife with a feeling of sincere satisfaction at the brilliant and national way in which the fair had concluded.

The Hurricane.

Various portions of our country have at different periods, suffered severely from the influence of violent storms of wind, some of which have been known to traverse nearly the whole extent of the United States, and to leave such deep impressions in their way as will not easily be forgotten. Having witnessed one of these awful phenomena, in all its grandeur, I shall attempt to describe it for your sake, kind reader, and for your sake only, the recollection of that astonishing revolution of the ethereal element, even now bringing with it so disagreeable a sensation, that I feel as if about to be affected by a sudden stoppage of the circulation of my blood.

I had left the village of Shawaney, situated on the banks of the Ohio, on my return from Henderson, which is also seated on the banks of the same beautiful stream. The weather was pleasant, and I thought not warmer than usual at that season. My horse was jogging quietly along, and my thoughts were, for once at least in the course of my life, entirely engaged in commercial speculations. I had forded Highland Creek, and was on the eve of entering a tract of bottom land or valley that lay between it and Canoe Creek, when, on a sudden, I remarked a great difference in the aspect of the heavens. A hazy thickness had overspread the country, and I for sometime expected an earthquake, but my horse exhibited no propensity to stop and prepare for such an occurrence. I had nearly arrived at the verge of the valley, when I thought fit to stop near a brook, and dismounted to quench the thirst which had come upon me.

I was leaning on my knees with my lips about to touch the water, when, from my proximity to the earth, I heard a distant murmuring sound of an extraordinary nature. I drank, however, and as I rose on my feet, looked toward the south-west, where I observed a yellowish oval spot, the appearance of which was quite new to me. Little time was left me for consideration, as the next moment a smart breeze began to agitate the taller trees. It increased to an unexpected height, and already the smaller branches and twigs were seen falling in a slanting direction towards the ground. Two minutes had scarcely elapsed, when the whole forest before me was in fearful motion. Here and there, where one tree pressed against another, a creaking noise was produced, similar to that occasioned by the violent gusts which sometimes sweep over the country. Turning instinctively towards the direction from which the wind blew, I saw, to my great astonishment, that the noblest trees of the forest bent their lofty heads for a while, and unable to stand against the blast, were falling into pieces. First, the branches were broken off with a crackling noise; then went the upper part of the massy trunks: and in many places whole trees of gigantic size were falling entire to the ground. So rapid was the progress of the storm, that before I could think of taking measures to ensure my safety, the hurricane was passing opposite the place where I stood. Never can I forget the scene which at that moment presented itself. The tops of the trees were seen moving in the strangest manner, in the central current of the tempest, which carried along with it a mingled mass of twigs and foliage, that completely obscured the view. Some of the largest trees were seen bending and writhing under the gale; others suddenly snapped across; and many, after a momentary resistance, fell uprooted to the earth. The mass of branches, twigs, foliage, and dust that moved through the air, was whirled onwards like a cloud of feathers, and on passing, disclosed a wide space filled with fallen trees, naked stumps, and heaps of shapeless ruins, which marked the path of the tempest. This space was about a fourth of a mile in breadth, and to my imagination resembled the dried up bed of the Mississippi, with its thousands of planters and sawyers, strewed in the sand, and inclined in various degrees. The horrible noise resembled that of the great cataracts of Niagara, and as it howled along the track of the desolating tempest, produced a feeling in my mind which it were impossible to describe.

The principal force of the hurricane was now over, although millions of twigs and small branches, that had been brought from a great distance, were seen following the blast, as if drawn onwards by some mysterious power. They even floated in the air for some hours after, as if supported by the thick mass of dust that rose high above the ground. The sky had now a greenish lurid hue, and an extremely disagreeable sulphureous odour was diffused in the atmosphere. I waited in amazement, having sustained no material injury, until nature at length resumed her wonted aspect. For some moments, I felt undetermined whether I should return to Morgantown, or attempt to force my way through the wrecks of the tempest. My business, however, being of an urgent nature, I ventured into the path of the storm, and after encountering innumerable difficulties, succeeded in crossing it. I was obliged to lead my horse by the bridle, to enable him to leap over the fallen trees, whilst I scrambled over or under them in the best way I could, at times so hemmed in by the broken tops and tangled branches, as almost to become desperate. On arriving at my house, I gave an account of what I had seen, when, to my surprise, I was told that there had been very little wind in the neighbourhood, although in the streets and gardens many branches and twigs had fallen in a manner which excited great surprise.

Many wondrous accounts of the devastating effects of this hurricane were circulated in the country after its occurrence. Some loghouses, we were told, had been overturned, and their inmates destroyed. One person informed me that a wire-sifter had been conveyed by the gust to a distance of many miles. Another had found a cow lodged in the fork of a large half-broken tree. But, as I am disposed to relate only what I have myself seen, I shall not lead you into the region of romance, but shall content myself with saying that much damage was done by this awful visitation. The valley is yet a desolate place, overgrown with briars and bushes, thickly entangled amidst the tops and trunks of the fallen trees, and is the resort of ravenous animals, to which they betake themselves when pursued by man, or after they have committed their depredations, on the farms of the surrounding districts. I have crossed the path of the storm, at a distance of a hundred miles from the spot where I witnessed its fury, and, again, four hundred miles farther off, in the state of Ohio. Lastly, I observed traces of its ravages on the summits of the mountains connected with the Great Pine Forest of Pennsylvania, three hundred miles beyond the place last mentioned. In all these different parts, it appeared to me not to have exceeded a quarter of mile in breadth.

Audubon.

The Butterfly.

Child of the sun! pursue thy rapturous flight,
Mingling with her thou lov'st in fields of light;
And, where the flowers of paradise unfold,
Quaff fragrant nectar from their cups of gold,
There shall thy wings, rich as an evening sky,
Expand and shut in silent ecstasy.

—— Yet wert thou once a worm, a thing that crept
On the bare earth, then wrought a tomb, and slept;
And such is man; soon from his cell of clay
To burst a seraph in the blaze of day.

Rogers.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. № 23.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

John Banim.

Es iſt bereits an einer andern Stelle in dieſer Zeitſchrift ausgeſprochen worden, daß die politiſchen Anſichten und die Parthei, zu der ein engliſcher Schriftſteller durch dieſelben gehört, keinen geringen Einfluß auf die öffentlichen Urtheile haben, welche über ſeine Leiſtungen abgegeben werden. Dieß hat Niemand mehr erfahren als der bekannte Verfaſſer der Tales of the o'Hara family, deſſen wirklicher Name die Ueberſchrift zu dieſen einleitenden Zeilen bildet. Während er auf der einen Seite bis in den Himmel erhoben und von ſeinen Verehrern für den größten engliſchen Romandichter erklärt und ſelbſt über Walter Scott geſetzt wurde, warfen ihm ſeine Gegner vor, langweilig, voll Uebertreibung und unnatürlich zu ſein. Die Wahrheit liegt wie immer in der Mitte. Von glühender Liebe für ſein unglückliches Vaterland Irland erfüllt, ſchildert er die Leiden, Verhältniſſe und Zuſtände deſſelben mit brennenden Farben, und läßt ſich allerdings oft von ſeiner Phantaſie hinreißen, ſie zu ſtark aufzutragen. Dagegen iſt ihm eine reiche, mannigfaltig ſchaffende Einbildungskraft, Tiefe und Innigkeit der Empfindung, außerordentliche Kraft der Darſtellung, ſchwärmeriſches Gefühl, und ein redlicher, wenn auch oft ſich heftig äußernder Wille eigen, und wiegt die eben angeführten, mitunter allerdings ſtark hervortretenden Fehler reichlich auf. Seine Schilderungen ſind genau und treu, und die Fabel ſeiner Erzählungen iſt immer eben ſo gut erfunden, als gleichmäßig und ohne Ermüdung durchgeführt. Im Allgemeinen verdient er daher die Anerkennung, welche ihm zu Theil geworden iſt, in hohem Grade, aber die Nachwelt wird ihm erſt volle Gerechtigkeit können widerfahren laſſen, da eine eben ſo genaue Kenntniß der von ihm mit der Treue eines Hiſtorikers und der tiefen Innigkeit eines Dichters dargeſtellten Zuſtände, als eine von allem Partheiweſen freie Geſinnung dazu gehört, ein gerechtes Urtheil über ihn zu fällen. — Dem ruhigen deutſchen Freunde wahrer poetiſcher Leiſtungen wird indeſſen die Lectüre ſeiner Schriften immer einen großen Genuß gewähren.

Ueber ſeine Schickſale iſt weiter nichts bekannt, als daß er gegenwärtig als Privatmann von ſchweren körperlichen Leiden heimgeſucht, zu Paris lebt. Er trat zuerſt mit den Tales of the o'Hara family (erſte Reihe 1825, zweite Reihe 1827) auf, dieſen folgten The battle of the Boyne, the Croppy, the Denounced, the Smuggler, the Mayor of Wind-Gap u. A. m., auch ſchrieb er verſchiedene kleinere Erzählungen und Aufſätze für engliſche Zeitſchriften.

The Irish Lord Lieutenant and his Double.

By the Author of „the O'Hara Tales."

It is really quite true that some time ago, and not long ago either, there was a London gentleman who took a strange fit of ambition into his head. His partial friends, or himself alone of his own accord, or he, in concert with them, believed that he bore, in face, air, and even in the upper part of his figure, a striking resemblance to a certain nobleman, who had become highly distinguished in the annals of fame by brilliant qualities of various kinds. In truth there was a likeness, but a general one only, between him and the celebrated Duke (or Marquis — at present we cannot declare which ought to be the proper title), and, highly flattered by this personal compliment of nature, he did all in his power to seem „the very image." He studied his original as closely as the nobleman's appearance in public, in the streets, in the parks, in „the house," gave him opportunities for doing so; and, in consequence of his observations, he changed his elongated hat for one of a round fashion, and his light hair for a sandy-coloured, or haply (for we hate being as demonstrative as he himself was) a raven-black wig; he instructed his tailor how to cut his coat; he spent hours before his glass, practising the very tie of his neck-cloth—to say nothing of the other hours occupied, by its aid, in trying to imitate a bow, a smile, a turn of the lip, or a droop or a toss of the head. But, although much was gained by all these adaptations and labours, something yet remained to be done, in order to procure a public and general misconception of who he was: for the Double's great longing consisted of a wish to have people gaze after him in the streets, in proof of how well he enacted his mute lie; and here (as regarded self-exhibition in the streets) lay his difficulty. At home, indeed, or in the houses of his particular friends, while he sat quietly at table, he succeeded amazingly well, because, in fact, in a sitting posture, you could not so easily detect that his figure was considerably shorter than the noble one of his supposed counterpart; but one cannot well sit down, out of doors, in a thronged metropolis; unless indeed, one sits in a saddle, on horseback; and even if one could do the former-mentioned feat, it were of no avail in this particular case, inasmuch as the man to be cheated out of the admiration due exclusively to his own person, never did it; and as to sitting in a saddle, our gentleman had no saddle, not to talk of a horse's back to put it on. Truth must out, although „a real gentleman," the high prices at which human existence, with a reasonable share of enjoyment superadded, must be purchased in London, had deterred his hitherto economical and rational mind from attempting the keep of a steed worthy of being seen in and about the great city.

But what will not high ambition endeavour on the road to its object? The Double, after pondering the matter some time, started off, after breakfast, one morning, to scrutinize the studs of sundry livery-stables, of respectable character though reasonable charges; and with a vivid recollection in his mind of the often-contemplated horse most usually ridden about town by his own original, he selected, before dinner, an excellent likeness of the animal, and hired it, for two days in each week, at not a very extravagant price. And now, if ever a man were on his hobby-horse, surely he was on his; and twice every week, for months afterwards, we have seen him, at fashionable hours, walking or trotting, nay, even galloping, his new acquisition, up and down Piccadilly, and by Hyde Park Corner into Grosvenor place, and about the Parks, and where not; and veritable attention did they both draw from individuals of the passing crowds, who, having never seen the true man and horse anywhere but in the open air, were promptly imposed upon; nor is that all; but once or twice in the Ring in Hyde Park, we, and others along with us (for, at the time we speak of, he was beginning to be known among us knowing ones, as Master Shallow might say)—have seen him bowed, or smiled, or kissed fingertips to, out of carriages which he rapidly passed in the direction opposite to their motion; and, oh, intoxicating spirit of fame! what a happy glow did not these palpable hits impart to the countenance of the successful aspirant! Indeed, it cannot be guessed by what process of reasoning (to say little of feeling) he then deemed himself honoured in his own mind, on account of only being mistaken for a celebrated person. What, then, were the grounds upon which the poor Double so anxiously would have disowned his identity? (so anxiously, indeed, that we do believe he was ready and willing to sell himself to the devil, as Doctor Faustus did, could the bargain have ensured to him as perfect a change into the likeness he thirsted after, as was the change from youth to age ensured to the doctor by his bargain.) But 'tis useless multiplying questions or conjectures on the subject; we only know that, in a vein of perfect consistency, he was nearly as proud of the deception practised by his hired horse, as of that toiled after by himself; that he often wished the poor brute were conscious of the laurels he had gained; and that, wiping his brows with a handkerchief in a way he had once seen his better self do, he has been heard to say, after returning from a day's exhibition about town, „I do own myself grateful and proud for having been cast in the same mould with that great man!"

And so far, for months as has been said, he passed a very happy life; when suddenly there arose a prospect of great interruption to the gathering of the triumphs of his deceptive existence. It was clear that if the nobleman were known to have left London, he could scarce hope to make people go on believing that he was still in London; unless, indeed, he wished to frighten passengers in the streets out of their senses, by being taken for the wraith or fetch of the absent public character. In fact, to continue in the glory of the occasional doubt that he was somebody else, the Double was [illegible] tied to the place, though not to the spot of the place, inhabited by that somebody; and considerable, therefore, were his anxieties, and sorrow, and sense of humiliation, when he read in the papers that the noble and gallant officer was to go over immediately to Ireland as the Vice-King, or Lord Lieutenant.

True, the high appointment flattered his vanity, in a kind of personal way. He felt it as an additional homage very nearly paid to himself; and strongly was he tempted to spend the summer, at least, in the Irish metropolis, in the hope of coming in for his just share of the usual public, that is street, worship, to be paid to the representative of royalty. But then, first of all, he feared, if he did not dislike, the Irish; and they were at that time more to be feared than ever, many of the counties of their country being in open insurrection, famine, and typhus-fever. And next, what was he to do for his well-esteemed horse, in Dublin? he could not think of purchasing him, — the price was too much even for ambition to pay, taking purse into account; but by no other arrangement could he prevail on the owner of the livery-stables to allow the distinguished animal to [illegible] within view of Ireland's Eye (the little island so called in the bay of Dublin): and, in a word, (and, alas!) the newly-appointed Vice-King sailed for his Irish capital, while his disconsolate Double remained, still here by indecision, in London.

Scarce a month had elapsed, however, after the Lord Lieutenant's arrival in the land (sometimes) of potatoes, when the good folks of Dublin began to be puzzled, as their brethren of London had been, by the vision of his copyist, riding about the main streets, or along the beautiful quays, or in the Phœnix Park; the horse, too, whether the London one or not, being a very good similitude. One fortunate circumstance was in favour of our adventurer. The Lord Lieutenant (though he stuck no great bunch of shamrock in his hat or on his breast, and pointed at, or pressed his hand upon it, as some people had done before him) was beginning to be very popular, in consequence of a mode of conduct, so manly, and so suitable to his nature, as it was good in policy. In truth, from almost the day of his arrival, he had thrown himself upon the confidence of the people, asking the higher classes of them to share his hospitality, or [illegible] measuredly sharing theirs, and showing himself in public, with the least ostentation possible, to the other classes. To come to our point: he began soon to ride through the streets, very often quite alone: and here, it will be perceived, was the circumstance in favour of his untired and untiring mimic of which we have already spoken. Here was the Vice-Sovereign in a situation susceptible of perfect imitation by one man and horse; and it is quite true that the lonely impostor sometimes succeeded to his heart's content in consequence; hats and caps were taken off to him by men and boys at either side of the streets, as he rode along, bowing and smiling to a degree of similarity only conferable by long practice; and having heard that the object of his mixed adoration and self-esteem had alighted one day at the door of a pastrycook's shop, and chatted amiably with the pretty girl behind the counter, he also did dismount at the door of another shop of the same kind, and did also overwhelm with a sense of being inexpressibly honoured and lifted out of herself, the not so pretty handmaiden of the rival establishment; and after all this, he would steal away, horse and self, to deposit the former in his livery-stable, and then win, by circuitous and unfrequented ways, his own humble lodgings, and sit down, a delighted man, to his chop or his steak, not now playing the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to his orderly landlady or her smoke-dried daughter; though indeed it added to his notions of self-consequence in the house, to hear them begin to say—even while he strove to divest himself of the character—„how very like he was.“

But his happiness was again doomed to be sadly interrupted. It was announced that the Lord Lieutenant would speedily set out on a tour through some of the counties in Ireland, and some of the disturbed ones too! For all the reasons—and more with them—given for his internal troubles when he heard of the intended voyage from London to Dublin, he felt agitated anew. Doubtless, the Irish he had met with in Dublin, itself, were not so much to be dreaded as he had laid the thing down in his own mind; but the barbarians of the insurrectionary and remote quarters of the country! the savages, whooping among their hills and bogs, with scythes and pikes in their hands! His soul, although nothing of its darling thirst for renown had abated, shrunk from such a prospect of peril. Besides, would there be much glory, worthy of the name, to be gained by the mistakes of his person committed by the populace of small towns or villages, or by peasants on the road-side, even supposing he should escape danger? Yes! and a new and brilliant ray of future fame flashed on his soul. Yes! by some happy combination of circumstances, in his character of Lord Lieutenant, he, also — and he, really — might allay an Irish rebellion, or stanch the wounds of civil discord. But fears, deadly fears, came on him again. His horse, too, as in a former case? — In truth, we must a second time part from him undecided, and a prey to conflicting wishes and doubts, longings and terrors; and in the mean time, after some other things, let us occupy ourselves a little with his reality.

This was not a year of rank insurrection, in any of the usually disturbed (that is, starving!) districts of Ireland. Great outrages were not committed by the neglected, uneducated, and despairing peasantry. The chief feature of their refractory spirit, for the season, was evinced in combinations and determinations not to cut down the corn of any of their landowners, no matter of what degree, who, during the speechifying of a recent election, we believe, had thought proper to give them rather hard words.

„An' so, we're not so much as to lay a finger on the poor Capt'n's wheat, either, Con?“ asked one of a body of legislators among them, who were assembled, by stealth, at a late hour of the night, in an old barn, for the purpose of organizing the rebellious proceedings of the next day; — it will be understood that the querist spoke in a tone of mock compassion for „the poor Capt'n,“ while his features expressed a bitter sneer.

„The divels a grain of it 'ill ever lie in shape wid help from our holy Roman reaping-hooks, Micky, mo-bouchal," answered Con, who might be termed chairman of their committee of public safety, though, indeed, he was only squatted on a thin lair of old straw, accidentally found in the empty barn.

„Och, an' its like, if we don't cut it for him, that he'll be forced to send a little way to the north for the rale Orange lads," remarked a third, — "becase, ye see, boys, we're only all a set o' the heavy-brutes o' Romans that's to be found about him, in these parts, and that he said, out afore all the gintlemen, th' other day, wasn't fit to be trusted wid a pair o' tongs, as we war'nt, the Lord look down on us!" —

„Asto," resumed Micky — „an' sure if he can stop his nose at us, afore the wheat is ripe, he can do widout us, when it's ready to shell itself about the fields."

„That's a thruth," said another — „an', sure, when the people that God plased to put in a counthry, aren't fit to cut the harvest that God put in it too, why, thin, the Cap'n need only thry to send for the Orangemen, the five hundred miles, as my gossip here told ye afore now, or else see how many rale, honest boys, like 'em, he'll be able to get in the barony."

„An' they're easily counted," resumed Con, the chairman, — „four of 'em, all in a lump; ould Spear, with the head shakin' on his shoulthers, like the last leaf on the top of a poplar in that crow „sayin'" to his [illegible], the minister, in the church, every Sunday, — ould Spear, I say, is one; thin there's the two Hacks, brothers, the weavers; the only bodies that hears ould Spear in the church, or does be there to hear him, barrin the minister's own wife and childer, and the Cap'n himself, long life to him — an' to his whiskey, too — the Hacks is — stop — ould Spear is one — yes — the two Hacks is three — [illegible] so were away with the cattle, and goin' in whither to a could church, that — but, look up there boys!" cried the speaker, suddenly interrupting himself, as he stared towards the roof of the barn. The eyes of all the other rebels followed his, and fixed upon the face of a man which was visible thro' a rent in the thatch, and which earnestly regarded them.

„It's Cummins, the informer!" — shouted Micky — „out wid us, boys, an' let us give him what some of us owes him, at last!"

„I'm no Cummins, and I'm no informer," said the man overhead, „stop where ye are, boys, and look at my features again."

„By the mortial man!" cried one of the conspirators, a young, taciturn, sad-browed fellow, who previously had not uttered a word, tho' he now spoke with remarkable liveliness of voice and manner, as he sprung from his primitive seat on his heels by the rough wall of the building — „By the mortial man, an' he says thrue! — it's poor Ned Cahill is in it, if he's a livin' man this night!"

„You're not far off from the mark, Peery O'Dea," replied the intruder — „and, now that you're sure o'me won't you and the other boys let me step down among ye, to discourse one word?" — He prepared to descend thro' the aperture as he spoke; his face disappeared from it; his legs, his body, took the place of the former; then he swung an instant, by the hands, from the rude joists of the roof, and saying — „Isn't the same way some people 'ud like to see me hangin', boys" — he alighted firmly on his outspread feet, in the middle of the earthen floor of the barn. There was ease, agility, and lightness in all his motions while accomplishing this not unperilous descent; and now, the moonlight which illumined the council of the disaffected Irish, showed the person of a slight-limbed man of thirty, or thereabouts, with broad chest and shoulders, and a well-favoured face, of which the only disagreeable expression was the suspicious curl of the brow, and the sidelong quick glance of the eye.

„Musha, my poor fellow! poor Ned! resumed Peery O'Dea, hastening to him, and there were tears in Peery's eyes, and a tremor in his limbs, while they interchanged the usual salute — kissing each other's cheeks, as they held each other's hands. The other peasants looked on, with various expres-

[illegible] of countenance. Some showed sympathy; some anxiety, perhaps for themselves; and one or two regarded the new comer, as if forming a selfish resolution towards him.

„And how is Nelly, ma-bouchal?" demanded Ned Cahill.

„The only sister o' yours is brave an' hearty," answered Peery O'Finn — „if it wasn't for thinkin' a great dale about you, Ned, an' crying, mornin', noon, and night, on the head of it all."

„An' her gossoon?" continued Cahill.

„As fine a lump of a boy as ever you ——" began the vain father. His brother-in-law interrupted him.

„Oh, well, — sure I know, Peery; Nelly's gossoon 'll want no praises you can give him: but that's not the business, now. I cum here, a good stretch o' road, to spake o' something else to you and the boys forenent me, only I'm hungry, not to say drouthy, an' 'ud ate a bit an' a sup afore I make my oration; so you'll just step out, a-vich, and beg a mouthful for me from Nelly, and tell her I'll see her, may be, the night, afore I take to my thravels again."

„I'll run out," volunteered one of the two men, whom we have mentioned as glancing at Cahill in a questionable way, „I'll run out, Peery; an' you can be stoppin' wid your brother-in-law."

„No," said Cahill, fixing upon him an expressive look — „no, neighbour (we're all neighbours afther a manner, tho' I won't take it on me to say I ever saw much of you afore); but no, neither Peery nor you need go now. Con, my boy," turning hastily to the ex-chief of the assembly, „you and I are ould friends, an' you'll think it no great throuble to run and get a morsel to ate for a hungry and a tired man."

„Your [illegible] just sayin' it, Ned a-vich," responded Con, and he soon got [illegible] towards the badly secured and crazy door of the barn. „I'll let you out, my own self," continued Cahill, — „there," holding the door only a little way open, while he again glanced keenly around him, „an' now God speed you!" he shut the door, and secured it as he had found it; „and you and I, Peery, can just step, the closest at any, to the door; for who knows who might be on the scent of one of us abroad; there's great temptation, boys," turning to the legislators, as he drew a pistol from his breast, „great temptation even among neighbours sometimes, in the reward offered for the head of a poor outlaw."

Short answers, yet such as sympathized with Cahill's wellknown position, or seemed to do so, came from the greater number of his hearers after he had spoken: but Peery O'Finn was greatly moved; his friends heard him groan as he turned away his face.

„It's a long time since you cum this road afore, Ned," remarked Micky before named, „tho' we heard tell of you showing yourself, here and there, in other places."

„Aye, Micky, the life I'm forced to keep isn't the pleasantest: here an' there, as you say, good weather and bad; sleepin' little, and never two nights together on the same spot, an' never under a christian roof, but out in the fields at the snug side of a stack, or in a wood, or in a plantation, or near the fox's hole, or down by the river near the otter's bed; and all for fear of what I said a moment ago. The neighbours are very good to me — I'll never deny it; and, as yet, I have no rason to be in dread or doubt of any one; but the reward in the proclamation is a heavy one; that's all I have to say."

He started slightly, Peery sharing his emotion, as a woman's voice came to the door, at the outside, high in anxiety, if not lamentation. Cahill, after listening a moment, hastily undid a second time the fastenings of the door, using, however, some caution still, and after saying in a whisper to Peery, „Look about you," opened his arms to embrace his only sister, whom he had not for a long time seen, and who was his nearest surviving relation.

Their meeting evinced deep and true affection on both sides. The young woman had an interesting if not handsome face, and her person just began to indicate the matronly change, which her characters and duties of wife and mother were working in her mind. She wept abundantly.

while her arms surrounded his neck, and her face lay hidden on his bosom; but for some minutes her attempts to speak could not get beyond, „Oh, Ned! oh, poor Ned!“ Nor was the rough man she clung to unmoved.

At length they began to talk a little more freely, and calling to mind the claim which her brother had forwarded by Con upon her hospitality, „Mary O'Brien caused the outlaw to sit down near the door, with his back to the wall, upon her ample cloak folded into a temporary cushion; and confronting him, sitting also „on her hunkers,“ she gave him to eat of the plain fare she was able to snatch up at home, and to drink, too, out of a bottle of „potheen,“ diluted with water. During her attentions, and his industry in consequence of them, Mary looked every other instant at her brother's features, or scanned his person, or perhaps the state of his attire, while tears still flowed down her cheeks and plaintive mutterings escaped her. Poor Mary, poor as she was, deserves to be called a good specimen of the only really beautiful existence under Heaven's sun, a true-hearted and gentle-hearted woman; she possessed, too, as may appear, what (thank Providence!) often mixes up with female excellence in the safest shape, a strong, prompt mind, and a sacred sense of right and wrong.

„An' won't you stop wid us the night, Ned, agrah?“ she asked, towards the conclusion of his hasty meal.

„You oughtn't to say to me, won't you Ned, but can you, Mary acushla,“ he answered, turning his head to the door to note if Peery continued to do his duty at it, with the pistol he had slipped into his hand; „that's what you ought to say to me, Mary; but little's the use in thinkin' of the thing the heart 'ud like best to do, when a body isn't able to do it.“

„I'll do something to get you leave to do that, Ned, my dear, afore I'm many days ouldher,“ resumed Mary, glancing at her husband, and, with a nod of her head, looking expressively at her brother, while she spoke in a low, cautious voice.

„Mary! Mary acthore!“ he said, in the lowest whisper, although its cadence betokened sudden and deep emotion, „what are you for saying, girl? Get up, and come this way wid me.“

He took her by the arm, and led her into a corner of the barn where they were far removed from the peasants.

„What's this, at all?“ he continued; „tell me in one word, Mary!“

„I know all about it at last, Ned, and I'll do my best to free you from the outlawry,“ she replied.

„Dround!“ he cried impatiently; „the woman has taken lave of her seven senses! — all about what? and what would you dhrame o' doing? and who towld you, Mary, if you do know all?“

„Himself, Ned.“

(To be concluded in our next.)

What 's hallowed Ground.

What 's hallowed ground? Hath earth a clod
Its Maker meant not should be trod
By man, the image of his God,
Erect and free,
Unscourged by Superstition's rod
To bow the knee?

That 's hallowed ground — where, mourned and missed,
The lips repose our love has kissed; —
But where 's their memory's mansion? Is 't
Yon churchyard's bowers?
No! in ourselves their souls exist,
A part of ours.

A kiss can consecrate the ground
Where mated hearts are mutual bound:
The spot where love's first links were wound,
That ne'er are riven,
Is hallowed, down to earth's profound,
And up to heaven!

For time makes all but true love old;
The burning thoughts that then were told
Run molten still in memory's mould,
And will not cool

Until the heart itself be cold
In Lethe's pool.

What hallows ground where heroes sleep?
'T is not the sculptured piles you heap:
In dews that heavens far distant weep
Their turf may bloom;
Or Genii twine beneath the deep
Their coral tomb.

But strew his ashes to the wind,
Whose sword or voice has served mankind —
And is he dead, whose glorious mind
Lifts thine on high?
To live in hearts we leave behind,
Is not to die.

Is 't death to fall for Freedom's right?
He 's dead alone that lacks her light!
And murder sullies, in Heaven's sight,
The sword he draws: —
What can alone ennoble fight?
A noble cause!

Give that! and welcome War to brace
Her drums! and rend heaven's reeking space
The colours planted face to face,
The charging cheer,
Though Death's pale horse lead on the chase,
Shall still be dear.

And place our trophies where men kneel
To Heaven! — But Heaven rebukes my zeal;
The cause of truth and human weal,
O God above!
Transfer it from the sword's appeal
To peace and love!

Peace, Love — the cherubim that join
Their spread wings o'er Devotion's shrine —
Prayers sound in vain, and temples shine,
Where they are not;
The heart alone can make divine
Religion's spot.

To incantations dost thou trust,
And pompous rites in domes august!
See mouldering stones and metal's rust
Belie the vaunt,
That men can bless one pile of dust
With chime or chaunt.

The ticking wood-worm mocks thee, man!
Thy temples — creeds themselves grow wan;
But there 's a dome of nobler span,
A temple given
Thy faith, that bigots dare not ban —
Its space is heaven!

Its roof star-pictured, Nature's ceiling,
Where trancing the rapt spirit's feeling,
And God himself to man revealing,
The harmonious spheres
Make music, though unheard their pealing
By mortal ears.

Fair Stars! are not your beings pure?
Can sin, can death, your worlds obscure?
Else why so swell the thoughts at your Aspect above?
Ye must be heavens that make us sure
Of heavenly love!

And in your harmony sublime
I read the doom of distant time;
That man's regenerate soul from crime
Shall yet be drawn,
And reason on his mortal clime
Immortal dawn.

What 's hallowed ground? 'Tis what gives birth
To sacred thoughts in souls of worth!
Peace! Independence! Truth! go forth
Earth's compass round;
And your high-priesthood shall make earth
All hallowed ground!

Campbell.

Der BRITISH MUSEUM [illegible]

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 24.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Irish Lord Lieutenant and his Double.

By the Author of „the O'Hara Tales.“

(Concluded from our last.)

„Peery, his own self!“ he demanded. „No other crather; who could? Poor fellow, he couldn't long keep it from me; the heart in his body is too straight, and it loves and likes us both too well to let him lie down quietly, and you —“

„Whisht, Mary, for your life! whisht!“ he cast his suspicious eyes all around him. „Musha, but he's a born fool of his mother to open his lips to you a word about it! an' tell me, Mary, what are you goin' to do? what can you say that wouldn't be against your own husband — the father of your creatures?“ he continued passionately, „and dare you, Mary — dare you attempt any thing so unnatural as that? Mary, my curse be upon your head — and I will pray to our father and our mother to curse you out of their graves, if you let only the thought of it come into your mind!“ She several times strove to speak, he seemed resolved to afford her no opportunity; „give over thinking of it I warn you!“ he went on, „and now good bye and God bless you, if you deserve his blessing; good bye, Mary, I'll see you again as soon as I can!“ He hastily turned from her, and, standing with his back to the door, continued speaking to the peasants, without an instant's pause, „I'm goin' my road, boys, and as my time is short, I must say what I have to say to ye, at a hop-and-a-jump; so here it is. The Lord Lieutenant will be down among ye the morrow morning. He's to stop wid a good friend of yours, I hear, and that's like as if he wasn't far off from being a good friend himself. I don't want to advise ye to be good boys forenent his eyes; sure you'll thrate him well of your own accord, because ye all know he means well to us (the first of his kind that ever said so, at least), and more betoken because he goes about the poor country like a man who has trust in his poor people, ridin' his horse, sometimes, almost alone, along bye roads and boreens, as simple, ay, and a great deal simpler than some o' the little squireens nigh hand to us; well, if it's a thing that Captain Lighton axes the Lord Lieutenant to ax ye to cut his harvest, it would only be a good turn, afther all, not to refuse; it may sarve yourselves; and may be it might sarve me, too, in an endeavour I'm goin' to make to get leave to come home from my rambles, and take to arning an honest mouthful again; and so, there's what I'm come a begging to ye for; and, now the good night to ye, boys, or the top o' the morning; for that matter the day's breakin' already. God speed ye.“

„Peery O'Hea,“ he added, whispering to his brother-in-law, „help me to open this cauld door, quick, quick! and out wid you now like a lurcher afore me! and let us run over a field or two together. I want to spake to you, and keep you free of harm! Come man, hurry!" He seized Peery's arm, and almost forced him through the door-way; and when Mary and some of the peasants went out to look after them, the brothers-in-law were not to be seen. Mary pondered a moment, shook her head, and then bent her steps homewards, little changed in the resolution she had taken to try and restore her brother to society.

„What fool's talk has passed between you and Mary, Peery O'Dea?" asked Cahill, when they had gained their place of concealment, the ruins of an old castle, which overhung the main road to their village.

„Ned," answered Peery, "you know I've told her all; don't fly in a passion wid me; I saw ye discoursin' together in the barn, and it was asy to guess what Mary was sayin' to you."

„An' that's the way you keep your promise wid me?" — questioned Ned.

„I couldn't help it, Ned Cahill, asthore. It was lyin' like a heavy stone on my heart. Sure enough, we both thought it would be for the best; I to hould my tongue an' they to-work for her and the weeneach while you were only forced to hide yourself for a start. But I'll tell you what it is, Ned; the minute I heard of them takin' you, I set off for the jail door, to give myself up to them in your stead, as it well become me to do; an' nothin' but the news I larned on the road o' your breakin' jail, an' givin' 'em leg bail, the thing that put the out-lawry on you, afther all, poor boy, nothin' but that sent me home agin. Ay, an' I have more to say to you, Ned Cahill; the first moment I hear of your falling into their clutches a second time, I'll be on the road to the jail door a second time too; for I can't eat by day, nor sleep by night, thinkin' o' you. An' afther all we can say about Mary and the child, my heart tells me I'm not doin' a thing that a man ought to do."

„Bother an' botheration, Peery; do you mane to tell me, even if it did happen that I was locked up agin, that it would be the part of a man to start himself off, of his own accord, from wife an' weeneach; to say nothin' o' the poor ould father o' you sittin' at home by the fire; an' let them send you for life across the wide seys, if they didn't take the life from you afore-hand? I tell you, man, you have your duties laid out for you on this earth; as for me, no one is dependin' on me, and no one 'ud miss me barrin' yourself an' Mary; an' even ye only for the sorrow, an' nothing at all for the loss; an' I am not a boy given to marryin', I don't think the notion of id 'll ever come into my head agin; for, in throth, Peery, from the day I helped to carry poor Cauth Farrel to the berrin-ground, afther the long sickness that made her a light load to carry any where afore it ended her days" — Cahill's voice changed, and his eyes fell — „from that day to this, Peery, though I was a younger boy then, I never saw the colleen I'd care to be thinkin' of; no, nor wanted to see her neither. But we're talkin' a power o' roumaush here, in this old place. Tell me, Peery, an' don't tell me any thing but the thruth, how much o' the real business did you blab out to Mary?"

„I didn't hide a single bit of the real business, Ned. I tould her that it was myself (an' you not wid us nor in the secret) that went up to Lighton's house that night, for the arms, along wid the other boys; an' I tould her you only follied us to get me home out o' danger, when, by bad luck, you found out what I was goin' to do; and that when the Peelers purshued us, afther we got the guns and pistols, and were hard and close on my thrack, you ran up to me, Ned, and forced my gun from me, an' made me turn off home by a cross-cut; och, Ned! if it could come into my mind that night, what you were goin' to do —"

„Pua, Peery, I never meant they should ketch either of us, when I took your gun, an' if you were bid by me to use your legs sooner, they never would have to tell that they came up wid me; 'twas our argufyin' the thing that spiled all. Well, no matther now. Just listen to me over age. What's Mary goin' to do, to stay an' get no free o' the contrairy? can you tell me that, Peery?" Peery solemnly protested he could not, he had never heard his wife mention the subject. Cahill looked grave, and, after a pause, kindling into a rage, said, „By the sky over us! if my sisther, my father's and my mother's daughther, ever attempts the like of it, I could kill her with my own hand!"

Peery asked what he meant; and it was obvious from his perfectly unconscious manner, that he did not share with his brother-in-law a single doubt of Mary. — Cahill evaded answering him.

„You must stay the day by my side, Peery — that's all; or as much of the day, at least, as 'll be wanting to do what I mean to do in. An', first of all, let us bide here till the Lord Lieutenant passes by to Mr. Lowe's big house; I'd like to see him, that I may know him agin; an' he 'll soon come now, for Mr. Lowe expects him to the great breakfast."

Accordingly, both remained in the old ruinous house, peering out upon the road through narrow window-slits in its walls. And Ned Cahill seemed to have gained true information as to the movements of Vice-Royalty. After some time distant shouts reached them; they watched the top line of the hilly road; the uproar came nearer; clouds of dust arose in view; and, dimly seen through it, down streamed and trundled the crowds of peasantry, who were drawing his Excellency, with silken ropes, in his open carriage, and the huge crowds who, jumping and shouting, were before them, beside them, and behind them and Mr. Lowe, and other gentlemen of the place, on horseback, in front; „an' not a soger nor a Peeler to be seen!" — as the ecstatic mob declared, and truly declared, the ecstatic mob, who, not two years before, had been enjoying the Insurrection Act, and who have not remained quite ecstatic, ever since that blessed morning.

„I'm tould I'll know him in the carriage by his takin' off his hat and makin' all manner o' bows and fine manners to the people;" — soliloquized Cahill, looking close, as the female rout whirled onward the truly and meritedly popular Lord Lieutenant, often tumbling over each other, in the miserable zeal of each and all to „have one pull at the ropes."

„Well, an' there I seen him, sure enough," resumed Cahill, „an' it 'ill be quare if I don't know him agin, after he ates his breakfast — much good may it do him, every bit an' sup of it!"

At Mr. Lowe's hall-door the people permitted his Excellency to stop. Their parish priest there read him a little address, to which he replied kindly, in impromptu. Again we have to notice the correctness of Ned Cahill's private sources of information. Captain Lighton, who, with other gentlemen, had ridden out that morning to meet the great man, handed a note into the carriage. The Lord Lieutenant, interrupting a few words of conversation with the parish priest, immediately glanced over it, and then, saying something in a low voice, gave it to his late reverend panegyrist, who having perused it in his turn, thus addressed the assembled thousands.

„My good people — down to this morning ye have refused, even against my request, to cut Captain Lighton's corn; here is his Excellency, the Lord Lieutenant General, and General Governor of Ireland, and your friend, if you will let him, by deserving his friendship, — and through my mouth his Excellency is pleased to ask ye, will you, or will you not, save the blessed harvest that Divine Providence — —"

„We will, plase his Majesty and your Riverince;" interrupted a voice very like that of „Con;" — „we will, out o' glory to him, for axin us, — an' for another little raison, bekase poor Ned Cahill, that we're all sorry for, an' love an' like, is afther biddin us do the same thing aforehand."

„Ned Cahill! the poor outlaw!" resumed the good priest, forgetting a little chagrin he had felt, on the head of being cheated out of a very pretty peroration, by Con's interruption: and he and the Lord Lieutenant began to discourse anew, in seeming earnestness.

Ned Cahill and Peery O'Dea soon had proof, from a changed hiding-place, that the people respected Dan's pledge as their spokesman; shouting and capering, and brandishing their sickles, hundreds of them rushed into the Captain's fields, and simultaneously attacked all the ripe corn they could find.

And still the outlaw showed a knowledge of how more important people were to act upon that — to him — memorable day. Having again spirited Peery along with him to a convenient place of ambush, he watched, earnestly, the expected approach of the Lord Lieutenant, along a bye-road leading, zig-zag, from Mr. Lowe's house. Peery knew his purpose by this time, and awaited its issue with his own mental reservations of what he would do, should evil come of Ned's bold thought.

„Whisht, Peery!" cried Cahill, catching his arm, as he glanced over the hedge of the road, with a sparkling eye, and suddenly flaring cheeks: — „here he is, sooner than I or others had a notion of! — and ridin, quite alone, too, by the Powers! — not an [illegible], nor Misther Lowe, himself, wid him! — well, an' that's queer! but I s'pose they're behind the turn o' the road; or, at any rate, it's all the better for me — so here goes, in the name o' God and good luck!" — and springing upon the road, and falling instantly upon his knees, straight before the object of his soul's solicitude and reverence, he continued, — „Oh, your Excellency! oh, my Lord Lieutenant! — oh, plase your Majesty, hear one word from a poor, heart-sore man!"

„Wha — a — t, what, what, friend?" stuttered the person he addressed, endeavouring to rein in and quiet his horse, who had been amazingly startled at the sudden vision of Cahill; and, indeed, the horse's master did not speak or look like a man of perfect presence of mind.

„My life, my life!" resumed Cahill; „wait, your honour, my Lord Lieutenant, an' I'll hould him, for you;" — and he jumped up and grasped the horse's reins — „an' now — —"

„Let go, fellow! let go!" — screamed the rider, in increased terror, for, from Cahill's brogue and impassioned pronunciation, he had mistaken the possessive pronoun which the suppliant had placed before the word „life."

„Och, an' won't I, your Majesty, won't I, when you only hear me spake one word! — sure I'm no one else in the world, but poor Cahill the outlaw, that your Majesty —"

„Outlaw!" repeated the other — „savage villain! do you mean to murder me?"

„Murder you, my Lord Lieutenant!" repeated poor Cahill, in his turn, letting go the reins, and starting back, aghast, with clasped hands — „By the blessed stars in the sky! I love an' like you so well, that I wouldn't harm a hair o' your horse's mane, let alone one o' your own head, for the round world stuffed full of gold!"

„And why do you carry that pistol, then?" still stammered the poor Double, now a little steadied, however, by the heated flattery of Cahill, and the repetitions of the splendid titles addressed to him.

„This, the bit of a pistol, my lord?" Cahill drew it from his breast, where its butt had not been well hidden — „och, an' is id me you fear, on the head o' this? — lookee here, plase your Majesty —"

He discharged the weapon in the air, close by the horse's ears, however; the animal pranced and reared in a frenzy of terror, and his rider, still sharing his feelings, could scarce keep his saddle.

„An' see here, agin" — continued Cahill hurling the pistol from him — an action lost to the confounded and dancing eyes of the Double — „and now, at last, your Majesty 'ill plase to hear me!" — he renewed his grasp on the horse's bridle, really only meaning well — „you put the outlawry on an innocent poor man, my Lord Lieutenant! — one that never riz a hand, for bad, in the country! — oh, take it off o' me! Let me go home from the hills and the woods, agin, to sleep undher a christhen roof, an' to meet my fellow creatures without bein' afeard o' them, an' to put my hand to the spade or the plough, agin, that I may ern the honest lit, and the honest sup, an' that I may go to the house o' God, an' kneel down, there, and put up my prayers for you an' yours, to the last day I draw the breath o' life! — ochone, take it off o' me, an' may you reign long in glory, an' die happy! — It's an innocent poor boy! — Say the word out o' your mouth, say the word, an' do a good action! say the word, an' —“

„Well, well, well, man“ — interrupted the Double, his fears now only divided between the uncertainty whether he had to do with a wild-Irish assassin, or a wild-Irish madman — „I — don't you pull me about so, and we shall see — let go the bridle and I will say the word — there stand aside, now, and you may regard yourself as a free man.“

„Hurrah!“ screamed Cahill, jumping up a good height from the ground, as he smote his breast in utter joy — „Peery O'Dea, inside the fence there, do you hear that?“

„Hurrah! an' it's I that do!“ answered Peery, with another shout, discovering himself.

„It's off o' me!“ it's off o' me!“ continued Cahill, hugging his brother-in-law, — „isn't it, your honour-in-glory — isn't it?“

„It is, it is — to be sure it is — have I not said so? I revoke every thing — only won't you and the other man move away from my horse's head? So — good day to you both — all's right — good day ——“ and seeing the road at last clear before him, the speaker gave spur and rein to his horse, and was out of sight in a moment — ay, and out of Ireland in some hours after, from the nearest sea-port, cured, in a degree, of performing his absurd and miserable impostures in it.

„There you go, an' may honour an' glory be in your road, afore you!“ — Cahill continued to shout.

„There you go, an' may you never know what it is to have a heart as heavy as the hearts you're aither makin' happy, this day!“ — added Peery.

„Stand!“ cried voices at their backs — „one of you is Cahill, the outlaw.“ They turned, and saw half a dozen police, who, with presented carbines, immediately surrounded them.

„Bother, boys, wid your ‚stand!‘“ — answered Ned — „I'm Cahill, sure enough, but no outlaw, this blessed day, thank God, an' his honour the Lord Lieutenant! Hurrah!“! — he jumped again.

„Come, come — your arms“ — said the serjeant of the party.

„Arms? sorrow a one I have, barrin' the two God gave me; — a little while ago, to tell truth, I had a sort of an ould pistol wid me — but I shot the bullet of it up into the air, an' flung after the bullet, to the devils, entirely — an' its my word I give you, Misther Peelers, besides, that, from this day, out“ ——

„Search him,“ — interrupted the serjeant.

„Here, then — search — search, search — ah, wid all my heart. I tell you, boys, it's only givin' yourselves throuble for nothin'!“

„Fall in with the men, then, and march for jail,“ commanded the serjeant, when the useless search was ended.

„Jail? me march for jail? ye're mad to spake of it. It's more than your lives are worth to use the words. Take good care what you're for doin'!“

„Come, fall in: — where are the handcuffs?“

„Handcuffs?“ as he heard them jingling — „have a' care o' your behaviour to me, I tell you once agin!“ ejaculated Cahill, while he vainly resisted the strength used to manacle his hands — „his own self took the ban off o' me, misther Peelers — his own self, my Lord the Lieutenant, only a minute agone, an' on this very bless-ed spot! ay, ye may laugh at me; but I say he did! an' here's Peery O'Dea, that's ready to say the same thing, for he hard an' seen him! didn't you?“

Peery proved, indeed, a ready witness; but still the police sneered, until, after glancing down the road, in the direction of Mr. Lowe's house, the serjeant said, „well, Cahill, now's the time to get grace from us, if your words are true,“ — the man's laugh was still deriding — „here comes his Excellency.“

„Which way?" demanded Cahill, glancing up and down the road, in great astonishment — „Eh? the gentleman ridin' up to us wid Mr. Lowe an' the officers? stop — wait stop — oh? by the powers o'man, an' it is sure enough, however the divils — or by the Lord's will — he got there! Peery! Peery, avick!" —

„Move aside, and clear the road," said the serjeant. The police and their prisoners accordingly stood at the fence, the men presenting arms. The Lord Lieutenant stopt before them, and was about to ask what was the matter, when Cahill broke forward, and falling almost prostrate, with his manacled hands, prayed his Excellency to look on him, and remember himself, and say whether or no he had not, a few moments before, pardoned him his offence; and at the same time he again shouted out for Peery O'Dea to support his assertion.

„The man must be mad" — said the Lord Lieutenant, to Mr. Lowe — „both of them must be so; I have never seen either of them, in my life before: and yet how apparently sincere in their earnestness; one of them weeps."

At the sound of his Excellency's voice, Cahill started up, staring in misgiving and dismay on the face of the speaker; and again he called, in a whisper, to „Peery! Peery, avick!" as if for counsel.

„No, Ned, asthore," replied Peery, after making his own observations, „'tisn't himself is afore us — or — it is himself, I mean — or else the ne'r a one o' them — or, it was the ould divil that came the road, first of all, to make you go thro' wit the foolish thought o' your mind, an get you taken agin!"

While the Lord Lieutenant still spoke in an under tone with Mr. Lowe, the serjeant of the police advanced to recapture Cahill. Peery O'Dea now sprung forward and continued, in a loud, wailing voice — „But since they have you the second turn, Ned, it's time for me to do what I said! — Plase your lordship, Ned Cahill, my wife's brother, tho' he broke jail, is as innocent as my own stomach o' what sent him there, — I am the man — I, Peery O'Dea, — that headed the boys up to the house, for the arms that night, — an' Ned wasn't wid us at all, only met me on the road, after we got what we went for — an' forced my gun for me, an' stood to be seized by the Peelers! an' this is the holy thruth, an' I'll get your honor plenty o' witnesses to say so: — an' now, sure your Majesty 'ill just tell them to let him go, and take me, in his place, an'" —

„Don't put thrust in a word the fool of a' boy is sayin, glory to your lordship," interrupted Cahill — „the head of him is cracked, because I'm poor Mary's brother, an' he's often not in his right mind; 'twas in my hands the gun was found — an' 'twas I that broke jail — and, by coorse, it's I that ought to go to jail, over agin; an' so, mister serjeant — now, the Lord save us! an' what's this?"

Mary O'Dea held him in her arms, sobbing and weeping aloud. „To jail you'll never go, brother Ned, mavourneen!" — she cried — „never, never, praises to the good God, an' our good Lord Lieutenant!" — „Avick, you poor craythur; an' did that desaitful divil come across you, too, an' make you all manner o' promises?" asked Cahill, returning her embraces. „Your honor, my lord! continued Mary, „spake the word you promised me!" —

Addressing Mr. Lowe, his Excellency, touched and affected, turned his horse's head. „Pray, Sir, explain to the poor people." „Cahill," said Mr. Lowe, „your sister has saved you; at least confirmed the Lord Lieutenant's merciful dispositions towards you, previously formed out of other circumstances. She contrived to meet his Excellency, before my house this morning, and, on condition that a considerable depôt of concealed arms — discovered by her, she has not said how," (Cahill glanced from Mary to Peery) — „should be delivered up, obtained your pardon. The tranquillity of the country for the last year, a word in your favor, from your priest and others, and indeed from myself, and a wish to show the deluded people that they will be treated mercifully, whenever they, themselves, afford the opportunity — all this helped your sister's prayers, — Thank his Excellency. You are a free man. —"

That Cahill did as he was bid it would be idle to enforce. Neither is it necessary to describe the joy of the re-united family. But, indeed, kind readers, — contradictory as the thing may sound, — men made of mortal materials similar to those which we believe you like in the Brothers-in-law, Ned and Perry, often plunder away in some Irish counties, aye, — (and, also for the admission!) use them fearfully, too. Let us hope and pray, however, that such an Irish Lord Lieutenant as we have here sketched for you, acting under the wise instructions which shape his own excellent feelings and inclinations, may soon gain possession of all the hidden depths of Corruption, accumulated by the wretched people.

As for his Double —

„Perry, avich," said Cahill, after they and Mary had been left alone on the road —" let us run hard, straight-a-head, an' they an' lay hould o' that brute-baste of a pretendher!"

My little grey Landlord.

BY THE AUTHOR OF „SCENES IN POLAND."

„And you will not go?" said Frank, seizing the knob of the door, and darting a glance of impatience.

„Not for this time. To-morrow is packet day — a number of letters."

„The old song — letters — despatches. Our minister can scarcely have more business than you. You are a strange fellow. Here you come over in a hurry scurry, run the first three days over all the theatres and ball-rooms like a madman, and then ensconce yourself in one of the crooked, shabbiest corners of the most desolate parts of London, at an equal distance from Billingsgate and Smithfield."

„Not quite so desolate as you may suppose," returned I, pointing at a trio of vagrant minstrels, who were just establishing their perambulatory quarters right beneath my windows.

„Only look," said Frank; „but the fiend may look here! — nothing but murky walls to be seen. I pledge you my word, the most lovely day you ever beheld in London. Confound ye!" added he, running up to the window, and tearing the curtains down —

The trio had begun their concert — an invalid violin, a shattered harp, and an asthmatic flute, sending forth a sort of cacophonic medley, to the great delight of a gang of ragamuffins and idlers who clustered around —

„That's the third serenade I have enjoyed this morning. You see, John Bull is becoming quite musical. A German organ and a Scotch bagpipe have preceded these delightful instruments. If you stay, there may be a chance of hearing more!"

„You are insufferable," retorted Frank. „You want me to go. What is it that keeps you? Do you expect any body? — ‚Something pleasant to look at,' as our quaker says."

„No that I know of."

The trio had in the mean while toiled through a skeleton of Weber's hunting chorus, looking anxiously towards the window. A dirty-capped, squaw-like woman, was stretching forth her brown wrists, when an elegant cabriolet came up the narrow lane, and right through the crowd. A young fashionably-dressed man jumped out, knocked at the door, and was, after some delay, admitted.

„Is the visit intended for you?"

„I presume not."

„To whom can it be then?"

„There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

The minstrels persevered in regaling us with a doleful ditty; but above the shrill sounds of the music arose a cry of fury and terror, declining into a low, pitiful, and fearful moan. A long silence succeeded. The cry seemed to startle even the musicians; they paused, surveyed the windows, and retreated from the pavement. Immediately the gay young man came slowly down stairs, the bolt of the door was unfastened, and he approached his cabriolet; but what a change! The colour had deserted his cheeks — he was pale — he reeled as he mounted the vehicle!

„That's strange," said Frank: „strange, indeed. Why, Charles, where are we? Methought —"

„Hush!" said I; for I heard the sound of footsteps. I was not mistaken — a scarcely perceptible touch at the door indicated that some person was outside — it opened, and a head peeped in — it was my landlord.

Ah! Mr ——, you have company?"

I seized a couple of newspapers and ran after him. He took them.

„At two o'clock you will hear the signal. The King will dissolve Parliament."

I shook my head, and returned to my room.

„Who is that fellow?" demanded Frank, with a slight shudder; „as often as I see him an ague overcomes me."

„It is my landlord."

„I know; but who is he — what is he?"

„Hush! — more anon. Are you still bound to Regent's Park?"

„Certainly."

„Well, then, I am at your command."

Frank shook his head, and we descended. We rode on without a word, through Holborn. When we arrived at Tottenhamcourt-road, my friend broke silence.

„Charles, your landlord is a singular personage. I should not much like his company."

„Nor do I."

„Why not leave him then?"

„That's another question — but listen."

Frank drew his bridle and his horse approached mine.

„You remember," said I, „that in 1826—27, I sojourned about eight months in London, and in this very house. It belonged then to the firm of G— and Co., a mercantile establishment connected with our friends. The concern failed, and this house went over to its present owner. One morning, just as I was on the point of going out to hunt for apartments, this little, grey, thin man entered my room, looked around, and announcing himself, after a long glance at me, as the new proprietor, invited me to reside with him; I did not quite relish his appearance, but I hate moving about, and remained. Every Saturday at five o'clock, five minutes, five seconds, he came regularly for his thirty shillings, which I had to place on the corner of the table, and for which he left the receipt. There was no intercourse whatever between us, for the six months I stayed with him, and when I departed he looked as dry and stale as ever."

„Three days after my arrival last December, a transaction on 'Change kept me the greater part of the day in its vicinity. After I had concluded the business, I returned; but immersed as I was in thought, my steps led me unconsciously toward my old residence. I was already in sight of the house before I discovered my mistake. Curiosity prompted me to inquire after its proprietor. I had not spoken three words to the old woman, when the little grey man came down, grinned slightly and took me by the hand, pointing up stairs. I followed and entered my former apartments. Every thing stood as I left it, — even some papers I had forgotten lay in the same corner.

„You stay of course again with me," said the little man, who, turning round abruptly, quitted the room for his own. I moved into his house.

„As I had left him four years before, so I found him again. Not one additional wrinkle. The same withered, ashy features, with their yellow ground, not unlike a silver medal badly gilt. His thin grey hair carefully combed over his forehead, his visage as impassible as ever, his reddish rabbit-eye, protected by the identical dirty green spectacles, his nose as sharp as of old, his lips as meagre as though food had never found its way through them.

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro. 25.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

My little grey Landlord.

By the Author of „Scenes in Poland.

(Continued from our last.)

His very whisper was uttered with the same calculating care not to mismanage the stock of his breath. He never talks, he only lisps, and if you speak to him while a carriage is passing, he will delay his answer till every thing is still, for fear of straining his lungs. Now and then you may hear a noise — a shriek — a cry — a yell in his room, but never his own voice; and like a spell, this silence has always an unaccountable sudden effect on the most clamorous visitor. A deadly stillness succeeds a moan which resembles the hushing moan of the waves after they have ingulfed their victim. He is the most absolute egotist I ever yet have seen. His age is a problem to me. During my short stay in Paris (you know I landed at Havre, and spent a couple of weeks in the French capital), I became by chance possessed of a secret of some importance at the period. It was on the second day after I had taken up my abode with him, that he entered my room to look over my newspapers. He asked me a few questions respecting trade in Paris, and in the course of conversation, I gave him some hints as to the instability of a most eminent and flourishing house. The man quailed under my information — I pitied his consternation and gave him proofs

„No sooner had he inspected the papers, than he grasped my hand, and ran out of the room. Four days afterwards he entered with a ghastly smile, saying, „You are right — your information is correct. — It is still a secret — keep it. It will not be to your loss — have you two thousand pounds to spare?“

„No,“ said I.

„Here they are,“ returned he. „The — — stocks are down — in a week they will be up thirty per cent. and more. Buy now and sell then — but let me see — I will do it for you: I have no use for this money.“

„He kept his word. As he said, so it happened. After the lapse of a week he laid six hundred pounds on my table, the fruit of his whimsically generous speculation. From that time I have lived rent-free in his house, and his confidence in me is almost unlimited. The subsequent day I was admitted for the first time to his room. It is a perfect picture of himself. Every piece of furniture worn out, brushed threadbare, from the bedcover to the green cloth on his writing-desk. I never yet saw the coals blaze in his grate, they smoke away, smothered into a thick sheet of ashes. He passes his life without making more noise than the ticking of a crazy clock, as regular in his habits as the movement of the pendulum, going down at sunset, and winding up at sunrise.“

„I wonder what country may have given birth to this precious anomaly?" asked Frank.

„To judge from his protruding cheek-bones and a slight accent, I should think him a genuine Northman. Whether he has friends or relations I do not know."

„Go on," said Frank; „the account is marvellously interesting."

„His life is a mystery; no one ever enters his room except myself. At eight o'clock he makes his own coffee, the woman bringing him milk and water, and a roll of bread. At ten precisely he comes to look at the papers, over the contents of which he glances with the eye of an eagle. His acquaintance with every thing relating to trade, commerce, or credit, is astonishing. At eleven he walks out to return at half-past five. Till this time, the man, lost to every thing save money concerns, lives in a state of absolute somnambulism; but at half-past five the transmutation of the metal into something like humanity, takes place; then you may see him occasionally rubbing his hands, but softly and moderately, with a smile which might give you a nerve fit, — his harsh, withered, features contracting into ineffable bitterness.

„At six o'clock the woman carries up his dinner, which she places on a small table in the corner of the staircase: two raps at the door are the sign of her presence. Once she presumed to intrude, but she was wellnigh dismissed. Every Monday, at six o'clock, she fetches his linen, which she returns on Saturday at the same hour."

„To save expenses, he himself receives his bills, delivers his cheques, and transacts his business. However, with all his care and prudence, he is not unfrequently his own martyr. Last week I walked round the corner with him, when a sovereign dropped out of his pocket; how, I cannot yet conceive. A gentlemanly-dressed man took it up and presented it to him.

„It is not mine; it is not mine — I never carry gold about me, you may believe me — it is this gentleman's," whispered he, pointing at me. He was frightened out of his wits.

„I had to take the sovereign, in spite of my protestations for he would never have forgiven me, had I left it in the hands of the stranger. His satisfaction when I took it, showed that he felt something like a benevolent inclination towards me."

We now had approached Ulster Terrace, which presents so magnificent a range of palace-like houses to the view. It was one of the finest April days. The sun peered from the silvery clouds in bashful joyousness, with just sufficient force to burst the buds of plants and flowers, and yet not strong enough to dry up that humid fragrance which thrills through the English atmosphere, like the tear glistening in the eye of gentlest beauty. I enjoyed the scene fully — a scene so eminently calculated to impress a stranger, like myself, with the might and grandeur of this noble aristocratic country. As we approached Clarence Terrace, the clock struck two. A long-drawn peal of thunder came rolling on the breeze from the south.

„What is that?" said Frank; „it is like the sound of cannon."

I paused. — Should it be as my landlord foretold. — It was the St. James's guns.

„The King is dissolving parliament," said I.

„You are joking."

„By no means. Let us hasten down."

We trotted round the corner, and galloped towards Regent Street. Hurry, confusion every where increased as we approached Whitehall. It was as the little man had said. England's great, patriotic king — a Citizen King in the noblest sense of the words — was hastening to give his people the highest proof of his unbounded confidence — was going to put it in their power to speak to him as man speaks to man. He was going to dissolve Parliament. We gave a hearty hurrah! to the unflinching monarch as he passed by.

„Now, Charles!" said Frank; „you go with me, and dine with a dozen of our countrymen. We'll have a bumper to his Majesty."

„Not for this time, I must be at home," said I, turning my horse, and pressing his hand.

My little grey landlord filled my head. Where had he got the news — the positive news of an event which the King himself, probably, knew not at the time when he predicted it so confidently. The man had assumed a fearful importance with me. I hastened up the Strand, gave the stable-boy my horse, and paced home. Mr. Lomond was not in yet — I turned into the street, and paused; something unaccountable stirred within me. I entered the next coffee-house, ordered a hasty dinner, and scarcely taking time to finish it, proceeded through the narrow lane towards my residence.

„Is Mr. Lomond at home?“ — „Yes.“ A secret satisfaction accelerated my steps. I ascended the second staircase. — It was dark already in the street — our house was completely dark; I groped my way, and my hand touched the door.

„Who is there?“ asked he, scarcely audible.

I gave my name.

„Come in.“

I found my little grey landlord in his arm-chair before his smoking grate, motionless as a statue; his eyes fixed on the mantel-piece, on which stood an old lamp, once bronzed, that threw a pale light over an empty frame garnished with a variety of bills, cheques, accounts, and the like papers. As I looked into his sallow unearthly face, he glanced up, and the rays of the lamp shed a reddish glare upon his features, over which flickered something like a smile.

„Have you heard? Mr. Lomond,“ said I —

„I have, and know what you are going to say.“

„And what do you say?“

He shrugged his shoulders. „I knew it these four weeks.“

„These four weeks?“ The tone of my voice was rather doubtful.

„Look here;“ said he, pointing to a paper. It was a transfer of stock-property to a great amount. Again he relapsed into his former silence.

Does this creature think like other people, said I to myself. Does he know that there is a God? Has he a heart in his bosom? Has he even felt the influence of love? Does he know any such thing as woman, or happiness? Or is his soul shut up with his bonds and bags in the coffers of the bank, where his better self is securedly deposited.

„Well you have made a good business of it?“

„About a thousand pounds,“ he dryly remarked.

„And yet you are as mute and thoughtful as on the day when I gave you my confidential warning.“

„That you have given, young man,“ said he, „I have retrieved — saved — nay, gained a great sum through your fore-warning. I am still your debtor, I shall pay, rely on it; sooner or later; I shall pay: Lomond is sure.“

„Don't speak of it, Mr. Lomond, you have largely paid.“

He stretched out his fleshless hand and pressed mine. It lay like a piece of ice on my fingers.

„Have you met any disappointment, for really you seem to me —“

It was the first time that I ever touched so closely. He cast an inquiring glance at me, and said, after a pause —

„I amuse myself.“

„Amuse yourself,“ said I.

He again shrugged his shoulders, and darted a look of pity on me.

„Do you suppose there is no amusement, save that purchased by pounds and guineas in your ball-rooms and party saloons? Do you presume there is no poetry, save that which comes from Murray's or Longman's wholesale shops?“

Poetry! — This toad, thought I, and poetry! but I kept my thoughts to myself.

„Poetry — brilliant poetry — my young friend;“ the first time he had honoured me with this appellation. „Yes, my friend, Byron was never more in his trances than I was just now.“

His eyes glittered from behind the green spectacles as he drew up his lips.

„I am sorry then for having interrupted you.“

„Never mind, I am glad you are come. You shall hear, and from the recital of the events of this morning, you may, in some measure, be enabled to form an idea — but let us see. —“

So saying, he arose and rang the bell. We sat for a while without speaking a word, for the woman's heavy steps were heard upon the stairs.

„One of the bottles with the ducal coronet, and two tumblers,“ he said. — Again a pause. After some minutes the attendant came up; he went towards the door through which she held the bottle, and he handed it to me with a cork-screw.

„Fill the glasses. The King has no equal to this Madeira in his cellars.“

„I never have tasted the King's wine, but this I am sure is the best that ever reached my lips.“

„This morning,“ he began, after having sipped at his tumbler, „I had only three bills to present. Of the rest I had disposed yesterday. The first of these three bills had been handed to me by a hanger-on of the exquisites or exclusives of our capital — a frequenter of Crockford's, whose transition will be Newgate, and finally the halter. I have set him down for January, 1832. He came in a cabriolet; the bill was signed by his Grace of ——, a trifle of three thousand pounds lost and won, as is the fashion. The second of my bills came through a fine young dasher, who sported a tilbury, a most elegant fashionable. His scrap again was signed by one of our most charming women, the wife of a baronet, of good property, but somewhat embarrassed: this bill was for two hundred pounds. How the signature came upon it, I guessed, but that's not to the purpose. The third, for one hundred pounds, was to be honoured likewise by a lady — for the signature showed a Maria ——. It reached me through a linen-draper.

„The first object of my visit lives — you know where. The second occupies a fashionable mansion in —— square; the third I was to find in one of the fag-ends of our bloated city — Chelsea.

„If you knew the conjectures which crossed my brain on leaving home. These two women. What overtures, what anxiety, what tremors, what palpitations. How condescendingly they would press my hands — nay, offer gifts—gifts“ — The grey man darted a glance at me, which chilled my veins.

„Two hundred pounds are a trifle, comparatively speaking; but what might a woman not do for them, if pressed hard. While I, cold — ice-cold, stern, disdainful, would stand before her like the avenger of blood, seize her with the gripe of justice — but let us on — I respect rank, and my first visit, therefore, was paid to his Grace of ——“

„I entered the gorgeous mansion, freshed up with some assistance of my purse too — repaid — however — repaid. Times were once a little more prosperous in that quarter — the range wider. Things have changed — you comprehend —

I nodded.

„As I passed through the court-yard, the colonnade, when I was arrested by a grinning, yawning, gold-laced varlet, who handed me over to a fellow-idler, who again sent me forward to another; all of them grinning and jibing at me.

„‚His —— has not arisen yet,‘ said a powdered man.

„‚When can I see him?‘

„‚That is uncertain.‘

„‚My name is Lomond, I shall be here at three o'clock.‘

„‚Stop a moment;‘ said the minion, quailing a little under my determined look, ‚I shall see.‘

„I looked through the colonnade of the entrance. The fellow came down with a courtly, almost humble smirk. ‚His — is at leisure — please to walk up.‘

„I ascended the stairs, entered a magnificent drawing-room, and was ushered into a suite of apartments, each of them furnished with regal splendour. Just as I passed through, a figure was coming up from the back entrance of the mansion, who shrunk behind the door as soon as he caught a glimpse of me.

However, he had not escaped me; it was the A —— n A ——, that prince of coxcombs and profligates. Ah! thought I, does the wind blow from this quarter? But a door opened, and towards poor Mr. Lomond advanced, who should it be, but his Grace of —— himself! ‚Be brief, Mr. Lomond,' said the mighty man, ‚my time is precious.' I drew my bill from my pocket-book, and held it towards him. His —— is said to be unyielding — hard as iron — but he flinched a little, I can assure you.

„‚Ah, dear Mr. Lomond! three thousand pounds? The rascal was very quick, indeed; I hope, however, Mr. Lomond — dear Mr. Lomond, (I was dear, do you understand), I hope,' continued his ——, ‚you will wait a couple of days.'

„‚Till three o'clock precisely;' and I put my bill again into my pocket-book.

„‚Till three o'clock;' muttered his ——, ‚till three o'clock! Why that's little more than three hours.'

„‚Exactly.'

„‚You would not, you would not.' The iron frame, methought, shook.

„‚Were it an emperor I should not hesitate, if he refused acceptance.'

„At this moment the valet-de-chambre whispered something into the ear of his —— relating to the visitor I mentioned.

„‚Ah, well, very well; I am at his command. All is right, Mr. Lomond; at three then I shall have the pleasure ——.' The patrician's imperturbable countenance brightened up as I retreated.

„My second visit was to the beautiful Lady N——. It just struck twelve, when I entered the hall. Her ladyship, I was told, was still in bed; she could not be seen.

„‚When can I come then?'

„‚At two o'clock.'

„‚My name is Lomond. Tell her my name, I shall be here at two o'clock,' and I went away. My course lay down Chelsea, through King's-road, into one of the lanes, where a carriage is seldom or never seen. The cottage which I had to discover, was retired in a nook, pleasantly sheltered from the whirlwind of fashion and dissipation. I was admitted into the cheerful dwelling by a cleanly-dressed woman, who showed me up stairs into a neat drawing-room. Nothing can be more inviting than these abodes of our less wealthy fellow-citizens: this was a sample of the very best. No richness, no luxury, but every thing pretty and sparkling and convenient; I am a friend to order and cleanliness, and there I met it to my heart's content. Not the least trace of dust: there was an air of modesty, of noble simplicity, of virtue, in the room; true English, homebred virtue. I drew a deep sigh. On a sofa lay a prayerbook and a bible, with some needle-work; on a working-table, some linen; every thing white as snow. The door opened, and a girl, about eighteen, came out of a bed-room, from which a distressful coughing was heard. It was a sweet, delightful creature."

The man paused and took his glass and emptied it.

„Fill, my young friend, to her health; I should like to see you carry off this prize."

„I?"

„Stop, let us go on. She was dressed simply, but with extreme taste; her fair hair was arched, in two beautiful clusters, above her temples. One is seldom permitted to enjoy such a sight."

I emptied the tumbler.

„The girl stood a second or two looking at me before she said, ‚My mother is very sorry, but she is confined in bed.' I then presenting her the bill; she stepped into the next room, and returned soon after with a cheque on the banking-house of —— and Co.

„‚If, Miss, should perhaps — you understand me?' I said.

„‚I do not,' replied the girl, with an inquiring glance.

„‚If the payment should fall heavy upon you, I can and will wait.'

„‚It fell hard; but my mother is better; no, no,' she added, and retreated a few paces, as if afraid of me.

„I was touched — really touched. I felt almost as though I ought to leave the hundred pounds behind, but, on second thought, I deemed it better to put it into my pocket-book. She works hard to keep herself and her mother in something like respectability. A hundred pounds thrown in her way in such a manner, what mischief might it not create? One must consider every thing — why she might have a cousin, or some such connexion, who would fain drive his pony — or the hundred pounds might find their road into one of the thousand craters of French millinery. No; wiser to leave her as she was. She is the daughter of a mercantile gentleman who failed some years ago, and the remains of whose fortune are locked up in Chancery. Apropos, this Chancery business — it would be a pity if Brougham should succeed in curtailing so salutary an institution. It has brought many a thousand pounds into my coffers. Truly that girl would make a fine wife for you, young man; but let us proceed. When I regained the King's-road, the clock struck one. I looked for some time at the caricature shops, and at two found myself in —— square. I mounted the stairs of my lady's mansion, leaving, with every step, a foot imprinted into the Brussels carpet. That pleases me. I was desired by the servant to wait a moment, and seated myself in one of the gilded arm-chairs.

„‚Her ladyship has just rung the bell for the first time,' said the waiting-maid, with an air of importance. ‚I scarcely believe Mr. — what is his name? will be admitted.'

„‚Tell her ladyship my name.'

„She came in a few moments, and in a hurry, as it seemed, beckoning and running before me. I was ushered into a splendid apartment; the door opened to a second, and out came a woman. No; I shall not easily forget her, and how I saw her, and when, and where: there, young man, where no mortal will behold her save her husband, in a state — but hear.

(To be concluded in our next.)

The rainy Sunday.

It was a rainy Sunday in the gloomy month of November. I had been detained, in the course of a journey by a slight indisposition, from which I was recovering; but I was still feverish, and was obliged to keep within doors all day, in an inn of the small town of Derby. A wet Sunday in a country inn — whoever has had the luck to experience one can alone judge of my situation. The rain pattered against the casements; the bells tolled for church with a melancholy sound. I went to the windows in quest of something to amuse the eye; but it seemed as if I had been placed completely out of the reach of all amusement. The windows of my bed-room looked out among tiled roofs and stacks of chimneys, while those of my sitting-room commanded a full view of the stable-yard. I know of nothing more calculated to make a man sick of this world, than a stable-yard on a rainy day. The place was littered with straw, that had been kicked about by travellers and stable-boys. In one corner was a stagnant pool of water surrounding an island of muck; there were several half-drowned fowls, crowded together under a cart, among which was a miserable crest-fallen cock, drenched out of all life and spirit, his drooping tail matted, as it were, into a single feather, along which the water trickled from his back; near the cart was a half dozing cow, chewing the cud, and standing patiently to be rained on, with wreaths of vapour rising from her reeking hide; a wall-eyed horse, tired of the loneliness of the stable, was poking his spectral head out of a window, with the rain dripping on it from the eaves; an unhappy cur, chained to a dog-house hard by, uttered something every now and then between a bark and a yelp; a drab of a kitchen wench tramped backwards and forwards through the yard in pattens, looking as sulky as the weather itself, every-thing, in short, was comfortless and forlorn, excepting a crew of hard-drinking ducks, assembled like boon companions round a puddle, and making a riotous noise over their liquor.

I was lonely and listless, and wanted amusement. My room soon became insupportable; I abandoned it, and sought what is technically called the travellers' room. This is a public room set apart at most inns for the accommodation of a class of wayfarers, called travellers, or riders, — a kind of commercial knights-errant, who are incessantly scouring the kingdom in gigs, on horseback, or by coach. They are the only successors that I know of, at the present day, to the knights-errant of yore. They lead the same kind of roving, adventurous life, only changing the lance for a driving-whip, the buckler for a pattern-card, and the coat of mail for an upper Benjamin. Instead of vindicating the charms of peerless beauty, they rove about, spreading the fame and standing of some substantial tradesman or manufacturer, and are ready at any time to bargain in his name; it being the fashion now-a-days to trade instead of fight with one another. As the room of the hostel, in the good old fighting times, would be hung round at night with the armour of way-worn warriors — such as coats of mail, falchions and yawning helmets; so the travellers' room is garnished with the harnessing of their successors, — with box-coats, whips of all kinds, spurs, gaiters, and oil-cloth covered hats.

I was in hopes of finding some of these worthies to talk with, but was disappointed. There were, indeed, two or three in the room; but I could make nothing of them. One was just finishing his breakfast, quarrelling with his bread and butter, and huffing the waiter; another buttoned on a pair of gaiters, with many execrations at Boots for not having cleaned his shoes well; a third sat drumming on the table with his fingers, and looking at the rain as it streamed down the window-glass; they all appeared infected with the weather, and disappeared, one after the other, without exchanging a word.

I sauntered to the window, and stood gazing at the people picking their way to church, with clothes hoisted mid-leg high, and dripping umbrellas. The bell ceased to toll, and the streets became silent. I then amused myself with watching the daughters of a tradesman opposite, who, being confined to the house for fear of wetting their Sunday finery, played off their charms at the front windows to fascinate the chance tenants of the inn. They at length were summoned away by a vigilant, vinegar-faced mother, and I had nothing further from without to amuse me.

What was I to do to pass away the long-lived day? I was sadly nervous and lonely and every-thing about an inn seems calculated to make a dull day ten times duller: old newspapers, smelling of beer and tobacco smoke, and which I had already read half a dozen times; good-for-nothing books, that were worse than rainy weather. I bored myself to death with an old volume of the Lady's Magazine. I read all the common-place names of ambitious travellers scrawled on the panes of glass; the eternal families of the Smiths, and the Browns, and the Jacksons, and the Johnsons, and all the other sons; and I deciphered several scraps of fatiguing inn-window poetry, which I have met with in all parts of the world.

The day continued lowering and gloomy; the slovenly, ragged, spongy clouds drifted heavily along; there was no variety even in the rain; it was one dull, continued, monotonous patter — patter — patter, except that now and then I was enlivened by the idea of a brisk shower, from the rattling of the drops upon a passing umbrella.

It was quite refreshing (if I may be allowed a hackneyed phrase of the day) when, in the course of the morning, a horn blew, and a stage-coach whirled through the street, with outside passengers stuck all over it, cowering under cotton umbrellas, and seethed together, and reeking with the steams of wet box-coats, and upper Benjamins. The sound brought out from their lurking-places a crew of vagabond boys, and vagabond dogs, and the carroty-headed hostler, and that non-descript animal yclept Boots, and all the other vagabond race that infest the purlieus of an inn; but the bustle was transient, the coach again whirled on its way, and boy and dog, and beetles and Boots, all slunk back again to their holes; the street again became silent, and the rain continued to rain on. In fact there was no hope of its clearing up; the barometer pointed to rainy weather; mine hostess' tortoise-shell cat sat by the fire washing her face, and rubbing her paws over her ears; and on referring to the almanac, I found a direful prediction stretching from the top of the page to the bottom, through the whole month, ,,Expect — much — rain — about — this — time.''

I was dreadfully hipped. The hours seemed as if they would never creep by. The very ticking of the clock became irksome.

Irving.

To my Child.

They say thou art not fair to others' eyes,
Thou who dost seem so beautiful to mine!
The stranger coldly passes thee, nor asks
What name, what home, what parentage are thine;
But carelessly, as though it were by chance,
Bestows on thee an unadmiring glance.

Art thou not beautiful? — To me it seems
As though the blue veins in thy temples fair —
The crimson in thy full and innocent lips —
The light that falls upon thy shining hair —
The varying colour in thy rounded cheek —
Must all of nature's endless beauty speak!

The very pillow which thy head hath prest
Through the past night, a picture brings to me
Of rest so holy; calm, and exquisite,
That sweet tears rise at thought of it and thee;
And I repent, beneath the morning's light,
The mother's lingering gaze, and long good night!

Yea even thy shadow, as it slanting falls,
(When we two roam beneath the setting sun,)
Seems, as it glides along the path I tread,
A something bright and fair to gaze upon:
I press thy little eager hand the while,
And do not even turn to see thee smile!

Art thou not beautiful? — I hear thy voice —
Its musical shouts of childhood's sudden mirth —
And echo back thy laughter, as thy feet
Come gladly bounding o'er the damp spring earth:
Yet no gaze follows thee but mine. I fear
Love hath bewitched mine eyes — my only dear!

Beauty is that which dazzles, that which strikes —
That which doth paralyze the gazer's tongue,
Till he hath found some rapturous word of praise
To bear his proud and swelling thoughts along:
Sunbeams are beautiful — and gilded halls —
Wide terraces — and showery waterfalls.

Yet are there things which through the gazing eye
Reach the full soul, and thrill it into love,
Unworthy of those rapturous words of praise,
Yet prized, perchance, the brightest things above:
A nook that was our childhood's resting place —
A smile upon some dear familiar face.

And therefore did the discontented heart
Create that other word its thoughts to dress;
And what it could not say was BEAUTIFUL,
Yet gained the dearer term of LOVELINESS.
The loved are lovely: — so art thou to me,
Child in whose face strange eyes no beauty see.

Mrs. Norton.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 26.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

My little grey Landlord.

By the author of „Scenes in Poland."

(Concluded from our last.)

Over her bare shoulders she had flung, in the hurry of the moment, a precious cachemire, into which she shrouded herself so anxiously, that her fine proportions were developed every where. She was dressed in a peignoir white as snow. Her auburn air escaped luxuriously from a madras, ingeniously wound round her head, à la Créole — (by-the-bye, I once kept a large assortment of French goods.) The half-open door presented a coup d'œil for which a painter would have given a world. The bed was thrown into the most picturesque confusion. Her dreams must have been very violent; a snowy pillow lay at the foot; the blue silken coverlet, garnished with white lace, was half flung on the carpet. Behind one of the lion-jaws carved into the foot of the acajou bed, lay a white satin shoe; another straggled further off. Over a gilded chair dangled a robe crumpled into shapelessness; stockings, which a breath might have wafted away, were slung round a screen; flowers, bracelets, gloves, garters, and girdles, were strewed all over the room. She must have hurried to bed without the attendance of her maid; all was luxury and disorder. A vague, voluptuous odour pervaded the apartment. As those vanities lay scattered before me, I could not restrain a smile of pity. In their proper places they might have driven a dozen of men into delirium; here they gave strong indications of passion — of reckless passion, with misery and shame, scorn and utter desolation, close on the heels; nay, they lurked already beneath the bronzed eyelids of her ladyship. She was an exquisite piece of workmanship, the very image of passion — wild, overpowering, restless, careering on to destruction."

The man cast a feverish glance at me.

„Her eyes sparkled with a sleepy fire; she resembled one of the Herodiades, whom we owe to Leonardo da Vinci — (I have dealt in pictures too). Yes, a powerful woman she was; a matured form of beauty, with a tropical haze around her; nothing mean, all noble — her colour, her traits, her very paleness lighted up here and there by red streaks; they all showed fire and love; and yet she seemed stronger even than love. She made a deep impression on me. My heart beat almost. It is long since it beat last. I was already paid; for what are two hundred pounds for a sensation? — a sensation which recalls our sweetest hours before expiring phantasy!

„,Mr. Lemond,' she said, ‚will you please to take a chair? Will you be so good as to wait?'

„,Till to-morrow noon, Madam,' I answered, folding up the bill which I had presented to her;

‚till to-morrow noon; then we shall see further.‘

„My glance must have told her what was passing within me. Pshaw! thought I, pay for thy luxury — pay for thy happiness, thy dissipation, the monopoly which thou exercisest. For the hapless wretch whom thy fastidious eye scorns to look upon, there is Bow-street, and Newgate, and its juries and judges, and the gallows; but thou who reposest on silk and lace, for thee are the scorpions of shame, and the world's sneer and contempt.

„‚A protest!‘“ said the beautiful woman! ‚Mr. Lomond, you cannot be so cruel, so utterly, Mr. Lomond!“

„Her words were interrupted by a rap at the door.

„‚Not at present! not at present!‘ ejaculated she; ‚I am engaged; I am not at leisure,‘ she added imperiously.

„‚Caroline! I must see you,‘ said a manly voice.

„Impossible, my dear!‘ returned she in a softer, but still very positive tone.

„‚You are not in earnest? Who is it whom you talk with?‘ and with these words the door opened, and a middle-aged gentleman walked in. The lady cast a beseeching glance at me. I understood it. She was my slave. Ah! there was a time when I would have been fool enough, not to protest.

„‚Who is this man?‘ asked the baronet, measuring me from head to foot.

„‚My upholsterer, Mr. —.‘ The brow of her ladyship began to darken. She hesitated — she advanced.

„The baronet cast another glance at me, and then turned towards the window. The bill was still in my grasp, gaping most unmercifully at the beauty. At this direful sight she hurried towards me, and, with a broken whisper, pressed a diamond into my hand. ‚Take it and go. — Go, for heaven's sake!‘

„I glanced at the jewel, slipped the bill between the fingers of her ladyship, and turned away.

„The diamond was worth full three hundred. When I descended I found two brilliant carriages for her ladyship; a couple of liveried loungers brushed their coats, a third stood gaping and laughing. Ah, look! said I to myself, what leads these people to my poor house; what brings the duke and the marquis, the earl and the viscount before my door in the shape of supplicants, what makes them lose hundreds of thousands, and brings women to betray their husbands, men their country and themselves? They must live in style and extravagance! — just as I was thus meditating, there arrived in his elegant tilbury the young man who had transferred the bill to me.

„‚Sir,‘ I said, as he alighted, ‚here is one hundred pounds. You will be so good as to deliver it into the hands of her ladyship, and you will at the same time be pleased to tell her, that I shall keep the diamond at her disposal until next Wednesday at two o'clock, should she be inclined to redeem the pledge.‘

„The youth took the hundred pound note, a sardonic smile playing over his countenance.

„‚Ah! she has paid then, has she? All the better.‘

„This smile, these words, they said every thing. Her ladyship was already perdita!

„And now I passed to the mansion of his Grace of —; half a dozen of gold-laced servants marshalled my way, and I entered the sanctuarium of the Duke. Every thing sumptuous, but stern, like the possessor; yet dissipation was gleaming through.

„His Grace kept his seat, and presented me with a cheque on — on — No, I cannot mention it! but the cheque — While his keen eye rested on me, I remained, to all appearance, cold and indifferent.

„‚You understand me, Mr. Lomond? I shall perhaps want you soon again.‘

„He put his finger on his lips. ‚Can you be silent?‘

„I knew where the wind blew from. I knew what had passed — what was to come.“

My landlord paused, laid his green spectacles on the table, his ghastly countenance expanded, his reddish eyes hung with a chilling glare upon me. „Do you now understand my pleasures?“ said he, with a rising voice; the first time I had heard him raise his voice. „Do you reckon it nothing to penetrate into the innermost recesses of the human heart, to read the crooked counsels of statesmen, to lay bare the most hidden folds of society, to have placed before one's eyes the life of the proudest-born, of the brave, the crafty, and the beautiful, in utter nakedness and in utter helplessness. These scenes, ever shifting, ever varying, in a thousand ways; these hideous gamblings, these despairing joys and bootless ravings, which lead to the scaffold, those hysteric laughs of despair, those frantic festivals of dissipation green and grey. Now a father, who cuts his throat because he can no longer endure the cries of his starving children; again, a woman who offers the very jewel for which she has bartered name and happiness. O, these actors! these inimitable actors! Here Garrick and Kean and Kemble might have studied; but their art is lost on me. Often, indeed, a lovesick girl, an old merchant, a starving worthy mechanic, or a mother who panted to conceal the scandal of a beloved child; a noble lord on the brink of ruin; often have they made my hair stand erect like the mane of a frightened horse; but now I can look at those scenes, I can, young man; nothing now deceives me; nothing will. I can pierce the heart through; and what do I want? I possess every thing. I may buy ministers and consciences; that is in my power. The fairest women are rushing upon their knees before me. Here, young man, here in this room,“ said the withered usurer, „here have paid me homage, beauties, to delineate whose charms would outstrip the artist's skill. But I stand immoveable in my scorn, for I am past this frenzy; and I revenge myself on mankind who spurned and buffeted me while I was young and vigorous, but helpless and pennyless, and with no house to shelter, no friend to console me. I have tasted and am satiated. I am one of forty, who are the silent, the mute, the unknown kings of this country, the arbiters of life — for gold is life. Forty we are, bound together by the same ties, the same interests, though not the same motives. Once every week we assemble and compare notes, reveal the mysteries of finance, and of existence; no fortune, no condition escapes our view. We hold the secrets of every family from the highest to the lowest. Public credit and private happiness, the safety of the bank, and the stability of commerce, depend ten times of the year upon us. What is your secret police? It is we who analyse, who anatomize the world and its value. We love money; we love it, but we love power still more, and money is power. Yes, yes it is —

„Here,“ said the little grey man, pointing round his comfortless walls; „here, within these dingy naked walls — here the most enraptured lover, whom a word from the lips of his divinity would drive mad, here he will beg with folded hands; here prays the merchant, who never acknowledged the name of his Creator; here she bends low — low, before whom the stateliest noble would kiss the dust. Here the artist and mechanic, the farmer and the landlord, learn to unite in prayer. Here,“ added he, drawing his hand over his brow, „is the scale in which the destiny of thousands, of London itself, is balanced. Do you then believe that I have no rejoicing, no pleasure, no poetry, under this cold and shrivelled mask? that there beats no feeling under these blasted muscles?“ He laid his hand on my shoulder, and riveted his eye once more upon me. „Yes, you shall hear more; yes, —“ and so saying he turned and retreated to his bedroom.

I arose, and staggered towards the door almost stupified. I tottered down stairs. The little grey man had swollen up before me into a frightful monster. He had changed into a fantastic horrible being. He was the incarnate representative of the arch-demon. Existence, man, and beauty, looked hideous to my eyes; for all, all appeared subservient to his infernal power.

A little Talk about Spring, and the Sweeps.

> "Now ladies, up in the sky-parlour; only once a year, if you please!"
>
> Young Lady with Brass Ladle.
>
> "Sweep—sweep—sw-e-ep!"
>
> Illegal Watchword.

The first of May! There is a merry freshness in the sound, calling to our minds a thousand thoughts of all that is pleasant and beautiful in nature, in her sweetest and most delightful form. What man is there, over whose mind a bright spring morning does not exercise a magic influence? carrying him back to the days of his childish sports, and conjuring up before him the old green field, with its gently-waving trees, where the birds sang as he has never heard them since — where the butterfly fluttered far more gaily than he ever sees him now in all his ramblings — where the sky seemed bluer, and the sun shone more brightly — where the air blew more freshly over greener grass, and sweeter smelling flowers — where every thing wore a richer and more brilliant hue than it is ever dressed in now! Such are the deep feelings of childhood, and such are the impressions which every lovely object stamps upon its heart. The hardy traveller wanders through the maze of thick and pathless woods, where the sun's rays never shone, and heaven's pure air never played; he stands on the brink of the roaring waterfall, and, giddy and bewildered, watches the foaming mass as it leaps from stone to stone, and from crag to crag; he lingers in the fertile plains of a land of perpetual sunshine, and revels in the luxury of their balmy breath. But what are the deep forests, or the thundering waters, or the richest landscapes that bounteous nature ever spread, to charm the eyes and captivate the senses of man, compared with the recollection of the old scenes of his early youth — magic scenes indeed; for the fairy thoughts of infancy dressed them in colours brighter than the rainbow, and almost as fleeting: colours which are the reflection only of the sparkling sunbeams of childhood, and can never be called into existence, in the dark and cloudy days of after-life!

In former times, spring brought with it not only such associations as these, connected with the past, but sports and games for the present — merry dances round rustic pillars, adorned with emblems of the season, and reared in honour of its coming. Where are they now! Pillars we have, but they are no longer rustic ones; and as to dancers, they are used to rooms, and lights, and would not show well in the open air. Think of the immorality, too! What would your sabbath enthusiasts say, to an aristocratic ring encircling the Duke of York's column in Carlton-terrace — a grand poussette of the middle classes, round Alderman Waithman's monument in Fleet-street — or a general hands-four-round of ten-pound householders, at the foot of the Obelisk in St. George's-fields? Alas! romance can make no head against the riot act; and pastoral simplicity is not understood by the police.

Well, many years ago, we began to get a steady and matter-of-fact sort of people; and dancing in spring, being beneath our dignity, we gave it up, and in course of time it descended to the sweeps — a fall certainly; because, though sweeps are very good fellows in their way, and moreover very useful in a civilized community, they are not exactly the sort of people to give the tone to the little elegances of society. The sweeps, however, got the dancing to themselves, and they kept it up and handed it down. This was a severe blow to the romance of spring-time, but it did not entirely destroy it either; for a portion of it descended to the sweeps with the dancing, and rendered them objects of great interest. A mystery hung over the sweeps in those days. Legends were in existence of wealthy gentlemen who had lost children, and who, after many years of sorrow and suffering, had found them in the character of sweeps. Stories were related of a young gentleman, who having been stolen from his parents in his infancy, and devoted to the occupation of chimney-sweeping, was sent, in the course of his professional career, to sweep the chimney of his mamma's bedroom; and how, being hot and tired when he came out of the chimney, he got into the bed he had so often slept in, as an infant, and was discovered and recognised therein by his mother, who once every year of her life, thereafter, requested the pleasure of the company of every London sweep at half-past one o'clock, to roast beef, plum-pudding, porter, and sixpence.

Such stories as these, and there were many such, threw an air of mystery round the sweeps, and produced for them some of those good effects, which animals derive from the doctrine of the transmigration of souls. No one, except the masters, thought of ill-treating a sweep, because no one knew who he might be, or what nobleman's or gentleman's son he might turn out. Chimney sweeping was, by many believers in the marvellous, considered as a sort of probationary term, at an earlier or later period of which, divers young noblemen were to come into possession of their rank and titles: and the profession was held by them in great respect accordingly. We remember, in our young days, a little sweep, about our own age, with curly hair and white teeth, whom we devoutly and sincerely believed to be the lost son and heir of some illustrious personage — an impression which was resolved into an unchangeable conviction on our infant mind, by the subject of our speculations informing us one day, in reply to our question, propounded a few moments before his ascent to the summit of the kitchen chimney, „that he believed he'd been born in the vurkis, but he'd never know'd his father." We felt certain, from that time forth, that he would one day be owned by a lord at least; and we never heard the church bells ring, or saw a flag hoisted in the neighbourhood, without thinking that the happy event had at last occurred, and that his long lost parent had arrived in a coach and six, to take him home to Grosvenor Square. He never came, however; and, at the present moment, the young gentleman in question is settled down as a master sweep in the neighbourhood of Battle Bridge, his distinguishing characteristics being a decided antipathy to washing himself, and the possession of a pair of legs very inadequate to the support of his somewhat unwieldy and corpulent body.

Now the romance of spring having gone out before our time, we were fain to console ourselves as we best could, with the uncertainty that enveloped the birth and parentage of its attendant dancers, the sweeps; and we did console ourselves with it for many years. But even this wretched source of comfort received a shock, which was in reality its death-blow. We could not disguise from ourselves the fact, that whole families of sweeps were regularly born of sweeps, in the rural districts of Somers' Town and Camden Town — that the eldest son succeeded to the father's business, that the other branches assisted him therein, and commenced on their own account; that their children again were educated to the profession; and that about their identity there could be no mistake whatever. We could not be blind, we say, to this melancholy truth, but we could not bring ourselves to admit it nevertheless, and we lived on for some years in a state of voluntary ignorance. We were roused from our pleasant slumber, by certain dark insinuations thrown out by a friend of ours, to the effect that children in the lower ranks of life, were beginning to choose chimney sweeping as their particular walk, that applications had been made by various boys to the constituted authorities to allow them to pursue the object of their ambition, with the full concurrence and sanction of the law; that the affair, in short, was becoming one of mere legal contract. We turned a deaf ear to these rumours at first, but slowly and surely they stole upon us. Month after month, week after week, nay, day after day, at last, did we meet with accounts of similar applications. The veil was removed, all mystery was at an end, chimney sweeping became a favourite and chosen pursuit: there is no longer any occasion to steal boys, for boys flock in crowds to bind themselves. The romance of the trade has fled, and the chimney sweeper of the present day is no more like unto him of thirty years ago, than is a Fleet Street pickpocket to a Spanish brigand, or Paul Pry to Caleb Williams.

This gradual decay and disuse of the practice of leading noble youths into captivity, and compelling them to ascend chimneys, was a severe blow, if we may so speak, to the romance of chimney sweeping, and to the romance of spring at the same time; but even this was not all; for some few years ago, the dancing on May-day began to decline; small sweeps were observed to congregate in twos or threes, unsupported by a „green,“ with no „My Lord“ to act as master of the ceremonies, and no „My Lady“ to preside over the exchequer. Even in companies where there was a green, it was an absolute nothing — a mere sprout; and the instrumental accompaniments rarely extended beyond the shovels and a set of Pan pipes, better known to the many, as a „mouth organ.“ These were signs of the times, portentous omens of a coming change: and what was the result which they shadowed forth? Why, the master sweeps, influenced by a restless spirit of innovation, actually interposed their authority, in opposition to the dancing, and substituted a dinner — an anniversary dinner at White Conduit House — where clean faces appeared in lieu of black ones smeared with rose pink; and knee cords and tops, superseded nankeen drawers and rosetted shoes. Gentlemen who were in the habit of riding shy horses, and steady-going people, who have no vagrancy in their souls, lauded this alteration to the skies, and the conduct of the master sweeps was described as beyond the reach of praise. But how stands the real fact? Let any man deny, if he can, that when the cloth had been removed, fresh pots and pipes laid upon the table, and the customary loyal and patriotic toasts proposed, the celebrated Mr. Shiffen, of Adam and Eve Court, whose authority not the most malignant of our opponents can call in question, expressed himself in manner following: „That now he'd cotcht the cheerman's hi, he vished he might be jolly vell blessed, if he worn't a goin' to have his innins, vich he vould say these here obserwashuns — that how some mischeevous coves as know'd nuffin about the consarn, had tried to sit people agin the mas'r swips, and take the shine out o' their bis'ness, and the bread out o' the traps o' their precious kids, by a makin' o' this here remark, as chimblies could be as vel swept by 'sheenery as by boys, and that the makin' use o' boys for that there purpose vos barbareous, vereas he 'ad been a chummy — he begged the cheerman's parding for usin' such a wulgar hexpression — more nor thirty year, he might say he'd been born in a chimbley, and he know'd uncommon vel as 'sheenery vos vus nor o' no use: and as to ker-hewelty to the boys, every body in the chimbley line, know'd as vel as he did, that they liked the climbin' better nor nuffin as vos.“ From this day, we date the total fall of the last lingering remnant of May-day dancing, among the élite of the profession; and from this period we commence a new era in that portion of our spring associations, which relates to the first of May.

We are aware that the unthinking part of the population will meet us here, with the assertion that dancing on May-day still continues — that „greens“ are annually seen to roll along the streets — that sportive youth, in the garb of clowns, precede them, giving vent to the ebullitions of their sportive fancies; and that lords and ladies follow in their wake. Granted. We are ready to acknowledge that in outward show these processions have greatly improved: we do not deny the introduction of solos on the drum; we will even go so far as to admit an occasional fantasia on the triangle; but here our admissions end. We positively deny that the sweeps have art or part in these proceedings. We distinctly charge the dustmen with throwing what they ought to clear away, into the eyes of the public. We accuse scavengers, brick-makers, and gentlemen who devote their energies to the costermongering line, with obtaining money once a-year under false pretences. We cling with peculiar fondness to the customs of days gone by, and have shut out conviction as long as we could, but it has forced itself upon us; and we now proclaim to a deluded public that the May-day dancers are not sweeps. The size of them alone is sufficient to repudiate the idea. It is a notorious fact that the widely-spread taste for register-stoves has materially increased the demand for small boys; whereas the men, who under a fictitious character, dance about the streets on the first of May now-a-days, would be a tight fit in a kitchen flue, to say nothing of the parlour. This is strong presumptive evidence, but we have positive proof — the evidence of our own senses, and here is our testimony: —

Upon the morning of the second of this present month of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, we went out for a stroll, with a kind of forlorn hope of seeing something or other which might induce us to believe that it was really spring, and not Christmas; and after wandering as far as Copenhagen House, without meeting any thing calculated to dispel our impression that there was a mistake in the almanacks, we turned back down Maiden-lane, with the intention of passing through the extensive colony lying between it and Battle-bridge, which is inhabited by proprietors of donkey-carts, boilers of horse-flesh, and sifters of cinders; and through this colony we should have passed, without stoppage or interruption, if a little crowd gathered round a shed had not attracted our attention, and induced us to pause. When we say a „shed," we do not mean the conservatory sort of building, which, according to the old song, Love tenanted when he was a young man; but a wooden house with windows stuffed with rags and paper, and a small yard at the side, with one dust-cart, two baskets, a few shovels, and little heaps of cinders, and fragments of China and tiles, scattered about it. Before this inviting spot we paused; and the longer we looked, the more we wondered what exciting circumstance it could be, that induced the foremost members of the crowd to flatten their noses against the parlour window, in the vain hope of catching a glimpse of what was going on inside. After staring vacantly about us for some minutes, we appealed, touching the cause of this assemblage, to a gentleman in a suit of tarpaulin, who was smoking his pipe on our right hand; but as the only answer we obtained, was a playful inquiry whether our maternal parent had disposed of her mangle, we determined to await the issue in silence. Judge of our virtuous indignation, when the street-door of the shed opened, and a party emerged therefrom, clad in the costume and emulating the appearance of May-day sweeps!

The first person who appeared was „my lord," habited in a blue coat and bright buttons, with gilt paper tacked over the seams, yellow knee-breeches, pink cotton stockings, and shoes, a cocked hat ornamented with shreds of various coloured paper on his head, a bouquet about the size of a prize cauliflower in his button-hole, a long Belcher handkerchief in his right hand, and a thin cane in his left. A murmur of applause ran through the crowd (which was chiefly composed of his personal friends) when this graceful figure made his appearance, which swelled into a burst of applause as his fair partner in the dance bounded forth to join him. Her ladyship was attired in pink crape over bed-furniture, with a low body and short sleeves. The symmetry of her ankles was partially concealed by a very perceptible pair of frilled trousers; and the inconvenience which might have resulted from the circumstance of her white satin shoes being a few sizes too large, was obviated by their being firmly attached to her legs with strong tape-sandals.

Her head was ornamented with a profusion of artificial flowers, and in her hand she bore a large brass ladle, wherein to receive what she figuratively denominated „the tin." The other characters were a young gentleman in girl's clothes and a widow's cap; two clowns who walked upon their hands in the mud, to the immeasurable delight of all the spectators, a man with a drum, another man with a flageolet, a dirty woman in a large shawl, with a box under her arm for the money, — and last, though not least, the Green, animated by no less a personage than our identical friend in the tarpaulin suit. The man hammered away at the drum, the flageolet squeaked, the shovels rattled, the Green rolled about, pitching first on one side and then on the other, my lady threw her right foot over her left ankle, and her left foot over her right ankle alternately; and my lord ran a few paces forward and butted at the Green, and then a few paces backward upon the toes of the crowd, and then went to the right, and then to the left, and then dodged my lady round the Green, and finally drew her arm through his, and called upon the boys to shout, which they did lustily, — for this was the dancing.

We passed the same group accidentally in the evening. We never saw a green so drunk, a lord so quarrelsome (except in the house of peers after dinner), a pair of clowns so melancholy, a lady so muddy, or a party so miserable.

How has May-day decayed! thought we. How many merry sports, such as dancing round the May-pole, have fallen into desuetude! And, apparently trifling as their loss may appear, with how many profligate and vicious customs have they been replaced! How much of cheerfulness and simplicity of character have they carried away with them; and how much of degradation and discontent have they left behind!

Boz.

Song of a Spirit.

In the sightless air I dwell,
On the sloping sunbeams play;
Delve the cavern's inmost cell,
Where never yet did day-light stray:

I dive beneath the green sea waves,
And gambol in the briny deeps;
Skim every shore that Neptune laves,
From Lapland's plains to India's steeps.

Oft I mount with rapid force
Above the wide earth's shadowy zone;
Follow the day-star's flaming course
Thro' realms of space to thought unknown;

And listen to celestial sounds
That swell in air, unheard of men,
As I watch my nightly rounds
O'er woody steep and silent glen.

Under the shade of waving trees,
On the green bank of fountain clear,
At pensive eve I sit at ease,
While dying music murmurs near.

And oft, on point of airy cliff,
That hangs upon the western main,
I watch the gay tints passing swift,
And twilight veil the liquid plain.

Then, when the breeze has sunk away,
And ocean scarce is heard to lave,
For me the sea-nymphs softly play
Their dulcet shells beneath the wave.

Their dulcet shells! — I hear them now;
Slow swells the strain upon mine ear;
Now faintly falls — now warbles low,
Till rapture melts into a tear.

The ray that silvers o'er the dew,
And trembles through the leafy shade,
And tints the scene with softer hue,
Calls me to rove the lonely glade;

Or hie me to some ruin'd tower,
Faintly shown by moonlight gleam,
Where the lone wand'rer owns my power
In shadows dire that substance seem;

In thrilling sounds that murmur woe,
And pausing silence make more dread;
In music breathing from below
Sad, solemn strains, that wake the dead.

Unseen I move — unknown am fear'd!
Fancy's wildest dreams I weave;
And oft by bards my voice is heard
To die along the gales of eve.

Mrs. Radcliffe.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. № 27.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Capitain Marryat.

Den Vornamen dieſes beliebten Romanſchriftſtellers, der aber im Auslande und vorzüglich bei uns eben ſo viel, wenn nicht gar mehr geleſen wird als in ſeinem Vaterlande, hat die Welt noch nicht erfahren; ſein Name gilt ihm ſtatt deſſen und ſteht auf ſeinem Bilde, auf welchem er ſich in ganzer Figur und in Seetracht zeigt, denn wir die Unterſchrift Capitain Marryat, der jedoch das bedeutungsvolle R. N. (Royal Navy) hinzugefügt iſt, das ihm bekanntlich gleich angeſehene Stellung mit einem Officier der Landtruppen verleiht. Dieſes R. N. iſt denn auch der Schlüſſel zu ſeinem Leben, wie zu ſeinen Leiſtungen. — Von dem Erſteren haben wir indeſſen Nichts zu berichten, als daß er ein Mann von ungefähr vierzig Jahren iſt, eine gute Erziehung genoß, früh ſchon in den Dienſt der Großbritanniſchen Flotte trat, und ſich noch jetzt, als Capitain einer Fregatte in demſelben befindet. Hinſichtlich ſeiner literariſchen Laufbahn iſt hier nichts eine Seltſamkeit, daß er ein ſehr beliebtes Londoner belletriſtiſches Journal, das Metropolitan Magazine, mit Geſchmack, Takt, Umſicht und liberaler Geſinnung redigirt. — Seine meiſten Romane ſchildern das Seeleben in allen ſeinen Erſcheinungen, und ſollen größtentheils von ihm in ſeiner Kajüte geſchrieben worden ſein. — Das merkt man ihnen auch an, ſie ſind ebenſo wechſelnd, wie das ewig bewegte Meer und ihr vorzüglichſter Reiz liegt zum Theil darin, daß ſie aus unmittelbarer Anſchauung entſprungen und frei von aller Autoren-Coquetterie abgefaßt ſind. — Außerordentliche Kunſtwerke ſind ſie freilich gar nicht, und der Capitain Marryat iſt auch nichts weniger als was man einen geiſtigen Autor nennt, d. h. einen ſolchen, der Genie und Talent ſtreng den als gültig angenommenen Regeln, dem Convenablen und den Anforderungen des Tages unterwirft, ohne doch ſeine Originalität und Selbſtſtändigkeit dabei aufzuopfern. — Was uns noch mehr für ihn einnimmt, iſt, daß ſeine Natürlichkeit und Alles was er warm und wahr hervorbringt, obwohl dies gänzlich außerhalb ſeiner Abſicht liegt, weil er gerade überall am Ehrlichen iſt, wenn Natur ſich ſtets bei ihm drängt und entſchieden er ſo [illegible] umgeht, daß einem zärtlichen engliſchen Autor ein Grauen dabei anwandeln muß. Denn ein Dichter würde aus einem Marryat'ſchen Roman bequem deren drei gewöhnliche machen können, wie ſie der Londoner Büchermarkt nicht beſſer verlangt. Das wahre treue Eichenherz*) mit ſeiner ganzen Tüchtigkeit und Redlichkeit, ſeinem Patriotismus und ſeiner Kindlichkeit, aber auch mit ſeinem ganzen Selbſtgefühle, ſeinem Uebermuthe und ſeiner tollen Laune tritt uns in vollſter Natürlichkeit bei ihm entgegen und wirkt unbewußt zauberiſch auf uns ein. — Die eigentliche Fabel ſeiner Romane iſt meiſt ſehr loſe gewebt, und beruht häufig, namentlich in ihrer Löſung, auf Unwahrſcheinlichkeiten; das kann aber einem Mann, der ſo vieler Länder und Städte Menſchen geſehn, und dem ſo Manches wirklich vor die Augen trat, von dem ſich unſere Philoſophie hinter dem Ofen Nichts träumen ließ, durchaus nicht ſchaden, er wappnet ſich mit dem bekannten Spruche le vrai n'est souvent pas vraisemblable, und er entreiſt und ſeine bunten, mannichfaltigen Bilder und ſelbſt gewebt, nach dem Willen der Admiralität heute im ſtillen Meere zu kreuzen, morgen nach der Nordſee zu ſegeln und von dort das Steuer wieder nach dem indiſchen Archipel zu richten, nimmt er ſeinen Leſer ohne ihn zu fragen, ein ſeemänniſcher [illegible], überall dorthin mit, immer jedoch ſich in ſeinen Darſtellungen gleichbleibend, aus dem täglichen Leben mit voller Hand ſchöpfend, und in Soho-ſquare oder Bondſtreet, ganz ſo behaglich zu Hauſe als auf den brauſenden vom Sturm gepeitſchten, himmelan ſchäumenden Wellen. — Darin aber liegt eben der große Reiz ſeiner Schriften und das Geheimniß, daß ſo viele Leſer an dieſelben feſſelt, und deren Verfaſſer zu ihrem Liebling macht. Erhöht wird jener Reiz noch durch die lebenswarme Wahrheit ſeiner Charaktere und die wirklich mitunter überraſchend tiefen pſychologiſchen Blicke, die er uns in das Weſen des Menſchen thun läßt.

---

*) Hearts of oak: (Eichenherzen) Benennung der Matroſen der engliſchen Flotte, welche ſie ſich gern ſelbſt geben.

Das Einzige, was man ihm vorwerfen könnte, iſt, daß er zuviel ſchreibt; mehr als dreißig Bände Romane von ihm liegen vor uns und wie ſehr er ſich in ihnen, ſo geſchickt er auch das Gewand zu wechſeln verſteht, das er ihnen umwirft, unausbleiblich auf Wiederholungen, namentlich der Motive, die dann als Manier erſcheinen. Er iſt nun einmal der Liebling der Leſewelt, dieſes Argus nicht mit hundert Augen, ſondern mit hundert Schlünden, der unaufhörlich ohne zu verdauen, verſchlingt, und dem man, will man ſich bei ihm in Gunſt erhalten, unermüdlich neues Futter zwiſchen die ſtets geöffneten Zähne ſchieben muß. — Sein Talent leichter Production verführt ihn daher, da es ihm keine Anſtrengung koſtet, ſtets Neues zu ſchaffen; dazu kommt, daß ſeine Romane kapitelweiſe im Metropolitan erſcheinen, ehe ſie als ein Ganzes vor das Publicum treten, und ſo arbeitet er unermüdlich und ehe noch der Schluß des letzten in alle Welt gegangen iſt, leſen wir bereits den Anfang eines neuen Werkes in dieſem Journal. —

Unter ſeinen Dichtungen iſt gerade der Roman, der das Seeleben gar nicht berührt, der ſeinen Titel tragende Japhet (Japhet in search of his father) hinſichtlich des Wunderlichen der Charaktere, neben ſeinen anderen Peter Simple, The Kings Own und Mr. Midshipman Easy am Meiſten anzupreiſen von.

The Three Cutters.

Chapter I.

Cutter the First.

Reader, have you ever been at Plymouth? If you have, your eye must have dwelt with ecstasy upon the beautiful property of the Earl of Mount Edgcumbe: if you have not been at Plymouth, the sooner that you go there, the better. At Mount Edgcumbe you will behold the finest timber in existence, towering up to the summits of the hills, and feathering down to the shingle on the beach. And from this lovely spot you will witness one of the most splendid panoramas in the world. You will see — I hardly know what you will not see — you will see Ram Head, and Cawsand Bay; and then you will see the Breakwater, and Drake's Island and the Devil's Bridge below you; and the town of Plymouth and its fortifications, and the Hoe; and then you will come to the Devil's Point, round which the tide runs devilish strong; and then you will see the New Victualling Office, — about which Sir James Gordon used to stump all day, and take a pinch of snuff from every man who carried a box, which all were delighted to give, and he was delighted to receive, proving how much pleasure may be communicated merely by a pinch of snuff — and then you will see Mount Wise and Mutton Cove; the town of Devonport, with its magnificent dock-yard and arsenals, North Corner, and the way which leads to Saltash. And you will see ships building and ships in ordinary; and ships repairing and ships fitting; and hulks and convict-ships, and the guard-ship; ships ready to sail and ships under sail; besides lighters, men-of-war's boats, dock-yard boats, bum-boats, and shore-boats. In short, there is a great deal to see at Plymouth besides the sea itself: but what I particularly wish now, is, that you should stand at the battery of Mount Edgcumbe and look into Barn Pool below you, and there you will see, lying at single anchor, a cutter; and you may also see, by her pendant and ensign, that she is a yacht.

Of all the amusements entered into by the nobility and gentry of our island, there is not one so manly, so exciting, so patriotic, or so national, as yacht-sailing. It is peculiar to England, not only from our insular position and our fine harbours, but because it requires a certain degree of energy and a certain amount of income rarely to be found elsewhere. It has been wisely fostered by our sovereigns, who have felt that the security of the kingdom is increased by every man being more or less a sailor, or connected with the nautical profession. It is an amusement of the greatest importance to the country; as it has much improved our ship building and our ship fitting, while it affords employment to our seamen and shipwrights. But if I were to say all that I could say in praise of yachts, I should never advance with my narrative. I shall therefore drink a bumper to the health of Admiral Lord Yarborough and the Yacht Club, and proceed.

You observe that this yacht is cutter-rigged, and that she sits gracefully on the smooth water. She is just heaving up her anchor; her foresail is loose, all ready to cast her — in a few minutes she will be under weigh. You see that there are some ladies sitting at the taffrail; and there are five haunches of venison hanging over the stern. Of all amusements give me yachting. But we must go on board. The deck, you observe, is of narrow deal planks as white as snow; the guns are of polished brass; the bitts and binnacles of mahogany; she is painted with taste; and all the mouldings are gilded. There is nothing wanting; and yet how clear and how unencumbered are her decks! Let us go below. This is the ladies' cabin: can any thing be more tasteful or elegant? is it not luxurious? and, although so small, does not its very confined space astonish you, when you view so many comforts so beautifully arranged? This is the dining-room, and where the gentlemen repair. What can be more complete or recherché? and just peep into their state-rooms and bed places. Here is the steward's room and the beaufet: the steward is squeezing lemons for the punch, and there is the champagne in ice; and by the side of the pail, the long corks are ranged up, all ready. Now, let us go forwards; here are the men's berths, not confined as in a man-of-war. No! luxury starts from abaft, and is not wholly lost, even at the fore-peak. This is the kitchen: is it not admirably arranged? What a cuisine in petto! and how delightful are the fumes of the turtle-soup! At sea we do meet with rough weather at times; but, for roughing it out, give me a yacht. Now that I have shown you round the vessel, I must introduce the parties on board.

You observe that florid, handsome man in white trousers and blue jacket, who has a telescope in one hand and is sipping a glass of brandy and water which he has just taken off the skylight. That is the owner of the vessel, and a member of the Yacht Club. It is Lord B——; he looks like a sailor, and he does not much belie his looks; yet I have seen him in the robes of state at the opening of the House of Lords. The one near to him is Mr. Stewart, a lieutenant in the navy. He holds on by the rigging with one hand, because, having been actively employed all his life, he does not know what to do with hands which have nothing in them. He is a protégé of Lord B.; and is now on board as sailing-master of the yacht.

That handsome, well-built man who is standing by the binnacle, is a Mr. Hamilton. He served six years as midshipman in the navy, and did not like it. He then served six years in a cavalry regiment, and did not like it. He then married, and, in a much shorter probation, found that he did not like that. But he is very fond of yachts and other men's wives, although he does not like his own; and wherever he goes, he is welcome.

That young man with an embroidered silk waistcoat and white gloves, bending to talk to one of the ladies, is a Mr. Vaughan. He is to be seen at Almack's, at Crockford's, and everywhere else. Every body knows him, and he knows every body. He is a little in debt, and yachting is convenient.

The one who sits by the lady is a relation of Lord B.; you see at once what he is. He apes the sailor: he has not shaved, because sailors have no time to shave every day; he has not changed his form, because sailors cannot change every day. He has a cigar in his mouth, which makes him half sick and annoys his company. He talks of the pleasure of a rough sea, which will drive all the ladies below — and then they will not perceive that he is more sick than themselves. He has the misfortune to be born to a large estate, and to be a fool. His name is Ossulton.

The last of the gentlemen on board whom I have to introduce, is Mr. Seagrove. He is slightly made, with marked features full of intelligence. He has been brought up to the bar; and has every qualification but application. He has never had a brief, nor has he a chance of one. He is the fiddler of the company, and he has locked up his chambers, and come, by invitation of his lordship, to play on board of his yacht.

I have yet to describe the ladies — perhaps I should have commenced with them — I must excuse myself upon the principle of reserving the best to the last. All puppet-showmen do so; and what is this but the first scene in my puppet-show.

We will describe them according to seniority. That tall, thin, cross-looking lady of forty-five is a spinster, and sister to Lord B. She has been persuaded very much against her will to come on board; but her notions of propriety would not permit her niece to embark under the protection of only her father. She is frightened at every thing; if a rope is thrown down on the deck, up she starts, and cries, ,,Oh!'' if on the deck, she thinks the water is rushing in below; if down below, and there is a noise, she is convinced there is danger; and, if it be perfectly still, she is sure there is something wrong. She fidgets herself and every body, and is quite a nuisance with her pride and ill-humour; but she has strict notions of propriety, and sacrifices herself as a martyr. She is the Hon. Miss Ossulton.

The lady who, when she smiles, shews so many dimples in her pretty oval face, is a young widow of the name of Lascelles. She married an old man to please her father and mother, which was very dutiful on her part. She was rewarded by finding herself a widow with a large fortune. Having married the first time to please her parents, she intends now to marry to please herself; but she is very young, and is in no hurry.

That young lady with such a sweet expression of countenance, is the Hon. Miss Cecilia Ossulton. She is lively, witty, and has no fear in her composition; but she is very young yet, not more than seventeen — and nobody knows what she really is — she does not know herself. These are the parties who meet in the cabin of the yacht. The crew consists of ten fine seamen, the steward, and the cook. There is also Lord B.'s valet, Mr. Ossulton's gentleman, and the lady's maid of Miss Ossulton. There not being accommodation for them, the other servants have been left on shore.

The yacht is now under weigh, and her sails are all set. She is running between Drake's Island and the main. Dinner has been announced. As the reader has learnt something about the preparations, I leave him to judge whether it be not very pleasant to sit down to dinner in a yacht. The air had given every body an appetite; and it was not until the cloth was removed that the conversation became general.

,,Mr. Seagrove,'' said his lordship, ,,you very nearly lost your passage; I expected you last Thursday.''

,,I am sorry, my lord, that business prevented my sooner attending to your lordship's kind summons.''

,,Come, Seagrove, don't be professional,'' said Hautaine; ,, you told me yourself, the other evening, when you were talkative, that you had never had a brief in your life.''

,,And a very fortunate circumstance,'' replied Seagrove; ,,for if I had had a brief I should not have known what to have done with it. It is not my fault; I am fit for nothing but a commissioner; but still I had business, and very important business, too; I was summoned by Ponsonby to go with him to Tattersall's, to give my opinion about a horse he wishes to purchase, and then to attend him to Forest Wild to plead his cause with his uncle."

,,It appears, then, that you were retained," replied Lord B.; ,,may I ask you whether your friend gained his cause?"

,,No, my Lord, he lost his cause, but he gained a suit."

,,Expound your riddle, sir," said Cecilia Hamilton.

,,The fact is, that old Ponsonby is very anxious that William should marry Miss Percival, whose estates join on to Forest Wild. Now, my friend William is about as fond of marriage as I am of law, and thereby issue was joined."

,,But why were you to be called in?" inquired Mrs. Lascelles.

,,Because, madam, as Ponsonby never buys a horse without consulting me ——"

,,I cannot see the analogy, sir," observed Miss Hamilton, senior, bridling up.

,,Pardon me, madam: the fact is," continued Seagrave, ,,that, as I always have to back Ponsonby's horses, he thought it right that, in this instance, I should back him; he required special pleading, but his uncle tried him for the capital offence, and he was not allowed counsel. As soon as we arrived, and I had bowed myself into the room, Mr. Ponsonby bowed me out again — which would have been infinitely more jarring to my feelings, had not the door been left a-jar."

,,Do any thing but pun, Seagrave," interrupted Horatio.

,,Well, then, I will take a glass of wine."

,,Do so," said his lordship; ,,but recollect, the whole company are impatient for your story."

,,I can assure you, my lord, that it was equal to any scene in a comedy."

Now, be it observed, that Mr. Seagrave had a great deal of comic talent; he was an excellent mimic, and could alter his voice almost as he pleased. It was a custom of his to act a scene as between other people, and he performed it remarkably well. Whenever he said that any thing he was going to narrate was ,,as good as a comedy," it was generally understood by those who were acquainted with him, that he was to be asked so to do. Cecilia Hamilton therefore immediately said, ,,Pray act it, Mr. Seagrave."

Upon which Mr. Seagrave — premising that he had not only heard, but also seen all that had passed — changing his voice, and suiting the action to the word, commenced. ,,It may," said he, ,,be called

Five Thousand Acres in a Ring-Fence."

We shall not describe Mr. Seagrave's motions; they must be inferred from his words.

,,'It will, then, William,' observed Mr. Ponsonby, stopping, and turning to his nephew, after a rapid walk up and down the room with his hands behind him under his coat, so as to allow the tails to drop their perpendicular about three inches clear of his body, 'I may say, without contradiction, be the finest property in the county — five thousand acres in a ring-fence.'

,,'I dare say it will, uncle,' replied William, tapping his foot as he lounged in a green morocco easy-chair; 'and so, because you have set your fancy upon having these two estates enclosed together in a ring-fence, you wish that I should also be enclosed in a ring-fence.'

,,'And a beautiful property it will be,' replied Mr. Ponsonby.

,,'Which, uncle? — the estate, or the wife?'

,,'Both, nephew, both; and I expect your consent.'

,,'Uncle, I am not avaricious. Your present property is sufficient for me. With your permission, instead of doubling the property, and doubling myself, I will remain your sole heir, and single.'

,,'Observe, William, such an opportunity may not occur again for centuries. We shall restore Forest Wild to its ancient boundaries. You know it has been divided nearly two hundred years. We now have a glorious, golden opportunity of re-uniting the two properties; and when joined, the estate will be exactly what it was when granted to our ancestors by Henry the Eighth, at the period of the Reformation. This house must be pulled down, and the monastery left standing.

Then we shall have our own again, and the property without encumbrance.'

„Without encumbrance, uncle! — You forget that there will be a wife.'

„And you forget that there will be five thousand acres in a ring-fence.'

„Indeed, uncle, you ring it too often in my ears, that I should forget it; but much as I should like to be the happy possessor of such a property, I do not feel inclined to be the happy possessor of Miss Percival; and the more so, as I have never seen the property.'

„We will ride over it to-morrow, William.'

„Ride over Miss Percival, uncle, that will not be very gallant. I will, however, one of these days, ride over the property with you, which, as well as Miss Percival, I have not as yet seen.'

„Then I can tell you, she is a very pretty property.'

„If she were not in a ring-fence.'

„In good heart, William. — That is, I mean an excellent disposition.'

„Valuable in matrimony.'

„And well tilled — I should say well educated, by her three maiden aunts, who are the patterns of propriety.'

„Does any one follow the fashion?'

„In a high state of cultivation; that is, her mind highly cultivated, and according to the last new system — what is it?'

„A four-course shift, I presume,' replied William, laughing; ‚that is, dancing, music, and drawing.'

„And only seventeen! — Capital soil, promising good crops. — What would you have more?'

„A very pretty estate, uncle, if it were not the estate of matrimony. I am sorry, very sorry, to disappoint you; but I must decline taking a lease of it for life.'

„Then, sir, allow me to hint to you, that, in my testament, you are only tenant at will. I consider it a duty that I owe to the family, that the estate should be re-united. That can only be done by one of our family marrying Miss Percival; and, as you will not, I shall now write to your cousin James, and if he accept my proposal, shall make him my heir. Probably he will more fully appreciate the advantages of five thousand acres in a ring-fence.'

„And Mr. Ponsonby directed his steps towards the door.

„Stop, my dear uncle,' cried William, rising up from his easy-chair; ‚we do not quite understand one another. It is very true that I would prefer half the property and remaining single to the two estates and the estate of marriage; but, at the same time, I did not tell you that I would prefer beggary to a wife and five thousand acres in a ring-fence. I know you to be a man of your word; — I accept your proposal, and you need not put my cousin James to the expense of postage.'

„Very good, William; I require no more: and as I know you to be a man of your word, I shall consider this match as settled. It was on this account only that I sent for you, and now you may go back again as soon as you please — I will let you know when all is ready.'

„I must be at Tattersall's on Monday, uncle; there is a horse I must have for next season. Pray, uncle, may I ask when you are likely to want me?'

„Let me see — this is May — about July, I should think.'

„July, uncle! Spare me — I cannot marry in the dog-days. — No, hang it, not July.'

„Well, William, perhaps, as you must come down once or twice to see the property — Miss Percival, I should say — it may be too soon — suppose we put it off till October.'

„October — I shall be down at Melton.'

„Pray, sir, may I then inquire what portion of the year is not, with you, dog-days?'

„Why, uncle, next April now I think that would do.'

„Next April. — Eleven months, and a winter between. Suppose Miss Percival was to take a cold, and die! —'

„I should be excessively obliged to her,' thought William.

„‚No! no!‘ continued Mr. Ponsonby, ‚there is nothing certain in this world, William.‘

„‚Well then, uncle, suppose we arrange it for the first hard frost.‘

„‚We have had no hard frosts lately, William. — We may wait for years. — The sooner it is over the better. — Go back to town, buy your horse, and then come down here — my dear William, to oblige your uncle — never mind the dog days.‘

„‚Well, sir,‘ if I am to make a sacrifice, it shall not be done by halves; out of respect for you, I will even marry in July, without any regard to the thermometer.‘

„‚You are a good boy, William. — Do you want a cheque?‘

„‚I have had one to-day,‘ thought William, but was almost at fault. ‚I shall be most thankful, sir — they sell horse-flesh by the ounce now-a-days.‘

„‚And you pay in pounds. — There, William.‘

„‚Thank you, sir, I'm all obedience; and I'll keep my word, even if there should be a comet. I'll go and buy the horse, and then I shall be ready to take the ring-fence as soon as you please.‘

„‚Yes, and you'll get over it cleverly, I've no doubt. — Five thousand acres, William, and — a pretty wife!‘

„‚Have you any further commands, uncle?‘, said William, depositing the cheque in his pocket-book.

„‚No, my dear boy, are you going?‘

„‚Yes, sir; I dine at the Clarendon.‘

„‚Well, then, good-bye. — Make my compliments and excuses to your friend Seagrove. — You will come Tuesday or Wednesday.‘

„Thus was concluded the marriage between William Ponsonby and Emily Percival, and the junction of the two estates, which formed together the great desideratum, — five thousand acres in a ring-fence.“

Mr. Seagrove finished, and looked round for approbation.

„Very good, indeed, Seagrove,“ said his lordship, „you must take a glass of wine after that.“

„I would not give much for Miss Percival's chance of happiness,“ observed the elder Miss Ossulton.

„Of two evils choose the least, they say,“ observed Mr. Hoskins. „Poor Ponsonby could not help himself.“

„That's a very polite observation of yours, Mr. Hoskins — I thank you in the name of the sex,“ replied Cecilia Ossulton.

„Nay, Miss Ossulton; would you like to marry a person whom you never saw?“

„Most certainly not; but when you mentioned the two evils, Mr. Hoskins, I appeal to your honour, did you not refer to marriage or beggary?“

„I must confess it, Miss Ossulton; but it is hardly fair to call on my honour to get me into a scrape.“

„I only wish that the offer had been made to me,“ observed Vaughan; „I should not have hesitated as Ponsonby did.“

„Then I beg you will not think of proposing for me,“ said Mrs. Lascelles, laughing; — for Mr. Vaughan had been excessively attentive.

„It appears to me, Vaughan,“ observed Seagrove, „that you have slightly committed yourself by that remark.“

Vaughan, who thought so too, replied: „Mrs. Lascelles must be aware that I was only joking.“

„Fie! Mr. Vaughan,“ cried Cecilia Ossulton; „you know it came from your heart.“

„My dear Cecilia,“ said the elder Miss Ossulton, „you forget yourself — what can you possibly know about gentlemen's hearts?“

„The Bible says, ‚that they are deceitful and desperately wicked,‘ aunt.“

„And cannot we also quote the Bible against your sex, Miss Ossulton?“ replied Seagrove.

„Yes, you could, perhaps, if any of you had ever read it,“ replied Miss Ossulton, carelessly.

„Upon my word, Cissy, you are throwing the gauntlet down to the gentlemen,“ observed Lord B. „but I shall throw my warder down, and not permit this combat à l'outrance. — I perceive you drink no more wine, gentlemen, — we will take our coffee on deck."

„We were just about to retire, my lord," observed the elder Miss Ossulton, with great asperity: „I have been trying to catch the eye of Mrs. Lascelles for some time, but —"

„I was looking another way, I presume," interrupted Mrs. Lascelles, smiling.

„I am afraid that I am the unfortunate culprit," said Mr. Seagrove; „I was telling a little anecdote to Mrs. Lascelles —"

„Which, of course, from its being communicated in an under tone, was not proper for all the company to hear," replied the elder Miss Ossulton: „but if Mrs. Lascelles is now ready—" continued she, bridling up, as she rose from her chair.

„At all events, I can hear the remainder of it on deck," replied Mrs. Lascelles. The ladies rose, and went into the cabin: Cecilia and Mrs. Lascelles exchanging very significant smiles, as they followed the precise spinster, who did not choose that Mrs. Lascelles should take the lead, merely because she had once happened to have been married. — The gentlemen also broke up, and went on deck.

„We have a nice breeze now, my lord," observed Mr. Stewart, who had remained on deck, „and we lie right up Channel."

„So much the better," replied his lordship; „we ought to have been anchored at Cowes a week ago. They will all be there before us."

„Tell Mr. Simpson to bring me a light for my cigar," said Mr. Ossulton to one of the men.

Mr. Stewart went down to his dinner; the ladies and the coffee came on deck; the breeze was fine, the weather (it was April) almost warm; and the yacht, whose name was the Arrow, assisted by the tide, soon left the Mewstone far astern.

(To be continued in our next.)

The Flying-fish.

When I have seen thy snowy wing
O'er the blue wave at evening spring
And give those scales, of silver white,
So gaily to the eye of light,
As if thy frame were form'd to rise,
And live amid the glorious skies;
Oh! it has made me proudly feel,
How like thy wing's impatient zeal
Is the pure soul, that scorns to rest
Upon the world's ignoble breast,
But takes the plume that God has given,
And rises into light and heaven!

But, when I see that wing, so bright,
Grow languid with a moment's flight,
Attempt the paths of air, in vain,
And sink into the waves again;
Alas! the flattering pride is o'er;
Like thee, awhile, the soul may soar,
But erring man must blush to think,
Like thee, again, the soul may sink!

Oh Virtue! when thy clime I seek,
Let not my spirit's flight be weak:
Let me not, like this feeble thing,
With brine still dropping from its wing,
Just sparkle in the solar glow,
And plunge again to depths below;
But, when I leave the grosser throng
With whom my soul hath dwelt so long,
Let me, in that aspiring day,
Cast every lingering stain away,
And, panting for thy purer air,
Fly up at once and fix me there!

Thomas Moore.

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. [illegible] die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnements-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monat 1 Thlr. [illegible] Ein Abonnement unter 26 Nummern findet nicht Statt. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Postämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. [illegible] N^ro 28.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS

OF THE

MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS

BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. [illegible]

The Three Cutters.

(Continued from our last.)

Chapter II.

[illegible]

Reader, have you ever been at Portsmouth? If you have, you must have been delighted with the view from the saluting battery; and, if you have not, you had better go there as soon as you can. From the saluting battery you may look up the harbour, and see much of what I have described at Plymouth: the scenery is different, but similar dock-yards, and the [illegible] of our magnificent navy, are to be found there. — And you will see Gosport on the other side of the harbour, and [illegible] close to your [illegible] a great many other places, which, from the saluting battery, you cannot see. And then there is Southsea Beach to your left. Before you, Spithead, with the men-of-war, and the Motherbank, crowded with merchant vessels; — and there is the Nore, where the Royal George was wrecked, and where she still lies, the fish swimming in and out of her cabin windows: but this is not all, you can also see the Isle of Wight, — Ryde, with its long wooden pier, and Cowes, where the yachts lie. In fact, there is a great deal to be seen at Portsmouth as well as at Plymouth; but what I wish you particularly to see, just now, is a cutter holding fast to the buoy, just off the saluting battery. She is a cutter, and you may know that she belongs to the Preventive Service by the number of gigs and galleys which she has hoisted up all round her. She looks like a vessel that was about to sail with a cargo of boats. Two on deck, one astern, one on each side of her. You observe that she is painted black, and all her boats are white. She is not such an elegant vessel as the yacht, and she is much more lumbered up. She has no [illegible] of [illegible] over the stern, but then there is a bag of biscuit, and some cabbages hanging by their stalks. But revenue-cutters are not yachts. — You will find no [illegible] papers: but, nevertheless, you will, perhaps, find a joint to carve at, a good glass of grog, and a hearty welcome.

Let us go on board. — You observe the guns are iron, and painted black, and her bulwarks are painted red; it is not a very becoming colour, but then it lasts a long while, and the dock-yard is not very generous on the score of paint — or lieutenants of the navy troubled with much spare cash. She has plenty of men, and fine men they are; all dressed in red flannel shirts and blue trousers; some of them have not taken off their canvas or tarpaulin petticoats, which are very useful to them, as they are in the boats night and day, and in all weathers. But we will at once go down into the cabin, where we shall find the lieutenant who commands her, a master's mate, and a midshipman. — They have each their tumbler before them, and are drinking gin-toddy, hot, with sugar — capital gin, too, 'bove proof; it is from that small anker, standing under the table. It was one that they forgot to return to the custom-house when they made their last seizure. We must introduce them.

The elderly personage, with grizzly hair and whiskers, a round pale face, and a somewhat red nose (being too much in the wind will make the nose red, and this old officer is very often „in the wind," of course from the very nature of his profession), is a Lieutenant Appleboy. He has served in every class of vessel in the service, and done the duty of first-lieutenant for twenty years; he is now on promotion — that is to say, after he has taken a certain number of tubs of gin, he will be rewarded with his rank as commander. It is a pity that what he takes inside of him does not count, for he takes it morning, noon, and night. — He is just filling his fourteenth glass; he always keeps a regular account, as he never exceeds his limited number, which is seventeen: then he is exactly down to his bearings.

The master's mate's name is Tomkins; he has served his six years three times over, and has now outgrown his ambition, which is fortunate for him, as his chances of promotion are small. He prefers a small vessel to a large one, because he is not obliged to be so particular in his dress — and looks for his lieutenancy whenever there shall be another charity promotion. He is fond of soft bread, for his teeth are all absent without leave; he prefers porter to any other liquor, but he can drink his glass of grog, whether it be based upon rum, brandy, or the liquor now before him.

Mr. Smith is the name of that young gentleman, whose jacket is so out at the elbows; he has been intending to mend it these last two months, but is too lazy to go to his chest for another. — He has been turned out of half the ships in the service for laziness; but he was born so — and therefore it is not his fault. — A revenue-cutter suits him, she is half her time hove to; and he has no objection to boat-service, as he sits down always in the stern-sheets, which is not fatiguing. Creeping for tubs is his delight, as he gets over so little ground. He is fond of grog, but there is some trouble in carrying the tumbler so often to his mouth; so he looks at it, and lets it stand. He says little, because he is too lazy to speak. He has served more than eight years; but as for passing — it has never come into his head. Such are the three persons who are now sitting in the cabin of the revenue-cutter, drinking hot gin-toddy.

„Let me see, it was, I think, in ninety-three or ninety-four. — Before you were in the service, Tomkins. —"

„May-be, sir; it's so long ago since I entered, that I can't recollect dates, but this I know, that my aunt died three days before."

„Then the question is, when did your aunt die?"

„Oh! she died about a year after my uncle."

„And when did your uncle die?"

„I'll be hanged if I know!"

„Then, d' ye see, you 've no departure to work from. However, I think you cannot have been in the service at that time. We were not quite so particular about uniform as we are now."

„Then I think the service was all for it. Now-a-days, in your crack ships, a mate has to go down in the hold or spirit-room, and after whipping up fifty empty casks, and breaking out twenty full ones, he is expected to come on the quarter-deck as clean as if he was just come out of a bandbox."

„Well, there's plenty of water alongside, so far as the outward man goes, and iron dust is soon brushed off. However, as you say, perhaps, a little too much is expected, at least, in five of the ships in which I was first-lieutenant, the captain was always hauling me over the coals about the midshipmen not dressing properly, as if I was their dry nurse. I wonder what Captain Prigg would have said, if he'd seen such a turn-out as you, Mr. Smith, on his quarter-deck."

„I should have had one turn-out more," drawled Smith.

„With your out-at-elbows jacket, there, heh!" continued Mr. Appleboy.

Smith turned up his elbows, looked at one and then at the other; after so fatiguing an operation, he was silent.

„Well, where was I? Oh! it was about ninety-three or ninety-four, as I said, that it happened — Tomkins, fill your glass, and hand me the sugar, — how do I get on? — This is No. 15," said Appleboy, counting some white lines on the table by him; and taking up the piece of chalk, he marked one more line on his tally. „I don't think this so good a tub as the last; Tomkins, there's a twang about it — a want of juniper — however, I hope we shall have better luck this time. — Of course, you know we sail to-morrow."

„I presume so, by the leg of mutton coming on board."

„True — true — I'm regular — as clock-work. — After being twenty years a first-lieutenant, one gets a little method — I like regularity. Now the admiral has never omitted asking me to dinner once, every time I have come into harbour, except this time. — I was so certain of it, that I never expected to sail, and I have but two shirts clean in consequence."

„That's odd, isn't it? and the more so, because he has had such great people down here, and has been giving large parties every day."

„And yet I made three seizures, besides sweeping up those thirty-seven tubs."

„I swept them up," observed Smith.

„That's all the same thing, youngster. — When you've been a little longer in the service, you'll find out that the commanding officer has the merit of all that is done — but you're green yet. — Let me see, where was I? Oh! — it was about ninety-three or ninety-four, as I said. At that time I was in the Channel fleet — Tomkins, I'll trouble you for the hot water — this water's cold. — Mr. Smith, do me the favour to ring the bell — Jem, some more hot water."

„Please sir," said Jem, who was barefooted, as well as bareheaded, touching the lock of hair on his forehead, „the cook has capsized the kettle — but he has put more on."

„Capsized the kettle! heh! — very well — we'll talk about that to-morrow. — Mr. Tomkins do me the favour to put him in the report, I may forget it. And pray, sir, how long is it since he has put more on?"

„Just this moment, sir, as I came aft."

„Very well, we'll see to that to-morrow; — you bring the kettle aft as soon as it is ready. — I say, Mr. Jem, is that fellow sober?"

„Yees, sir, he be sober as you be."

„It's quite astonishing what a propensity the common sailors have to liquor. Forty odd years have I been in the service, and I've never found any difference. I only wish I had a guinea for every time that I have given a fellow seven-water grog during my servitude as first-lieutenant, I wouldn't call the king my cousin. Well, if there's not hot water we must take lukewarm — it won't do to heave to. By the L—d Harry! who would have thought it? — I'm at No. 16! — Let me count — yes! surely I must have made a mistake. — A fact, by heaven!" continued Mr. Appleboy, throwing the chalk down on the table. „Only one more glass, after this — that is, if I have counted right — I may have seen double."

„Yes," drawled Smith.

„Well, never mind — Let's go on with my story. — It was either in the year ninety-three or ninety-four, that I was in the Channel fleet — we were then a-breast of Torbay."

„Here be the hot water, sir," cried Jem, putting the kettle down on the deck.

„Very well, boy. — By-the-bye, has the jar of butter come on board?"

„Yes, but it be broke all down the middle; I tied him up with a rope-yarn."

„Who broke it, sir?"

„Coxswain says as how he didn't."

„But who did, sir?"

„Coxswain handed it up to Bill Jones, and he says as how he didn't."

„But who did, sir?"

„Bill Jones gave it to me, and I'm sure as how I didn't."

„Then who did, sir, I ask you?"

„I think it be Bill Jones, sir, 'cause he's fond of butter, I know, and there be very little left in the jar."

„Very well, we'll see to that to-morrow morning. Mr. Tomkins, you'll oblige me by putting the butter-jar down in the report, in case it should slip my memory. Bill Jones, indeed, looks as if butter wouldn't melt in his mouth — never mind. Well, it was, as I said before — it was in the year ninety-three or ninety-four, when I was in the Channel fleet; we were then off Torbay, and had just taken two reefs in the topsails. Stop, before I go on with my story, I'll take my last glass — I think it's the last: let me count — yes, by heavens! I make out sixteen, well told! Never mind, it shall be a stiff one. Boy, bring the bottle, and mind you don't pour the hot water into my shoes, as you did the other night. There, that will do. Now, Tomkins, fill up yours; and you, Mr. Smith: let us all start fair, and then you shall have my story — and a very curious one it is, I can tell you; I wouldn't have believed it myself, if I hadn't seen it. Hillo! what's this? Confound it! what's the matter with the toddy? Hah, Mr. Tomkins?"

Mr. Tomkins tasted, but, like the lieutenant, he had made it very stiff, and, as he had also taken largely before, he was, like him, not quite so clear in his discrimination: „It has a queer flavour, sir; Smith, what is it?"

Smith took up his glass, tasted the contents:

„Salt water," drawled the midshipman.

„Salt water! so it is, by heavens!" cried Mr. Appleboy.

„Salt as Lot's wife! — by all that's infamous!" cried the master's mate.

„Salt water, sir!" cried Jem, in a fright — expecting a salt eel for supper.

„Yes, sir," replied Mr. Appleboy, tossing the contents of the tumbler in the boy's face, — "salt water. Very well, sir — very well!"

„It wasn't me, sir," replied the boy, making up a piteous look.

„No, sir, but you said the cook was sober."

„He was not so very much disguised, sir," replied Jem.

„Oh! very well — never mind. Mr. Tomkins, in case I should forget it, do me the favour to put the kettle of salt water down in the report. The scoundrel! I'm very sorry, gentlemen, but there's no means of having any more gin-toddy, — but never mind, we'll see to this to-morrow. Two can play at this; and if I don't salt-water their grog, and make them drink it, too, I have been twenty years a first-lieutenant for nothing — that's all. Good night, gentlemen; and," continued the lieutenant, in a severe tone, „you'll keep a sharp look-out, Mr. Smith — do you hear, sir?"

„Yes," drawled Smith, „but it's not my watch; it was my first watch, and, just now, it struck one bell."

„You'll keep the middle watch, then, Mr. Smith," said Mr. Appleboy, who was not a little put out; „and, Mr. Tomkins, let me know as soon as it's daylight. Boy, get my bed made. Salt water, by all that's blue! However, we'll see to that to-morrow morning."

Mr. Appleboy then turned in; so did Mr. Tomkins; and so did Mr. Smith, who had no idea of keeping the middle watch because the cook was drunk and had filled up the kettle with salt water. As for what happened in ninety-three or ninety-four, I really would inform the reader if I knew, but I'm afraid that that most curious story is never to be handed down to posterity.

The next morning, Mr. Tomkins, as usual, forgot to report the cook, the jar of butter, and the kettle of salt water; and Mr. Appleboy's wrath had long been appeased before he remembered them. At daylight the lieutenant came on deck, having only slept away half of the sixteen, not a taste of the seventeenth salt water glass of gin-toddy. He rubbed his gray eyes, that he might peer through the gray of the morning; the fresh breeze blew about his grizzly locks, and cooled his rubicund nose. The re-revenue-cutter, whose name was the „Active," cast off from the buoy; and, with a fresh breeze, steered her course for the Needles' passage.

Chapter III.

CUTTER THE THIRD.

Reader! have you been to St. Malo? If you have, you were glad enough to leave the hole; and, if you have not, take my advice, and do not give yourself the trouble to go and see that, or any other French port in the Channel. There is not one worth looking at. They have made one or two artificial ports, and they are no great things; there is no getting out, or getting in. In fact, they have no harbours in the Channel, while we have the finest in the world; a peculiar dispensation of Providence, because it knew that we should want them, and France would not. In France, what are called ports are all alike, nasty narrow holes, only to be entered at certain times of tide and certain winds; made up of basins and back-waters, custom-houses, and cabarets; just fit for smugglers to run into, and nothing more; and, therefore, they are used for very little else.

Now, in the dog-hole called St. Malo, there is some pretty land, although a great deficiency of marine-scenery. But never mind that: stay at home, and don't go abroad to drink sour wine, because they call it Bordeaux, and eat villainous trash, so disguised by cookery that you cannot possibly tell which of the birds of the air, or beasts of the field, or fishes of the sea, you are cramming down your throat. „If all is right, there is no occasion for disguise," is an old saying; so depend upon it, that there is something wrong, and that you are eating offal, under a grand French name. They eat every thing in France, and would serve you up the head of a monkey who has died of the small-pox, as Singe à la petite vérole — that is, if you did not understand French; if you did, they would call it, Tête d'amour à l'Ethiopique, and then you would be even more puzzled. As for their wine, there is no disguise in that — it's half vinegar. No, no! stay at home; you can live just as cheaply, if you choose, and then you will have good meat, good vegetables, good ale, good beer, and a good glass of grog — and what is of more importance, you will be in good company. Live with your friends, and don't make a fool of yourself.

I would not have condescended to have noticed this place, had it not been that I wish you to observe a vessel which is lying along the pier-wharf, with a plank from the shore to her gunnel. It is low water, and she is aground, and the plank dips down at such an angle, that it is a work of danger to go either in or out of her. You observe that there is nothing very remarkable in her. She is a cutter, and a good sea-boat, and sails well before the wind. She is short for her breadth of beam, and is not armed. Smugglers do not arm now — the service is too dangerous; they effect their purpose by cunning, not by force. Nevertheless, it requires that smugglers should be good seamen, smart, active fellows, and keen-witted, or they can do nothing. This vessel has not got a large cargo in her, but it is valuable. She has some thousand yards of lace, a few hundred pounds of tea, a few bales of silk, and about forty ankers of brandy — just as much as they can land in one boat. All they ask is a heavy gale, or a thick fog, and they trust to themselves for success.

There is nobody on board except a boy — the crew are all up at the cabaret, settling their little accounts of every description — for they smuggle both ways, and every man had his own private venture. There they are all, eleven of them, and fine-looking fellows, too, sitting at that long table. They are very merry, but quite sober, as they are to sail to-night.

The captain of the vessel (whose name, by-the-by, is the „Happy-go-lucky," — the captain christened her himself) is that fine-looking young man, with dark whiskers, meeting under his throat. His name is Jack Pickersgill. You perceive, at once, that he is much above a common sailor in appearance. His manners are good, he is remarkably handsome, very clean, and rather a dandy in his dress. Observe, how very politely he takes off his hat to that Frenchman, with whom he has just settled accounts; he beats Johnny Crapaud at his own weapons. And then there is an air of command, a feeling of conscious superiority about Jack; see how he treats the landlord, de haut en bas, at the same time that he is very civil. The fact is, that Jack is of a very good, old family, and received a very excellent education: but he was an orphan, his friends were poor, and could do but little for him; he went out to India as a cadet, ran away, and served in a schooner which smuggled opium into China, and then came home. He took a liking to the employment, and is now laying up a very pretty little sum: not that he intends to stop; no, as soon as he has enough to fit out a vessel for himself, he intends to start again for India, and with two cargoes of opium, he will return, he trusts, with a handsome fortune, and reassume his family name. Such are Jack's intentions: and, as he eventually means to reappear as a gentleman, he preserves his gentlemanly habits; he neither drinks, nor chews, nor smokes. He keeps his hands clean, wears rings, and sports a gold snuff-box; notwithstanding which, Jack is one of the boldest and best of sailors, and the men know it. He is full of fun, and as keen as a razor. Jack has a very heavy venture this time — all the lace is his own speculation, and, if he gets it in safe, he will clear some thousands of pounds. A certain fashionable shop in London has already agreed to take the whole off his hands.

That short, neatly made young man, is the second in command, and the companion of the captain. He is clever, and always has a remedy to propose when there is a difficulty, which is a great quality in a second in command. His name is Corbett. He is always merry — half sailor, half tradesman; knows the markets, runs up to London, and does business as well as a chapman — lives for the day, and laughs at tomorrow.

That little punchy old man, with long gray hair and fat face, with a nose like a note of interrogation, is the most personage of importance. He ought to be called the sailing master, for, although he goes on shore in France, off the English coast he never quits the vessel. When they leave her with the goods, he remains on board; he is always to be found off any part of the coast where he may be ordered; holding his position in defiance of gales, and tides, and fogs: as for the revenue-vessels, they all know him well enough, but they cannot touch a vessel in ballast, if she has no more men on board than allowed by her tonnage. He knows every creek, and hole, and corner, of the coast; how the tides run in — tide, half-tide, eddy, or current. That is his value. His name is Morrison.

You observe that Jack Pickersgill has two excellent supporters in Corbett and Morrison; his other men are good seamen, active, and obedient, which is all that he requires. I shall not particularly introduce them.

„Now you may call for another litre, my lads, and that must be the last; the tide is flowing fast, and we shall be afloat in half an hour, and we have just the breeze we want. What d'ye think, Morrison, shall we have dirt?"

„I've been looking just now, and if it were any other month in the year I should say, yes; but there's no trusting April, captain. Howsomever, if it does blow off, I'll promise you a fog in three hours afterwards."

„That will do as well. Corbett, have you settled with Duval?"

„Yes, after more noise and chattering than a panic in the stock-exchange would make in England. He fought and squabbled for an hour, and I found that, without some abatement, I never should have settled the affair."

„What did you let him off?"

„Seventeen sous," replied Corbett, laughing.

„And that satisfied him?" inquired Pickersgill.

„Yes — it was all he could prove to be a surfaire: two of the knives were a little rusty. But he will always have something off; he could not be happy without it. I really think he would commit suicide, if he had to pay a bill without a deduction."

„Let him live," replied Pickersgill. „Jeannette, a bottle of Volnay, of toll, and three glasses."

Jeannette, who was the fille de cabaret, soon appeared with a bottle of a wine, seldom called for, except by the captain of the Happy-go-lucky.

„You sail to-night?" said she, as she placed the bottle before him.

Pickersgill nodded his head.

„I had a strange dream," said Jeannette; „I thought you were all taken by a revenue cutter, and put into a cachot. I went to see you, and I did not know one of you again — you were all changed."

„Very likely, Jeannette — you would not be the first who did not know their friends again when in misfortune. There was nothing strange in your dream."

„Mais, mon Dieu! je ne suis pas comme ça, moi."

„No, that you are not, Jeannette; you are a good girl, and some of these fine days I'll marry you," said Corbett.

„Doit être bien beau ce jour-là, par exemple," replied Jeannette, laughing; „you have promised to marry me every time you have come in, these last three years."

„Well, that proves I keep to my promise, any how."

„Yes; but you never go any farther."

„I can't spare him, Jeannette, that is the real truth," said the captain; „but wait a little — in the mean time, here is a five-franc-piece to add to your petite fortune."

„Merci bien, monsieur le capitaine; bon voyage!" Jeannette held her finger up to Corbett, saying, with a smile, „méchant!" and then quitted the room.

„Come, Morrison, help us to empty this bottle, and then we will all go on board."

„I wish that girl wouldn't come here with her nonsensical dreams," said Morrison, taking his seat; „I don't like it. When she said that we should be taken by a revenue cutter, I was looking at a blue and a white pigeon sitting on the wall opposite; and I said to myself, now, if that be a warning, I will see: if the blue pigeon flies away first, I shall be in jail in a week; if the white, I shall be back here."

„Well?" said Pickersgill, laughing.

„It wasn't well," answered Morrison, tossing off his wine, and putting the glass down with a deep sigh; „for the cursed blue pigeon flew away immediately."

„Why, Morrison, you must have a chicken-heart to be frightened at a blue pigeon," said Corbett, laughing, and looking out of the window; „at all events, he has come back again, and there he is sitting by the white one."

„It's the first time that ever I was called chicken-hearted," replied Morrison, in wrath.

„Nor do you deserve it, Morrison," replied Pickersgill; „but Corbett is only joking."

„Well, at all events I'll try my luck in the same way, and see whether I am to be in jail: I shall take the blue pigeon as my bad omen, as you did."

The sailors and Captain Pickersgill all rose and went to the window, to ascertain Corbett's fortune by this new species of augury. The blue pigeon flapped his wings, and then he sidled up to the white one; at last, the white pigeon flew off the wall and settled on the roof of the adjacent house. „Bravo! white pigeon," said Corbett; „I shall be here again in a week." The whole party, laughing, then resumed their seats; and Morrison's countenance brightened up. As he took the glass of wine poured out by Pickersgill, he said, „Here's your health, Corbett; it was all nonsense, after all — for, d'ye see, I can't be put in jail without you are. We all sail in the same boat, and when you leave me, you take with you every thing that can condemn the vessel — so here's success to our trip."

„We will all drink that toast, my lads, and then on board," said the captain; „here's success to our trip."

The captain rose, as did the mates and men, drank the toast, turned down the drinking cannikin on the table, hastened to the wharf, and, in half an hour, the Happy-go-lucky was clear off the port of St. Malo.

(To be continued in our next.)

The Lover's Rock.

The Maiden through the favouring night
From Granada took her flight,
She bade her father's house farewell,
And fled away with Manuel.

No Moorish maid might hope to vie
With Laila's cheek or Laila's eye,
No maiden loved with purer truth,
Or ever loved a lovelier youth.

In fear they fled across the plain,
The father's wrath, the captive's chain,
In hope to Murcia on they flee,
To Peace, and Love, and Liberty.

And now they reach the mountain's height,
And she was weary with her flight,
She laid her head on Manuel's breast,
And pleasant was the maiden's rest.

But while she slept, the passing gale
Waved the maiden's flowing veil,
Her father, as he crost the height,
Saw the veil so long and white.

Young Manuel started from his sleep,
He saw them hastening up the steep,
And Laila shriek'd, and desperate now
They climb'd the precipice's brow.

They saw him raise his angry hand,
And follow with his armed band,
They saw them climbing up the steep,
And heard his curses loud and deep.

Then Manuel's heart grew wild with woe,
He loosen'd stones and roll'd below,
He loosen'd crags, for Manuel strove
For life, and liberty, and love.

The ascent was steep, the rock was high,
The Moors they durst not venture nigh,
The fugitives stood safely there,
They stood in safety and despair.

The Moorish chief unmoved could see
His daughter bend the suppliant knee,
He heard his child for pardon plead,
And swore the offenders both should bleed.

He bade the archers bend the bow,
And make the Christian fall below,
He bade the archers aim the dart,
And pierce the Maid's apostate heart.

The archers aim'd their arrows there,
She clasp'd young Manuel in despair,
Death, Manuel, shall set us free!
Then leap below and die with me.

He clasp'd her close and cried farewell,
In one another's arms they fell;
They leapt adown the craggy side,
In one another's arms they died.

And side by side they there are laid,
The Christian youth and Moorish maid,
But never Cross was planted there,
Because they perish'd for despair.

Yet every Moorish maid can tell
Where Laila lies who loved so well,
And every youth who passes there
Says for Manuel's soul a prayer.

Robert Southey.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. №. 29.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. L. M. M.

The Three Cutters.

(Continued from our last.)

Chapter IV.

PORTLAND BILL.

The Happy-go-lucky sailed with a fresh breeze and a flowing sheet from St. Helens, the evening before the Arrow sailed from Barn Pool. The Active sailed from Portsmouth the morning after.

The yacht, as we before observed, was bound to Cowes, in the Isle of Wight. The Active had orders to cruise wherever she pleased within the limits of the admiral's station; and she ran for West Bay, on the other side of the Bill of Portland. The Happy-go-lucky was also bound for that bay to land her cargo.

The wind was light, and there was every appearance of fine weather, when the Happy-go-lucky, at 10 o'clock on the Tuesday night, made the Portland Lights; as it was impossible to run her cargo that night, she hove to.

At 11 o'clock, the Portland lights were made by the revenue cutter, Active. Mr. Appleboy went up to have a look at them, ordered the cutter to be hove to, and then went down to finish his allowance of gin toddy. At 12 o'clock, the yacht Arrow made the Portland lights, and continued her course, hardly stemming the ebb tide.

Day broke, and the horizon was clear. The first on the look-out were, of course, — the smugglers; they, and those on board of the revenue cutter, were the only two interested parties — the yacht was neuter.

„There are two cutters in sight, sir," said Corbett, who had the watch; for Pickersgill, having been up almost the whole night, had thrown himself down on his bed with his clothes on.

„What do they look like?" said Pickersgill, who was up in a moment.

„One is a yacht, and the other may be; but I rather think, as far as I can judge in the grey, that it is our old friend of here."

„What! old Appleboy?"

„Yes, it looks like him; but the day has scarcely broke yet."

„Well, he can do nothing in a light wind like this; and, before the wind, we can show him our heels: but are you sure the other is a yacht?" said Pickersgill, coming on the deck.

„Yes; the flag is seen outside of his canvass."

„You're right," said Pickersgill, „that's a yacht; and you're right there again in your guess — that is the stupid old Active, which always about creeping for tubs. Well, I see nothing to alarm us at present, provided it don't fall a dead calm, and then we must take to our boats as soon as he takes to his; we are four miles from him at least. Watch his motions, Corbett, and see if he lowers a boat. What does she go now? four knots — that will soon tire their men."

The positions of the three cutters were as follows: —

The Happy-go-lucky was about four miles off Portland Head, and well into West Bay. The revenue cutter was close to the Head. The yacht was outside of the smuggler about two miles to the westward, and about five or six miles from the revenue cutter.

„Two vessels in sight, sir," said Mr. Smith, coming down into the cabin to Mr. Appleboy.

„Very well," replied the lieutenant, who was lying down in his standing bed-place.

„The people say one is the Happy-go-lucky, sir," drawled Smith.

„Heh? what! Happy-go-lucky? yes, I recollect; I've boarded her twenty times — always empty. How's she standing?"

„She stands to the westward now, sir; but she was hove to, they say, when they first saw her."

„Then she has a cargo in her;" and Mr. Appleboy shaved himself, dressed, and went on deck.

„Yes," said the lieutenant, rubbing his eyes again and again, and then looking through the glass, „it is her sure enough. Let draw the fore-sheet — hands make sail. What vessel's the other?"

„Don't know, sir, — she's a cutter."

„A cutter? yes; may be a yacht, or may be the new cutter ordered on the station. Make all sail, Mr. Tomkins; hoist our pendant, and fire a gun — they will understand what we mean then; they don't know the Happy-go-lucky as well as we do."

In a few minutes the Active was under a press of sail; she hoisted her pendant, and fired a gun. The smuggler perceived that the Active had recognised her, and she also threw out more canvass, and ran off more to the westward.

„There's a gun, sir," reported one of the men to Mr Stewart, on board of the yacht.

„Yes; give me the glass — a revenue cutter: then that vessel in shore, running towards us, must be a smuggler."

„She has just now made all sail, sir."

„Yes, there's no doubt of it; I will go down to his lordship — keep her as she goes."

Mr. Stewart then went down to inform Lord B. of the circumstance. Not only Lord B., but most of the gentlemen came on deck; as did soon afterwards the ladies, who had received the intelligence from Lord B., who spoke to them through the door of the cabin.

But the smuggler had more wind than the revenue cutter, and increased her distance.

„If we were to wear round now, my lord," observed Mr. Stewart, „she is just abreast of us and in shore, we could prevent her escape."

„Round with her, Mr. Stewart," said Lord B., „we must do our duty, and protect the laws."

„That will not be fair, papa," said Cecilia Ounslow, „we have no quarrel with the smugglers; I'm sure the ladies have not, for they bring us beautiful things."

„Miss Ounslow, observed her aunt, „it is not proper for you to offer an opinion."

The yacht wore round, and sailing so fast, the smuggler had little chance of escaping her; but to chase is one thing — to capture, another.

„Let us give her a gun, said Lord B., that will frighten her; and he dare not cross our hawse."

The gun was loaded, and not being more than a mile from the smuggler, actually threw the ball almost a quarter of the way.

The gentlemen, as well as Lord B., were equally excited by the ardour of pursuit; but the wind died away, and at last it was nearly calm. The revenue cutter's boats were out, and coming up fast.

„Let us get our boat out, Stewart," said his lordship, „and help them, it is quite calm now."

The boat was soon out: it was a very large one, usually stowed on, and occupied a large portion of, the deck. It pulled six oars; and when it was manned, Mr. Stewart jumped in, and Lord B. followed him.

„But you have no arms," said Mr. Hamilton.

„The smugglers never resist now," observed Stewart.

„Then you are going on a very gallant expedition, indeed," observed Cecilia Hamilton; „I wish you joy."

But Lord B. was too much excited to pay attention. They shoved off, and pulled towards the smuggler.

At this time, the revenue boats were about five miles astern of the Happy-go-lucky, and the yacht about three quarters of a mile from her in the offing. Pickersgill had, of course, observed the motions on the yacht; had seen her wear on chase, hoist her ensign and pendant, and fire her gun.

„Well," said he, „this is the blackest ingratitude; to be attacked by the very people whom we smuggle for. I only wish she may come up with us; and, let her attempt to interfere, she shall rue the day: I don't much like this, though."

As we before observed, it fell nearly calm, and the revenue boats were in chase. Pickersgill watched them as they came up.

„What shall we do," said Corbett, — „get the boat out?"

„Yes," replied Pickersgill, „we will get the boat out, and have the goods in tow all ready: but we can pull faster than they do, in the first place, and, in the next, they will be pretty well tired before they come up to us. We are fresh, and shall soon walk away from them; so I shall not leave the vessel till they are within half a mile. We must sink the ankers, that they may not seize the vessel, for it is not worth while taking them with us. Pass them along ready to run them over the bows, that they may not see us and swear to it. But we have a good half hour and more."

„Ay, and you may hold all fast if you choose," said Morrison, „although it's better to be on the right side and get ready: otherwise, before half an hour, I'll swear that we are out of their sight: look there," said he, pointing to the eastward at a heavy bank, „it's coming right down upon us, as I said it would."

True enough, but still there is no saying which will come up first, Morrison; the boats or the fog, so we must be prepared."

„Hilloa! what's this? why, there's a boat coming from the yacht."

Pickersgill took out his glass.

„Yes, and the yacht's own boat, with the name painted on her bows. Well, let them come — we will have no ceremony in resisting them; they are not in the act of Parliament, and must take the consequences. We have naught to fear. Get stretchers, my lads, and hand-spikes; they row six oars, and are three in the sternsheets — they must be good men if they take us."

In a few minutes Lord B.'s boat was close to the smuggler.

„Boat, ahoy! what do you want?"

„Surrender, in the king's name."

„To what, and to whom, and what are we to surrender? We are an English vessel coasting along shore."

„Pull on board, my lads," cried Stewart; „I am a king's officer — we know her."

The boat dashed alongside, and Stewart and Lord B., followed by the men, jumped on the deck.

„Well, gentlemen, what do you want?" said Pickersgill.

„We seize you — you are a smuggler; there's no denying it — look at the casks of spirits stretched along the deck."

„We never said that we were not smugglers," replied Pickersgill; „but what is that to you? you are not a king's ship, or employed by the revenue."

„No, but we carry a pendant, and it is our duty to protect the laws."

„And who are you?" said Pickersgill.

„I am Lord B."

„Then, my lord, allow me to say that you would do much better to attend to the framing of laws, and leave people of less consequence like those astern of us, to execute them. „Mind your own business,' is an old adage. We shall not hurt you, my lord, as you have only employed words, but we shall put it out of your power to hurt us. Come aft, my lads. Now, my lord, resistance is useless; we are double your numbers, and you have caught a Tartar."

Lord B. and Mr. Stewart perceived that they were in an awkward predicament.

„You may do what you please," observed Mr. Stewart, „but the revenue boats are coming up, recollect."

„Look you, sir, do you see the revenue cutter?" said Pickersgill.

Stewart looked in that direction, and saw that she was hidden in the fog.

„In five minutes, sir, the boats will be out of sight also, and so will your vessel; we have nothing to fear from them."

„Indeed, my lord, we had better return," said Mr. Stewart, who perceived that Pickersgill was right.

„I beg your pardon, you will not go on board of your yacht so soon as you expect. Take the oars out of the boat, my lads, two or three of you, and throw in a couple of our paddles for them to reach the shore with. The rest of you knock down the first man who offers to resist. You are not aware, perhaps, my lord, that you have attempted piracy on the high seas."

Stewart looked at Lord B. It was true enough. The men of the yacht could offer no resistance; the oars were taken out of the boat, and the men got in again.

„My lord," said Pickersgill, „your boat is manned — do me the favour to step into it; and you, sir, do the same. I should be sorry to lay my hands upon a peer of the realm, or a king's officer even on half pay."

Remonstrance was vain; his lordship was led to the boat by two of the smugglers, and Stewart followed.

„I will leave your oars, my lord, at the Weymouth custom-house; and I trust this will be a lesson to you in future to ‚mind your own business.'"

The boat was shoved off from the sloop by the smugglers, and was soon lost sight of in the fog, which had now covered the revenue boats as well as the yacht; at the same time, it brought down a breeze from the eastward.

„Haul to the wind, Morrison," said Pickersgill, „we will stand out to get rid of the boats; if they pull on, they will take it for granted that we shall run into the bay, as will the revenue cutter."

Pickersgill and Corbett were in conversation abaft for a short time, when the former desired the course to be altered two points.

„Keep silence all of you, my lads, and let me know if you hear a gun or a bell from the yacht," said Pickersgill.

„There is a gun, sir, close to us," said one of the men — „the sound was right ahead."

„That will do, keep her as she goes. Aft here, my lads; we cannot run our cargo in the bay, for the cutter has been seen to chase us, and they will all be on the look-out at the preventive stations for us on shore. Now, my lads, I have made up my mind that, as these yacht gentlemen have thought proper to interfere, that I will take possession of the yacht for a few days. We shall then outsail every thing, go where we like unsuspected, and land our cargo with ease. I shall run alongside of her — she can have but few hands on board; and mind, do not hurt any body, but be civil and obey my orders. Morrison, you and your four men and the boy will remain on board as before, and take the vessel to Cherbourg, where we will join you."

In a short time, another gun was fired from the yacht. Those on board, particularly the ladies, were alarmed; the fog was very thick, and they could not distinguish the length of the vessel. They had seen the boat board, but had not seen her turned adrift without oars, as the fog came on just at that time. The yacht was left with only three seamen on board, and, should it come on bad weather, they were in an awkward predicament. Mr. Hautaine had taken the command, and ordered the guns to be fired that the boat might be enabled to find them.

The fourth gun was loading, when they perceivof the smuggler's cutter close to them, looming through the fog.

„Here they are,“ cried the seamen; „and they have brought the prize along with them. Three cheers for the Arrow!“

„Hilloa! you'll be on board of us,“ cried Hautaine.

„That's exactly what I intended to be, sir,“ replied Pickersgill, jumping on the quarter-deck, followed by his men.

„Who the devil are you?“

„That's exactly the same question that I asked Lord B. when he boarded us,“ replied Pickersgill, taking off his hat to the ladies.

„Well, but what business have you here?“

„Exactly the same question which I put to Lord B.,“ replied Pickersgill.

„Where is Lord B., sir?“ said Cecilia Ossulton, going up to the smuggler; „is he safe?“

„Yes, madam, he is safe; at least he is in his boat with all his men, and unhurt — but you must excuse me, if I request you and the other ladies to go down below, while I speak to these gentlemen. Be under no alarm, miss; you will receive neither insult nor ill treatment — I have only taken possession of this vessel for the present.“

„Take possession,“ cried Hautaine, „of a yacht!“

„Yes, sir, since the owner of the yacht thought proper to attempt to take possession of me. I always thought that yachts were pleasure-vessels, sailing about for amusement, respected themselves, and not interfering with others; but it appears that such is not the case. The owner of this yacht has thought proper to break through the neutrality, and commence aggression; and, under such circumstances, I have now, in retaliation, taken possession of her.“

„And, pray, what do you mean to do, sir?“

„Simply, for a few days, to make an exchange. I shall send you on board of my vessel as smugglers, while I remain here with the ladies, and amuse myself with yachting.“

„Why, sir, you cannot mean ...“

„I have said, gentlemen, and that is enough; I should be sorry to resort to violence, but I must be obeyed. You have, I perceive, three seamen only left; they are not sufficient to take charge of the vessel, and Lord B. and the others you will not meet for several days. My regard for the ladies — even common humanity, points out to me that I cannot leave the vessel in this crippled condition. At the same time, as I must have hands on board on my own, you will oblige me by going on board, and taking her safely into port. It is the least return you can make for my kindness. In those dresses, gentlemen, you will not be able to do your duty; oblige me by shifting, and putting on these.“ Corbett handed a flannel shirt, a rough jacket and trowsers, to Messrs. Hautaine, Ossulton, Vaughan, and Seagrave. After some useless resistance they were stripped, and, having put on the smugglers' attire, they were handed on board of the Happy-go-lucky.

The three English seamen were also sent on board, and confined below, as well as Ossulton's servant, who was also equipped like his master, and confined below with the seamen. Corbett and the men then handed up all the smuggled goods into the yacht, dropped the boat, and made it fast astern; and, Morrison having received his directions, the vessels separated, — Morrison running for Cherbourg, and Pickersgill steering the yacht along shore to the westward. About an hour after this exchange had been effected, the fog cleared up, and showed the revenue cutter hove to for her boats, which had pulled back, and were close on board of her; and the Happy-go-lucky, about three miles in the offing. Lord B. and his boat's crew were about four miles in shore, paddling and drifting with the tide towards Portland. As soon as the boats were on board, the revenue cutter made all sail after the smuggler, paying no attention to the yacht, and either not seeing or not caring about the boat which was drifting about in West Bay.

Chapter V.

THE TRAVESTIE.

Here we are, Corbett, and now I only wish my venture had been double,“ observed Pickersgill; „but I shall not allow business to absorb me wholly — we must add a little amusement. It appears to me, Corbett, that the gentleman's clothes which lie there will fit you, and those of the good-looking fellow who was spokesman will, I am sure, suit me well. Now, let us dress ourselves, and then for breakfast.“

Pickersgill then exchanged his clothes for those of Mr Hautaine, and Corbett fitted on those of Mr Ossulton. The steward was summoned up, and he dared not disobey; he appeared on deck, trembling.

„Steward — you will take these clothes below,“ said Pickersgill, „and, observe, I now command this yacht; and, during the time that I am on board, you will pay me the same respect as you did Lord B.; nay, more, you will always address me as Lord B. You will prepare dinner and breakfast, and do your duty just as if his lordship was on board, and take care that you feed us well, for I will not allow the ladies to be entertained in a less sumptuous manner than before. — You will tell the cook what I say, — and now that you have heard me, take care that you obey; if not, recollect that I have my own men here, and if I but point with my finger, overboard you go. — Do you perfectly comprehend me?“

„Yes, — sir,“ stammered the steward.

„Yes, sir! — What did I tell you, sirrah? — Yes, my lord. — Do you understand me?“

„Yes — my lord.“

„Pray, steward, whose clothes has this gentleman put on?“

„Mr. — Mr. Ossulton's, I think — sir — my lord — I mean.“

„Very well, steward; then recollect, in future you always address that gentleman as Mr. Ossulton.“

„Yes, my lord,“ and the steward went down below, and was obliged to take a couple of glasses of brandy, to keep himself from fainting.

„Who are they, and what are they! Mr. Maddox?“ cried the lady's-maid, who had been weeping.

„Pirates! — bloody, murderous, stick-at-nothing pirates!“ replied the steward.

„Oh!“ screamed the lady's-maid, „what will become of us, poor unprotected females?“ and she hastened into the cabin, to impart this dreadful intelligence.

The ladies in the cabin were not in a very enviable situation. As for the elder Miss Ossulton, (that, perhaps, it will be better in future, to distinguish the two ladies, by calling the elder simply Miss Ossulton, and her niece, Cecilia,) she was sitting with her salts to her nose, agonized with a mixture of trepidation and wounded pride. Mrs. Lascelles was weeping, but weeping gently. Cecilia was sad, and her heart was beating with anxiety and suspense — when the maid rushed in.

„Oh madam! Oh miss! Oh Mrs. Lascelles! I have found it all out! — they are murderous, bloody, do-every-thing pirates!!“

„Mercy on us!“ exclaimed Miss Ossulton, „surely they will never dare — —?“

„Oh, ma'am, they dare any thing! — they just now were throwing the steward overboard — and they have rummaged all the portmanteaus, and dressed themselves in the gentlemen's best clothes — the captain of them told the steward that he was Lord B. — and that if he dared to call him any thing else, he would cut his throat from ear to ear — and if the cook don't give them a good dinner, they swear that they'll chop his right hand off, and make him eat, without pepper or salt!“

Miss Ossulton screamed, and went off into hysterics. — Mrs. Lascelles and Cecilia went to her assistance; but the latter had not forgotten the very different behaviour of Jack Pickersgill, and his polite manners, when he boarded the vessel. She did not, therefore, believe what the maid had reported, but still her anxiety and suspense were great, especially about her father

After having restored her coat, she put on her bonnet, which was lying on the sofa.

„Where are you going, dear?" said Mrs. Lascelles.

„On deck," replied Cecilia; „I must and will speak to these men."

„Gracious heaven! Miss Ossulton; going on deck! have you heard what Phœbe says?"

„Yes, aunt, I have — but I can wait here no longer."

„Stop her! stop her! — she will be murdered!" — she will be — she is mad!" screamed Miss Ossulton; but no one attempted to stop Cecilia, and on deck she went. On her arrival, she found Jack Pickersgill and Corbett walking the deck; one of the smugglers at the helm, and the rest forward, and as quiet as the crew of the yacht. As soon as she made her appearance, Jack took off his hat, and made her a bow.

„I do not know whom I have the honour of addressing, young lady! but I am flattered with this mark of confidence. — You feel, and I assure you, you feel correctly, that you are not exactly in lawless hands."

Cecilia looked with more surprise than fear at Pickersgill; Mr. Hautaine's dress became him, he was a handsome, fine-looking man, and had nothing of the ruffian in his appearance; unless, like Byron's Corsair, he was half savage, half soft. She could not help thinking that she had met many with less pretensions, as far as appearance went, to the claims of a gentleman at Almack's, and other fashionable circles.

„I have ventured on deck, sir," said Cecilia, with a little tremulousness in her voice, „to request, as a favour, that you will inform me what your intentions may be, with regard to the vessel, and with regard to the ladies?"

„And I feel much obliged to you, for your so doing, and I assure you, I will, as far as I have made up my own mind, answer you candidly: but you tremble — allow me to conduct you to a seat. In few words, then, to remove your present alarm, I intend that the vessel shall be returned to its owner, with every article in it, as religiously respected as if they were church property. With respect to you, and the other ladies on board, I pledge you my honour, that you have nothing to fear; that you shall be treated with every respect; your privacy never invaded: and that, in a few days, you will be restored to your friends. Young lady, I pledge my hopes of future salvation to the truth of this; but, at the same time, I must make a few conditions, which, however, will not be very severe."

„But, sir," replied Cecilia, much relieved, for Pickersgill had stood by her in the most respectful manner, „you are, I presume, the captain of the smuggler? — Pray, answer me one question more — What became of the boat, with Lord B., — he is my father?"

„I left him in his boat, without a hair of his head touched, young lady: but I took away the oars."

„Then he will perish!" cried Cecilia, putting her handkerchief to her eyes.

„No, young lady, he is on shore probably by this time; although I took away his means of assisting to capture us, I left him the means of gaining the land. It is not every one who would have done that, after his conduct to me."

„I begged him not to go," said Cecilia; „I told him that it was not fair, and that he had no quarrel with the smugglers."

„I thank you even for that," replied Pickersgill; „and now, miss — I have not the pleasure of recollecting his lordship's family name?"

„Ossulton, sir," said Cecilia, looking at Pickersgill with surprise.

„Then, with your permission, Miss Ossulton, I will now make you my confidant; excuse my using so fine a term, but it is because I wish to relieve your fears; at the same time, I cannot permit you to divulge all my intentions to the whole party on board; I feel that I may trust you, for you have courage, and where there is courage, there generally is truth; but you must first tell me whether you will condescend to accept these terms?"

Cecilia demurred a moment — the idea of being the confidant of a smuggler rather startled her; but still, her knowledge of what his intentions were, if she might not reveal them might be important, as, perhaps, she might dissuade him. She could be in no worse position than she was now, and she might be in a much better. The conduct of Pickersgill had been such, up to the present, as to inspire confidence; and although he defied the laws, he appeared to regard the courtesies of life. Cecilia was a courageous girl, and at length she replied: —

„Provided what you desire me to keep secret will not be injurious to any one, or compromise me, in my peculiar situation, I consent."

„I would not hurt a fly, Miss Ossulton, but in self-defence, and I have too much respect for you, from your conduct during our short meeting, to compromise you. Allow me now to be very candid; and then, perhaps, you will acknowledge that, in my situation, others would do the same; and, perhaps, not shew half so much forbearance. Your father, without any right whatever, interferes with me, and my calling; he attempts to make me a prisoner, to have me thrown in jail; heavily fined, and, perhaps, sent out of the country. I will not enter into any defence of smuggling, it is sufficient to say, that there are pains and penalties attached to the infraction of certain laws, and that I choose to risk them — but Lord B. was not empowered by government to attack me — it was a gratuitous act, and had I thrown him, and all his crew into the sea, I should have been justified, for it was in short, an act of piracy on their part. Now, as your father has thought to turn a yacht into a revenue cutter, you cannot be surprised at my retaliating, in turning her into a smuggler; and as he has mixed up looking after the revenue with yachting, he cannot be surprised if I retaliate, by mixing up a little yachting with smuggling. I have dressed your male companions as smugglers, and have sent them in the smuggling vessel to Cherbourg, where they will be safely landed; and I have dressed myself, and the only person whom I could join with me in this frolic, as gentlemen, in their places. My object is twofold; one is, to land my cargo, which I have now on board, and which is very valuable; the other is, to retaliate upon your father and his companions, for their attempt upon me, by stepping into their shoes, and enjoying, for a day or two, their luxuries. It is my intention to make free with nothing, but his lordship's wine and eatables, that you may be assured of; but I shall have no pleasure, if the ladies do not sit down to the dinner-table with us, as they did before with your father and his friends."

„You can hardly expect that, sir," said Cecilia.

„Yes, I do; and that will be not only the price of the early release of the yacht and themselves, but it will also be the only means by which they will obtain any thing to eat. You observe, Miss Ossulton, the sins of the fathers are visited on the children. I have now told you what I mean to do, and what I wish. I leave you to think of it, and decide whether it will not be best for all parties to consent. You have my permission to tell the other ladies, that whatever may be their conduct, they are as secure from ill treatment or rudeness, as if they were in Grosvenor Square; but I cannot answer that they will not be hungry, if, after such forbearance in every point, they shew so little gratitude, as not to honour me with their company."

„Then I am to understand, that we are to be starved into submission."

„No, not starved, Miss Ossulton; but recollect, that you will be on bread and water, and detained until you do consent, and your detention will increase the anxiety of your father."

„You know how to persuade, sir," said Cecilia. „As far as I am concerned, I trust I shall ever be ready to sacrifice any feelings of pride, to spare my father so much uneasiness.

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nro 30.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

William Wordsworth.

Das Haupt der ſogenannten Lake-School, deren Anſehn jedoch in neueſter Zeit abzunehmen beginnt, wird Wordsworth von ſeinen Landsleuten als lyriſcher Dichter ſehr hochgeſtellt. Er ward am 7. April 1770 in Cockermouth geboren, zeichnete ſich ſchon als Knabe durch Fleiß und Fähigkeiten aus und bezog 1788 die Univerſität Cambridge. Als Student machte er mehrere Fußreiſen durch Frankreich, die Schweiz, Savoyen und Italien, welche er in Verſen beſchrieb und 1793 unter dem Titel Descriptive sketches*) herausgab. — Nachdem er ſeine Studien vollendet, zog er die ländliche Abgeſchiedenheit dem Geſchäftsleben vor, und ſchlug mit ſeinem Freunde Coleridge ſeine Wohnung zu Alfarden bei Bridgewater in Somerſetſhire auf. — Im Jahre 1798 erſchienen ſeine lyrical ballads; zu derſelben Zeit machte er eine Reiſe durch Deutſchland, und ließ ſich dann, bald nach ſeiner Rückkehr, in Rydale nieder, wo er ſeitdem von ſeinem Vermögen und dem Einkommen einer kleinen Beamtenſtelle in ſtillem Frieden lebt. — Im Jahre 1803 vermählte er ſich mit Miß Mary Hutchinſon, mit welcher er eine ſehr glückliche, kinderreiche Ehe führt.

Wordsworth iſt als Menſch mehr werth, denn als Dichter, obwohl er durchaus nicht zu den unbedeutenden oder alltäglichen Poeten gerechnet werden kann. — Seine Geſinnungen und Gefühle ſind edel, ſchön und wahr, Alles kommt bei ihm aus dem Herzen, und erfüllt den Leſer mit großer Achtung und Verehrung für den beſcheidenen Mann, der ſolche Empfindungen ſo warm und lebendig äußert und ſchildert, weil er ſie wirklich ſelbſt beſitzt, aber es fehlt ihm durchaus an Tiefe der Anſchauung, wie an Reichthum und Kraft der Phantaſie. Er iſt zu einſeitig, zu monoton; und da er zu ſehr darnach ſtrebt, fremde Gemüther nach dem ſeinigen zu ſtimmen, ſo wird er in dieſem ängſtlichen Bemühen mitunter trivial, ſehr häufig aber geſucht und manierirt. Daher erhebt er ſich eigentlich nicht über eine [illegible] Mittelmäßigkeit, und findet demzufolge auch ſeine meiſten Freunde unter der großen Menge der Mittelmäßigen. — Seine Sprache iſt ſehr cultivirt; ſeine Bilder ſind glücklich und anmuthig, ſeine Verſe fließend und gewählt. Sein edles, religiöſes Gefühl, ſein [illegible] Wohlwollen für die ganze Schöpfung, und ſeine Liebe zum Wahren und Guten ſind endlich nicht geringe Zierden des wackern Mannes — aber alle dieſe vortrefflichen Eigenſchaften reichen doch nicht hin, um einen großen Dichter zu ſchaffen.

Wordsworths bedeutendſtes und gelungenſtes Gedicht iſt das weiße Reh von Rylstone. Sein zweites größeres Gedicht, The excursion, die Streifzüge eines engliſchen Hauſirers und deſſen Unterhaltungen über Gegenſtände des Lebens mit den verſchiedenartigſten Perſonen enthaltend, leidet, trotz mancher Schönheiten, doch ſehr an Trivialität, es iſt dem Dichter hier mehr darum zu thun, ſeine Anſichten und An-

---

*) Descriptive sketches taken during a pedestrian tour in the Alps.

II. Jahrgang.

wickeln, als uns durch die Wahl und Behandlung ſeines Stoffes zu unterhalten, und ſo verfällt er nur gar zu häufig in eine Art von ſüßlichem Predigerton, der uns ſehr bald ermüdet und vom weiteren Leſen abſchreckt.

Unter ſeinen kleineren Gedichten findet ſich dagegen manches Gelungene, namentlich das hier mitgetheilte: We are seven!

We are Seven.

By W. Wordsworth.

— — A simple child
That lightly draws its breath
And feels its life in every limb,
What should it know of death?

I met a little cottage-girl:
She was eight years old, she said;
Her hair was thick with many a curl
That clustered round her head.

She had a rustic woodland-air
And she was wildly clad;
Her eyes were fair, and very fair;
Her beauty made me glad.

Sisters and brothers, little maid,
How many may you be?
How many? Seven in all, she said,
And wondering looked at me.

And where are they? I pray you tell.
She answered: Seven are we;
And two of us at Conway dwell,
And two are gone to sea.

Two of us in the church-yard lie,
My sister and my brother;
And, in the church-yard-cottage, I
Dwell near them with my mother.

You say that two at Conway dwell,
And two are gone to sea,
Yet ye are seven! — I pray you tell,
Sweet maid, how this may be?

Then did the little maid reply:
Seven boys and girls are we;
Two of us in the church-yard lie,
Beneath the church-yard-tree.

You run about, my little maid,
Your limbs they are alive;
If two are in the church-yard laid,
Then ye are only five.

Their graves are green, they may be seen,
The little maid replied,
Twelve steps or more from my mother's door,
And they are side by side.

My stockings there I often knit,
My kerchief there I hem;
And there upon the ground I sit
I sit and sing to them.

And often after sunset, Sir,
When it is light and fair,
I take my little porringer,
And eat my supper there.

The first that died was little Jane;
In bed she moaning lay,
Till God released her of her pain;
And then she went away.

So in the church-yard she was laid;
And all the summer dry
Together round her grave we played,
My brother John and I.

And when the ground was white with snow,
And I could run and slide,
My brother John was forced to go,
And he lies by her side.

How many are you then, said I,
If they two are in Heaven?
The little maiden did reply:
O master we are seven.

But they are dead; those two are dead!
Their spirits are in Heaven!

'Twas throwing words away: for still
The little maid would have her will,
And said: Nay, we are seven!

The Farmer of Tilsbury-Vale.

By W. Wordsworth.

'Tis not for the unfeeling, the falsely refined,
The squeamish in taste, and the narrow of mind,
And the small critic wielding his delicate pen,
That I sing of old Adam, the pride of old men.

He dwells in the centre of London's wide town,
His staff is a sceptre — his grey hairs a crown;
Erect as a sunflower he stands, and the streak,
Of the unfaded rose is expressed on his cheek.

'Mid the dews, in the sunshine of morn — 'mid the joy
Of the fields, he collected that bloom, when a boy;
There fashioned that countenance, which, in spite of a stain
That his life hath received, to the last will remain.

A farmer he was; and his house far and near
Was the boast of the country for excellent cheer:
How oft have I heard in sweet Tilsbury-Vale
Of the silver-rimmed horn whence he dealt his good ale.

Yet Adam was far as the farthest from ruin,
His fields seemed to know what their master was doing;
And turnips, and corn-land, and meadow, and lea,
All caught the infection — as generous as he.

Yet Adam prized little the feast and the bowl, —
The fields better suited the ease of his soul:
He strayed through the fields like an indolent wight,
The quiet of nature was Adam's delight.

For Adam was simple in thought, and the poor
Familiar with him made an inn of his door;
He gave them the best that he had; or to say
What less may mislead you, they took it away.

Thus thirty smooth years did he thrive on his farm;
The genius of plenty preserved him from harm:
At length, what to most is a season of sorrow,
His means are run out, — he must beg or must borrow.

To the neighbours he went — all were free with their money;
For his hive had so long been replenished with honey,
That they dreamt not of dearth — He continued his rounds,
Knocked here and knocked there, pounds still adding to pounds.

He paid what he could of his ill-gotten pelf,
And something, it might be, reserved for himself:
Then (what is too true), without hinting a word,
Turned his back on the country; and off like a bird.

You lift up your eyes! — and I guess that you frame
A judgment too harsh of the sin and the shame;
In him it was scarcely a business of art,
For this he did all in the ease of his heart.

To London — a sad emigration I ween —
With his grey hairs he went from the brook and the green;
And there, with small wealth but his legs and his hands,
As lonely he stood as a crow on the sands.

All trades, as need was, did old Adam assume, —
Served as stable-boy, errand-boy, porter, and groom;
But nature is gracious, necessity kind,
And, in spite of the shame that may lurk in his mind,

He seems ten birth-days younger, is green and is stout;

Twice as fast as before does his blood run about;
You would say that each hair of his beard was alive
And his fingers are busy as bees in a hive.

For he's not like an old man that leisurely goes
About work that he knows in a track that he knows;
But often his mind is compelled to demur,
And you guess that the more then his body must stir.

In the throng of the town like a stranger is he,
Like one whose own country's far over the sea,
And nature, while through the great city he hies,
Full ten times a day takes his heart by surprise.

This gives him the fancy of one that is young,
More of soul in his face than of words on his tongue:
Like a maiden of twenty he trembles and sighs,
And tears of fifteen have come into his eyes.

What's a tempest to him or the dry parching heats?
Yet he watches the clouds that pass over the streets;
With a look of such earnestness often will stand
You might think he'd twelve reapers at work in the Strand.

Where proud Covent-garden, in desolate hours
Of snow and hoar-frost, spreads her fruits and her flowers,
Old Adam will smile at the pains that have made
Poor winter look fine in such strange masquerade.

'Mid coaches and chariots, a waggon of straw
Like a magnet the heart of old Adam can draw;
With a thousand soft pictures his memory will teem,
And his hearing is touched with the sounds of a dream.

Up the Hay-market-hill he oft whistles his way,
Thrusts his hands in the waggon, and smells at the hay:
He thinks of the fields he so often hath mown,
And is happy as if the rich freight were his own.

But chiefly to Smithfield he loves to repair —
If you pass by at morning you'll meet with him there;
The breath of the Cows you may see him inhale,
And his heart all the while is in Tilsbury-Vale.

Now farewell, old Adam, when low thou art laid
May one blade of grass spring up over thy head;
And I hope that thy grave, wheresoever it be,
Will hear the wind sigh through the leaves of a tree.

The Three Cutters.

(Continued from our last.)

With your permission, I will now go down into the cabin, and relieve my companions from the worst of their fears. As for obtaining what you wish, I can only say, that, as a young person, I am not likely to have much influence with those older than myself, and must inevitably be overruled, as I have not permission to point out to them reasons which might avail. Would you so far allow me to be relieved from my promise, as to communicate all you have said to me, to the only married woman on board? I think I then might obtain your wishes, which, I must candidly tell you, I shall attempt to effect, only because I am most anxious to rejoin my friends."

,,And be relieved of my company," replied Pickersgill, smiling, ironically, — ,,of course you are; but I must and will have my petty revenge; and although you may, and probably will detest me, at all events, you shall not have any very formidable charge to make against me. — Before you go below, Miss Ossulton, I give you my permission to add the married lady to the number of my confidants; and you must permit me to introduce my friend, Mr. Ossulton," and Pickersgill waved his hand in the direction of Corbett, who took off his hat, and made a low obeisance.

It was impossible for Cecilia Ossulton to help smiling.

„And," continued Pickersgill, „having taken the command of this yacht, instead of his lordship, it is absolutely necessary that I also take his lordship's name. While on board, I am Lord B., and allow me to introduce myself under that name — I cannot be addressed otherwise. Depend upon it, Miss Ossulton, that I shall have a most paternal solicitude to make you happy and comfortable."

Had Cecilia Ossulton dared to have given vent to her real feelings at that time, she would have burst into a fit of laughter, it was too ludicrous. At the same time the very burlesque re-assured her still more. She went into the cabin with a heavy weight removed from her heart.

In the mean time, Miss Ossulton and Mrs. Lascelles remained below, in the greatest anxiety at Cecilia's prolonged stay; they knew not what to think, and dared not go on deck. Mrs. Lascelles had once determined at all risks to go up; but Miss Ossulton and Phoebe had screamed, and implored her so fervently not to leave them, that she unwillingly consented to remain. Cecilia's countenance, when she entered the cabin, re-assured Mrs. Lascelles, but not her aunt, who ran to her, crying and sobbing, and clinging to her, saying: „What have they done to you, my poor, poor Cecilia?"

„Nothing at all, aunt," replied Cecilia, „the captain speaks very fairly, and says that he shall respect us in every possible way, provided that we obey his orders, but if not —"

„If not — what, Cecilia?" said Miss Ossulton, grasping her niece's arm.

„He will starve us, and not let us go!"

„God have mercy on us!" cried Miss Ossulton, renewing her sobs.

Cecilia then went to Mrs. Lascelles, and communicated to her, apart, all that had passed. Mrs. Lascelles agreed with Cecilia, that they were in no danger of insult; and as they talked over the matter, they at last began to laugh; there was a novelty in it, and there was something so ridiculous in all the gentlemen being turned into smugglers. Cecilia was glad that she could not tell her aunt, as she wished her to be so frightened, as never to have her company on board of the yacht again; and Mrs. Lascelles was too glad to annoy her for many and various insults received. The matter was, therefore, canvassed over very satisfactorily, and Mrs. Lascelles felt a natural curiosity to see this new Lord B. and the second Mr. Ossulton. But they had had no breakfast, and were feeling very hungry, now that their alarm was over. They desired Phoebe to ask the steward for some tea or coffee. The reply was, that „breakfast was laid in the cabin, and Lord B. trusted that the ladies would come to partake of it."

„No, no," replied Mrs. Lascelles, „I never can, without being introduced to them first."

„Nor will I go," replied Cecilia, „but I will write a note, and we will have our breakfast here." Cecilia wrote a note in pencil as follows.

„Miss Ossulton's compliments to Lord B., and, as the ladies feel rather indisposed after the alarm of this morning, they trust that his lordship will excuse their coming to breakfast; but hope to meet his lordship at dinner, if not before that time, on deck."

The answer was propitious, and the servant soon appeared with the breakfast in the ladies' cabin.

„Well, Maddox," said Cecilia, „how do you get on with your new master?"

The steward looked at the door, to see if it was closed, shook his head, and then said with a look of despair: „He has ordered a haunch of venison for dinner, miss, and he has twice threatened to toss me overboard."

„You must obey him, Maddox, or he certainly will. These pirates are dreadful fellows; be attentive, and serve him just as if he was my father."

„Yes, yes, ma'am, I will, but our time may come; it's burglary on the high seas, and I'll go fifty miles to see him hanged."

„Steward!" cried Pickersgill, from the cabin.

„O lord! he can't have heard me — d'ye think he did, miss?"

„The partitions are very thin, and you spoke very loud," said Mrs. Lascelles; „at all events, go to him quickly."

,,Good bye, miss; good bye, ma'am; if I shouldn't see you any more," said Maddox, trembling with fear, as he obeyed the awful summons — which was to demand a toothpick.

Miss Ossulton would not touch the breakfast; not so Mrs Lascelles and Cecilia, who ate very heartily.

,,It's very dull to be shut up in this cabin," said Mrs. Lascelles; ,,come, Cecilia let's go on deck."

,,And leave me," cried Miss Ossulton.

,,There is Phoebe here, aunt; we are going up to persuade the pirates to put us all on shore."

Mrs Lascelles and Cecilia put on their bonnets and went up. Lord B. took off his hat, and begged the honour of being introduced to the pretty widow. He handed the ladies to a seat, and then commenced conversing upon various subjects, which, at the same time, possessed great novelty. His lordship talked about France, and described its ports; told now and then a good anecdote; pointed out the different headlands, bays, towns, and villages, which they were passing rapidly, and always had some little story connected with each. Before the ladies had been two hours on deck, they found themselves, to their infinite surprise, not only interested, but in conversation with the captain of the smuggler, and more than once they laughed outright. But the soi-disant Lord B. had inspired them with confidence; they fully believed that what he had told them was true, and that he had taken possession of the yacht to smuggle his goods, to be revenged, and to have a laugh. Now none of these three offences are capital in the eyes of the fair sex; and Jack was a handsome, fine-looking fellow, of excellent manners, and very agreeable conversation, at the same time neither he nor his friend were in their general deportment or behaviour otherwise than most respectful.

,,Ladies, as you are not afraid of me, which is a greater happiness than I had reason to expect, I think you may be amused to witness the fear of those who accuse your sex of cowardice. With your permission, I will send for the cook and steward, and inquire about the dinner?"

,,I should like to know what there is for dinner," observed Mrs. Lascelles demurely; ,,would'nt you, Cecilia?"

Cecilia put her handkerchief to her mouth.

,,Tell the steward and the cook both to come aft immediately," cried Pickersgill.

In a few seconds they both made their appearance.

,,Steward!" cried Pickersgill, with a loud voice.

,,Yes, my lord," replied Maddox, with his hat in his hand.

,,What wines have you put out for dinner?"

,,Champagne, my lord; and claret, my lord; and Madeira and sherry, my lord."

,,No Burgundy, sir?"

,,No, my lord; there is no Burgundy on board."

,,No Burgundy, sir! do you dare to tell me that?"

,,Upon my soul, my lord," cried Maddox, dropping on his knees, ,,there is no Burgundy on board — ask the ladies."

,,Very well, sir; you may go."

,,Cook, what have you got for dinner?"

,,Sir, a haunch of mutt — of venison, my lord," replied the cook, with his white night-cap in his hand.

,,What else, sirrah?"

,,A boiled calf's head, my lord."

,,A boiled calf's head? Let it be roasted, or I'll roast you, sir," cried Pickersgill in an angry tone.

,,Yes, my lord; I'll roast it."

,,And what else, sir?"

,,Maintenon cutlets, my lord."

,,Maintenon cutlets! I hate them — I won't have them, sir. Let them be dressed à l'ombre Chinoise."

,,I don't know what that is, my lord."

,,I don't care for that, sirrah; if you don't find out by dinner-time, you're food for fishes — that's all: you may go."

The cook walked off wringing his hands and his night-cap as well — for he still held it in his hand — and disappeared down the fore-hatchway.

,,I have done this to pay you a deserved compliment, ladies; you have more courage than the other sex."

,,Recollect that we have had confidence given to me in consequence of your pledging your word, my lord.“

„You do me, then, the honour of believing me?“

„I did not until I saw you,“ replied Mrs. Lascelles; „but now I am convinced that you will perform your promise.“

„You do, indeed, encourage me, madam, to pursue what is right,“ said Pickersgill, bowing; „for your approbation I should be most sorry to lose, still more sorry to prove myself unworthy of it.“

As the reader will observe, every thing was going on remarkably well.

Chapter VI.

THE SMUGGLING YACHT.

Cecilia returned to the cabin, to ascertain whether her aunt was more composed; but Mrs. Lascelles remained on deck. She was much pleased with Pickersgill; and they continued their conversation. Pickersgill entered into a defence of his conduct to Lord B.; and Mrs. Lascelles could not but admit the provocation. After a long conversation, she hinted at his profession, and how superior he appeared to be to such a lawless life.

„You may be incredulous, madam,“ replied Pickersgill, „if I tell you that I have as good a right to quarter my arms as Lord B. himself; and that I am not under my real name. Smuggling is, at all events, no crime; and I infinitely prefer the wild life I lead at the head of my men, to being spurned by society because I am poor. The greatest crime in this country is poverty. I may, if I am fortunate, some day resume my name. You may, perhaps, meet me, and, if you please, you may expose me.“

„That I should not be likely to do,“ replied the widow; „but still I regret to see a person, evidently intended for better things, employed in so disreputable a profession.“

„I hardly know, madam, what is and what is not disreputable in this conventional world. It is not considered disreputable to cringe to the vices of a court, or to accept a pension, wrung from the industry of the nation, in return for base servility. It is not considered disreputable to take tithes, intended for the service of God, and lavish them away at watering-places or elsewhere, seeking pleasure instead of doing God service. It is not considered disreputable to take fee after fee to uphold injustice, to plead against innocence, to pervert truth, and to aid the devil. It is not considered disreputable to gamble on the stock exchange, or to corrupt the honesty of electors by bribes, to doing which the penalty attached is equal to that decreed to the offence of which I am guilty. All these, and much more, are not considered disreputable; yet, by all these are the moral bonds of society loosened, while in mine we cause no guilt in others — —“

„But still it is a crime.“

„A violation of the revenue-laws, and no more. Observe, madam, the English government encourage the smuggling of our manufactures to the Continent, at the same time that they take every step to prevent articles being smuggled into this country. Now, madam, can that be a crime, when the head of the vessel is turned north, which becomes no crime when she steers the opposite way?“

„There is a stigma attached to it, you must allow.“

„That I grant you, madam; and as soon as I can quit the profession I shall. No captive ever sighed more to be released from his chains; but I will not leave it, till I find that I am in a situation not to be spurned and neglected by those with whom I have a right to associate.“

At this moment, the steward was seen forward making signs to Mrs. Lascelles, who excused herself, and went to him.

„For the love of God, madam,“ said Maddox, „as he appears to be friendly with you, do pray find out how these cutlets are to be dressed; the cook is tearing his hair, and we shall never have any dinner; and then it will all fall upon me, and I — shall be tossed overboard.“

Mrs. Lascelles desired poor Maddox to wait there while she obtained the desired information. In a few minutes she returned to him.

„I have found it out. They are first to be boiled in vinegar; then fried in batter, and served up with a sauce of anchovy and Malaga raisins.“

„First fried in vinegar; then boiled in batter, and served up with the almonds and raisins.“

„No — no!“ Mrs. Lascelles repeated the injunction to the frightened steward; and then returned aft, and re-entered into a conversation with Pickersgill, in which, for the first time, Corbett now joined. Corbett had sense enough to feel, that the less he came forward until his superior had established himself in the good graces of the ladies, the more favourable would be the result.

In the mean time Cecilia had gone down to her aunt, who still continued to wail and lament. The young lady tried all she could to console her, and to persuade her that if they were civil and obedient they had nothing to fear.

„Civil and obedient, indeed!“ cried Miss Ossulton, „to a fellow who is a smuggler and a pirate. I, the sister of Lord B. Never! The presumption of the wretch!“

„That is all very well, aunt; but recollect, we must submit to circumstances. These men insist upon our dining with them; and we must go, or we shall have no dinner.“

„I sit down with a pirate! Never! I'll have no dinner — I'll starve — I'll die!“

„But, my dear aunt, it's the only chance we have of obtaining our release; and if you do not do it, Mrs. Lascelles will think that you wish to remain with them.“

„Mrs. Lascelles judges of other people by herself.“

„The captain is certainly a very well-behaved, handsome man. He looks like a nobleman in disguise. What an odd thing it would be, aunt, if this should be all a hoax?“

„A hoax, child?“ replied Miss Ossulton, sitting up on the sofa.

Cecilia found that she had hit the right nail, as the saying is; and she brought forward so many arguments to prove that she thought it was a hoax to frighten them, and that the gentleman above was a man of consequence, that her aunt began to listen to reason, and at last condescended to join the dinner-party. Mrs. Lascelles now came down below; and when dinner was announced, they repaired to the large cabin, where they found Pickersgill and Corbett waiting for them.

Miss Ossulton did not venture to look up, until she heard Pickersgill say to Mrs. Lascelles: „Perhaps, madam, you will do me the favour to introduce me to that lady, whom I have not had the honour of seeing before?“

„Certainly, my lord,“ replied Mrs. Lascelles; „Miss Ossulton, the aunt of this young lady.“

Mrs. Lascelles purposely did not introduce his lordship in return, that she might mystify the old spinster.

„I feel highly honoured in finding myself in the company of Miss Ossulton,“ said Pickersgill. „Ladies, we wait but for you to sit down. Ossulton, take the head of the table and serve the soup.“

Miss Ossulton was astonished; she looked at the smugglers, and perceived two well-dressed gentlemanly men, one of whom was apparently a lord, and the other having the same family name.

„It must be all a hoax,“ thought she; and she very quietly took to her soup.

The dinner passed off very pleasantly. Pickersgill was agreeable, Corbett funny, and Miss Ossulton so far recovered herself as to drink wine with his lordship, and to ask Corbett what branch of their family he belonged to.

„I presume it's the Irish branch,“ said Mrs. Lascelles, prompting him.

„Exactly, madam,“ replied Corbett.

„Have you ever been to Torquay, ladies?“ inquired Pickersgill.

„No, my lord,“ answered Mrs. Lascelles.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nro 31.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Three Cutters.

(Concluded from our last.)

„We shall anchor there in the course of an hour, and probably remain there till to-morrow. Steward, bring coffee. Tell the cook those cutlets were remarkably well dressed.“

The ladies retired to the cabin. Miss Ossulton was now convinced that it was all a hoax; „but“ said she, „I shall tell Lord B. my opinion of their practical jokes when he returns. What is his lordship's name who is on board?“

„He won't tell us,“ replied Mrs. Lascelles; „but I think I know; it is Lord Blarney.“

„Lord Blaney you mean, I presume,“ said Miss Ossulton; „however, the thing is carried too far. Cecilia, we will go on shore at Torquay, and wait till the yacht returns with Lord B. I don't like these jokes: they may do very well for widows, and people of no rank.“

Now, Mrs. Lascelles was sorry to find Miss Ossulton so much at her ease. She owed her no little spite, and wished for revenge. Ladies will go very far to obtain this. How far Mrs. Lascelles would have gone, I will not pretend to say, but this is certain, that the last tirade of Miss Ossulton very much added to her determination. She took her bonnet and went on deck, at once told Pickersgill that he could not please her or Cecilia more than by frightening Miss Ossulton, who, under the idea that it was all a hoax, had quite recovered her spirits; talked of her pride and ill-nature, and wished her to receive a useful lesson. Thus, to follow up her revenge, did Mrs. Lascelles commit herself so far, as to be confidential with the smuggler in return.

„Mrs. Lascelles, I shall be able to obey you, and, at the same time, to combine business with pleasure.“

After a short conversation, the yacht dropped her anchor at Torquay. It was then about two hours before sunset. As soon as the sails were furled, one or two gentlemen, who resided there, came on board to pay their respects to Lord B.; and, as Pickersgill had found out from Cecilia that her father was acquainted with no one there, he received them in person, asked them down in the cabin; called for wine; and desired them to send their boat away, as his own was going on shore. The smugglers took great care, that the steward, cook, and lady's maid, should keep no communication with the guests; one of them, by Corbett's direction, being a sentinel over each individual. The gentlemen remained about half-an-hour on board, during which Corbett and the smugglers had filled the portmanteaus found in the cabin with the lace; and they were put in the boat. Corbett then landed the gentlemen in the same boat, and went up to the hotel, the smugglers following him with the portmanteaus, without any suspicion or interruption. As soon as he was there, he ordered post-horses, and set off for a town close by, where he had correspondents; and thus the major part of the cargo was secured. Corbett then returned in the night, bringing with him people to receive the goods; and the smugglers landed the silks, teas, etc, with the same good fortune. Every thing was out of the yacht except a portion of the lace, which the portmanteaus would not hold. Pickersgill might easily have sent this on shore; but, to please Mrs. Lascelles, he arranged otherwise.

The next morning, about an hour after breakfast was finished, Mrs. Lascelles entered the cabin pretending to be in the greatest consternation, and fell on the sofa, as if she were going to faint.

„Good heavens! what is the matter?" exclaimed Cecilia, who knew very well what was coming.

„Oh, the wretch! he has made such proposals."

„Proposals! what proposals? what! Lord Blacey?" cried Miss Ossulton.

„Oh, he's no lord; he's a villain and a smuggler, and he insists that we shall both fill our pockets full of lace, and go on shore with him."

„Mercy on me! then it is no hoax after all; and I've been sitting down to dinner with a smuggler!"

„Sitting down, madam! — if it were to be no more than that — but we are to take his arm up to the hotel. Oh, dear! Cecilia, I am ordered on deck, pray come with me."

Miss Ossulton rolled on the sofa, and rang for Phoebe; she was in a state of great alarm.

A knock at the door.

„Come in," said Miss Ossulton, thinking it was Phoebe; when Pickersgill made his appearance.

„What do you want, sir? go out, sir! go out directly, or I'll scream."

„It is no use screaming, madam; recollect that all on board are at my service. You will oblige me by listening to me, Miss Ossulton. I am, as you know, a smuggler, and I must send this lace on shore. You will oblige me by putting it into your pockets, or about your person, and prepare to go on shore with me. As soon as we arrive at the hotel, you will deliver it to me, and I then shall reconduct you on board of the yacht. You are not the first lady who has gone on shore with contraband articles about her person.

„No, sir, go on shore in that way? no, sir, never! what will the world say? the Hon. Miss Ossulton walking with a smuggler! No, sir, never!"

„Yes, madam, walking arm-and-arm with a smuggler: I shall have you on one arm, and Mrs. Lascelles on the other; and I would advise you to take it very quietly, for, in the first place, it will be you who smuggle, as the goods will be found on your person, and you will certainly be put in prison, for, at the least appearance of insubordination, we run and inform against you and, further, your niece will remain on board a a hostage for your good behaviour, and if you have any regard for her liberty, you will consent immediately."

Pickersgill left the cabin, and shortly afterwards Cecilia and Mrs. Lascelles entered, apparently much distressed. They had been informed of all, and Mrs. Lascelles declared, that, for her part, sooner than leave her poor Cecilia to the mercy of such people, she had made up her mind to submit to the smuggler's demands. Cecilia also begged so earnestly, that Miss Ossulton, who had no idea that it was a trick, with much sobbing and blubbering, consented.

When all was ready, Cecilia left the cabin; Pickersgill came down, handed up the two ladies, who had not exchanged a word with each other during Cecilia's absence; the boat was ready alongside, they went in, and pulled on shore. Every thing succeeded to the smuggler's satisfaction. Miss Ossulton, frightened out of her wits, took his arm; and, with Mrs. Lascelles on the other, they went up to the hotel, followed by four of his boat's crew. As soon as they were shewn into a room, Corbett, who was already on shore, asked for Lord B., and joined them. The ladies retired to another apartment, divested themselves of their contraband goods, and, after calling for some sandwiches and wine, Pickersgill walked on shore, and then returned on board. Mrs. Lascelles was triumphant; and she rewarded her new ally, the smuggler, with one of her sweetest smiles. Community of interest will sometimes make strange friendships.

Chapter VII

CONCLUSION.

We must now return to the other parties who have assisted in the acts of this little drama. Lord B., after puffing and paddling, the men relieving each other in order to make head against the wind which was off shore, arrived about midnight at a small town in West Bay, from whence he took a chaise on to Portsmouth, taking it for granted that his yacht would arrive as soon as, if not before himself, little imagining that it was in possession of the smugglers. There he remained three or four days, when, becoming impatient, he applied to one of his friends who had a yacht at Cowes, and sailed with him to look after his own.

We left the Happy-go-lucky chased by the revenue cutter. At first the smuggler had the advantage before the wind; but, by degrees, the wind went round with the sun, and brought the revenue cutter to leeward; it was then a chase on a wind, and the revenue cutter came fast up with her.

Morrison perceiving that he had no chance of escape, let run the ankers of brandy that he might not be condemned; but still he was in an awkward situation, as he had more men on board than allowed by act of Parliament. He therefore stood on, notwithstanding the shot of the cutter went over and over him, hoping that a fog or night might enable him to escape; but he had no such good fortune, — one of the shot carried away the heel of his mast, and the Happy-go-lucky's luck was all over. He was boarded and taken possession of; he asserted that the extra men were only passengers; but, in the first place, they were dressed in seamen's clothes, and, in the second, as soon as the boat was cleared of her, Appleboy had gone down to his gin toddy, and was not to be disturbed. The gentlemen smugglers therefore passed an uncomfortable night; and the cutter going to Portland by daylight before Appleboy was out of bed, they were taken on shore to the magistrate. Ossulton explained the whole affair, and they were immediately released and treated with respect; but they were not permitted to depart until they were bound over to appear against the smugglers, and prove the brandy having been on board. They then set off for Portsmouth in the seamen's clothes, having had quite enough of yachting for that season, Mr. Ossulton declaring that he only wanted to get his luggage, and then he would take care how he put himself again in the way of the shot of a revenue cruiser, or of sleeping a night on her decks.

In the meantime, Morrison and his men were locked up in the jail, the old man, as the key was turned on him, exclaiming, as he raised his foot in vexation: „That cursed blue pigeon!“

We will now return to the yacht.

About an hour after Pickersgill had come on board, Corbett had made all his arrangements and followed him. It was not advisable to remain at Torquay any longer, through fear of discovery; he, therefore, weighed the anchor before dinner, and made sail.

„What do you intend to do now, my lord,“ said Mrs. Lascelles.

„I intend to run down to Cowes, anchor the yacht in the night; and an hour before daylight leave you in my boat with all my men. I will take care that you are in perfect safety, depend upon it, even if I run a risk. I should, indeed, be miserable, if, through my wild freaks, any accident should happen to Mrs. Lascelles or Miss Ossulton.“

„I am very anxious about my father,“ observed Cecilia. „I trust that you will keep your promise.“

„I always have hitherto, Miss Ossulton; have I not?“

„Ours is but a short and strange acquaintance."

„I grant it; but it will serve for you to talk about long after. I shall disappear as suddenly as I have come — you will neither of you, in all probability, ever see me again."

The dinner was announced, and they sat down to table as before; but the elderly spinster refused to make her appearance; and Mrs Lascelles and Cecilia, who thought she had been frightened enough, did not attempt to force her. Pickersgill immediately yielded to these remonstrances, and, from that time, she remained undisturbed in the ladies' cabin, meditating over the indignity of having sat down to table, having drunk wine, and been obliged to walk on shore, taking the arm of a smuggler, and appear in such a humiliating situation.

The wind was light, and they made but little progress, and were not abreast of Portland till the second day, when another yacht appeared in sight, and the two vessels slowly neared until in the afternoon they were within four miles of each other. It then fell a dead calm — signals were thrown out by the other yacht, but could not be distinguished, and, for the last time, they sat down to dinner. Three days' companionship on board of a vessel, cooped up together, and having no one else to converse with, will produce intimacy; and Pickersgill was a young man of so much originality and information, that he was listened to with pleasure. He never attempted to advance beyond the line of strict decorum and politeness; and his companion was equally unpresuming. Situated as they were, and feeling what must have been the case had they fallen into other hands, both Cecilia and Mrs. Lascelles felt some degree of gratitude towards him; and, although anxious to be relieved from so strange a position, they had gradually acquired a perfect confidence in him, and this had produced a degree of familiarity, on their parts, although never ventured upon by the smuggler. As Corbett was at the table, one of the men came down and made a sign. Corbett shortly after quitted the table and went on deck. „I wish, my lord, you would come up a moment, and see if you can make this thing out," said Corbett, giving a significant nod to Pickersgill. „Excuse me, ladies, one moment," said Pickersgill, who went on deck.

„It is the boat of the yacht coming on board," said Corbett; „and Lord B. is in the sternsheets with the gentleman who was with him."

„And how many men in the boat? — let me see — only four. Well, let his lordship and his friend come: when they are on the deck, have the men ready in case of accident; but if you can manage to tell the boat's crew that they are to go on board again, and get rid of them that way, so much the better. Arrange this with Adams, and then come down again — his lordship must see us all at dinner."

Pickersgill then descended, and Corbett had hardly time to give his directions and to resume his seat, before his lordship and Mr. Stewart pulled up alongside and jumped on deck. There was no one to receive them but the seamen, and those whom they did not know. They looked around in amazement; at last his lordship said to Adams, who stood forward,

„What men are you?"

„Belong to the yacht, ye'r honour."

Lord B. heard laughing in the cabin: he would not wait to interrogate the men; he walked aft, followed by Mr. Stewart, looked down the skylight, and perceived his daughter and Mrs. Lascelles with, as he supposed, Houston and Ossulton.

Pickersgill had heard the boat rub the side, and the sound of the feet on deck, and he talked the more loudly that the ladies might be caught by Lord B. as they were. He heard their feet at the skylight, and knew that they could hear what passed; and at that moment he proposed to the ladies that as this was their last meeting at at table they should all take a glass of champagne to drink to „their happy meeting with Lord B." This was a toast which they did not refuse. Madden poured out the wine, and they were all bowing to each other, when his lordship, who had come down the ladder, walked into the cabin, followed by Mr. Stewart.

Cecilia perceived her father, the champagneglass dropped from her hand — she flew into his arms, and burst into tears.

„Who would not be a father, Mrs. Lascelles," said Pickersgill, quietly seating himself, after having first risen to receive Lord B.

„And pray, whom may I have the honour of finding established here?" said Lord B. in an angry tone, speaking over his daughter's head, who still lay in his arms. „By Heavens, you! — Stewart, it is the smuggling captain dressed out."

„Even so, my lord," replied Pickersgill. „You abandoned your yacht to capture me; you left these ladies in a vessel crippled for want of men: they might have been lost. I have returned good for evil by coming on board with my own people, and taking charge of them. This night I expected to have anchored your vessel in Cowes, and have left them in safety."

„By the — —" cried Stewart.

„Stop, sir, if you please!" cried Pickersgill; „recollect you have once already attacked one who never offended. Oblige me by refraining from intemperate language; for I tell you I will not put up with it. Recollect, sir, that I have refrained from that, and also from taking advantage of you when you were in my power. Recollect, sir, also, that the yacht is still in possession of the smugglers, and that you are in no condition to insult with impunity. My lord, allow me to observe, that we men are too hot of temperament to argue, or listen coolly. With your permission, your friend, and my friend, and I, will repair on deck, leaving you to hear from your daughter and that lady all that has passed. After that, my lord, I shall be most happy to hear any thing which your lordship may please to say."

„Upon my word —" commenced Mr. Stewart.

„Mr. Stewart," interrupted Cecilia Ossulton, „I request your silence; nay, more, if ever we are again to sail in the same vessel together, I insist upon it."

„Your lordship will oblige me by enforcing Miss Ossulton's request," said Mrs. Lascelles.

Mr. Stewart was dumbfounded, no wonder, to find the ladies siding with the smuggler.

„I am obliged to you ladies for your interference," said Pickersgill; „for although I have the means of enforcing conditions, I should be sorry to avail myself of them. I wait for his lordship's reply."

Lord B. was very much surprised. He wished for an explanation; he bowed with hauteur. Every body appeared to be in a false position; even he, Lord B., somehow or another, had bowed to a smuggler.

Pickersgill and Stewart went on deck, walking up and down, crossing each other, without speaking, but reminding you of two dogs who both are anxious to fight, but have been restrained by the voice of their masters. Corbett followed, and talked in a low tone to Pickersgill; Stewart went over to leeward to see if the boat was still alongside, but it had long before returned to the yacht. Miss Ossulton had heard her brother's voice, but did not come out of the after-cabin; she wished to be magnificent; and, at the same time, she was not sure whether all was right, Phebe having informed her that there was nobody with her brother and Mr. Stewart, and that the smugglers still had the command of the vessel. After a while, Pickersgill and Corbett went down forward, and returned dressed in the smugglers' clothes, when they resumed their walk on the deck.

In the mean time, it was dark; the cutter flew along the coast; and the Needles' lights were on the larboard bow. The conversation between Cecilia, Mrs. Lascelles, and her father, was long. When all had been detailed, and the conduct of Pickersgill duly represented, Lord B. acknowledged that, by attacking the smuggler, he had laid himself open to retaliation; that Pickersgill had shewn a great deal of forbearance in every instance; and, after all, had he not gone on board the yacht she might have been lost, with only three seamen on board. He was amused with the smuggling and the fright of his sister; still more, with the gentlemen being sent to Cherbourg; and much consoled that he was not the only one to be laughed at. He was also much pleased with Pickersgill's intention of leaving the yacht safe in Cowes harbour, his respect to the property on board, and his conduct to the ladies. On the whole, he felt grateful to Pickersgill; and where there is gratitude, there is always good will.

„But who can he be?" said Mrs. Lascelles, „his name he acknowledges not to be Pickersgill; and he told me confidentially that he was of good family."

„Confidentially! my dear Mrs. Lascelles," said Lord B.

„Oh, yes! we are both his confidants. Are we not, Cecilia?"

„Upon my honour, Mrs. Lascelles, this smuggler appears to have made an impression which many have attempted in vain."

Mrs. Lascelles did not reply to that remark, but said, „Now, my lord, you must decide; and I trust you will to oblige us — treat him as he has treated us, with the greatest respect and kindness."

„Why should you suppose otherwise?" replied Lord B.; „it is not only my wish, but my interest so to do. He may take us over to France to-night, or any where else. Has he not possession of the vessel?"

„Yes, replied Cecilia; „but we flatter ourselves that we have the command. Shall we call him down, papa?"

„Ring for Maddox. Maddox, tell Mr. Pickersgill, who is on deck, that I wish to speak with him, and shall be obliged by his stepping down into the cabin."

„Who, my lord? What! Him?"

„Yes, him," replied Cecilia, laughing.

„Must I call him, my lord, now, miss?"

„You may do as you please, Maddox; but recollect, he still is in possession of the vessel," replied Cecilia.

„Then, with your lordship's permission, I will; it's the safest way."

The smuggler entered the cabin; the ladies started as he appeared in his rough costume, with his throat open, and his loose black handkerchief. He was the beau-ideal of a handsome sailor.

„Your lordship wishes to communicate with me?"

„Mr. Pickersgill, I feel that you have had cause of enmity against me, and that you have behaved with forbearance. I thank you for your considerate treatment of the ladies; and I assure you, that I feel no resentment for what has passed."

„My lord, I am quite satisfied with what you have said; and I only hope that, in future, you will not interfere with a poor smuggler, who may be striving, by a life of danger and privation, to procure subsistence for himself and, perhaps, his family. I stated to these ladies my intention of anchoring the yacht this night at Cowes, and leaving her as soon as she was in safety. Your unexpected presence will only make this difference, which is, that I must previously obtain your lordship's assurance that those with you, will allow me and my men to quit her without molestation, after we have performed this service."

„I pledge you my word, Mr. Pickersgill, and I thank you into the bargain. I trust you will allow me to offer some remuneration."

„Most certainly not, my lord."

„At all events, Mr. Pickersgill, if, at any other time, I can be of service, you may command me."

Pickersgill made no reply.

„Surely, Mr. Pickersgill, —"

„Pickersgill! how I hate that name!" said the smuggler, musing. „I beg your lordship's pardon — if I may require your assistance for any of my unfortunate companions —"

„Not for yourself, Mr. Pickersgill?" said Mrs. Lascelles.

„Madam, I smuggle no more."

„For the pleasure I feel in hearing that resolution, Mr. Pickersgill," said Cecilia, „take my hand, and thanks."

„And mine," said Mrs. Lascelles, half crying.

„And mine, too," said Lord B., rising up.

Pickersgill passed the back of his hand across his eyes, turned round, and left the cabin.

„I'm so happy!“ said Mrs. Lascelles, bursting into tears.

„He's a magnificent fellow,“ observed Lord B. „Come, let us all go on deck.“

„You have not seen my aunt, papa.“

„True; I'll go in to her, and then follow you.“

The ladies went upon deck. Cecilia entered into conversation with Mr. Stewart, giving him a narrative of what had happened. Mrs. Lascelles sat abaft on the taffrail, with her pretty hand supporting her cheek, looking very much à la Juliette.

„Mrs. Lascelles,“ said Pickersgill, „before we part, allow me to observe, that it is you who have induced me to give up my profession——“

„Why me, Mr. Pickersgill?“

„You said that you did not like it.“

Mrs. Lascelles felt the force of the compliment. „You said, just now, that you hated the name of Pickersgill: why do you call yourself so?“

„It was my smuggling name, Mrs. Lascelles.“

„And now, that you have left off smuggling, pray what may be the name we are to call you by?“

„I cannot resume it, till I have not only left this vessel, but shaken hands with, and bid farewell to, my companions; and by that time, Mrs. Lascelles, I shall be away from you.“

„But I've a great curiosity to know it, and a lady's curiosity must be gratified. You must call upon me some day and tell it me. Here is my address.“

Pickersgill received the card with a low bow, and Lord B. coming on deck, Mrs. Lascelles hastened to meet him.

The vessel was now passing the Bridge at the Needles, and the smuggler piloted her on. As soon as they were clear and well inside, the whole party went down into the cabin, Lord B. requesting Pickersgill and Corbett to join him in a parting glass. Mr. Stewart, who had received the account of what had passed from Cecilia, was very attentive to Pickersgill, and took an opportunity of saying, that he was sorry that he had said or done any thing to annoy him. Every one recovered his spirits; and all was good humour and mirth, because Miss Ossulton adhered to her resolution of not quitting the cabin till she could quit the yacht. At ten o'clock the yacht was anchored. Pickersgill took his leave of the honourable company, and went in his boat with his men; and Lord B. was again in possession of his vessel, although he had not a ship's company. Mathews recovered his usual tone; and the cook flourished his knife, swearing that he should like to see the smuggler who would again order him to dress dinner à l'ombre Chinoise.

The yacht had remained three days at Cowes, when Lord B. received a letter from Pickersgill, stating that the men of his vessel had been captured, and would be condemned, in consequence of their having the gentlemen on board, who were bound to appear against them, to prove that they had sunk the brandy. Lord B. paid all the recognisances, and the men were liberated for want of evidence.

It was about two years after this that Cecilia Ossulton, who was sitting at her work-table in deep mourning for her aunt, was presented with a letter by the butler. It was from her friend Mrs. Lascelles, informing her that she was married again to a Mr. Davenant, and intended to pay her a short visit on her way to the Continent. Mr. and Mrs. Davenant arrived the next day; and when the latter introduced her husband, she said to Miss Ossulton, „Look, Cecilia, dear, and tell me if you have ever seen Davenant before.“

Cecilia looked earnestly. „I have, indeed,“ cried she at last, extending her hand with warmth; „and happy am I to meet with him again.“

For in Mr. Davenant she recognised her old acquaintance, the captain of the Happy-go-lucky, Jack Pickersgill, the smuggler.

The seven Sisters;
or the Solitude of Binnorie.

By W. Wordsworth.

Seven Daughters had Lord Archibald,
All children of one mother:
I could not say in one short day
What love they bore each other.
A garland of seven lilies wrought!
Seven sisters that together dwell;
But he, bold knight as ever fought,
Their father, took of them no thought,
He loved the wars so well.
Sing, mournfully, oh! mournfully,
The solitude of Binnorie!

Fresh blows the wind, a western wind,
And from the shores of Erin,
Across the wave, a rover brave
To Binnorie is steering:
Right onward to the Scottish strand
The gallant ship is borne;
The warriors leap upon the land,
And hark! the leader of the band
Hath blown his bugle-horn.
Sing, mournfully, oh! mournfully,
The solitude of Binnorie.

Beside a grotto of their own,
With boughs above them closing,
The Seven are laid, and in the shade
They lie like fawns reposing.
But now, upstarting with affright
At noise of man and steed,
Away they fly to left, to right —
Of your fair household, father knight,
Methinks you take small heed!
Sing, mournfully, oh! mournfully,
The solitude of Binnorie.

Away the seven fair Campbells fly,
And, over hill and hollow,
With menace proud, and insult loud,
The youthful rovers follow.
Cried they: Your father loves to roam:
Enough for him to find
The empty house when he comes home;
For us your yellow ringlets comb,
For us be fair and kind! —
Sing, mournfully, oh! mournfully,
The solitude of Binnorie.

Some close behind, some side by side,
Like clouds in stormy weather,
They run, and cry: Nay let us die,
And let us die together.
A lake was near; the shore was steep;
There never foot had been;
They ran, and with a desperate leap
Together plung'd into the deep,
Nor ever more were seen.
Sing, mournfully, oh! mournfully,
The solitude of Binnorie.

The stream that flows out of the lake,
As through the glen it rambles,
Repeats a moan o'er moss and stone,
For those seven lovely Campbells.
Seven little islands, green and bare,
Have risen from out the deep:
The fishers say, those sisters fair
By Faeries are all buried there,
And there together sleep.
Sing, mournfully, oh! mournfully,
The solitude of Binnorie.

A Thought.

They say that Hope is happiness, —
  But genuine love must prize the Past;
And Memory wakes rich thoughts, that bless, —
  They rose the first, — they set the last.
And all that memory loves the most,
  Was once our only hope to be, —
And all that Hope adored and lost
  Hath melted into memory.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. No. 32.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Henry Fielding.

Dieſer, zu ſeiner Zeit als Gründer des engliſchen komiſchen Familienromans eben ſo hoch gefeierte, als wegen ſeiner perſönlichen Schwächen lebhaft angegriffene Schriftſteller ſtammte aus guter Familie, und ward im Jahre 1707 zu Sharpham in Somerſetſhire geboren. Sein Vater, der General Fielding, ließ ihm eine vortreffliche Erziehung geben, und ſandte ihn erſt auf die Schule nach Eton und darauf nach Leiden, um dort die Rechte zu ſtudiren. Er verweilte hier zwei Jahr und kehrte dann kaum zwanzigjährig nach England zurück. Leichtſinn und lockeres Leben, welche ihn in Schulden ſtürzten, trieben ihn an, ſeiner Neigung zu folgen und für die komiſche Bühne zu arbeiten. Seine Luſtſpiele und Opern erfreuten ſich größtentheils eines glücklichen Erfolges, den ſie mehr ihrer Wahrheit und Natürlichkeit als ihrem wirklichen dramatiſchen Werthe zu verdanken haben. Ein günſtiges Geſchick ließ ihn um dieſe Zeit die Neigung einer vortrefflichen, nicht ganz unbemittelten Dame gewinnen. Er vermählte ſich mit ihr und hätte, da ihm der Tod ſeiner Mutter ein jährliches Einkommen von 200 Pfund Sterling ſicherte, nun ſorgenfrei ſeinen literäriſchen Beſchäftigungen leben können, aber ſein zügelloſer Leichtſinn verleitete ihn fortwährend zu neuen Verſchwendungen, ſo daß ſein ganzes ererbtes Vermögen bereits vergeudet war, noch ehe er ſein dreißigſtes Jahr erreicht hatte. Die Nothwendigkeit für ſich und die Seinen ſorgen zu müſſen, veranlaßte ihn, ſeine juriſtiſchen Studien wieder aufzunehmen und Advocat zu werden. Auch in dieſem neuen Berufe begünſtigte ihn das Schickſal; er arbeitete fleißig und gehörte eine Zeitlang zu den beliebteſten und geſuchteſten Anwälden in London. Richardſon's Familienromane, welche damals außerordentlich viel geleſen wurden und faſt unglaublichen Beifall fanden, brachten ihn auf den Gedanken, daſſelbe Genre komiſch zu behandeln. Schon früher hatte er das Leben eines berüchtigten Spitzbuben, Jonathan Wild, als einen Roman bearbeitet und dieſe Arbeit ſich einer ſehr guten Aufnahme bei dem Publikum erfreut, jetzt trat er aber mit ſeinem Joſeph Andrews einem komiſchen Seitenſtück zu Richardſon's Pamela hervor und begann den Ruhm ſeines ernſten Nebenbuhlers beträchtlich dadurch zu ſchmälern; den glänzendſten Erfolg jedoch fand ſein nächſtes Werk dieſer Art, der berühmte Tom Jones (History of a Foundling) das trotz ſeinen vielen Fehlern doch noch immer als ein Meiſterſtück komiſcher Darſtellung des bürgerlichen Lebens betrachtet wird. — Nicht ſo gelungen iſt ſeine, bald nach dem Tom Jones erſchienene dritte Leiſtung auf dieſem Gebiet, Amelia, da ſie bereits unverkennbare Spuren geiſtiger Erſchöpfung trägt, obwohl ſie im Ganzen correcter iſt. Fieldings Jugendleben hatte ihm ein frühes Alter zugezogen: von mannigfachen körperlichen Leiden geſchwächt, begab er ſich mit ſeiner Familie nach Liſſabon, um hier durch den Einfluß des milden Klima zu geneſen; aber ſeine Hoffnung war vergebens, er ſtarb daſelbſt wenige Monate nach ſeiner Landung, 1754, im acht und vierzigſten Jahre ſeines Alters an der Waſſerſucht. Eine Herausgabe ſeiner ſämmtlichen Schriften beſorgte Arthur Murphy (Works of Fielding, London 1762, 4 Bde. in 4., ſowie 8 Bde. in 8.)

Die hervorſtechendſte Eigenſchaft in Fieldings Leiſtungen iſt ſeine komiſche Auffaſſung des häuslichen

Lebens und ſein Talent der Darſtellung, wenn man es von dieſer Seite aus betrachtet. Der geſunde Verſtand, der ſich hier überall bei ihm offenbart, würde aber noch wirkſamer ſein, wenn er eine moraliſche Tendenz vor Augen gehabt hätte; ſelbſt leichtſinnig gefällt er ſich zu wohl darin den Leichtſinn als liebenswürdig zu ſchildern und verſchmäht die Gemeinheit nicht, wo dieſe ihm komiſche Motive darbietet. Indem er vor Allem gegen das Unnatürliche und Naturwidrige ankämpft, ſcheint ihm dagegen alles Natürliche nicht allein erlaubt, ſondern rechtmäßig, und die ſtrenge Scheidungslinie, die ein höherer Sinn zwiſchen Sittlichkeit aus edlerem Bedürfniß und der Sinnlichkeit als rohem Naturtriebe zieht, iſt für ihn nur inſofern vorhanden, als die Nothwendigkeit des gewöhnlichen Lebens mit ſeinen hergebrachten Geſetzen ſie gezogen hat, nicht aber wie das Streben nach geiſtiger Verbeſſerung ſie verlangt. Große Lebenskenntniß, ſubjective Wahrheit und gewandte, wenn auch oft zu breit angelegte Zeichnung ſind ihm dagegen nicht abzuſprechen und ſein Tom Jones, ſowie einzelne Stellen und Capitel aus ſeinen anderen Schriften werden ſtets als Muſterbilder in dieſem Genre ihre Geltung behalten.

The History of Anna Boleyn.

By Henry Fielding.

(See A Journey from this World to the next.)

I am going now truly to recount a life, which, from the time of its ceasing, has been, in the other world, the continual subject of the cavils of contending parties; the one making me as black as hell, the other as pure and innocent as the inhabitants of this blessed place; the mist of prejudice blinding their eyes, and zeal for what they themselves profess, making every thing appear in that light, which they think most conduces to its honour.

My infancy was spent in my father's house, in those childish plays, which are most suitable to that state, and I think was one of the happiest parts of my life; for my parents were not among the number of those who look upon their children as so many objects of a tyrannic power, but I was regarded as the dear pledge of a virtuous love, and all my little pleasures were thought from their indulgence their greatest delight. At seven years old I was carried into France with the King's sister, who was married to the French King, where I lived with a person of quality, who was an acquaintance of my father's. I spent my time in learning those things necessary to give young persons of fashion a polite education, and did neither good nor evil, but day passed after day in the same easy way, till I was fourteen; then began my anxiety; my vanity grew strong, and my heart fluttered with joy at every compliment paid to my beauty: and as the lady, with whom I lived, was of a gay, cheerful disposition, she kept a great deal of company, and my youth and charms made me the continual object of their admiration. I passed some little time in those exulting raptures, which are felt by every woman, perfectly satisfied with herself, and with the behaviour of others towards her: I was, when very young, promoted to be maid of honour to her majesty. The court was frequented by a young nobleman, whose beauty was the chief subject of conversation in all assemblies of ladies. The delicacy of his person, added to a great softness in his manner, gave every thing he said and did such an air of tenderness, that every woman he spoke to, flattered herself with being the object of his love. I was one of those who was vain enough of my own charms to hope to make a conquest of him, whom the whole court sighed for: I now thought every other object below my notice; yet the only pleasure I proposed to myself in this design was, the triumphing over that heart, which I plainly saw all the ladies of the highest quality, and the greatest beauty, would have been proud of possessing. I was yet too young to be very artful; but nature, without any assistance, soon discovers to a man, who is used to gallantry, a woman's desire to be liked by him, whether that desire arises from any particular choice she makes of him, or only from vanity. He soon perceived my thoughts, and gratified my utmost wishes, by constantly preferring me before all other women, and exerting his utmost gallantry and address to engage my affections. This sudden happiness, which I then thought the greatest I could have had, appeared visible to all my actions; I grew so gay, and so full of vivacity, that it made my person appear still to a better advantage, all my acquaintance pretending to be fonder of me than ever: though young as I was, I plainly saw it was but pretence, for through all their endeavours to the contrary, envy would often break forth in sly insinuations, and malicious sneers, which gave me fresh matter of triumph, and frequent opportunities of insulting them, which I never let slip, for now first my female heart grew sensible of the spiteful pleasure of seeing another languish for what I enjoyed. Whilst I was in the height of my happiness, her majesty fell ill of a languishing distemper, which obliged her to go into the country for the change of air; my place made it necessary for me to attend her, and which way he brought it about, I can't imagine, but my young hero found means to be one of that small train that waited on my royal mistress, although she went as privately as possible. Hitherto all the interviews I had ever had with him were in public, and I only looked on him as the fitter object to feed that pride which had no other view but to shew its power; but now the scene was quite changed. My rivals were all at a distance: the place we went to was as charming as the most agreeable natural situation, assisted by the greatest art, could make it; the pleasant solitary walks, the singing of birds, the thousand pretty romantic scenes this delightful place afforded, gave a sudden turn to my mind, my whole soul was melted into softness, and all my vanity was fled. My spark was too much used to affairs of this nature, not to perceive this change; at first the profuse transports of his joy made me believe him wholly mine, and this belief gave me such happiness, that no language affords words to express it, and can be only known to those who have felt it. But this was of a very short duration, for I soon found I had to do with one of those men, whose only end in the pursuit of a woman, is to make her fall a victim to an insatiable desire to be admired. His designs had succeeded, and now he every day grew colder, and, as if by infatuation, my passion every day increased; and notwithstanding all my resolutions and endeavours to the contrary, my rage at the disappointment at once both of my love and pride, and at the finding a passion fixed in my breast, I knew not how to conquer, broke out into that inconsistent behaviour, which must always be the consequence of violent passions. One moment I reproached him, the next I grew to tenderness, and blamed myself, and thought I fancied what was not true; he saw my struggle, and triumphed in it; but as he had not witnesses enough there of his victory, to give him the full enjoyment of it, he grew weary of the country, and returned to Paris, and left me in a condition it is utterly impossible to describe. My mind was like a city up in arms, all confusion: and every new thought was a fresh disturber of my peace. Sleep quite forsook me, and the anxiety I suffered threw me into a fever, which had like to have cost me my life. With great care I recovered; but the violence of the distemper left such a weakness on my body, that the disturbance of my mind was greatly assuaged; and now I began to comfort myself in the reflection, that this gentleman's being a finished coquet, was very likely the only thing that could have preserved me; for he was the only man from whom I was ever in any danger. By that time I was got tolerably well, we returned to Paris; and I confess, I both wished and feared to see this cause of all my pain: however, I hoped, by the help of my resentment, to be able to meet him with indifference. This employed my thoughts till our arrival. The next day, there was a very full court to congratulate the queen on her recovery: and, amongst the rest, my love appeared dressed and adorned, as if he designed some new conquest. Instead of seeing a woman he despised and slighted, he approached me with that assured air which is common to successful coxcombs.

At the same time, I perceived I was surrounded by all those ladies who were on his account my greatest enemies; and, in revenge, wished for nothing more than to see me make a ridiculous figure. This situation so perplexed my thoughts, that when he came near enough to speak to me, I fainted away in his arms. (Had I studied which way I could gratify him most, it was impossible to have done any thing to have pleased him more!) Some, that stood by, brought smelling-bottles, and used means for my recovery; and I was welcomed to returning life, by all those ill-natured repartees, which women enraged by envy are capable of venting. One cried: Well I never thought my lord had any thing so frightful in his person, or so fierce in his manner, as to strike a young lady dead at the sight of him. No, no, says another, some ladies' senses are more apt to be hurried by agreeable, than disagreeable objects. With many more such sort of speeches which shewed more malice than wit. This not being able to bear, trembling, and with but just strength enough to move, I crawled to my coach and hurried home. When I was alone, and thought on what had happened to me in a public court, I was at first driven to the utmost despair, but afterwards, when I came to reflect, I believe this accident contributed more to my being cured of my passion, than any other could have done. I began to think the only method to pique the man, who had used me so barbarously, and to be revenged on my spiteful rivals, was to recover that beauty, which was then languid, and had lost its lustre; to let them see I had still charms enough to engage as many lovers as I could desire, and that I could yet rival them, who had thus cruelly insulted me. These pleasing hopes revived my sinking spirits, and worked a more effectual cure on me, than all the philosophy and advice of the wisest men could have done. I now employed all my time and care in adorning my person, and studying the surest means of engaging the affections of others, while I myself continued quite indifferent; for I resolved for the future, if ever one soft thought made its way to my heart, to fly the object of it, and by new lovers to drive the image from my breast. I consulted my glass every morning, and got such a command of my countenance, that I could suit it to the different tastes of a variety of lovers; and though I was young, for I was not yet above seventeen, yet my public way of life gave me such continual opportunities of conversing with men, and the strong desire I now had of pleasing them, led me to make such constant observations on every thing they said or did, that I soon found out the different methods of dealing with them. I observed that most men generally liked in women what was most opposite to their own characters; therefore, to the grave solid man of sense, I endeavoured to appear sprightly, and full of spirit; to the witty and gay, soft and languishing; to the amorous (for they want no increase of their passions) cold and reserved; to the fearful and backward, warm and full of fire; and so of all the rest. As to beaux, and all those sort of men, whose desires are centered in the satisfaction of their vanity, I had learned, by sad experience, the only way to deal with them was to laugh at them, and let their own good opinion of themselves be the only support of their hopes. I knew, while I could get other followers, I was sure of them; for the only sign of modesty they ever give, is that of not depending on their own judgments, but following the opinions of the greatest number. Thus furnished with maxims, and grown wise by past errors, I in a manner began the world again: I appeared in all public places handsomer and more lively than ever, to the amazement of every one who saw me, and had heard of the affair between me and my lord. He himself was much surprised and vexed at this sudden change, nor could he account how it was possible for me so soon to shake off those chains he thought he had fixed on me for life, nor was he willing to lose his conquest in this manner. He endeavoured by all means possible to talk to me again of love, but I stood fixed to my resolution, (in which I was greatly assisted by the crowd of admirers that daily surrounded me) never to let him explain himself: for notwithstanding all my pride, I found the first impression the heart receives of love is so strong, that it requires the most vigilant care to prevent a relapse. Now I lived three years in a constant round of diversions, and was made the perfect idol of all the men that came to court of all ages, and all characters. I had several good matches offered me, but I thought none of them equal to my merit; and one of my greatest pleasures was to see those women, who had pretended to rival me, often glad to marry those whom I had refused. Yet, notwithstanding this great success of my schemes, I cannot say I was perfectly happy; for every woman that was taken the least notice of, and every man that was insensible to my arts, gave me as much pain as all the rest gave me pleasure; and sometimes little underhand plots, which were laid against my designs, would succeed in spite of my care: so that I really began to grow weary of this manner of life, when my father, returning from his embassy in France, took me home with him, and carried me to a little pleasant country house, where there was nothing grand or superfluous, but every thing neat and agreeable; there I led a life perfectly solitary. At first, the time hung very heavy on my hands, and I wanted all kind of employment, and I had very like to have fallen into the height of the vapours, from no other reason, but from want of knowing what to do with myself. But when I had lived here a little time, I found such a calmness in my mind, and such a difference between this, and the restless anxieties I had experienced in a court, that I began to share the tranquillity, that visibly appeared in every thing round me. I set myself to do works of fancy, and to raise little flower gardens, with many such innocent rural amusements; which although they are not capable of affording any great pleasure, yet they give that serene turn to the mind, which I think much preferable to any thing else human nature is made susceptible of. I now resolved to spend the rest of my days here, and that nothing should allure me from this sweet retirement, to be again tossed about with tempestuous passions of any kind. Whilst I was in this situation, my lord Piercy, the earl of Northumberland's eldest son, by an accident of losing his way after a fox-chase, was met by my father, about a mile from our house; he came home with him, only with a design of dining with us, but was so taken with me, that he stayed three days. I had too much experience in all affairs of this kind, not to see presently the influence I had on him; but I was at that time so entirely free from all ambition, that even the prospect of being a countess had no effect on me; and I then thought nothing in the world could have bribed me to have changed my way of life. This young lord, who was just in his bloom, found his passion so strong, he could not endure a long absence, but returned again in a week, and endeavoured, by all the means he could think of, to engage me to return his affection. He addressed me with that tenderness and respect, which women on earth think can flow from nothing but real love; and very often told me, that unless he could be so happy, as by his assiduity and care to make himself agreeable to me, although he knew my father would eagerly embrace any proposal from him, yet he would suffer that last of miseries, of never seeing me more, rather than owe his own happiness to any thing that might be the least contradiction to my inclinations. This manner of proceeding had something in it so noble and generous, that by degrees it raised a sensation in me, which I know not how to describe, nor by what name to call it; it was nothing like my former passion; for there was no turbulence, no uneasy waking nights attending it, but all I could with honour grant to oblige him, appeared to me to be justly due to his truth and love, and more the effect of gratitude, than of any desire of my own. The character I had heard of him from my father, at my first returning to England, in discoursing of the young nobility, convinced me, that if I was his wife, I should have the perpetual satisfaction of knowing every action of his must be approved by all the sensible part of mankind; so that very soon I began to have no scruple left, but that of leaving my little scene of quietness, and venturing again into the world. But this, by his continual application and submissive behaviour, by degrees entirely vanished, and I agreed he should take his own time to break it to my father, whose consent he was not long in obtaining; for such a match was by no means to be refused. There remained nothing now to be done, but to prevail with the earl of Northumberland to comply with what his son so ardently desired; for which purpose, he set out immediately for London, and begged it as the greatest favour, that I would accompany my father, who was also to go thither the week following. I could not refuse his request, and as soon as we arrived in town, he flew to me with the greatest raptures, to inform me his father was so good, that finding his happiness depended on his answer, he had given him free leave to act in this affair as would best please himself, and that he had now no obstacle to prevent his wishes. It was then the beginning of the winter, and the time for our marriage was fixed for the latter end of March: the consent of all parties made his access to me very easy, and we conversed together both with innocence and pleasure. As his fondness was so great, that he contrived all the methods possible to keep me continually in his sight, he told me one morning, he was commanded by his father to attend him to court that evening, and begged I would be so good as to meet him there. I was now so used to act as he would have me, that I made no difficulty of complying with his desire. Two days after this, I was very much surprised at perceiving such a melancholy in his countenance, and alteration in his behaviour, as I could no way account for; but, by my importunity, at last, I got from him, that cardinal Wolsey, for what reason he knew not had peremptorily forbid him to think any more of me: and when he urged that his father was not displeased with it, the cardinal, in his imperious manner, answered him, he should give his father such convincing reasons, why it would be attended with great inconveniencies, that he was sure he could bring him to be of his opinion. On which he turned from him, and gave him no opportunity of replying. I could not imagine what design the cardinal could have in intermeddling in this match, and I was still more perplexed to find that my father treated my lord Piercy with much more coldness than usual; he too saw it, and we both wondered what could possibly be the cause of all this. But it was not long before the mystery was all made clear by my father, who sending for me one day into his chamber, let me into a secret which was as little wished for as expected. He began with the surprising effects of youth and beauty, and the madness of letting go those advantages they might procure us, till it was too late, when we might wish in vain to bring them back again. I stood amazed at this beginning; he saw my confusion, and bid me sit down, and attend to what he was going to tell me, which was of the greatest consequence; and he hoped I would be wise enough to take his advice, and act as he should think best for my future welfare. He then asked me, if I should not be much pleased to be a queen? I answered, with the greatest earnestness, that so far from it, I would not live in a court again to be the greatest queen in the world; that I had a lover who was both desirous and able to raise my station, even beyond my wishes. I found this discourse was very displeasing; my father frowned, and called me a romantic fool, and said, if I would hearken to him he could make me a queen; for the cardinal had told him, that the king, from the time he saw me at court the other night, liked me; and intended to get a divorce from his wife, and to put me in her place: and ordered him to find some method to make me a maid of honour to her present majesty, that, in the mean time, he might have an opportunity of seeing me. It is impossible to express the astonishment these words threw me into; and notwithstanding that the moment before, when it appeared at so great a distance, I was very sincere in my declaration, how much it was against my will to be raised so high, yet, now the prospect came nearer, I confess my heart fluttered, and my eyes were dazzled with a view of being seated on a throne. My imagination presented before me all the pomp, power, and greatness, that attend a crown; and

I was so perplexed, I knew not what to answer, but remained so silent as if I had lost the use of my speech. My father, who guessed what it was that made me in this condition, proceeded to bring all the arguments he thought most likely to bend me to his will; at last, I recovered from this dream of grandeur, and begged him by all the most endearing names I could think of, not to urge me dishonourably to forsake the man, who I was convinced would raise me to an empire, if in his power to give me all I desired. But he was deaf to all I could say, and insisted, that by next week, I should prepare myself to go to court: he bid me consider of it, and not prefer a ridiculous notion of honour to the real interest of my whole family, but, above all things, not to disclose what he had trusted me with. On which, he left me to my own thoughts. When I was alone, I reflected how little tenderness this behaviour showed to me, whose happiness he did not at all consult; but only looked on me as a ladder, on which he could climb to the height of his own ambitious desires: and when I thought of his fondness for me in my infancy, I could impute it to nothing, but either the liking me as a plaything, or the gratification of his vanity in my beauty. But I was too much divided between a crown and my engagement to lord Piercy, to spend much time in thinking of any thing else; and although my father had positively forbid me, yet, when he came next, I could not help acquainting him with all that had passed, with the reserve only of the struggle in my own mind on the first mention of being a queen. I expected he would have received the news with the greatest agonies; but he showed no vast emotion; however, he could not help turning pale; and taking me by the hand, looked at me with an air of tenderness, and said: If being a queen will make you happy, and it is in your power to be so, I would not for the world prevent it, let me suffer what I will.

This amazing greatness of mind had on me quite the contrary effect from what it ought to have had; for instead of increasing my love for him, it almost put an end to it, and I began to think if he could part with me, the matter was not much. And I am convinced, when any man gives up the possession of a woman, whose consent he has once obtained, let his motive be ever so generous, he will disoblige her. I could not help showing my dissatisfaction, and told him, I was very glad this affair sat so easily on him. He had not power to answer, but was so suddenly struck with this unexpected ill-natured turn I gave his behaviour, that he stood amazed for some time, and then bowed and left me. Now I was again left to my own reflections; but, to make any thing intelligible out of them, is quite impossible; I wished to be a queen, and wished I might not be one; I would have my lord Piercy happy without me; and yet I would not have the power of my charms be so weak, that he could bear the thought of life after being disappointed in my love. But the result of all these confused thoughts was a resolution to obey my father. I am afraid there was not much duty in the case, though at that time I was glad to take hold of that small shadow, to save me from looking on my own actions in the true light. When my lover came again, I looked on him with that coldness that he could not bear, on purpose to rid myself of all importunity: for since I had resolved to use him ill, I regarded him as the monument of my shame, and his every look appeared to me to upbraid me. My father soon carried me to court; there I had no very hard part to act; for with the experience I had had of mankind, I could find no great difficulty in managing a man who liked me, and for whom I not only did not care, but had an utter aversion to; but this aversion he believed to be virtue, for how credulous is a man who has an inclination to believe! And I took care sometimes to drop words of cottages and love, and how happy the woman was who fixed her affections on a man in such a station of life, that she might show her love, without being suspected of hypocrisy or mercenary views. All this was swallowed very easily by the amorous king, who pushed on the divorce with the utmost impetuosity, although the affair lasted a good while, and I remained most part of the time behind the curtain. Whenever the king mentioned it to me, I used such arguments against it, as I thought the most likely to make him the more eager for it; begging, that unless his conscience was really touched, he would not on my account give any grief to his virtuous queen; for, to being her handmaid, I thought myself highly honoured; and that I would not only forego a crown, but even give up the pleasure of ever seeing him more, rather than wrong my royal mistress. This way of talking, joined to his eager desire to possess my person, convinced the king so strongly of my exalted merit, that he thought it a meritorious act to displace the woman (whom he could not have so good an opinion of, because he was tired of her) and to put me in her place. After about a year's stay at court, as the king's love to me began to be talked of, it was thought proper to remove me, that there might be no umbrage given to the queen's party; I was forced to comply with this, though greatly against my will; for I was very jealous that absence might change the king's mind. I retired again with my father to his country-seat, but it had no longer those charms for me which I once enjoyed there; for my mind was now too much taken up with ambition, to make room for any other thoughts. During my stay here, my royal lover often sent gentlemen to me with messages and letters, which I always answered in the manner I thought would best bring about my designs, which were to come back again to court. In all the letters that passed between us, there was something so kingly and commanding in his, and so deceitful and submissive in mine, that I sometimes could not help reflecting on the difference betwixt this correspondence, and that with lord Percy; yet I was so pressed forward by the desire of a crown, I could not think of turning back. In all I wrote, I continually praised his resolution of letting me be at a distance from him, since at this time it was condescend indeed to my honour; but what was of ten times more weight with me, I thought it was necessary for his; and I would sooner suffer any thing in the world, than be any means of hurt to him, either in his interest, or reputation. I always gave some hints of ill health, with some reflections how necessary the peace of the mind was to that of the body. By these means, I brought him to recal me again by the most absolute command, which I for a little time artfully delayed, (for I knew the impatience of his temper would not bear any contradiction) till he made my father in a manner force me to what I most wished, with the utmost appearance of reluctance on my side. When I had gained this point, I began to think which way I could separate the king from the queen, for hitherto they lived in the same house. The lady Mary, the queen's daughter, being then about sixteen, I sought for emissaries of her own age, that I could confide in, to instil into her mind disrespectful thoughts of her father, and make a jest of the tenderness of his conscience about the divorce. I knew she had naturally strong passions, and that young people of that age are apt to think those that pretend to be their friends are really so, and only speak their minds freely: I afterwards contrived to have every word she spoke of him carried to the king; who took it all as I could wish, and fancied those things did not come at first from the young lady, but from her mother. He would often talk of it to me, and I agreed with him in his sentiments; but then, as a great proof of my goodness, I always endeavoured to excuse her, by saying, a lady so long time used to be a royal queen, might naturally be a little exasperated with those she fancied would throw her from that station she so justly deserved.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erſcheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Die Poſtämter verſenden die Nummern wöchentlich, die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnements-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monat 1 Thlr. 5 gr. Ein Abonnement unter 26 Nummern findet nicht Statt. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Poſtämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. №. 33.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The History of Anna Boleyn.

By Henry Fielding.

(Concluded from our last.)

By these sort of plots, I found the way to make the king angry with the queen; for nothing is easier than to make a man angry with a woman he wants to be rid of, and who stands in the way between him and his pleasures: so that now the king, on the pretence of the queen's obstinacy, in a point where his conscience was so tenderly concerned, parted with her. Every thing was now plain before me; I had nothing farther to do but to let the king alone to his own desires: and I had no reason to fear, since they had carried him so far, but that they would urge him on to do every thing I aimed at. I was created marchioness of Pembroke. This dignity sat very easy on me; for the thoughts of a much higher title took from me all feelings of this; and I looked upon being a marchioness as a trifle; not that I saw the bauble in its true light, but because it fell short of what I had figured to myself I should soon obtain. The king's desires grew very impatient, and it was not long before I was privately married to him. I was no sooner his wife, than I found all the queen come upon me; I felt myself conscious of royalty, and even the faces of my most intimate acquaintance seemed to me to be quite strange. I hardly knew them, height had turned my head, and I was like a man placed on a monument, to whose sight all creatures, at a great distance below him, appear like so many little pigmies crawling about on the earth; and the prospect so greatly delighted me, that I did not presently consider, that in both cases descending a few steps erected by human hands would place us in the number of those very pigmies who appear so despicable. Our marriage was kept private for some time, for it was not thought proper to make it public (the affair of the divorce not being finished) till the birth of my daughter Elizabeth made it necessary. But all who saw me knew it; for my manner of speaking and acting was so much changed with my station, that all around me plainly perceived, I was sure I was a queen. While it was a secret, I had yet something to wish for; I could not be perfectly satisfied, till all the world was acquainted with my fortune: but when my coronation was over, and I was raised to the height of my ambition, instead of finding myself happy, I was in reality more miserable than ever; for besides that the aversion I had naturally to the king was much more difficult to dissemble after marriage than before, and grew into a perfect detestation, my imagination, which had thus warmly pursued a crown, grew cool when I was in the possession of it, and gave me time to reflect what mighty matter

I had gained by all this bustle; and I often used to think myself in the case of the fox hunter, who, when he has toiled and sweated all day in the chace, as if some unheard-of blessing was to crown his success, finds, at last, all he has got by his labour, is a stinking nauseous animal. But my condition was yet worse than his; for he leaves the loathsome wretch to be torn by his hounds, whilst I was obliged to fondle mine, and meanly pretend him to be the object of my love. For the whole time I was in this envied, this exalted state, I led a continual life of hypocrisy, which I now know nothing on earth can compensate. I had no companion but the man I hated. I dared not disclose my sentiments to any person about me; nor did any one presume [illegible] enter into any freedom of conversation wi[illegible] but all who spoke to me, talked to the [illegible] and not to me; for they would have said just the same things to a dress'd up puppet, if the king had taken a fancy to call it his wife. And as I knew every woman in the court was my enemy, from thinking she had much more right than I had to the place I filled, I thought myself as unhappy, as if I had been placed in a wild wood, where there was no human creature for me to speak to, in a continual fear of leaving any traces of my footsteps, lest I should be found by some dreadful monster, or stung by snakes and adders; for such are spiteful women to the objects of their envy.

In this worst of all situations, I was obliged to hide my melancholy, and appear cheerful. This threw me into an error the other way, and I sometimes fell into a levity in my behaviour, that was afterwards made use of to my disadvantage. I had a son dead-born, which I perceived abated something of the king's ardour; for his temper could not brook the least disappointment. This gave me no uneasiness; for not considering the consequences, I could not help being best pleased when I saw least of his company. Afterwards I found he had cast his eyes on one of my maids of honour; and whether it was owing to any art of hers, or only to the king's violent passions, I was in the end used even worse than my former mistress had been by my means. The decay of the king's affection was presently seen by all those court sycophants, who continually watch the motions of royal eyes; and the moment they found they could be heard against me, they turned my most innocent actions and words, nay even my very looks, into proofs of the blackest crimes. The king, who was impatient to enjoy his new love, lent a willing ear to all my accusers, who found ways of making him jealous, that I was false to his bed. He would not so easily have believed any thing against me before, but he was now glad to flatter himself that he had found a reason to do just what he had resolved upon without a reason; and on some [illegible] pretences, and hearsay evidence, I was [illegible] to the Tower, where the lady, who was my greatest enemy, was appointed to watch me, and lie in the same chamber with me. This was really as bad a punishment as my death; for she insulted me with those keen reproaches, and spiteful witticisms which threw me into such vapours and violent fits, that I knew not what I uttered in this condition. She pretended, I had confessed talking ridiculous stuff with a set of low fellows, whom I had hardly ever taken notice of, as could have imposed on none but such as were resolved to believe. I was brought to my trial, and, to blacken me the more, accused of conversing criminally with my own brother, whom indeed I loved extremely well, but never looked on him in any other light than as my friend. However, I was condemned to be beheaded, or burnt, as the king pleased; and he was graciously pleased, from the great remains of his love, to chuse the mildest sentence. I was much less shocked at this manner of ending my life, than I should have been in any other station; but I had had so little enjoyment from the time I had been a queen, that death was the less dreadful to me. The chief things that lay on my conscience, were the arts I made use of to induce the king to part with the queen, my ill usage of lady Mary, and my jilting lord Piercy. However, I endeavoured to calm my mind as well as I could, and hoped these crimes would be forgiven me; for in other respects I had led a very innocent life, and always did all the good-natured actions I found any opportunity of doing. From the time I had it in my power, I gave a great deal of money amongst the poor, I prayed very devoutly, and went to my execution very composedly. Thus I lost my life at the age of twenty-nine, in which short time I believe I went through more variety of scenes, than many people who live to be very old. I had lived in a court, where I spent my time in coquetry and gaiety: I had experienced what it was to have one of those violent passions which make the mind all turbulence and anxiety. I had had a lover whom I esteemed and valued, and at the latter part of my life, I was raised to a station as high as the vainest woman could wish. But in all these various changes, I never enjoyed any real satisfaction, unless in the little time I lived retired in the country free from all noise and hurry; and while I was conscious I was the object of the love and esteem of a man of sense and honour.

The Dream.

By the Author of „Private Life," &c.

> I cannot tell how the truth may be, —
> I tell the tale as 't was said to me.
>
> SCOTT.

It was a bright morning early in June — that month of fragrance and sunshine, the laughing May of the old Poets — that a lively party assembled around the breakfast table of General Falkland. One guest, in addition to sons and daughters of various ages, — from twenty-five to sweet fifteen, — formed the gay group. They were talking of dreams.

„I shall sit next to William," exclaimed Emma Falkland; „for I am quite tired of you, Raymond; you have been in my dreams all night."

„Why, what a favoured mortal you are," replied Raymond, laughing; „your good genius must have presided over your slumbers!"

„Not at all," returned Emma; „you were like a great many persons in this waking, breathing world, who talk a great deal, and say nothing."

„Well, I cannot pay anybody the compliment of dreaming of them," observed William, „for I never dream."

„As few persons ever dream any thing worth dreaming of or recording, you need not deplore your delinquency very deeply," observed the General.

„My dear Sir," interrupted Raymond, „persons of active imaginations certainly dream most."

„Persons of perfect digestion certainly dream least," returned the General drily.

„You do not mean to refer dreaming to mere physical causes, I hope?" said Raymond.

„Ninety-nine times out of a hundred it may be so referred," returned the General.

„Ah! my dear father," said Emma, laughing, „what would the whole race of poets and philosophers say to you?"

„Why, poets and philosophers contrive to make a great deal out of nothing," said the General; „I am less skilful."

„Well but may we not consider dreams as a proof that the soul is independent of matter?" observed Raymond; „does not the mind think vigorously — eloquently, even when the senses are steeped in forgetfulness? Do we not see, hear, feel, act? Can we not, like Ariel, ‚compass the wandering moon,' or soar, as with a seraph-wing, to the seventh heaven?"

„I can answer for never having performed any feats of the kind," replied the General.

„Well, I would not give up that world of our own, in which, as Heraclitus said, we live in dreams," observed Raymond, „for the best share of this common world, where we meet to eat and drink, and where wise men and fools jostle and weary each other."

„My world of dreams so precisely resembles dull, substantial earth," said the General, „that I cannot any how mistake it for Elysium or Paradise."

„But will you not allow," continued Raymond, „that there have been persons whose inculties and perceptions were even more acute in a sleeping state? Did not Sir Thomas Browne declare, that though he never said or thought a witty thing in his waking hours, yet, in sleep he could compose a whole comedy, and laugh himself awake at the conceits thereof?“

„Perhaps the merriment would have been all his own, even if he had favoured the world with these conceits of his sleeping hours,“ replied the General. „The wit of a man wide awake is of a somewhat less questionable character.“

„Well, — not to insist upon the poetical and philosophical use that may be made of dreams,“ said Raymond, „certainly you will not deny that many singular and important communications have been made through their medium.“

„The Wizard, the Fairy, and the Banshee were in the habit of making singular and important communications at one time, I believe,“ returned the General.

„There is, at least, neither superstition nor enthusiasm in the opinion,“ observed Raymond; „for to say nothing of profane authors, the Scriptures record many such communications.“

„Yes, yes,“ returned the General, „and we shall do well to confine ourselves to that record; the age of supernatural interposition is gone by.“

„I am by no means prepared to concide in that opinion,“ said their guest, who had hitherto been quietly engaged discussing his coffee and ham, and had borne no part in the conversation; „depend upon it, there are ‚more things in heaven and earth‘ than are dreamed of in your philosophy, my dear General.“

Raymond turned to his new ally with unfeigned astonishment.

Mr. Clifford — the gentleman in question — was more than fifty years of age, and a barrister of about thirty years' standing: he was remarkable for acuteness of mind and strength of judgment; very learned in the law; and looking forward, at no very distant period, to that summum bonum of a lawyer's hopes, — the judge's wig. He appeared an entirely unimaginative person; one who had never thought of setting his foot in fairy land since he was seven years old.

„Have you any special reason for your opinion, Clifford?“ inquired the General.

„Twenty-five years ago,“ returned Mr. Clifford, when I was a young briefless barrister, on the Northern Circuit, a cause came into court, which made a very strong impression upon my mind; and I have ever since believed it to be highly presumptuous, to declare that supernatural intimations may not sometimes be given in dreams.“

„Oh! pray let us hear the story, sir,“ said Raymond eagerly; and all the party joined in his entreaties.

„No,“ replied Mr. Clifford; the carriage will be at the door before I have half done, and I must be in court in an hour: but at the time this occurred, I took some trouble to inquire into the history of the whole affair, and of the parties concerned; and I thought the particulars so well worth preserving, that I threw them into the form of a tale, which shall be forwarded to you when I return home.“

Mr. Clifford took leave; and in a few days the following pages were received by General Falkland.

The Barrister's Tale:

OR, THE DREAM. *)

‚The cottage homes of England,
By thousands on her plains,
They are smiling o'er the silvery brooks
And round the hamlet fanes.
Through glowing orchards forth they peep,
Each from its nook of leaves,
And fearless there the lowly sleep,
As the bird beneath their eaves.“

Such a home of cheerful, quiet beauty, in Ashgrove, a village in the West Riding of Yorkshire had been the residence of Edmund Walton for the last twenty years. He rented a farm of about three hundred acres; and his intelligence, integrity, and kindliness of disposition rendered him a very popular person both with rich and poor. His station in society was something inferior to that which he once hoped to fill: he was the son of a clergyman, and, in the days of his boyhood, had been destined for the church: the sudden death of his father — when Edmund was in his sixteenth year disappointed the hope. Instead of preparing for college, he was transferred to the chambers of a solicitor in London; but Edmund had been trained up amidst the freedom and freshness of nature, and he found a dull desk in a dusky office an insufferable exchange for the sunny hills, smiling valleys, and woody glens of his early home.

---

*) It is proper to mention that the leading incidents of this tale are strictly and literally facts.

He accordingly decided upon devoting himself to agricultural pursuits; — and if a shade of regret at the blight of his youthful prospects sometimes stole over his mind, it was soon lost amidst the energy of active usefulness, or charmed away by a smile from his gentle wife, or the gambols of his sportive children. His education had been thoroughly good, for it had taught him to estimate things, persons, and circumstances justly; and when he compared his own lot with that of others, he was not disposed to quarrel with it. It was humble, but not mean: it secured independence, and permitted hospitality. His days were passed amidst woods, and brakes, and fields, in the full enjoyment of „free nature's grace," and his evenings in the soft, sweet endearments of domestic life. There were few better or happier men than Edmund Walton.

His principal servant and assistant in the management of the farm, was John Cumming: he had been in the employ of the former occupant, and to use his own phrase, had worked, man and boy, on the land nearly fifty years; he was indeed well known to all the inhabitants of Ashgrove. Notwithstanding his sober, sedate, industrious habits, John was a bachelor. Many ascribed this to the cold cautiousness of his character; but two or three of the grey-headed patriarchs of Ashgrove remembered something of a love-affair in his youth, which, however, ended in nothing. The old folks surmised that John had been jilted: it is certain that his proposed marriage with Susan Wilmot, the pretty dairymaid at the Rectory, had been suddenly broken off, and that from that time John became an altered man—not, indeed, less sober or industrious, but less gay and social. However, notwithstanding his single blessedness, and his ungracious preference of John Cumming's society to that of the world of Ashgrove, he was much respected, consulted as an oracle upon all matters connected with husbandry, and appealed to by parochial authorities, in doubtful and delicate cases, as a man acquainted with every rood of land in the parish.

With his master, he was on the best terms imaginable; fearlessly trusted, and entirely trustworthy. Every thing indeed, animate and inanimate, seemed to prosper under his care. There was also a peculiar tie between them. On one occasion, when Walton was breaking in a young horse, John had saved the life of his master, at the imminent peril of his own. Unsocial as his manner unquestionably was, the frank kindness of Walton seemed to open his heart. The children, too, became his pets and playthings: they climbed his knee, stroked his rough face with familiar fondness, and his long arm was frequently in request to reach a bough of hawthorn, a sprig of eglantine, or a cluster of ripe nuts: the eldest boy often followed him round the farm; there were young lambs to be seen, or rabbits to be hunted, or John would take him to the copse, where the finest primroses, harebells, and violets were to be found. Indeed, Cumming was treated in this family with the indulgence of a relative, rather than the distance usual with a hired servant.

A singular and fearful incident at length interrupted this happy state of things. Mrs. Walton was one night suddenly awakened by a deep groan from her husband: he started up in bed, his whole frame convulsed with terror, and continued for some minutes in a state of speechless agitation. At length the tremor began a little to subside, and looking fearfully around him, he exclaimed, „Thank God!—it is but a dream!" Still, however, he trembled exceedingly; and after vainly endeavouring to compose himself, arose, and walked about the room.

„It is but a dream," he repeated, in a low tone; „but, oh! how fearfully, how dreadfully distinct." He threw open the window: it was a still, balmy night in June, and the whole earth seemed wrapped in the softest quietude; the stars in glory and beauty were keeping their night-watches; and through the rich woods that clothed the hills, not a leaf stirred. A dewy fragrance stole from the woodbine, that hung its tangled wreaths around the window, and Walton felt his spirit soothed by the delicious calm of nature.

> „All was so still, so soft in earth and air,
> You scarce would start to meet a spirit there;
> Secure that nought of evil could delight
> To walk in such a scene, on such a night!“

He slept little more; and rising with the dawn, made a strong effort to shake off the impression of his fearful dream, but in vain; neither

> „The active day so boon and bright.“

nor his own cheerful temperament, availed; he reasoned with himself again, and again he exclaimed:

„How absurd to be thus harassed by an idle dream!“

All would not do; the images conjured up in sleep, haunted him with strange pertinacity; he resisted the solicitation of his wife, whose curiosity was very naturally excited, and refused to relate the circumstances which had so affected him.

„Why should I infect your mind with images of horror?“ said he; „It would only increase the difficulty of dismissing them from my own, which I intend to do with all possible speed. Not one more word will we say on the subject.“

A week elapsed. Walton adhered to his resolution, and his impressions had lost some of their horror and intenseness, when precisely the same dream was repeated; the circumstances did not vary in a single point; the scene again appeared before him with the most vivid and intense distinctness. Still more agitated, still more deeply impressed, he no longer refused himself the relief of imparting the particulars to his wife.

„It is most remarkable,“ exclaimed he, „that this dream is entirely free from all confusion and indistinctness; every object and every circumstance are so clearly marked and defined, as if all were reality instead of illusion.

„I thought that I was walking on a fine, calm night through a green lane a few miles from Ashgrove: the moon shone brightly; and I came to a spot where the lane jutted out into a sort of broad bay. A large oak threw its rugged arms across the greensward; and at a few yards distance, ran a clear brook, over which was thrown a single plank by way of bridge; an old grey weeping ash, half despoiled of its branches, hung over it. As I stood watching the moonbeams softly playing over the little stream, two figures appeared slowly and silently advancing from that part of the lane which was wrapped in shade: the one wore the dress of a sailor, neat and trim, as if in his holiday garb; the other was considerably taller, habited in a carter's frock and thick shoes, like a ploughman just returned from his work. Though I heard no sound, yet their gestures appeared animated; and on the countryman's part, violent; the countenance of the sailor seemed to wear an arch smile; they paused a moment under the oak; the gestures of the rustic betrayed increasing and frightful violence. At length he suddenly seized upon the sailor, threw him on the ground, grasped his with a demon-like force, and after a few moments of fierce struggle, the man lay a corpse at his feet. I thought that I had no power to move or speak; my feet were rooted to the spot, while the murderer stood motionless, contemplating in silence his savage work, and the stiffening form of his victim.

„While I still gazed in unspeakable horror, the earth suddenly clave asunder, and again closed over the corpse of the murdered man. Every vestige of the bloody deed had vanished; the ruffian stood alone. At this moment, the moon shone with the most refulgent brightness. Suddenly he seemed invested with an atmosphere of light; he threw up his hands and eyes, as if in agony, then turned towards me; every line of his face and figure stood out with the cold, clear distinctness of a statue. The murderer was JOHN CREWSE!“

„How strange!“ exclaimed Mrs. Walton, in a low tremulous tone; „how very dreadful!“

Several minutes elapsed, and not another word was uttered, while Walton walked up and down the room in a state of violent perturbation.

„He is so faithful — so excellent! continued he, following the current of his own thoughts. „A shade of suspicion appears to be the most barbarous injustice, and yet — but it is a dream — the idle coinage of my own brain.“

John, at this moment, passed the window, with the eldest boy perched on his shoulder; the rough bass tones of his voice blending with the laughing joy of the boy. A cold shudder crept over Walton's heart; he passed hastily out, took the child gently from him, and pressed it with passionate fondness to his heart, as if he had rescued it from some strange peril.

„It is wicked — it is cruel!“ exclaimed he, „for an instant to harbour such thoughts.“ He covered his face for a moment with both hands; and then starting up, took his hat, and strove by a long walk, to dissipate the gloom that was steadily gathering over his mind.

Wrapped in thought, he wandered on till he found himself at some distance from Ashgrove; and, pausing for a few seconds to consider the bearings of the country, he struck into a bye-lane little frequented, which he thought would lead homewards by a short cut.

The sun was setting as Walton turned into the lane, so that the greatest part was in shade; but occasional breaks in the hedge admitted a few gleams of his parting radiance. He found the way longer and more winding than he had calculated upon, and was beginning to regret that he had made choice of such a path, when every feeling was absorbed in emotions of wonder and fear. He stood in the very spot of which he had dreamed! There was the little stream — the bridge of a single plank — the old withered oak. Walton leaned against the tree for support, and closed his eyes, as if fearful that the horrid vision should appear before him; but all around was calm and still. The distant low of the cattle, the tinkling of the sheep-bell, and the rich song of the nightingale, alone interrupted the deep repose of evening.

Walton, still leaning against the tree, breathed a fervent prayer for strength and direction. Free as he was from all superstition, he yet began to think that such a singular coincidence could not be the effect of chance; and while his frame trembled with emotion, he earnestly petitioned for that wisdom, which would alike preserve him from presumptuous recklessness or enfeebling terror.

Somewhat relieved, though still painfully agitated, he cast another rapid and inquiring glance around the spot, and shuddering at its fearful identity, pursued his way, wrapped in anxious meditation.

The shadows of twilight were deepening around him; and, his mind bewildered and oppressed, he was scarcely able to form a definitive purpose; he felt, however, a strong desire to examine the precise spot where the body had so mysteriously disappeared, but this could not be done with the secrecy and expedition which were so desirable, without assistance — and to whom could he apply? He dreaded the result of the examination. If he found any corroborating proofs, what course could he pursue? The occurrence was indeed passing strange! yet, would it not be better to bear the miserable burthen of such a mystery, than, by disclosing it, to impeach a man of irreproachable life and character — his own faithful and attached servant — one who had watched over his interests for many years with unceasing vigilance — whose age was now „falling into the sear and yellow leaf“ — above all, one who had saved his life?

Yet, if the whole dream were not the work of chance, or of some juggling fiend, was he at liberty to pass it over? — was he not imperatively called upon to proceed and ascertain the truth? His only relief, in this wretched perplexity, was to talk the whole matter over freely with his wife, and she strongly urged him to confide the circumstances to Mr. Forrester, the Rector of the parish. He was a man who combined high principle with clear sound sense and the best feelings; one who would judge wisely and act kindly. But so reluctant did Walton feel to make the disclosure, that not until he had been again and again visited by the same dream, and his health and spirits began to sink under its pressure, did he resolve to adopt her advice.

Mr. Forrester listened to the relation with deep interest.

„Perhaps," added Walton, „you will be inclined to think that I discover a great deal of childish credulity in being thus forcibly impressed by a dream: but I have struggled with the feeling in vain."

„No, my dear sir," replied Mr. Forrester, thoughtfully; and after a pause of some minutes, — „I should not envy the man who could readily dismiss such a dream; it would be, in my opinion, a far greater proof of presumption than of wisdom. From what is termed vulgar superstition, I hope we are equally free. It has pleased God, of His unspeakable mercy, to furnish us with a revelation of His will, containing a clear rule of faith and practice; and we have certainly the highest authority for concluding, that departed spirits are not permitted to revisit this earth — or, at least, to assume a visible form, and hold personal communion with its inhabitants, either to confirm the faith of the wavering, or alarm the conscience of the wicked; but I would by no means affirm, that even such visitations may not be permitted, for the discovery or prevention of atrocious crime; and with respect to dreams, who would have the hardihood to assert that the High and Holy Being, who breathed a portion of His spirit into man, cannot direct and control the action of that spirit, in order to accomplish any purpose of justice or of mercy? Nor do I see any reason, why a dream may not be made the medium of such agency. It is consonant with the recorded dealings of God in the olden time. But, of course, in such matters the exercise of nice discrimination and sound judgment is in the highest degree essential. I believe, that special interferences of this nature are extremely rare, — and that, where they do occur, the importance of the end justifies the unusual nature of the means. We must be upon our guard, too, against the freaks both of the body and the mind; for man is a curious compound; and the nerves and imagination, when stimulated to unusual action, are apt to be somewhat unmanageable. Nervous excitement, and a morbid state of mind, often produce strange imaginings. But, in your case, I see no proof either of physical or mental disease. The connected tenor of your dream — the strange identity of the spot — are so remarkable, that we appear to me to be imperatively called upon to investigate the matter further. As secrecy, however, is of the last importance, we will admit no person to our confidence. This very night, if you please, we will repair to the spot; if the examination should afford any confirmation of the circumstances of this most singular dream, we must then consider what course it will be wise to adopt."

In pursuance of this arrangement, when the evening sounds had gradually died away, and only a light here and there was seen to twinkle from the cottage windows of Ashgrove, Mr. Forrester and Walton pursued their intended way.

There was no moon, but the stars shone softly amidst the still, summer twilight, and they reached the lane about midnight.

During the evening Walton had conveyed the necessary implements; and, pointing to the exact spot, so tragically marked in his dream, they began their drear task. They had continued their work for more than an hour, pausing only occasionally to rest, and exchange a few low whispers, when Walton, feeling his labours suddenly impeded, stopped, and throwing the light of the lantern full on the ground, exclaimed, after a few moments, examination —

Gracious God! — all is then true — it is no illusion!"

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing

1838. Nro 34.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Mary Howitt.

Dieſe eben ſo tief als zart und fromm empfindende geiſtreiche Dichterin ward während eines kurzen Aufenthaltes ihrer Eltern, welche Wood hießen, zu Coleford in Glouceſterſhire dort geboren; ſie zog jedoch bald nachher mit ihnen nach dem gewöhnlichen Wohnorte derſelben, Uttoxeter in Staffordſhire, wo ſie ihre Jugend verlebte. Die wunderſchönen Gegenden in dieſem Theile von Staffordſhire ließen einen bleibenden Eindruck in ihrer Seele zurück und weckten ſchon früh die Liebe zur Dichterkunſt in derſelben, da aber ihre Eltern ſtrenge Mitglieder der Quäkergemeine waren, ſo erhielt ſie eine ſehr beſchränkte Erziehung, und lernte nur diejenigen Bücher kennen, welche von dem Umſichtigſten ihrer Glaubensgenoſſen gebilligt wurden. Um deſto lebhafter wirkte daher ſpäter die Lectüre von Poeſieen auf ihr Gemüth, und namentlich war es die alte echt engliſche volksthümliche Ballade, der ſie ihre volle Neigung zuwandte. Sie ward in ihrem einundzwanzigſten Jahre mit Richard Howitt, einem ausgezeichneten, auch als Dichter gefeierten Manne vermählt, und lebt in ſehr glücklicher Ehe mit demſelben, zuerſt in Staffordſhire, dann in Nottingham, und ſeit geraumer Zeit zu Eſher in Surrey.

In Verbindung mit ihrem Manne gab ſie zwei Bände Dichtungen heraus: „The Forest Minstrel, 1823“ und „The Desolation of Eyam and other Poems 1827“. — 1834 erſchien eine Reihe von Dramen aus ihrer Feder unter dem Titel: The Seven Temptations, welche zu anderer Zeit allein ſchon ihr einen bedeutenden Ruf verſchafft haben würden, da ſie reich an kühnen Gedanken, ſcharfen Charakterzeichnungen und kräftigen Zügen ſind. Mehrere Schriften für die Jugend aus ihrer Feder fanden gleichfalls großen Beifall.

Engliſche Berichterſtatter können nicht genug ihre Liebenswürdigkeit, Anmuth und herzliche Freundlichkeit ſchildern. Ihre Schriften halten gleichen Schritt mit ihrem Character; in allen herrſcht zarte Geſinnung, Wohlwollen, Liebe, tiefes Gefühl und echte Frömmigkeit bei großer Gewandtheit der Form, Kraft und Schönheit, ohne daß je die reinſte Weiblichkeit verletzt wird.

M. Howitt iſt gegenwärtig mit der Sammlung und Herausgabe ihrer volksthümlichen Balladen, in deren Behandlung alle ihre Zeitgenoſſen hinter ihr zurückbleiben, beſchäftigt. — Wir theilen eins der vorzüglichſten ihrer Gedichte aus dieſer Gattung hier mit.

Elian Gray.

By Mary Howitt.

„Oh! Elian Gray, rise up, rise up!“
His neighbours cried, „still dost thou sleep?
The bloody Indians are come down,
Flames rise from the near English town; —
And hark! — the warwhoop, wild and deep!“

„I sleep not,“ said the ancient man,
„Fly you — but tarry not for me! —

I dare not quit this lonely ground,
Though the wild Indians camp around,
For God commands me not to fear.

„I know not what may be his will,
But when I rose up to depart,
‚Fly not — thou hast no cause to fear, —
Thy place of duty still is here;'
Like lightning-words passed through my heart.

„Therefore, I dare not quit this place, —
But you, whom no commands delay,
Haste and secure by timely flight
Your wives and little ones this night, —
Fly! fly, my children! while ye may!"

They fled like wild deer through the woods,
And saw from each commanding height,
Afar, and all around, aspire
The red flames of consuming fire,
Marking the Indians' path that night.

Alone, alone sate Elias Gray,
With unbarred door, beside his fire,
Thoughtful, yet cheerfully resigned,
Awaiting with submissive mind
What the Great Master might require.

Seven days went on, and where was he?
A captive, travel-worn and spent
With many marchings night and day,
Through the far wilderness, away
To a wild Indian settlement.

And now the old man's strength had failed,
And powerless as a child new-born,
Stretched in that lonely forest-place,
Among a fierce and savage race,
He lay, as if of God forlorn! —

Forlorn! — and yet he prayed to live,
With a wild, feverish agony;
And fearful, doubting grew his mind,
And for a moment he repined
That God had brought him here to die.

When lowly murmured by the door
Of the rude hut in which he lay,
He heard, as if in dreams he heard,
Mournfully many an English word
Cast to the desert winds away.

He looked — it was an Indian woman,
Singing, as if to soothe some woe
Which at her very heart was strong, —
The sad words of an English song
That he remembered long ago, —

The ballad of a broken heart; —
But how could her soul understand
The sadness of that story old?
How could an Indian tongue unfold
The language of another's land?

Ere long the mystery was revealed,
And then the old man, Elias Gray,
Saw the great work of God was clear,
And she was the poor stricken deer
For whom his path through peril lay!

„No, I am not of Indian birth!"
Said she, „I have an English name,
Though now none give it unto me; —
Mahontis, child of misery,
They gave me for my Indian name,
And 'tis the only one I claim.

„And yet I love the English tongue,
And let us two our converse hold
In that dear, unforgotten speech,
For it hath words my grief to reach, —
The Indian tongue is harsh and cold.

„The place of which I scarce can think
Thou know'st, and knowing it, art dear;
For thou wilt say there's not on earth
A spot like that which gave me birth —
Know'st thou the Vale of Windermere?

„And yet it matters not — thou dost! —
There was my birth-place; there I grew,
Without a care my youth to dim,

A mountain-maiden strong of limb,
And free as the wild winds that blew.

,,My step was firm, my heart was bold,
I crossed the lake, I clomb the rock;
Clad in that simple country's dress,
I was a mountain shepherdess,
And there I kept my father's flock.

,,I grew, — and I became a wife;
And he who was my chosen mate,
Though midst our lonely mountains bred,
Much knowledge had, and much had read, —
Too much for one of his estate.

,,He knew all lands, all histories old —
He understood whate'er he saw:
His words poured out like waters free;
His was that native dignity
Which could respect from all men draw.

,,Wise as he was, he could not toil,
And all went wrong about our place:
The years were wet, we'd nought to reap;
Amid the snows we lost our sheep,
And misery stared us in the face.

,,We left the land that gave us birth —
And I, who was become a mother,
Within my inmost heart kept deep
My burning tears — I would not weep;
'Tis hard our bitterest griefs to smother!

,,My parents' graves among the hills,
We left them in their silence lying!
My husband's hopes were high and strong,
And with light heart he went along,
Good omens in each thing descrying *).

,,My heart was heavy as a stone, —
And the poor children's weary cry
Fevered me till my brain grew wild; —
And then I wept even as a child,
And tears relieved my misery.

,,We came into this foreign land —
Oh! weary is the stranger's fate —
He comes where none his feelings share,
Where he may die, and no one care!
This, this is to be desolate!

,,He died — ay, in the city street, —
God knows why such great grief was sent!
He died — and as the brute might die —
The careless people passed us by;
They were so used to misery,
Their meanest sympathies were spent!

,,Ah me! I by his body sate,
Stupid, as if I could not break
The bonds of that supremest thrall;
Nor had I roused my soul at all
But for my little children's sake.

,,We were indeed, those babes and I,
Wretched, in that strange land alone;
And yet, even then, 'twas mine to know
More misery, — a heavier woe
Than yet my wretched soul had known!

,,Want — total want of daily bread
Came next; — my native pride was strong
And yet I begged from day to day,
And made my miserable way
Throughout the city's busy throng!

,,I felt that I was one debased,
And what I was I dared not think:
Even from myself I strove to hide
My very name; an honest pride
Made me from common beggary shrink.

,,Oh misery! — my homeless heart
Grew sick of life. — I wandered out
With my two children, far away
Into the solitudes that lay
The populous city round about:

,,The mother in my soul was strong,
And I was ravenous as the beast;
Man's heart was hard — I stole them bread —

---

*) [illegible]

And while I pined the children fed,
And yet each day our wants increased.

„I saw them waste, and waste away,
I strove to think it was not so;
At length, one died — of want he died —
My very brain seemed petrified —
I wept not in that bitter woe!

„I took the other in my arms,
And day by day, like one amazed
By an unutterable grief,
I wandered on; — I found relief
In travel, but my brain was crazed.

„How we were fed I cannot tell;
I pulled the berry from the tree,
And we lived on, — I knew no pain
Save a dull stupor in my brain,
And I forgot my misery.

„I joyed to see the little stars,
I joyed to see the midnight moon;
I felt at times a wild delight, —
I saw my child before my sight
As gamesome as the young racoon! *)

„'T was a strange season; and how long
It lasted, whether days or years,
I know not, — it too soon went by; —
I woke again to agony,
But ne'er again to human tears.

„The Indian found me in the wood,
He took me to his forest-home; —
They laid my child beneath the tree,
They buried it, unknown to me,
In a wild, lonely place of gloom.

„The Indian women on me gazed
With eyes of tenderness, and then
Slowly came back each 'wildered sense;
Their low tones of benevolence
Gave me my human soul again.

„And I have lived with them for years,
And I have been an Indian wife;
And save at times, when thoughts will flow
Back through those dreadful times of woe
To my youth's sunshine long ago,
I almost like the Indian life.

„But one thing in my soul is dark —
I have forgot my Fathers' God!
I cannot pray — and yet I turn
Toward Him, and my weak soul doth yearn
Once more for holy, spiritual food.

„Oh that I had an inward peace
To cheer my soul — a hope to bless —
A faith to strengthen and sustain
My spirit through its mortal pain, —
To comfort my long wretchedness!

„But I am feeble as a child —
I pine as one that wanteth bread;
And idly I repeat each word
Of holy import I have heard,
Or that in early creeds I said.

„But oh! my comfort cometh not!
And whether God is fixed in wrath
And will not heed my misery; —
Or whether he regardeth me,
I know not — gloomy is my path!“

With this arose old Elias Gray —
„My daughter, God hath left thee not!
He hath regarded thy complaint —
Hath seen thy spirit bruised and faint!
Thou art not of His love forgot.

„'T is by His arm I hither came —
Surely for this I heard a voice
Which bade me in my place ‚be still,‘
I came by his Almighty will,
And greatly doth my soul rejoice!“

He gave her comfort — gave her peace, —
And that lone daughter of despair
For very joy of heart shed tears;

---

*) [illegible]

And the dark agony of years
  Passed by, like a wild dream of care.

Thus was the old man's mission done;
  And she, who 'mong that forest race
Was wife and mother, won his life
From torture, from the scalping-knife,
  And sped him to his former place.

The Dream.

BY THE AUTHOR OF ,,PRIVATE LIFE, &c."

(Continued from our last.)

He leaned on Mr. Forrester for support, as he pointed to the earth, where the remains of a human form were distinctly visible.

Awe-struck and trembling, they stood for some minutes by the yawning grave in silence. Here a deed of darkness had been done. Here had been the fierce and fearful struggle, the groan of mortal agony, and then the deep unbroken silence of death. Years must have rolled away since, amidst the darkness and hush of night, the murderer had committed his victim to the cold silent earth. No human eye beheld that work—no human ear heard the quick throbbing of that guilty heart—no human being witnessed the startled terror of his glance, as he gazed wildly around, though his eye rested only on the dimpling brook, and the foliage sleeping softly beneath the calm moonbeam. No busy feet had trod that lone and unfrequented path—only the wandering gipsy now and then fixed his tent beneath the old oak, tempted by the sheltered quietness of the spot. For many a year had the harebell and pale primrose

,,Unheeded shed their blossoms," and the violet breathed its rich fragrance over that unsuspected grave. But the Eye of that Holy Being, which ,,slumbereth not,, neither sleepeth," beheld the ruthless deed—in His book the dark deed was inscribed, and now, at the same hour, amidst the darkness and the hush of night, at his bidding, the grave again gave up its dead, and the secret stood revealed.

,,Dreadful! most dreadful!" exclaimed Walton; ,,too surely the murderous deed was done—and by whom? Oh! the agony of that horrid thought!"

,,This appears, indeed, to be a conjunction as strange as it is fearful," observed Mr. Forrester, endeavouring to quiet his own feelings and those of his agitated companion; but we must take courage. He who has so obviously willed the discovery of this crime, has doubtless some hidden purpose of mercy to accomplish: to Him let us commit our way, in humble and holy confidence, assured that He will direct our path."

In haste and trepidation they again filled up the untimely grave, and returned to Ashgrove: much time, however, elapsed in the completion of their task; and ere they reached home, ,,fair Hesperus had spent his lamp." Faint streaks of red tinted the grey mists with morning light, growing brighter and more bright, till the sky was rich with burnished gold; then the jewelled earth glittered and sparkled in his beam; the fresh flowers, decked in living lustre, filled the air with fragrance, and a thousand notes of joy rung out from every thicket.

,,Up rose the gallant sun,"

,,Who can doubt," exclaimed Mr. Forrester, as he paused for a minute to look around on the bright and lovely scene, ,,that the mighty Hand which thus clothes the visible world in the splendour of light; which in a moment changes the dim and colourless earth into a scene of such surpassing beauty, can as easily unveil the hidden things of darkness, and bring to light the secret counsels of the heart? The Creator of ten thousand times ten thousand worlds disdains not to watch over that feeble insect," continued he, pointing to one which was just unfolding its newborn wings, and fluttering away its little hour of life beneath the morning beam. ,,He 'who calleth the stars by their names,' clothes the lily of the field, counts the leaves of the forest, and has declared that even the hairs of our head are numbered. And can the children of men hope to elude his vigilance, to veil their dark secrets from his piercing gaze? Is there a thought, a feeling, a wish framed in the human heart, which he perceiveth not? Oh! the inconceivable weakness, the utter folly of wickedness! ,He who made the eye, shall he not see? He who formed the ear, shall he not hear?' "

As he said this, they reached the gate of the rectory, and letting themselves in, passed into Mr. Forrester's study. There, Walton gave free scope to his agitated feelings.

„My perplexity is but increased by this dreadful discovery," said he; „my suspicions are darker and deeper than ever; but how can I act? Is it for me to denounce the man, who perilled his life for mine — who has spent the prime and vigour of his life in my service? Is it for me to bring his grey hairs with shame and ignominy to a dishonoured grave? No, never will I stir in the business — let it remain in all the darkness of mystery: yet I cannot see him without a shudder, without a feeling of indefinable horror and dread. Oh that he could be removed to some far distant land, where my eyes might never more behold him!"

„My dear Sir," returned Mr Forrester, „had our suspicions been excited by circumstances purely, or apparently accidental, we might perhaps have felt at liberty to proceed, or not, with the investigation: but certainly I may say without hesitation or superstition, that the more immediate hand of God is to be traced in this affair. We have yet no proof whatever of Cumming's guilt; we have only what appears strong presumption against him: but I have something to communicate, which I forbore to mention when I first listened to your dream, because I was unwilling to strengthen its impression unless corroborating proofs were obtained, though the circumstance recurred to my mind at the time with the most vivid and painful force.

„More than twenty-five years ago Susan Wilmot, the young person whom Cumming loved, lived in my service. She was a sprightly, gay, good-humoured girl, with rosy cheeks and laughing eyes — the belle and coquette of the village; and when the gossips of the parish let me into the secret that John Cumming was her suitor, he found warm advocates both with Mrs. Forrester and myself. We thought his steadiness and industry would form a happy counterpoise to the thoughtless simplicity of Susan; therefore John's lingering in the poultry yard or leaning over the gate for a long chat with her, appeared to us to be very happy omens. Every thing went on prosperously, till a young stranger came to our village, on a visit to some distant relations. Frank Gordon was an orphan; but gay, good-humoured, and careless as Susan herself, and soon rivalled John Cumming in her favour. Strange to say," continued Mr. Forrester, in a still lower tone, „this successful rival was a sailor."

Walton started, and shuddered.

„Well do I remember him!" resumed Mr. Forrester; „his countenance so full of youth, life, and glee! Imprudent as the whole business was, and while I gravely remonstrated, I could scarcely wonder at Susan. Though only twenty-one, he had made three voyages; and his talk of parrots and palm-trees, of bread-fruit and wild Indians, made the village annals of John Cumming appear stale, flat, and unprofitable.

„The lovers had golden hopes: he was to take a voyage,

> ,To make the crown a pound'

and in six months to return, and marry. Poor Susan wept abundantly when they parted; but her tears were ,forgot as soon as shed,' in the joyful hope of his return.

„Gradually, however, fear began to mingle with hope; for month after month passed and a line, not a word reached her. No tidings cheered the long, dull winter. Spring, summer, autumn, returned; then another long, dreary winter; and her bright hopes gradually faded into deep melancholy — she never doubted his truth — but

> ,Her fancy followed him through foaming waves
> To distant shores, and she would sit and weep
> At what a sailor suffers.'

„At length the hope that kept alive despair was all that remained to her. I made repeated inquiries, but it appeared that he had not sailed in the vessel which he had mentioned to Susan.

„It was concluded that he had entered on board another; but when or where, could never be ascertained. She became languid and dejected, and her health so visibly suffered, that it was thought desirable she should return to her friends, who lived in a distant county. For some months, we expected that she would be able to resume her place in our family, but her spirits were so entirely saddened, that it was considered best for her to remain at home—and many years have elapsed since we lost sight of her.

„All these circumstances considered—as a magistrate, I do not think myself justified in passing over the discovery of the body. I will not, however, act on my own judgment; this day a letter shall be dispatched to the Home Secretary, stating the circumstances, without mentioning names, and requesting advice upon the subject.“

„He saved my life“ reiterated Walton, covering his face with his hands, in unutterable anguish, „and I shall bring him to a shameful death!“

„Take courage, Walton,“ said Mr. Forrester. „Endeavour to calm this emotion; human sympathies, even the kindliest and the best, need control. ‚We dimly see‘ but a little part of the ways of God in this world. If Cumming be really guilty, doubt not that even the distressing circumstances, which at this moment bow your spirit to the earth, will be overruled for good. He whose mighty prerogative it is, to educe good from evil, is, no doubt, mysteriously and beautifully working out his own gracious ends. May not the repentance of the criminal need awakening or quickening? Will not agonies of shame in this world be the award of mercy, if they lead to deep contrition, if they teach him to cling to the cross of his Redeemer, and if from the depths of humiliation his pleadings for mercy rise to the throne of the eternal God? Remember, ‚duties are ours, events are His.‘“

The proposed letter was forwarded the following day; and in a short time a reply was received, recommending a private examination of the suspected person. John Cumming was therefore summoned to the rectory, where Walton, pale and agitated, was already prepared to meet him. John, concluding that the Rector had sent to talk to him on the subject of crops and cattle, entered the room, and stood before them in fearless confidence. His figure was tall, his cheek bronzed with health; but his grey locks, and a slight bend in the shoulders, showed that age was touching him, though gently.

„You and I are old acquaintance, John;“ said Mr. Forrester; „many a year has passed since we first met.“

„It is just five-and-twenty years since your reverence came to the rectory,“ returned John. „I remember it as well as if it was but yesterday.“

„I am glad to find your memory so tenacious,“ said Mr. Forrester, „for I have some important questions to put to you, about years long ago. Pray, have you any recollection of a young sailor, who passed some weeks here twenty-five years since, and who was never afterwards heard of?“

Mr. Forrester paused, but Cumming could not speak; he leaned for support on the back of a chair, grasping it eagerly with his hands.

„Your master has had a very extraordinary dream, which we believe to be connected with that individual,“ said the Rector; and without appearing to notice the emotion of his auditor, he proceeded to relate the circumstances, while Walton gazed on the changing countenance of Cumming, with agonizing intentness. John listened to the recital with breathless interest. At first, the convulsive quivering of his lip was all that indicated his secret emotion; but when the scene of the murder was detailed, and the spot and the struggle were described, his whole frame shook with agony; a mortal paleness spread over his face, his hands relaxed their grasp, and he fell into a death-like swoon.

Mr. Forrester and Walton placed him on a couch, and after the application of various remedies, a deep-drawn sigh evinced the return of consciousness; he opened his eyes, looked fearfully around, and in vain tried to speak. A cordial was administered, and after swallowing a few drops, he exclaimed —

„I am a doomed man! the hand of God is upon me.“

„Stop, Cumming, and listen to me,“ said Walton, eagerly. „I would give all I have in the world, to believe you innocent; but make no rash confession, and fear nothing from me. I solemnly pledge myself never to appear against you in this matter!“

„The hand of God is upon me,“ repeated Cumming, with a shudder, „and who can hinder it? My crime must be known to the whole world. I give myself up to justice. You shall hear all.“

It was a dark tale of jealousy and revenge. — He had followed the lovers secretly to their trysting-place, overheard the tender parting, the vow of constancy, the warm fond hope of a happy meeting. Maddened with fury, he breathed a vow that such a day of joy should never rise for them, and in a few hours sealed it by a deed of blood. He described the sort of malignant triumph, which mingled even in the keen agony of his remorse, when his victim lay motionless before him; the sudden, dreadful calm, which succeeded the tempest of his passion; the shuddering recoil with which he shrunk from the object of his love, and the dread of detection, which for years had haunted him, as a grim and fearful spectre.

To leave the neighbourhood had been his first impulse; but the fear of awakening suspicion determined him to remain, and endure conjectures, wonderings, and allusions, which made him sick at heart. He seemed barred and shut out from the sympathies and humanities of social life. But years rolled away, and pity and wonder died away also. That a sailor should perish of some distant coast, and be heard of no more, was no new event in the annals of human suffering; and except in the faithful heart of poor Susan, scarcely any remembrance of Frank Gordon was retained.

Gradually, the fears of Cumming had subsided, and a comparative calm had stolen over his feelings and conscience. True, it was a fearful crime, committed in an hour of intense passion, but he lived in the esteem and confidence of his fellow men, and no vial of wrath had been poured on his devoted head by the avenging hand of Providence. Every day, the remembrance of his crime became less acute and oppressive; and at length he began to look with something like complacency, on the honest industry, regularity, and usefulness of his life.

Mr. Forrester listened to the tale of his feelings with strong emotion. Never had he been more keenly sensible of his deep responsibility, as an „ambassador from God to guilty man.“ The comparative peace of Cumming's mind was exchanged for the agony, not only of remorse, but of terror; he believed that his earthly doom was fixed, as irrevocably as that of the guilty King, who saw his fearful condemnation inscribed by no mortal hand on the walls of his palace; and he fancied that a decree of eternal vengeance had gone forth against him. With desperate eagerness he surrendered himself to justice, repeating his confession to a neighbouring magistrate; and in a few days he had exchanged the cheerful home of his master for the dreary cell of a felon's prison.

Some weeks intervened before the trial came on. In spite of Walton's reiterated entreaties, Cumming resolved to plead guilty. His mind continued in a state of deep despondency; he believed, that like Cain, the first murderer, he was an object of abhorrence to God and man, branded by the hand of the Eternal; and that the shame and ignominy awaiting him on earth, were but preludes to the everlasting shame and contempt which would be poured on his devoted head hereafter.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 35.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS

OF THE

MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS

BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. W. R.

The Dream.

BY THE AUTHOR OF „PRIVATE LIFE,“ &c.

(Concluded from our last.)

Day after day, did Mr. Forrester devote hours to the unhappy man, listening with deep sympathy and patient tenderness, to the out-pourings of his harassed spirit. It was the Pastor's earnest desire to change the feelings and language of despair, to those of humble penitence; to prove, that in the midst of judgment, God remembers mercy; that even in this moment of utter desolation, amidst the chill and dreary darkness of that dungeon, a beam of heaven's own light could penetrate. Again, and again, he represented to the stricken man, that the judgments of God in this world, however severe, and though they may appear in a measure retributive, are still tempered with loving kindness and tender mercy; that correction, not vengeance, is their object; that they are intended, while they declare in the most emphatic language the watchful providence of God and his hatred of sin, to excite in the heart of the sinner, that repentance which shall not be repented of, — that they are, in fact, the work of love, that wondrous love, which willeth not that any should perish — which attaches unspeakable value to one immortal soul!

It was long, ere hope shed a beam over the tossed and troubled spirit of the criminal. Mr. Forrester, indeed, had no desire to check the salutary workings of penitence, to lull the soul with anodynes, which at once deaden the sense of sin, and bewilder rather than strengthen, the mind. It was when the sense of sin was felt in all its intenseness and poignancy — when, sunk to the depths of humiliation, the penitent scarcely dared to raise his eyes to heaven, but smote upon his breast, exclaiming, „God be merciful to me, a sinner;“ it was then that the Pastor dwelt upon the ineffable goodness of Him who came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, „to seek and to save that which was lost;“ it was then that he expatiated upon the touching instances of grace and mercy, recorded for our consolation and instruction in the book of Truth; that he pointed to the welcomed prodigal, to the dying thief, to the heavenly host rejoicing amidst the glory by which they are encircled, „over one sinner that repenteth.“

Hope at length dawned upon the soul of the criminal; comfort visited his heart. It was, however, a hope chastened by humility; a touching sense of the Redeemer's love, melting the heart to gratitude, but not kindling it to rapture.

Mr. Forrester did not desire to hear from his lips the language of that triumphant faith, which beholds the radiant crown prepared by the Lord, the righteous Judge: he did not desire to see the martyr's rapture, the saint's ecstatic joy: it was enough for him, that while his penitent was humbled under a consciousness of guilt, he was soothed by a sense of pardon.

On the awful day of trial, Cumming pleaded guilty. In vain did the Judge remonstrate, and declare that the law of England secured every possible indulgence to the accused.

„I am a murderer!" exclaimed Cumming. „God himself has borne witness to my crime, and I can say nothing but, Guilty!"

The sentence of the law was pronounced — and meekly did the criminal prepare for his awful doom. From that hour, his master scarcely ever left him: to talk with him, to read, and to pray by his side, were the only occupations that could at all soothe his own perturbed spirit. Confinement, and mental anguish, had wrought a considerable change on the frame of the prisoner; his form was bent, his cheek pale and thin, his eye dim; but the peace of a patient spirit sat upon his brow. He spoke of past days — of Walton's constant kindness — of the children, to whom his heart still clung; then his voice faltered, and a tear rolled down his furrowed cheek.

„They loved me," said he: „but the name of old John Cumming must now be a forbidden sound; it must never pollute their innocent lips. May God bless them!" continued he, clasping his withered hands: „may God bless them! now, and for ever!"

Then he spoke of the future, — calmly, hopefully. He could now recognise the hand of Mercy in the discovery of his crime. Had any vague suspicion been awakened, he felt that he might have plunged still deeper into guilt; had he been cut off suddenly by any fearful accident, some rapid disease, the future would have been all darkness and horror; and now he felt that there was hope — hope even for him.

„Yes, my poor friend," said Walton, fervently pressing his hand, during the last evening they were to pass together on earth, „we shall meet again, I trust, where anguish, such as I now feel, will be unknown, — where 'tears will be wiped from off all faces.'" Together they partook of the holy communion — and Cumming, exhausted by the emotions of the day, fell into a calm sleep.

With feelings of solemn awe, but not of terror, he awakened from that sleep; and after joining with Mr Forrester in devout prayer, awaited with fortitude the last awful summons. The moment arrived, and he was conducted to a spot at a short distance from the prison. A stillness, as of death, pervaded the immense concourse gathered around the scaffold. — Not a sound was breathed, as the old man slowly advanced, and cast a farewell glance around.

Once more he beheld the bright and blessed sun, careering through the joyous sky; once more the morning air, laden with fragrance, blew freshly round his temples, — and a thought of the past, of the smiling earth, the green hills and woods, where his footsteps would tread no more, was for a moment busy; it was but for a moment. — He felt the parting pressure of the good Pastor's hand; he heard his voice in fervent and sweet solemnity, pronounce the words — „I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord." Then did this world, its joys, and woes, fade from before his eyes; and the future, with its blessed hopes, its glorious certainties, opened to his view, and calmed and sustained his parting soul.

A few minutes elapsed, and all was over — the awful penalty claimed by human and Divine justice, was paid; and the repentant and ransomed spirit returned to the God who gave it.

The golden Cup and the Dish of Silver.

By Thomas Hood.

Every one knows what a dog's life the miserable Jews lead all over the world, but especially amongst the Turks, who plunder them of their riches, and slay them on the most frivolous pretences. Thus, if they acquire any wealth, they are obliged to hide it in holes and corners, and to snatch their scanty enjoyments by stealth, in recompense of the buffets and contumely of their turbaned oppressors.

In this manner lived Yusouf, a Hebrew of great wealth and wisdom, but, outwardly, a poor beggarly druggist, inhabiting, with his wife, Anna, one of the meanest houses in Constantinople. The curse of his nation had often fallen bitterly upon his head; his great skill in medicine procuring him some uncertain favour from the Turks, but on the failure of his remedies, a tenfold proportion of ill-usage and contempt. In such cases, a hundred blows on the soles of his feet were his common payment; whereas on the happiest cures, he was often dismissed with empty hands and some epithet of disgrace.

As he was sitting one day at his humble door, thinking over these miseries, a Janizary came up to him, and commanded Yusouf to go with him to his Aga or captain, whose palace was close at hand. Yusouf's gold immediately weighed heavy at his heart, as the cause of this summons; however, he arose obediently, and followed the soldier to the Aga, who was sitting cross-legged on a handsome carpet, with his long pipe in his mouth. The Jew, casting himself on his knees, with his face to the floor, began, like his brethren, to plead poverty in excuse for the meanness of his appearance, but the Aga interrupting him, proceeded to compliment him in a flattering strain on his reputation for wisdom, which he said had made him desirous of his conversation. He then ordered the banquet to be brought in; whereupon the slaves put down before them some wine, in a golden cup, and some pork, on a dish of silver; both of which were forbidden things, and therefore made the Jew wonder very much at such an entertainment. The Aga then pointing to the refreshments addressed him as follows: —

„Yusouf, they say you are a very wise and learned man, and have studied deeper than any one the mysteries of nature. I have sent for you, therefore, to resolve me on certain doubts concerning this flesh, and this liquor before us, the pork being as abominable to your religion, as the wine is unto ours. But I am especially curious to know the reasons why your prophet should have forbidden a meat, which by reports of the Christians is both savoury and wholesome; wherefore I will have you to proceed first with that argument and, in order that you may not discuss it negligently, I am resolved in case you fail to justify the prohibition, that you shall empty the silver dish before you stir from the place. Nevertheless, to show you that I am equally candid, I promise, if you shall thereafter prove to me the unreasonableness of the injunction against wine, I will drink of this golden goblet as frankly before we part."

The terrified Jew understood very readily the purpose of this trial; however, after a secret prayer to Moses, he began in the best way he could to plead against the abominable dish that was steaming under his nostrils. He failed, notwithstanding, to convince the sceptical Aga, who, therefore, commanded him to eat up the pork, and then begin his discourse in favour of the wine.

The sad Jew, at this order, endeavoured to move the obdurate Turk by his tears; but the Aga was resolute, and drawing his crooked cimetar, declared, „that if Yusouf did not instantly fall to, he would smite his head from his shoulders."

It was time, at this threat, for Yusouf to commend his soul unto Heaven, for in Turkey the Jews wear their heads very loosely; however, by dint of fresh tears and supplications he obtained a respite of three days, to consider if he could not bring forward any further arguments.

As soon as the audience was over, Yusouf returned disconsolately to his house, and informed his wife Anna of what had passed between him and the Aga. The poor woman foresaw clearly how the matter would end; for it was aimed only at the confiscation of their riches. She advised Yusouf, therefore, instead of racking his wits for fresh arguments, to carry a bag of gold to the Aga, who condescended to receive his ransom; and after another brief discourse, to grant him a respite of three days longer. In the same manner, Yussuf procured a further interval, but somewhat dearer; so that in despair at losing his money at this rate, he returned for the fourth time to the palace.

The Aga and Yussuf being seated as before, with the mess of pork and the wine between them, the Turk asked, if he had brought any fresh arguments. The doctor replied, „Alas! he had already discussed the subject so often, that his reasons were quite exhausted;" whereupon the flashing cimeter leaping quickly out of its scabbard, the trembling Hebrew plucked the loathsome dish towards him, and with many struggles began to eat.

It cost him a thousand wry faces to swallow the first morsel; and from the laughter that came from behind a silken screen, they were observed by more watchers besides the Aga, who took such a cruel pleasure in the amusement of his women, that Yussuf was compelled to proceed even to the licking of the dish. He was then suffered to depart, without wasting any logic upon the cup of wine, which after his loathsome meal he would have been quite happy to discuss.

I guess not how the Jew consoled himself besides for his involuntary sin, but he bitterly cursed the cruel Aga and all his wives who could not amuse their indolent lives with their dancing-girls and tale-tellers, but made merry at the expense of his soul. His wife joined heartily in his imprecations; and both putting ashes on their heads, they mourned and cursed together till the sunset. There came no Janizary, however, on the morrow, as they expected; but on the eighth day, Yussuf was summoned again to the Aga.

The Jew at this message began to weep, making sure, in his mind, that a fresh dish of pork was prepared for him; however, he repaired obediently to the palace, where he was told, that the favourite lady of the harem was indisposed, and the Aga commanded him to prescribe for her. Now, the Turks are very jealous of their mistresses, and disdain, especially, to expose them to the eyes of infidels, of whom the Jews are held the most vile; — wherefore, when Yussuf begged to see his patient, she was allowed to be brought forth only in a long white veil, that reached down to her feet. The Aga, notwithstanding the folly of such a proceeding, forbade her veil to be lifted; neither would he permit the Jew to converse with her, but commanded him on pain of death to return home and prepare his medicines.

The wretched doctor, groaning all the way, went back to his house, without wasting a thought on what drugs he should administer on so hopeless a case; but considering, instead, the surgical practice of the Aga, which separated so many necks. However, he told his wife of the new jeopardy he was placed in for the Moorish Jezabel.

„A curse take her!" said Anna; „give her a dose of poison, and let her perish before his eyes."

„Nay," answered the Jew, „that will be to pluck the sword down upon our own heads; nevertheless, I will cheat the infidel's concubine with some wine, which is equally damnable to their souls; and may God visit upon their conscience the misery they have enforced upon mine?"

In this bitter mood, going to a filthy hole in the floor, he drew out a flask of schiraz; and bestowing as many Hebrew curses on the liquor, as the Mussulmen are wont to utter of blessings over their medicines, he filled up some physic bottles, and repaired with them to the palace.

And now let the generous virtues of good wine be duly lauded for the happy sequel!

The illness of the favourite, being merely a languor and melancholy, proceeding from the voluptuous indolence of her life, the draughts of Yussuf soon dissipated her chagrin, in such a miraculous manner, that she sang and danced more gaily than any of her slaves. The Aga, therefore, instead of beheading Yussuf, returned to him all the purses of gold he had taken; to which the grateful lady, besides, added a valuable ruby; and, thenceforward, when she was ill, would have none but the Jewish physician.

Thus, Yussuf saved both his head and his money; and, besides, convinced the Aga of the virtues of good wine; so that the golden cup was finally emptied, as well as the dish of silver.

Stray Leaves.

Oh! the past — the past! Why has man so many artificial modes of tormenting his own heart? By what law of his moral nature is it that that which is gone seems ever brighter than that which is present? Why is it that (apart from all which may have been won and lost in the meantime, — apart from all the hopes that made the past beautiful, and all the regrets that darken the present) the days that are gone seem ever to have been better than the days which are with us? It is with the ages of man as with the ages of the world, — the early scenes are ever better than the succeeding ones, and the earliest the best. It is in this very distance itself, says St. Evremond, that consist the gold and silver of which, at our pleasure, we compose the ages that are past.

It is with the moral as with the natural world. It is not amid the serenity of fortune, it is not in the unshaded light of noon, that the sublime of the one or the other is to be sought. Amid the mingled light and shadow which compose sunrise, the grandest combinations are formed; from the struggle of adverse or doubtful fortune, the loftiest morals are gathered. The doubt and the darkness, the shadow and the cloud, make the glory and the beauty! The moral and the natural light, in their essence and abstraction, are, alike, things too pure and bright and spiritual to be contemplated or understood by the eye of the body or the mind. It is only when they have some medium to act upon, some sorrow or difficulty to struggle with, some cloud to gild, that their glory and their beauty can be sensibly felt, and in part understood.

Oh! Beautiful! how very fair is thine image in the eye of memory! and how thy going away has changed all things for me. The bright and the beautiful lie still about — still bright and beautiful even to me; but in another manner than when thou wert here! All fair things have a look, and all sweet sounds a tone, of mourning since thou leftest me. How long it seems! — as if ages, instead of months of the grave had grown between us! — as if, indeed, I had known thee in some former and far removed state of being! I do not love to think of thee as dead. I think of thee rather as one whom I have left behind in the sunny and quiet valley of our youth and our love — from whom I have wandered forth, and lost my way amid the mazes of the world. But, oh! how little even that delusion can avail me, when it is saddened by the thought that I can never, never, never recover the youth which should lead me back to thee! There may have been fairer (sweeter, never!) things than thou in the world, but my heart could never be made to believe or understand it. Had I known thee only in the world, I might not have marked thy beauty; but thou wert with me when the world left me. In the flood of the sunshine, when a thousand birds are singing about us, we go upon our way, with a sense that there is melody around, but singling, perchance, not one note, to take home to the heart and make a worship of. But the one bird that sings to us in the dim and silent night, oh! none can know how dear its song becomes, filling with its music all the deserted mansions of the lonely soul. But the bird is dead — the song is hushed — and the bowers of my spirit are empty and silent and desolate!

The sun is, at each moment, rising upon some part of the world, and setting in another. We have but to change our horizons, — could we travel quickly enough, — to keep him always in view. There is no such thing, in truth, as sunshine or sunrise, but with reference to our fettered selves. It is not until we can learn to abstract self from the investigations which we follow, and the judgments which they form, that we can arrive at just views and sound conclusions, moral or natural.

However unseen or unnoted, the spirit of sadness is ever present, even by the side of joy. It haunts the natural world — it were but a truism to say it pervades the moral. Who ever found himself in the immediate presence of nature without a feeling of sadness, — even in youth, before the sadness lifts up its voice from the chambers of his own heart? Why is it that shouts of laughter, heard in the distance, come sadly on the ear? Why is it that echoes, when the sounds that gave them birth were bursts of gladness, are ever sad? It is the natural spirit of sadness which dwells in all things, making itself heard to those who are far enough removed from the exciting sentiment which gave birth to the shout and the laugh, to listen to its „still — small voice!"

They who have earnestly wished, must have deeply doubted. There is no hope where there is no fear. The absence of fear or doubt leaves certainty. It is no paradox, though it may seem one, to say that fear is an essential constituent of hope. Remove fear from the mind's workings, and what remains is something more than hope. Let in fear again, and the antagonist principle, which is called hope, comes at once to combat it. They have never panted after good who have not feared evil.

I know not how to describe the effect which the reflections of a single night have produced on my mind. Though I parted from her only yesterday, already I have learnt to think of her as of one separated from me by a long age of absence and death; — as if it were long since I had beheld her, — as if I gazed upon her from a far distance, across the lengthened and dreary alleys of the valley of the dead! She is yet, physically speaking, within my reach; and yet is she to me as if the tomb or the cloister had received her, and made of her (what the world or the grave makes of all things we have loved) a dream of the night — a phantom of the imagination — an angel of the memory — a creation of the hour of shadows! Whatever may be her future fortunes — however her name may, hereafter, be borne to my mortal ear, my heart will ever refuse to picture her but as one who died in her youth!

To you I send a final farewell, — and it is uttered in all the simplicity of sorrow and of love! I recommend you — Lucy and you — to the protection of Him who watches over the birds of the air, and clothes, with a beauty passing the glory of Solomon, the lilies of the field. None will learn with more joy than he whom she has deserted, that Lucy shall have added to the charms with which nature has endowed her, the charms which fortune can bestow. Yet would I rather she should remember that those very natural graces, those charms which she shares with the lilies, have been pronounced (by an authority paramount for her and me) above all the riches and all the pomp of the richest and most splendid of all the monarchs of the rich and splendid East — before his kingly crown, his poet-laurel, and his reputation as a sage; — and that the gift of a pure, simple, loving, and faithful heart, is worth more than all that can be purchased by its sacrifice. I carry away with me new blossoms and new regrets; wretched hitherto, in that all my lessons have been for me but so many regrets: happy, perchance, in the end, if all my regrets shall turn into so many lessons.

A letter! — alas! a letter is but a feeble consolation for the absence of one who is beloved. Surely separation must be a heavy evil, when we are obliged to felicitate ourselves on a consolation so imperfect and so sad. I know not if there be more of joy or sorrow in the receipt of a letter from the dearly loved — if it should be most properly said to communicate a painful pleasure or a pleasing pain. These may sound the same to the ear, but the heart knows well that it makes much difference which shall be the substantive and which the adjective. A letter is ever a witness of the absence which renders it necessary, — at the same time that it represents very feebly the presence for which the spirit pines. And is it not sad to read of sentiments which may be dead ere we have heard of their existence; and to receive assurances which are no assurance for the heart, — because time may have overthrown all which they promise by the moment when they reach us. Two fond hearts, separated by distance, exist not, if I may use the expression, at the same time. One is ever in arrear of the other, and the good announced is, even at the time of its announcement, a good gone by! A letter, too, must always want that communion of sentiment, that commingling of feeling, which makes so much of the charm of personal communications — that sympathy, which increases emotion in sharing it, and is like the incommunicable odour of flowers. You, my cousin, may copy for me the form and the colours of the rose which Henry may have placed in your bosom in the springtime of the year and of your loves, — but who shall paint for me the perfume which is its greatest charm — the mystery of its enchantment, the spirit of its beauty? It is no more to be traced by mortal pen or pencil, my cousin, than is the feeling with which it was placed, by Love's own hand, in its sweet resting-place!

It is strange how I have been haunted by the airs which you used to sing me. Sometimes, in the silent night, when broken snatches of melodies, imperfectly remembered, steal through the chambers of my heart, — even in the sweet tones in which it learnt to love them, — I ask myself if our love shall be like these passing and half-forgotten melodies! — If the time shall ever come when it shall be like an old song, learnt in life's happier day, — and whose memory has been treasured to make us weep in the years when the heart has ceased to be soothed by weeping! Shall there ever be a time when I shall pronounce, — no, not pronounce — that would not be! — but hear your name, as the name of a stranger? Oh! forgive me, but I am far from you, and I am ill and sad! How truly may we be said to live but in the past and the future — to have our beings made up of memory and hope — for which the present is little better than a void! And alas! is it not true, as a consequence, that the more they are occupied with memory, the less room have they for hope. Ambition, the one is ever gaining upon the other, — and the dark waters of memory are hourly spreading upon that shore where hope had been to build her edifices and play about them — till at length they cover all, — and hope, having "no room for the sole of her foot," flies forward to a higher and a better shore!

Hope! alas! by what fatality have I ever more found myself in a country, and learning its hope, ever so fatal for me? By a retribution which has never failed me, the fault here with itself its own punishment; the death of hope has been the price which I was destined to pay for the weakness of having permitted its birth! How many harps have been tuned in honour of hope; and, yet, what, on this dim earth, is it worth, — save only to make us long for that better country where it has no existence, because its place is occupied by certainty! It is the source of many sorrows, — the beautiful parent of deformed and mourning children. For myself, I have never wept, but because I had hoped. For me, the bud has ever perished ere it could blow to a flower! And yet I cannot resist the voice of the charmer, who charmeth "not wisely, but too well!" I cannot but feed the golden-plumaged bird that comes singing to my window, though I know that he will use his bright plumage but to leave me. Hope — eternal hope! — ever departing and ever returning — the heart's spreading tide — ever ebbing, but to flow again — overflowing, only that it may ebb — the true

Proteus, filling a thousand shapes — the veritable Metempsychosis, perishing in one form, but to be reproduced in another — undying and eternal in its essence — most mortal and mutable in its combinations!

The Mother.

Happy woman, who hast bound
Love within a magic round
Of home duties, and the ties
Of thy true heart's sympathies!
What to thee is daily care,
Early waking, homely fare,
Arduous toils, and watchings late —
What? — Thy being's careful state,
That which makes thee what thou art,
Beautiful, and pure of heart!
God hath given thee to fulfil,
Duties: and thy cheerful will
Doeth well the part assigned:
  And thy days of labour hard
  Bring abundant, rich reward,
Strength of body, peace of mind!

Woman, oft to such as thee,
With thy calm, maternal brow,
With thy heart, whose holy spring
Knows no wild disquieting,
Do I look, even with a sense
Of admiring reverence:
  With a wish, that I, like thee,
Had no restless yearnings fond
Towards what is our grasp beyond —
Had no eagle thought impelling
Onward, upward — that the welling
  Of my soul's strong tide would be Like thine own, a stream that flows
Ever, yet no tumult knows.
Blessing to the Power benign,
Who warms that mother's heart of thine,
  And hath made thy soul's delight
  Thine own children in thy sight,
  And doth give, like morning dew,
  The goods thy spirit clings unto!
  Blessing be to God! for he
  Hath many mothers made like thee,
  Holy spirits, whose calm worth,
  Like spring sunbeams on the earth,
Makes a bliss where'er it shone!

Go, thou happy one, and cast
  Light thy children's home around:
Fame has nothing that can last
  Like the peace thy heart has found!
Go, thou art not poor, though lowly,
Thy life's wealth is duty holy;
And the countless joys that rise
From thy heart's warm charities,
These are better than the blind
Dreamings of a stranger mind.

MARY HOWITT.

The Alps at Day-break.

The sunbeams streak the azure skies,
And line with light the mountain's brow;
With hounds and horns the hunters rise,
And chase the roebuck through the snow.

From rock to rock, with giant bound,
High on their iron poles they pass;
Mute, lest the air, convuls'd by sound,
Rend from above a frozen mass.

The goats wind slow their wonted way,
Up craggy steeps and ridges rude;
Mark'd by the wild wolf for his prey,
From desert cave or hanging wood.

And while the torrent thunders loud,
And as the echoing cliffs reply,
The huts peep o'er the morning cloud,
Perch'd like an eagle's nest, on high.

ROGERS.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 36.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Leigh Hunt.

Dieſer in der Geſchichte der neueſten engliſchen Literatur oft erwähnte talentvolle Schriftſteller iſt der Sohn eines Geiſtlichen der engliſchen Kirche und ward am 19ten October 1784 zu Southgate in Middleſex geboren. Er erhielt ſeine erſte wiſſenſchaftliche Bildung im Chriſthospital, ging aber nicht zur Univerſität, da ein Fehler in ſeinem Sprachorgan, den er ſpäter glücklich beſiegte, ihn davon zurückhielt. Auf der Schule zeichnete er ſich durch Lebhaftigkeit aus, dagegen bewies er nur geringen Fleiß und ſeine Ausarbeitungen (Verſe ausgenommen, wo er gewöhnlich noch ein Mal ſo viel als aufgegeben war, lieferte), fielen meiſt ſo ſchlecht aus, daß ſie der Lehrer in der Hand zuſammen zu drücken und den anderen Schülern als Spielball hinzuwerfen pflegte.

Nach dem betrat Hunt ſchon früh die Laufbahn eines politiſchen Schriftſtellers und war einer der erſten Vorkämpfer für die Reform, die er mit größtem Eifer verfocht, und für welche er Leiden aller Art dulden mußte, ohne daß ihm ſpäter der verdiente Lohn dafür geworden wäre. Ein Artikel in der Zeitſchrift: „The Examiner,“ welche unter ſeiner Leitung ſtand, zog ihm, da derſelbe für ein Pasquill auf den Prinz Regenten erklärt wurde, Gefängnißſtrafe zu. Während dieſer Zeit entſpann ſich ſeine Bekanntſchaft mit Lord Byron, deſſen Weſen und Thun er ſpäter zu ſeinem eigenen Nachtheil ſo ungünſtig ſchilderte, was ihm um ſo mehr verargt wurde, als er dem edeln Lord Verbindlichkeiten ſchuldig war. In jener Zeit wurde ſein in den Journalen viel beſprochener Name auch bei uns bekannter, als er es ſeitdem geblieben iſt. Er kehrte nach längerem Verweilen in Italien nach England zurück und lebt dort gegenwärtig als Journaliſt beſchäftigt.

Als Dichter zeichnet er ſich aus durch Wärme, Friſche, lebhaftes Gefühl, Einfachheit und offene Herzlichkeit; die älteren engliſchen Dichter ſo wie die italieniſchen Novelliſten ſcheinen ſeine Vorbilder zu ſein. Dies verleitet ihn jedoch mitunter zu geſchwätzig, ja ſelbſt affectirt zu werden, auch redet er zu oft und gern von ſich ſelbſt. Ohne dieſe Fehler würde er ſich den begabteſten Geiſtern ſeiner Nation zugeſellen können, namentlich enthält ſein Gedicht, Francesca da Rimini, große und bedeutende Schönheiten.

Der Vergleichung wegen wird es unſeren Leſern nicht ohne Intereſſe ſein, zu ſehen, wie er denſelben Stoff, den Schiller in ſeinem „Handſchuh“ behandelte, bearbeitet hat. Die Art und Weiſe, mit der er denſelben ganz verſchieden von unſerem großen Dichter auffaßte und durchführte, verdient ihrer Originalität wegen, nicht geringes Lob. Sein Gedicht möge hier folgen.

The Glove and the Lions.

King Francis was a hearty king and lov'd a royal sport,
And one day as his lions fought, sat looking on the court;
The nobles fill'd the benches round, the ladies by their side,
And 'mongst them sat the Count de Lorge, with one for whom he sigh'd:

And truly 'twas a gallant thing to see that crowning show,
Valour and love, and a king above, and the royal beasts below

Ramp'd and roar'd the lions, with horrid laughing jaws;
They bit, they glared, gave blows like beams, a wind went with their paws;
With wallowing might and stifled roar, they roll'd on one another,
Till all the pit, with sand and mane, was in a thunderous smother;
The bloody foam above the bars came whisking through the air;
Said Francis, then: „Faith, gentlemen we're better here than there."

De Lorge's love o'erheard the king, a beauteous lively dame,
With smiling lips and sharp bright eyes, which always seem'd the same;
She thought: The count my lover is as brave as brave can be —
He surely would do wond'rous things to show his love of me.
King, ladies, lovers all look on; the occasion is divine, —
I'll drop my glove, to prove his love; great glory will be mine.

She dropp'd her glove, to prove his love, then look'd at him and smil'd;
He bow'd and in a moment leap'd among the lions wild:
The leap was quick, return was quick, he has regain'd the place,
Then threw the glove, but not with love, right in the lady's face.
„By God!" cried Francis," rightly done!" and he rose from where he sat;
„No love" quoth he, „but vanity sets love a task like that.

La Bella Tabaccaja.

By Leigh Hunt.

Nina was an orphan, and, at the age of fifteen, mistress of a snuff and tobacco shop in Pisa, under the discreet guidance of an aunt, who boarded and lodged with her by virtue of her experience. The stock in trade, a little ready money, and two houses in the suburbs of Leghorn, were her patrimony. She had the fairest complexion with the darkest ringlets that ever were formed together; and though no one ever criticised her lips as rather too full, yet some fastidious admirers objected to the largeness of her eyes — but they could not have remarked their lustre and expression, nor the beautiful jet lashes which shaded them. She was called La Bella Tabaccaja. The students of the University, as they returned from lecture, always peeped in the shop, to see if Nina was behind the counter; and, if she was, nine out of ten walked in and asked for segars. There they lighted them one after another at the pan of charcoal, and by turns, puffing awhile for invention, ventured on some gallant compliments. If these were received with a smile, as they generally were, and often more roguishly than would be considered within the rules of a bench of old English ladies, then away they went to strut on the Lungarno with a much gayer notion of themselves. The grave ones of the neighbourhood thought it a pity she could encourage such idle talk; and the aunt constantly advised her to go into the inner room, whenever those wild young fellows made their appearance. But Nina had all the vivacity, the joyousness of youth, almost of childhood, and defended herself by saying, „La' aunt, there can be no harm in their merriment; for my mother used to tell me, young men with serious faces were the only dangerous ones." And the mother's authority never failed in silencing the aunt.

Late one evening, a student entered while Nina was alone in the shop. After a single glance, he sat down by the side of the counter, took up a knife, that lay there, and began seemingly to play with it, but with a countenance that betrayed the most violent agitation. The poor girl, never having witnessed any thing like despair, imagined he was intoxicated; and, as the safest means of avoiding insult, remained firmly in her place. On a sudden, the youth, grasping the knife in his hand, seized her by the hair, and threatened death if she did not immediately, and without a word or a scream, give him her money. Instead of complying, quietly and on the instant, in her fright she shrieked for help, and struggled with him. Had not the youth felt a touch of pity, even in that moment of frenzy, she would have been destroyed. For her struggles were in vain, and the knife was at her bosom, when some passengers, hearing her cries, together with the neighbours from the adjoining houses, ran in and seized him. Without further question, they placed him in the hands of the officers, who led him directly to the police, and Nina was required to follow. Her evidence was written down, and she was ordered to sign the paper. To this she complied, with no other thought than that she had not been guilty of the slightest exaggeration. As she laid down the pen, the officer assured her she might rely on the utmost redress for such an outrage; as her evidence was not only the clearest, but it completely tallied with the prisoner's confession; and ended with — „Be under no apprehension, my good girl, for you will shortly see him in yellow," alluding to the colour which those convicts wear who are sentenced to hard labour for life. It was not till these words were uttered that she, still trembling in her fears, had once reflected on the punishment; when starting as she heard them, she looked piteously in the officer's face, and said, „I hope not, sir; he has not robbed me — not hurt me — not in the least. Pray let me have that paper again; and I — I am sorry I came here — indeed I am!" She was told he was now in the hands of the law, and it was neither in her power, nor in theirs, to release him; and that as it was the law, not the individual, that punished a criminal, she need not accuse herself, in the slightest degree, of severity, whatever his sentence might be. Incapable of replying to this argument, she could do nothing but repeat her request for the paper, when she was answered by a smile, and told she was quite a child. „Do, do give me that paper," she continued, „let nothing more happen; if I can pardon him, why cannot you?" At this she was called a silly child. Nina looked round for the prisoner; but he had been led to his dungeon. „O God!" she cried, „how unhappy does this make me! I know, sir, I am, as you say, a child; but can you make a child so miserable?" The officer then spoke with greater kindness, reasoning on the impossibility of his yielding, and thus she was dismissed.

The aunt was waiting at home in a thousand ecstacies at so providential an escape from a robber and a murderer; to all which Nina scarcely replied, but went to her pillow weeping, „and pity, like a naked new-born babe," lay in her bosom. Thus in two short hours was the laughing gaiety of this young creature gone for ever. She was the means, it mattered not how innocently, of driving a fellow-being into wretchedness and infamy. That her sorrow was unreasonable, few, perhaps, will deny. However, Nina had never learned to take enlarged views of the duties of citizenship; nor did it once enter her head to ask herself whether she was right or wrong. Before sunrise the old lady was surprised at being wakened by her niece, and to see her hastily dressing herself to go once more to the police. This created a long discussion. „Well, well," said the niece, „I will go alone; but then I can have little hope. You, aunt, that know the world, may find some method of softening the hearts of these cruel officers. I have but one friend now that both my parents are dead; and sure she will not refuse the first earnest prayer I make!" This appeal could not be withstood. Nina ran to the looking-glass, to put on her bonnet, when she perceived several bruises on her neck, the marks of his rude hands, — they would be observed, and could not be mistaken. Instantly inquiring if it was not rather chilly that morning, she at the same time without waiting for an answer, took up a large shawl, pinned it close under her chin, and then waited, in the mildest manner in the world, for her friend.

At a very early hour the convicts employed to clean the streets begin their labour. When Nina arrived at the corner of the Borgo, she heard the clanking of their chains; and clinging with both hands on her aunt's arm, remained motionless while they slowly passed. Though accustomed to the sight from her infancy, she now, for the first time, regarded them attentively. They were accompanied, as usual, by their guards armed with muskets and cutlasses, and came heavily chained together in couples; the two first with brooms, followed by those who drag on a cart, and then two others with their shovels. One was clothed in yellow, the girl looked at him with tears in her eyes. „I never thought,“ said she, „these men were so wretched!“ „Santa Maria!“ exclaimed the aunt, „and what did you think? Would you have them as comfortable as good Christians like ourselves? You will see, as I told you before, the gentlemen of the police will call me a simpleton for going to them on such an errand.“ In this she was mistaken; nobody noticed her. Nina's earnestness astonished the officers. They had never seen or heard of any thing of the like, and could not understand it. That she should be in love with the prisoner was out of the question, as it appeared in her evidence his person was unknown to her until the evening before; and a young woman never makes a present of her heart (so they argued) to a ruffian who comes to take it with a knife. In the absence, therefore, of this suspicion, she seemed of a more human, if not a more heavenly nature, than any saint in the calendar. And as they sympathised in her distress — for how could they help it? — their compassion was startled into something favourable to all sorts of criminals. The worst was, they could not grant her request.

It is high time to talk of our student—poor Gaetano in his dungeon! He had been noted by the professors for his application at the University, and endeared to his companions by his never failing cheerfulness and good temper. What a dreary change! And he was the favourite of his father, who, though not rich, still represented, with some attempts at dignity, an ancient family in Pistoia. Young Gaetano's story, I am sorry to own it, is a very bad one; as it bears a resemblance to that doleful tragedy, George Barnwell. Italians, to their praise be it spoken, seldom put faith in that love which is to be purchased by costly presents — they know better; yet when guilty of such folly, their extravagance is often boundless. It was so with this youth. After having, on every possible pretence, obtained money from his father, and lavished it on his Milwood, she began to put on her cold looks; then, in a short time, her door was closed against a penniless suitor. Why he attacked Nina seemed inexplicable. Had Pisa no respected Signor, with a heart as full of self-complacency as his pockets were of money, walking in his own orchard, and moralizing on his own goodness? It is certain, however, none but this innocent, defenceless girl struck his brain at that desperate moment. Perhaps there was a feeling of revenge against the sex. Your only true woman-hater is he who becomes trammelled in the magic of one whom his reason bids him despise. If this hint at an explanation should be objected to, I willingly refer the whole case to a general assembly of Scotch metaphysicians — they can settle every thing. My business is with facts. When Nina heard the story, she pitied him more than ever; and if this is sneered at as an immodest kind of pity among the courtly virtuous, let her inexperience in their ways be considered in her favour. So deep an impression did it make on her mind, that it stamped her character for ever. Instead of a laughing, thoughtless girl, she became, at once, a woman. Her brow was more tranquil, a milder brightness shone in her eyes, a far sweeter smile played upon her lips. Happiness, she thought, should not be divided; and, as the thought came over her, not a living being but shared in her sensibility. There is not a greater mistake than to imagine the characters of either sex are formed solely by the first impulses of love. Any of the passions, if thoroughly roused, or even pain of body, will have the same effect, and sometimes at a very early age. Grief, as I myself have witnessed, will act like inspiration; suddenly converting a childish docility in a lad into a manly fortitude and self-decision. The soul of Nina was awakened by the throbs of pity.

The trial came on; Gaetano's father hastened to Pisa, busy with his advocates in the defence of his son, but without seeing him. Insanity was attempted to be proved. Every effort availed nothing. When pronounced guilty, the father returned to Pistoia, thanking Heaven he had yet another son, and he should be his heir — a boy whom hitherto he had scarcely noticed, and who was at that time educating for the Church. Nina did better; she privately went to the houses of the Judges, and knelt before them, and implored the most lenient sentence. Whether her intercession was of some value, or whether there appeared to be more of passion than depravity in the prisoner, the sentence was certainly milder than was expected — three years hard labour.

When Gaetano appeared among the other convicts, every body ran to Nina and officiously pointed him out. Without some information it is probable she never would have recognized him. He passed before her door with that dull eye which those who have any shame instinctively acquire, seeing, as it were, every thing and nothing at the same time. She gazed at him fearfully and solemnly by turns, but did not utter a syllable. Always to see, or what is the same thing to the imagination, always to be liable to see, a fellow-creature who has injured us, suffering for his crime in toil and in chains, must, after awhile, excite the compassion of the sternest. It may be supposed that Nina's humanity could not have endured it. Not so; instead of avoiding him, she would walk through those parts of the city were he was employed, and frequently cross before him, in the hope of attracting his attention, merely that he might see how sorrowful she was, and then, she thought, she would be happier. But when, after some time, she suspected — (and the reader cannot but be prepared for so natural a transition) — there were other emotions in her bosom of a more tender nature than pity, she feared to watch him but from a distance. It ought not to create surprise, that as she could never drive him from her mind, he should win her heart even in a convict's clothes; though possibly in the gayest dress, and with the handsome lively countenance for which he was once admired, he might not have raised the slightest interest in her affections.

Still she retained the name of La Bella Tabaccaja; yet it was commonly followed by a whisper that once she was far more beautiful; and indeed her cheeks and her lips grew paler every day. This, together with the change of expression in her features, and her always choosing the earliest hour to go to mass, gave rise to many rumours. Some asserted she had been shamefully deserted by some one whom nobody knew; others, that she looked forward in terror towards the day when her enemy was to be released; and others, that she lived in constant dread of assassination — among which last was her wise aunt. Only one person, a lover of Nina's, discovered the secret; and he, as he has often declared, traced in her artless conduct the gradual progress of her love for Gaetano; from the first moment she saw him in the street. This may be going too far back, — yet it is no matter. He behaved generously, nobly to her, carefully avoiding to hint at his discovery, and offering his services to alleviate the hardships of his rival's fate. What a delight to speak of him! I wish I might give his name! Money is sometimes slipped into the hands of the convicts by their friends, while the guards pretend not to observe it, or turn their eyes another way. This was attempted by that young man with Gaetano, but nothing could induce him to receive it. To every offer of kindness he neither replied nor evinced by his manner that the words were understood. He was told that Nina was unhappy, and still he retained the same lethargic look. Every sense, his very soul, appeared to be fettered more heavily than his limbs. Failing in this, the young man visited the prison, and hoped to afford some relief to Nina in speaking of the attention paid to their health and cleanliness; and he described the discipline within the walls, not more severe than the mildest government could suggest; and Nina, as she listened to him, silently laid her cheek upon his hand. She, too, in her evening walks, would lead her aunt towards the Ponte a mare; and there lean upon the parapet, as if watching the rushing of the Arno through the arches. The prison stands at the end of the bridge. At the Ave Maria she heard them at their prayers; and sometimes her ear was startled at loud singing and laughter through the barred windows; for men, whether in a prison or a palace, however wretched their crimes or their follies ought to make them, will still, as in defiance, give loose to a wild jollity; and alas! it is the only enjoyment that remains for them.

The three years crawled drearily away, and at last the hour arrived for Gaetano to be set at liberty. A parcel was left for him at the prison door, with a message that it came from his father. Gaetano seized it from the keeper's hands, and throwing himself passionately on the ground, pressed it to his breast, for he had feared he was abandoned by every one he loved, and then he covered his face with it, and bathed it with his tears, the first he had shed within those walls. Suddenly he started up and tore open the parcel, eagerly searching for a letter—there was none—it contained nothing but a common sailor's dress. The cruel meaning in this present could not be misconstrued, and the son looked at it with a mixture of grief and indignation. „Yes, he shall be obeyed!" he muttered to himself; and at that instant Nina's lover, with his unwearied goodness, came in to warn him of his father's anger, and to advise not to seek a reconciliation too hastily. „Besides," he continued, „your father is ill and weak—bed-ridden for these five months—in great pain,—and it is thought, his disease is incurable." „Then," replied Gaetano, „I must see my father ere he dies, and he shall bless me—I know he will; and then, since he commands it, I will fly my country!" He hurried to put on the sailor's clothes, and instantly, with his free unfettered feet, speeded towards Pistoia.

When this news was carried to Nina, she trembled with apprehension. From all she could learn, the father's rage was implacable, and the crime of staining his family pride was never to be pardoned. She dreaded that Gaetano might be driven to some other act of despair, worse than before—suicide perhaps—and therefore, quietly avoiding observation, resolved to follow. A coach, similar to a stage-coach in England, was on the start for Lucca. There was yet a single place vacant, and when she entered it, the driver gladly whipped his horses forward. „Have I not done wrong?" she asked herself, „for no doubt he has taken the nearer path across the mountains. This silly coach—how it loiters! My own feet were better!" At Lucca she impatiently left her company, forgetting all ceremony, to the astonishment of a gentleman with a ribbon in his button-hole. She sought not for another conveyance, certain that her pace would be quicker than the lazy trot of such horses as had borne her from Pisa; and somewhat touched with shame at riding at her ease while Gaetano toiled on foot. On she walked, and in a few minutes came to that tedious part of the road, where the eye sees, in a straight line, and on a flat full three miles in prospect, between two double rows of trees. She strained her sight, but could distinguish no one in a sailor's habit. She quickened her steps. The road then takes a slight turn, and there is again a similar prospect, and for the same extent. Still not seeing him, she cried out, „Oh! where is he? Dear Madonna, Queen of Heaven, do but preserve him in his right mind, and I will be content! Let his father's arms receive him, and I will return—happy—and he shall never know that he might find a home in mine!" Coming into Pescia, she observed some children building their clay-houses on the side of the bridge; and perceiving that their work must have lasted from the morning, she hoped they could give her some information. From them she learnt that such a one had passed, though they disagreed as to the time, and described him very doubtfully; however, one among them, a little creature with a dusty thin face, satisfied her it could be no other but Gaetano, by his wonder at his long quick strides. Now she felt more light of heart, and gazed upon the mountains, clothed in a thousand varieties of trees and shrubs, and forming a kind of amphitheatre above the city, and her eyes wandered over the rich, luxuriant plain, till her soul was elevated by the beauty of nature, and, forgetting the Madonna, she prayed direct to the Creator.

At that moment, Gaetano knocked at his father's door. The servant who opened it, though a stranger to him, looked confused, as if he had been taught to expect such a visitor; and without asking any questions, left him on the threshold. Presently he returned and in a low voice told him he was threatened to be dismissed from the house, if he did not immediately close the door upon him. „Then do your duty," said Gaetano, „and shut me out," — and as he spoke he retired one step backward, — " but tell my father I only desire to touch his hand before I leave him for ever." No reply was brought, and the son waited there without motion, like a statue. At last the window of the room where the father lay, was opened. The wretched old man, on a sick bed, his bed of death, with a voice scarce human, shrieked at his once beloved boy in curses. His fury was exasperated, instead of being subdued by his own sufferings — I will not, I cannot repeat his words. Gaetano stood firmly, and heard them with a painful smile. But when they ceased, and there was silence, he sunk upon his knees, with his body supported against the door-post. The window was closed. Passengers stopped in their way, and whispered, and knew not how to act. At last a little girl from a neighbour's was sent with food, and as she said „Dear Signor, eat! eat! eat!" Gaetano laughed. One circumstance I must not omit; his brother, the now favoured son, stole softly round from the garden door, and kissed him, but for a short moment, and then fled swiftly back, lest his love should be noticed by any one in the house. Towards night-fall, the sympathy of the town's people increased, and collecting there in a crowd, they began to talk loudly and impatiently. This still more enraged the father; he ordered the window to be opened again, but his curses were answered by a cry from the people in the street; and a poor cripple, a beggar, exclaimed, „Peace! peace! irreverend old man!" and they heard him no more.

Nina was then forcing her way through the crowd. She had just arrived, pale and heartsick, but not weary. Regardless of the bystanders, or rather, not giving them a thought, she knelt down close to Gaetano; with her arms crossed upon her breast, like one of Raphael's angels, and prayed to him to forgive her. He heard her gentle voice as a voice from heaven and lifting his feeble eyelids, saw who it was. „Forgive you!" he replied, „I forgive all—all—even my father! every one but myself!" And striving to raise himself from the door-post, he sunk senseless into her arms. She believed his heart was burst — that he was either dead or dying, — and screamed for help. The window above her head closed against her cries.

Many among the crowd sprung forward to her assistance, and they bore Gaetano to an inn, while Nina walked by his side without a word, his hand fast locked in hers. On the following morning he was in a high fever, which, after a few days, became so violent, it threatened speedily to destroy him. All the while Nina was his kind nurse; and in spite of the restraint laid upon unmarried women in Italy, she alone attended him. „Entire affection scorneth nicer hands." The brother often visited him, but secretly, and at night, with all the circumspection of a gallant to his mistress. At length Nina had the joy to see his health return, hanging over him with her sweet, quiet smiles, till he gazed upon her, forgetting he was unhappy. In a few days he wondered if it was possible to be unhappy again. And the roses began to blush on her cheeks more beautifully than ever they had blushed before. Yet they never talked of loving each other — it was a waste of words — neither of them had a doubt of it. One evening, the brother, as he paid his stolen visit, was not in the least surprised to hear they were married — why should he? And he wished them joy, and embraced Gaetano, and kissed the hand of his sister-bride, with a happiness almost equal to their own.

There was a good opportunity for opening a snuff-shop at Pescia, so the young couple resolved to fix themselves there. The aunt, and all the stock in trade, were removed from Pisa in the same cart to the new shop. Gaetano was presently initiated in the mysteries of weights and scales and canisters, delighted with his industry as his wife stood by his side. Yet at times a pang came across him as he thought of his father. At the end of six months a priest called, and said his genitore had forgiven him. This was merely effected by the terrors of his faith; and, therefore, the greatest bigot could have received but little comfort from it. In fact, he did no more than forgive him as a Christian; with this proviso, that he would never see him or leave him a farthing. Soon after this the old man died. Immediately the brother offered to divide the property, and upon his repeated entreaties, Gaetano did receive a part. „I cannot take half," said he, „because you, with a large house and no shop, are a poorer man than I am."

The aunt is more demure than ever. There are so many stories abroad of the infamy of an Illustrissimo becoming a shopkeeper, and of a respectable girl marrying a convict, that she is nervous. She goes about protesting she had no hand in the matter, that nothing of the kind ever entered her head, and thus gets suspected, most undeservedly, as a sly, good-for-nothing, wicked woman.

True love, they say, must be „itself alone," not the offspring of any other passion: and that affection springing from gratitude or pity is by no means love; with many more wise sayings, which I forget. To all this I have nothing to reply, — I only refer such dogmatisers to the principal snuff shop in Pescia. Gaetano and Nina have now three children. The youngest is the most beautiful infant I ever saw, „especially at the mother's breast;" — mind, reader, these are the husband's own words, and you are not to make me accountable for so dainty an observation.

The Destruction of Sennacherib.

The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
That host on the morrow lay wither'd and strown.

For the angel of death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed in the face of the foe as he pass'd;
And the eyes of the sleepers wax'd deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved: and for ever grew still!

And there lay the steed with his nostril all wide,
But through it there roll'd not the breath of his pride:
And the foam of his gasping lay white on the turf,
And cold as the spray of the rock-beating surf.

And there lay the rider distorted and pale,
With the dew on his brow and the rust on his mail;
And the tents were all silent, the banners alone,
The lances unlifted, the trumpet unblown.

And the widows of Ashur are loud in their wail,
And the idols are broke in the temple of Baal;
And the might of the Gentile, unsmote by the sword,
Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!

Byron.

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erscheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Die Verleger versenden die Nummern wöchentlich, die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnement-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monat 1 Thlr. [illegible] Das Abonnement [illegible] [illegible] Nummern [illegible] [illegible]. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Postämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. № 37.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS

OF THE

MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS

BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. L. M.

Lilian of the Vale.

Having partially recovered from a nervous distemper, brought on by a severe course of economical studies, I determined to withdraw for the summer months into the country, where my constitution, naturally weak, might be invigorated, and my mind be diverted from preying on my body, by the novelty and variety of such amusements as woods, and rivers, and mountains, and valleys afford. Both inclination and necessity (for I was not affluent) induced me to seek a place of retirement at once humble and private, where my expenditure would be inconsiderable, and my actions might escape from that ceremonious restraint which the forms of society impose upon its members. I had travelled for some time in search of such an abode, but with little success; when one evening as I was returning, quite chagrined, to the village where I had lain the night before, my eyes were attracted to a narrow sheepwalk, which deviated nearly at right angles from the high road, by something which I thought resembled an ornament of dress lying in the middle of the path. Upon taking it up, I found it to be a pale blue riband, simply folded in the form of a star-knot, and held together by a silken thread of the same colour. This was some proof at least, that a habitation was not far distant, and I immediately determined to attempt discovering it; for, beside the desire of returning the trifle to its owner, I was strongly imbued with that theory which appropriates much of our future destiny to such accidental occurrences, and I firmly believed that this pathway and no other would lead me to the object in search of which I had set out; especially as the riband I found did not lie near the road I was pursuing, but a considerable distance from it on the by-path, thereby obviously pointing out to me the way I should choose.

The path I speak of sank down between two hills, descending much below the level of the high road, and at length opening into a green platform which overlooked a still deeper declivity. I shall never forget the enchanting prospect which offered itself to my view, as I stood in the green recess formed by the two banks, which rose from the platform, and concealing both it and the steepdown valley beneath, from the passengers on the high road. I seemed as if suspended in middle air, for the purpose of surveying the hollow woodland beneath me to the greatest advantage; for the precipitous descent of the mountain, on whose side I was placed, prevented me from seeing that there was any thing under my feet but the surface of the platform itself. The valley was of considerable extent, and terminated either way in a dark glen*); it was perfectly verdant, except where its green mantle was relieved by the deeper tints of several masses of foliage with which the lawns were interspersed, by a few glistening rocks, or by the bright surface of a stream which ran at the bottom, forming innumerable cascades and waterfalls, which gave an uncommon sweetness and purity to the air. At one end of the valley appeared a small cottage, scarcely indeed apparent from the number of trees which surrounded it, and open only in front towards the river, on whose opposite side it lay. A few wreaths of thin blue smoke curling above it, showed it to be inhabited. Here then (said I,) shall my labours at length cease; if all the wealth I am master of can purchase a corner in such a paradise. — As I looked about to see how I should descend from my present altitude to this Eden, a little goat made its appearance on the edge of the precipice, — just where it was met by the bank forming the side of the recess where I stood, — and gazing full at me for some time, disappeared. I approached the place where it had vanished, and found that the former pathway still wound by the foot of the bank wall, and continued in a slanting direction down the side of the precipice, till it ended at the ford which lay across the river, and led up to the cottage door. With some difficulty and considerable danger I doubled this promontory, and descended cautiously, my four-footed guide running on before me, and stopping at intervals to see if I followed. Surely (said I,) still theorizing as I followed my active conductor to the bottom, my fate lies this way; here have I a second regulator of my path; there must be something in these governing accidents. — I found the river much wider and more rapid than I expected; a large tree, supported at each end on massive stones, lay across the deepest part of the stream, where there were no rocks to serve as steps. Over this my nimble vaunt-courier trotted, and in a few moments led me to the threshold of the cottage, which it entered unceremoniously. As my figure darkened the door, a matron, who sat within, raised her eyes from the book which lay upon her knee, and somewhat astonished, I suppose, at the suddenness of my appearance, waited without speaking till I had explained myself. Having apologized for my intrusion, and related the circumstances which occasioned it, I briefly mentioned the object in search of which I was travelling. The matron civilly replied, that her cottage, from its smallness, was ill adapted to my purposes, but that if I was satisfied with such an humble residence, if I thought my health would be improved by the situation, I was welcome to a part of her house; that she only regretted her inability to provide me with a suitable apartment.

---

*) enges Thal.

I agreed with the good woman on her own terms, and finding myself fatigued by my journey, I soon retired to my chamber. It was a small room, neatly but simply furnished; a little bed lay in one corner; a woman's dressing-stand, and a couple of old-fashioned chairs, with an oaken table, nearly completed the inventory. A few books, chiefly moral and religious, stood upon a shelf near the window, one of these I opened, and found the word Lilian, written in a delicate character, on the title-page. Without waiting to make any further observations, I went to bed and fell asleep immediately.

When the soul is entranced in slumber, and we are as if divided between life and death, there are sounds often heard in such moments, which seem to partake of another and a superior world; sounds of that wild and visionary description to which, waking, we can find no parallel. With such celestial music in my ears I awoke in the morning, but the sounds seemed to die away as I returned to the consciousness of earthly existence. While I was regretting that my dream was not reality, and before the echoes of its ideal symphony had ceased to vibrate in my brain, methought I heard the same notes distinctly repeated by a voice, human indeed, but more exquisitely sweet than ever I had heard on earth before. The imperfect sensations of sleep had given it its spirituality, but waking perception left it all its wildness and melody. The words, struck apparently by a silver tongue, penetrated to my brain, while lost in breathless transport my vision seemed to return. Again it sang: —

Vale of the Waterfalls!
Glen of the streams!
Wake from your slumbering!
Wake from your dreams!

Wild sings the mountain lark,
Bird of the air!
Calling the valley birds
Up to him there!

Sweet ring the mountain bells
High o'er the dale,
Waking the little bells
Down in the vale.

Fresh breathes the morning wind,
Bright looks the day, —
Up to the heather hills,
Lilian, away!

Raising myself on one elbow to catch these delicious sounds, and looking through the lattice which commanded a view of the ford, and the opposite side of the valley, I saw a light female figure glide swiftly over the sylvan bridge, and with the speed of wind fly up the pathway which I had descended yester evening. I arose instantly, and going to the window beheld her, accompanied by the little goat, rapidly ascending the precipice. When she had gained the platform, she turned towards the sun, which rose on the other side of the vale, and after a few moments, apparently given to contemplation of its splendour, disappeared between the banks which formed the verdant recess.

Though the morning was not far advanced, I felt too much interested, by the song I had heard, and the form I had seen, to think of returning to bed. I hastily dressed myself, and taking up one of the books which lay near me, fixed my eyes on the written characters which I had observed the night before. I know not how long I remained in this state of abstraction, when the shadow of the good woman of the house, passing over the book, awakened me from my reverie. In a few minutes she re-passed my window, and proceeded to the other end of the cottage, where a thick copsewood, reaching from it to the river, shut out the view of the mountains behind. A green plat, fresh and dewy, lay in front of the cottage, and sloping down to the river, mingled its short herbage with the sedgy borders of the channel; a rustic bench, shadowed by the overhanging copse, formed a kind of bower in which the matron now sat, looking anxiously towards the path which led down from the hills. As she sat there, I had a good opportunity to observe her appearance. It was that of one who had seen better days, who had felt misfortunes keenly but not impatiently; melancholy predominated in her countenance, but resignation strove hard for the superiority; sickness more than age had robbed her of youth's graces; but though the rose had faded on her cheek, the lily still remained in all its former delicacy. Turning towards my window, her eye caught mine, and I instantly went forth to salute her. She inquired kindly for my health, hoped a few days would restore it, and told me that her daughter had gone to pull some herbs which she thought would be of use to me, and would soon return. I asked, if it was her daughter whom I had heard that morning singing so exquisitely. „Yes (said she), my Lilian is more like a bird of the air than a thing of the earth; in joy she sings of her happiness: in woe she sings away her sadness; when in neither, like the birds she sings for very thoughtlessness." „And if I may judge (said I) by the rapidity with which she ascended yon precipice„ — she must have their wings too, as well as their song." The matron smiled. „Lilian (said she) has lived here for fourteen years, from infancy to girlhood; and these mountains are grown so familiar to her, that she might tread them blindfold. In truth, sir, she is a wild one: when her duty to me does not require her presence, she spends her time wandering through the recesses of this valley and the surrounding hills; she goes singing her little roundelays over the whole wilderness, and there is scarcely a rock, a cave, or a precipice, which has not echoed to her song." „Forgive me (said I), if I ask whether you are a native of this valley; your conversation would lead me to think not." „Alas, sir (replied the matron), I saw many years of sorrow before I came to this solitude. My husband was an officer of distinction in the army — but, hush! (said she, putting her finger to her lips) Lilian is coming; — and I think it but fair to keep the canker from the bud, let the old tree decay as it will," added the matron, forcing a smile as her daughter approached.

At the end of the arbour where I sat, the foliage was sufficiently thick to conceal me, yet not so dense as to prevent my seeing what might pass without: receiving a significant smile from the widow, I withdrew myself farther into the shade, just as the girl had reached the foot of the bridge. When she came to the middle where the water was deepest, she stopped, and clasping her hands, while she drew them to her neck with that natural grace which belongs to the period of extreme youthfulness, at the same time bending her aerial form into the attitude of one supplicating inwardly, she looked at her mother with an intensity of expression, which denoted more heartful feelings than words could possibly convey. This beautiful apparition seemed to have but just escaped the age of childhood; or rather, extreme innocence had prolonged that portion of her life beyond its due period; her figure was small, but exquisitely proportioned, as was evident from her delicate arms bare almost to the shoulder, and her tiny feet and ancles, which the mountain dress she wore was not calculated to conceal. Her hair was of a glossy fairness, and her complexion of that fine bloom which arises from health and purity of blood. Considerably heightened by exercise, the glow of her cheek was only surpassed by the bright redness of her mouth, which seemed indeed the very bed of sweetness. Eyes, with which we are inclined to imagine angels, heavenly blue and liquid from the overflowing of a tender and sensitive heart. A simple white wrapper of very thin muslin, showing off the harmony and gracefulness of her figure to the greatest advantage, and more like a mist than a garment, shrouded this little goddess; and as the foam of the cataract curled to her feet, or burst in a thousand frothy shapes around her, she stood like the Naiad of the River, which thundered in unruly joy at receiving her amongst its billows.

In this attitude she advanced, brightening as she approached her mother, and mincing her steps with girlish sportiveness, till she came within a few paces of the bower; then unclasping her hands and spreading her arms, as if to embrace her anxious parent, like a spirit at play, she began a kind of fantastic dance: and as her nimble fairy feet twinkled on the green turf, and her thin garb floated on her shoulders like wings, I thought the veritable Ariel swam before my sight. Fondly tantalizing her delighted mother, who sat with outstretched arms to receive her, while tears of joy trickled from her eyes, the playful girl still continued, without actually touching, to hover round her, accompanying her fantastic movements with a little song of the wildest, sweetest cadency.

I've been roaming! I've been roaming!
Where the meadow dew is sweet,
And like a queen I'm coming
With its pearls upon my feet.

I've been roaming! I've been roaming!
O'er red rose and lily fair,
And like a sylph I'm coming
With their blossoms in my hair.

I've been roaming! I've been roaming!
Where the honeysuckle creeps,
And like a bee I'm coming
With its kisses on my lips.

I've been roaming! I've been roaming!
Over hill and over plain,
And like a bird I'm coming
To my bower back again!

Here the fairy threw herself into her mother's breast, and was covered with kisses, as fervently repaid.

The favourite goat, which had been her companion, now presented itself at the entrance of the bower, having a little basket of light osier suspended from one of its horns, and containing a profusion of flowers which its mistress had gathered in her excursions. In rising from her mother's lap to relieve her companion from its charge, my figure met her view. A blush, at the recollection that she had been seen by a stranger, overspread her whole face, bosom, and even her arms, with the deepest crimson. When the good woman presented her to me as her daughter, with her cheek half averted, she made me a simple curtsy, and retired almost like a child behind her mother. In a little time we went to breakfast in the arbour, and the business of the scene was a relief to her embarrassment, but she remained in total silence, whilst at every turn of my head, the blood mantled involuntarily to her cheek and bosom. In this secluded valley, where perhaps no one of my sex above the grade of a peasant had ever appeared, and from which society was naturally excluded, neither her bashfulness nor her reserve surprised me, especially when I considered her extreme youth; but that such a beautiful creation could exist upon earth, without drawing the world to adore it as the symbol of heavenly perfection, was to me totally inexplicable.

Sensations which I never had experienced before, sensations under which my entire frame trembled with an agitation at once excessive and pleasurable, now took possession of my soul; I seemed to have plunged into a new world, a world of superior purity, where the softness of the air, and the brightness of the verdure, had exalted my feelings to a height of enthusiasm and intense sensitiveness, which we attribute to those who inhabit the visionary vales of eternal blessedness. Shut in from the common occurrences of life which might destroy the illusion, placed amid scenery so romantic, so melancholy, so lovely, it was no wonder if to one of my fervid imagination, his nature should seem to be exalted by the place, rather than the beauty of the scene to be exaggerated by his enthusiastic disposition. I forgot the actual world, — forgot that I was in it, and gave myself wholly up to the dreams of fancy. The sylvan goddess, or spirit of this place, had now become familiar, and as she hovered around my path, pointing out the freshest spots where I might recline she sung me into slumber, and showing me the various flowery treasures of her enchanted garden, I thought of Eden, of Elysium, of Paradise, fancied I had already by some forgotten means been transported to one of those delightful abodes, and her own angelic airy form confirmed the delusion. In fact, this singular girl had a character of mind and frame which was quite preternaturally: she was a perfect, I had almost said real, Wood nymph; her form, her actions, her thoughts, were those that belong to such a being. She seemed to have imbibed the very spirit of germination which pervaded the wild productions of her native valley; the tenderness and diminutive symmetry of its herbage had imparted a like delicacy and grace to her form; the purity and freshness of its elements had infused themselves into her blood; the wildness of its imagery, its sublimity, and its beauty, had assimilated the disposition of her mind to themselves. She was something between earthly and celestial; she had the form of a mortal, but the habits of a spirit.

For the first two or three days which I spent in the Vale of the Waterfalls (as it was called), Lilias was distant and reserved, but when a little habituated to my presence, with the freedom which we use in childhood when fear has subsided, she became affectionate and familiar, nor was there ever in her manners that coyness which generally distinguishes maidenhood; she seemed to be totally unconscious that it was necessary, and gave herself to my society as she would to that of a brother.

I became her inseparable companion. She would lead me through the devious paths of the wilderness, and bring me to the several groves and fountains, and fresh rolling streams, with which this solitude abounded; she would guide my steps over little hillocks blooming with the loveliest flowers, and glades of the sweetest verdure; then having ensconced me among those inextricable recesses, disappear like a wraith in some dell or hollow, and start up again when I least expected her. One day as I sat alone under the shade of a rock, I felt something rustle softly in my bosom, and looking round perceived the girl skipping down from the rock, with the riband which had first seduced me to this valley in her hand, and laughing gaily as she waved it round her head. She had silently mounted the rock behind me, and snatched the riband from my breast, where I had preserved it. I attempted to recover it, but she escaped me like a shadow before I had run a dozen paces. In a short time she re-appeared, and coming up to me, threw a little knot of blue flowers into my bosom, singing —

Sweet blue bells we,
Mid flowers of the lea
The likest in hue to heaven.
Our bonnets so blue
Are tinged with the dew
That drops from the sky at Even.

Our bloom more sweet
Than dark violet,
Or tulip's purple stain.
At every return
Of the dew breathing morn,
Grows brighter and brighter again!

A very remarkable circumstance attending my acquaintance with this creature was, that, except on the above occasion, I never knew what it was to feel her touch; and even here, the sensation was more that of a breeze rustling in my bosom, than of a mortal hand. Though perfectly familiar and unsuspicious, whenever I approached within the possibility of touching her, she seemed to flit from me by imperceptible degrees, so that I could not at this moment assert, except from the evidence of sight and reasoning, that she was actually corporeal. Indeed all her habits and actions partook of another nature.

(To be concluded in our next.)

The Three Jewels.

By Thomas Hood.

There are many examples in ancient and modern story, of lovers who have worn various disguises to obtain their mistresses: the great Jupiter himself setting the pattern by his notable transformations. Since those heroic days, Love has often diverted himself in Italy as a shepherd with his pastoral crook; and I propose to tell you how, in more recent times, he has gone amongst us in various other shapes. But in the first place I must introduce to you a handsome youth, named Torrello, of Bergamo, who was enamoured of Fiorenza, the daughter of gentlefolks in the same neighbourhood. His enemies never objected any thing against Torrello, but his want of means to support his gentlemanly pretensions and some extravagances and follies, which belong generally to youth, and are often the mere faults of a generous nature. However, the parents of Fiorenza being somewhat austere, perceived graver offences in his flights, and forbade him, under grievous penalties, to keep company with his mistress.

Love, notwithstanding, is the parent of more inventions than Necessity, and Torrello, being a lively-witted fellow, and withal deeply inspired by love, soon found out a way to be as often as he would in the presence of his lady. Seeing that he could not transform himself, like Jupiter, into a shower of gold for her sake, he put on the more humble seeming of a gardener, and so got employed in the pleasure-ground of her parents. I leave you to guess, then, how the flowers prospered under his care, since they were to form bouquets for Fiorenza, who was seldom afterwards to be seen without some pretty blossom in her bosom. She took many lessons besides of the gardener, in his gentle craft, and her fondness growing for the employment, her time was almost all spent naturally amongst her plants, and in the infinite cultivation of her heart's-ease, which had never before prospered to such a growth. She learned also of Torrello a pretty language of hieroglyphics, which he had gathered from the girls of the Greek Islands, so that they could hold secret colloquies together by exchanges of flowers; and Fiorenza became more eloquent by this kind of speech than in her own language, which she had never found competent to her dearest confessions.

Conceive how abundantly happy they were in such employments, surrounded by the lovely gifts of Nature, their pleasant occupation of itself being the primeval recreation of humankind before the fall, and love especially being with them, that can convert a wilderness into a garden of sweets.

The mother of Fiorenza, chiding her sometimes for the neglect of her embroideries, she would answer in this manner: —

,,Oh, my dear mother! what is there in labours of art at all comparable with these? Why should I task myself with a tedious needle to stitch out poor tame formal emblems of these beautiful flowers and plants, when thus the living blooms spring up naturally under my hands. I confess I never could account for the fondness of young women for that unwholesome chamber-work, for the sake of a piece of inanimate tapestry, which hath neither freshness nor fragrance; whereas, this breezy air, with the odour of the plants and shrubs, inspirits my very heart. I assure you, 'tis like a work of magic to see how they are charmed to spring up by the hands of our skilful gardener, who is so civil and kind as to teach me all the secrets of his art.“

By such expressions her mother was quieted; but her father was not so easily pacified; for it happened, that whilst the roses flourished everywhere, the household herbs, by the neglect of Turrello and his assistants, went entirely to decay, so that at last, though there was a nosegay in every chamber, there was seldom a sallad for the table. The master taking notice of the neglect, and the foolish Turrello in reply showing a beautiful flowery arbour, which he had busied himself in erecting, he was abruptly discharged on the spot, and driven out, like Adam, from his Paradise of flowers.

The mother being informed afterwards of this transaction —

,,In truth,“ said she, ,,it was well done of you, for the fellow was very forward, and I think Fiorenza did herself some disparagement in making so much of him, as I have observed. For example, a small fee of a crown or two would have paid him handsomely for his lessons to her, without giving him one of her jewels, which I fear the knave will be insolent enough to wear and make a boast of.“

And truly Turrello never parted with the gift which, as though it had been some magical talisman, transformed him quickly into a master falconer, on the estate of the parent of Fiorenza; and thus he rode side by side with her whenever she went a-fowling. That healthful exercise soon restored her cheerfulness, which, towards autumn, on the withering of her flowers, had been touched with melancholy; and she pursued her new pastime with as much eagerness as before. She rode always beside the falconer, as constant as a tassel gentle to his lure; whilst Turrello often forgot to recall his birds from their flights. His giddiness and inadvertence at last procuring his dismissal, the falcon was taken from his finger, which Fiorenza recompensed with a fresh jewel, to console him for his disgrace.

After this event, there being neither gardening nor fowling to amuse her, the languid girl fell into a worse melancholy than before, that quite disconcerted her parents. After a consultation, therefore, between themselves, they sent for a noted physician from Turin, in spite of the opposition of Fiorenza, who understood her own ailment sufficiently to know that it was desperate to his remedies. In the mean time his visits raised the anxiety of Turrello to such a pitch, that after languishing some days about the mansion he contrived to waylay the doctor on his return, and learned from him the mysterious nature of the patient's disease. The doctor confessing his despair of her cure,

,,Be of good cheer,“ replied Turrello; ,,I know well her complaint, and without any miracle will enable you to restore her, so as to redound very greatly to your credit. You tell me that she will neither eat nor drink, and cannot sleep if she would, but pines miserably away, with a despondency which must end in either madness or her dissolution: whereas, I promise you she shall not only feed heartily, and sleep soundly, but dance and sing as merrily as you can desire.“

He then related confidentially, the history o their mutual love, and begged earnestly, the the physician would devise some means of genting him admitted to the presence of his mistress. The doctor being a good-hearted man, was much moved by the entreaties of Torrello, and consented to use his ability.

„However," said he, „I can think of no way but one, which would displease you — and that is, that you should personate my pupil, and attend upon her with my medicines."

The joyful Torrello assured the doctor, „that he was very much mistaken in supposing that any falsely-imagined pride could overmaster the vehemence of his love;" and accordingly putting on an apron, with the requisite habits, he repaired on his errand to the languishing Fiorenza. She recovered very speedily, at his presence — but was altogether well again, to learn that thus a new mode was provided for their interviews. The physician thereupon was gratified with a handsome present by her parents, who allowed the assistant likewise to continue his visits till he had earned another jewel of Fiorenza. Prudence at last telling them that they must abandon this stratagem, they prepared for a fresh separation, but taking leave of each other upon a time too tenderly, they were observed by the father, and whilst Torrello was indignantly thrust out at the door, Fiorenza was commanded, with a stern rebuke, to her own chamber.

The old lady thereupon asking her angry husband concerning the cause of the uproar, he told her that he had caught the doctor's man on his knees to Fiorenza.

„A plague take him!" said he; „'tis the trick of all his tribe, with a pretence of feeling women's pulses to steal away their hearts. I marvel how meanly the jade will bestow her favour next; but it will be a baser varlet, I doubt, than a gardener, or a falconer."

„The falconer!" said the mother, „you spoke just now of the doctor's man."

„Ay," quoth he, „but I saw her exchange looks, too, with the falconer; my heart misgives me, that we shall undergo much disgrace and trouble on account of such a self-willed and froward child."

„Alas!" quoth the mother, „it is the way of young women, when they are crossed in the man of their liking; they grow desperate and careless of their behaviour. It is a pity, methinks, we did not let her have Torrello, who, with all his faults, was a youth of gentle birth, and not likely to disgrace us by his manners; but it would bring me down to my grave, to have the girl debase herself with any of these common and low-bred people."

Her husband, agreeing in these sentiments, they concerted how to have Torrello recalled, which the lady undertook to manage, so as to make the most of their parental indulgence to Fiorenza. Accordingly, after a proper lecture on her indiscretions, she dictated a dutiful letter to her lover, who came very joyfully in his own character as a gentleman, and a time was appointed for the wedding. When the day arrived, and the company were all assembled, the mother, who was very lynx-sighted, espied the three trinkets, namely, a ring, a clasp, and a buckle, on the person of Torrello, that had belonged to her daughter: however, before she could put any questions, he took Fiorenza by the hand, and spoke as follows.

„I know what a history you are going to tell me of the indiscretions of Fiorenza; and that the several jewels you regard so suspiciously, were bestowed by her on a gardener, a falconer, and a doctor's man. Those three knaves, being all as careless and improvident as myself, the gifts are come, as you perceive, into my own possession; notwithstanding, lest any should impeach, therefore, the constancy of this excellent lady, let them know that I will maintain her honour in behalf of myself, as well as of those other three, in token of which I have put on their several jewels."

The parents being enlightened by this discourse, and explaining it to their friends, the young people were married, to the general satisfaction; and Fiorenza confessed herself thrice happy with the gardener, the falconer, and the doctor's man.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. №. 38.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Lilian of the Vale.

(Concluded from our last.)

She spoke little; expressing herself mostly by gestures or inarticulate modulations of the voice. When she did utter words, they were breathed in a kind of recitative or cadence, or, as was most generally the case, her sentiments were conveyed in the form of a song. I have given a few specimens of these; and although simplicity is their principal attribute, when aided by her angelic voice and expressive gestures, they were the wildest and sweetest imaginable. In fact she had a natural turn for poetry; education had nothing to do with it, both her poetry and the music with which she accompanied it, were irregular and inartificial, like the song of a bird, the murmur of a brook, or the sigh of a tree — more the involuntary emanations than the premeditated combinations of sounds. Such of her songs as I can recall to memory — for as she sung from momentary impulse it was extremely difficult to find her repeating the same words except on similar occasions — such of these as I could collect on the instant will appear in order, whilst I endeavour to give some notion of this extraordinary girl, with whom the happiest, if not the most rational moments of my life were spent.

Her mother has often told me that she did not know how Lilian subsisted. She would never sit down to a regular meal, but would sometimes take a morsel of bread with her when she purposed a distant excursion, and even this would be found strewed on some pathway for the birds who might happen to light there. She was impatient of confinement; and often when her mother had seen her to bed, on going into her room an hour after, it would be found empty, and Lilian escaped unseen to wander by moonlight in the valley. This happened frequently during my residence there; and once being excited by curiosity, I went out in search of her, and found her in the bottom of a dell — drinking dew out of the cups of flowers. „Lilian,“ said I, „why have we lost you?“ „My sisters! my sisters!“ answered she impatiently. „What sisters?“ „Look! look!“ said she, pointing to some fantastic shapes into which the spray of the distant cataract was formed by the reflection of the moon. „I see nothing but the river foam dancing in the moonbeams.“ „These,“ she replied, „these are my sisters — the only sisters Lilian ever knew. Listen! do they not speak to each other?“ „Come, you are too romantic, Lilian; the water as it falls murmurs indistinctly, and at this distance misleads you.“ „Nearer then!“ said the girl, „I must hear what they say.“ And before I could interpose, she rushed to the brow of the cataract and disappeared. Uttering a cry of terror. I followed, and just as I had reached the spot where she vanished, her mother came to tell me that Lilian had returned to the cottage. I retired to my chamber, lost in astonishment at this singular occurrence. In the morning, when her mother expostulated with Lilian about the imprudence of wandering in the night air, she replied in a roundelay:

The wren hath her nest at the root of a tree,
And the tufted mouse in the couch of the bee,
Where rain nor cold hath power to harm her;
The bed of the eagle is built in the sky,
And the bittern in rushes doth nightly lie;
Then why should Lilian's bed be warmer?

Her senses were incontestably more acute than belongs to the nature of mortality. She would often stop in the midst of our conversation, to listen, as she said, to the wind walking over the flowers; and accordingly in a little time I would perceive the breeze to swell into a transient gust as it passed by the place where we stood. Whether in some instances her romantic imagination might not have suggested ideal murmurs, I will not decide, but her delicate perceptions of sound were mostly verified by fact. I remember sitting with her one sunny day on the river bank, in a sequestered part of the vale, when, after a fit of contemplative silence, upon my addressing myself to break it, she raised her head, and motioning me to be still, began in a low tremulous voice, scarcely distinguishable from the mixed murmur which rises from the breast of the woodland in summer time; a kind of irregular chant—

Hear! hear!
How the vale bells tinkle all around
As the sweet wind shakes them — hear!
What a wild and sylvan sound!

Hear! hear!
How the soft waves talk beneath the bank!
And each sighs to willow — hear!
The reed to the osier dank.

Hear! hear!
How the blue fly hisses in the air
With his voice in his fine wings — hear!
He sings of his flowery fare.

Hear! hear!
How the wood-bird murmurs in the dark,
And the distant cuckoo chimes — hear!
From the sun-cloud trills the lark.

She could discriminate accurately between the scents of flowers of the same species, so as to name them blindfold. Her sight was so fine that she would detect the minnows lying on the bed of a stream, in the darkest weather, when to me they were indistinguishable from the slimy pebbles of the bottom; on putting down a straw to the place she pointed out, they flitted. Her other senses were equally discriminative.

But in what she chiefly resembled our notions of a spirit, was the lightness, grace, and peculiar swiftness of her motion. Something between flying and dancing. Her movements were so rapid, that sometimes it required no great stretch of superstition to believe that she actually vanished into the air. The wild and restless life she led, wandering over hill, dell, rock, and precipice, had given an elasticity to her foot, which made her seem to tread on air; whilst the slightness of her limbs, formed on the most delicate model of beauty and grace, appeared, by the tremulous instability which they gave to her frame, to indicate a necessity for perpetual and ever-varying motion. I had often dreamed of Attendant Spirits, Sylphs, Gnomes, Semi-deities, and imagined beings partaking of a double nature, the spiritual and corporeal, beings of an intermediate class, whose outlines and figures were human, but whose form was unsubstantial; whose actions, habits, and thoughts were not preternatural, nor supernatural wholly, but such as human actions, habits, and thoughts would be when refined by some celestial alchemy, which would clear them of their grossness without divesting them of their specific essence: with such visionary beings had my waking dreams been peopled, but never until now were these conceptions apparently realized. This creature adequately represented my preconceived notion of an intermediate being.

The surface of the Vale of the Waterfalls was not uniform, but was broken into numberless hillocks and dells in miniature, interspersed with the several varieties of rock, cleft, glade, and declivity. Amid these romantic solitudes was Lilian ever straying; every singular or characterotic point of the Vale was to her in place of a companion; hillocks, rocks, shrubs, and flowers, the people of the wilderness, were to her in place of society. I have frequently wandered for the whole day in search of her, and perhaps found her at length in a shady nook singing to the wild flowers, or on a sunny bank dancing round a knot of cowslips, or hovering on the brink of the torrent chanting her mystic verses to its monotonous numbers. Sometimes I have accompanied her from the cottage door, while she rambled like a wild bee from bank to dell, and from shrub to flower, conversing with her by snatches, but never finding it possible to confine her either to one subject or one place. The character of her thoughts was wildness mingled with deep tenderness and melancholy; but she was at times gay and playful. A high strain of sublimity would often convert the sylph into a sybil, when the changes in the face of nature gave a gloomy colour to her mind; for her wildness, melancholy, gaiety, and sublimity of imagination, were nothing but the transcripts of those passions which seem to animate the system of natural things. A wild rock or a solitary cave attracted her notice, she grew romantic or melancholy; a sunny flower or a darkly-waving pine caught her eye, she became gay or gloomy accordingly. But as the predominating features of the solitude even in its most charming dress were melancholy and wildness, so the general characteristics of her thoughts were sadness and romance.

We sat one evening on the river side, just at the foot of the principal cataract, where the waters plunging from on high down into a rocky basin, shook the very bank we sat on by their fall, and drowning each other in the pool, raised a continual din and echo by their struggles and tumultuous contentions. The wind had swept in frequent gusts through the vale during the latter part of the day; but as night approached, the old trees began to groan with a heavier blast, and the wild birds flew with fearful screams to the groves; the small flowers closed up their breasts rapidly, and committed themselves to the storm, whilst the river seemed to foam and swell under the chafing wing of the tempest. In a few minutes the rack began; thunder broke in tremendous peals over our heads, leaves flew in eddies through the air, the shrill reed whistled, and the swinging pine moaned loudly in the night wind, whilst the caves and narrow passages between rocks swelled the terrific chorus by their hollow voices. Shuddering, I turned to Lilian. She had risen, and was hanging over the brink of the whirlpool, muttering something which, by its wildness and incoherence, resembled an incantation. Her delicate white arms were crossed upon her bosom, her long hair flew over her shoulders on the wind, and her little cheek grew pale as she uttered her mystic numbers to the roar of the torrent. „Lilian!“ said I, „come away; the night grows terrific.“ She answered not, but elevating her voice till it nearly reached a scream, and mingled with the noise of the waves like the cry of one drowning, she chaunted a wild rhapsody, her eye almost lighted to frenzy, and her cheek whitening every moment.

The woods are sighing!
And the wild birds crying!
And loud and sorely the wild waters weep!
Dark pines are groaning!
And night winds are moaning!
And muttering thunder rumbles hoarse and deep!

Ghostly, frantic, and appalling, she broke into a yet wilder measure:

Come, Sisters, come, come!
Bring the storm, and bring the rain,
Let the roving winds loose upon the swelling billows,
Down, Spirits, down, down!
Shake the oak, and split the rock,
Scream amid the dashing waves, and shriek among the willows!

Her voice ended in a wild shriek, and she disappeared. I had no courage to follow up this adventure. Her character seemed to change here; enthusiasm degenerated into frenzy, and gentleness gave way to more than sibylline extravagance of voice and gesture. I returned to the cottage, and as I did not wish to be questioned by the woman concerning her daughter, I retired immediately to my chamber.

There was something of a foreboding nature in this last incident. The morning after, I received a post letter from the neighbouring town whither the widow had gone for provisions, acquainting me that my father was on his death-bed, and requiring my immediate attendance to receive his last blessing. This was imperative; and though I had neither seen nor heard of Lilian since the preceding night, after having taken a hasty leave of her mother, I set off immediately to the village where I might procure some mode of conveyance to my father's residence. The direct path from the Vale of the Waterfalls to the village lay through one of the glens or dingles in which the valley terminated. The sides of the mountains which formed this defile were so precipitous that they almost met overhead, and they were moreover clothed with a dark mantle of hanging fir, which increased the gloom and horror of the place. At the very bottom lay the path, and as I looked up the sides of this dreary profound, which seemed the very realization of the Valley of the Shadow of Death, my fancy grew bewildered; though waking, I seemed to walk in a dream, and a thousand dim and terrible phantoms appeared to rise from the brambles under my feet, and darken still more the obscurity which encompassed me. The incidents of last night returned forcibly to my mind; there was something mysterious, unreal, and preternatural in every thing connected with that Vale, and this was a fit place for executing the final catastrophe. As I passed on, at intervals some horrid thing would brush by me, and a wet flaccid wing like that of a monstrous bat would flap me in the face; sometimes a phantom would come and whisper busily in my ear, yet I heard nothing; and I saw many hideous shapes, who by their distortions were apparently in the acts of screaming, laughing, and making other abominable noises, yet the air was as silent as death. All of a sudden, this subterranean passage of horror and darkness opened into the bright fields of day; I was re-inspirited; but the recollection of the dreary glen, the vale, Lilian and her preternatural disappearance, still remained. Pondering on these subjects, and endeavouring to account for them in some probable manner, I proceeded through the open valley into which the sides of the glen had widened and passing by a tuft of green bushes, I thought I heard from within them some one weeping like a deserted child. I immediately opened them, and to my astonishment found Lilian sitting on the green plat in the midst, with her head in her lap, lamenting piteously, and drowned in a flood of tears. She rose and spread her arms to receive me. I flew to her embrace, but when I thought to have caught her to my bosom, she was still at the same distance from me as before." „Lilian," said I, „why do you avoid me? I am going." „I know it," she replied, „and I come to take my last farewell." „Not the last, not the last, dear girl" (said I, forgetting yesterdays adventure) if heaven will spare us for each other: when I have paid the duties which I owe to my father, I will return to love and Lilian." „Lilian," said she, faintly smiling, „Lilian will then be no more!" As I stood, unable from the impressiveness of her manner to make any answer, whether it was imagination, or that the echo in this place was extraordinarily powerful, I heard her last words repeated several times up the mountains, and „No more! no more! no more!" at length died away in hollow sighs among the rocks of the valley. Perceiving me silent, she said, „Come, I will delay you no longer; depart to your home! On that glade," (pointing to a sloping bank at some distance), „we separate for ever!" We proceeded in silence. When we had reached the spot, she stopped; and turning to me, her innocent bosom filled with tears, and her blue eyes dropping crystal, she pointed towards the vale which lay behind us, and in a voice scarcely audible with sorrow, „Listen," said she, „to the Rover's Farewell!" —

Farewell the groves, and farewell the bowers!
Ye rocks, ye mountains, and ye streams, farewell!
Farewell the bloom and sweet breath of flowers!
Farewell for evermore! a long farewell!

Farewell, O Vale of fast falling water!
Ye banks, ye bushes, and ye glades, farewell!

Farewell, lone parent of one wayward daughter!
Farewell for ever, — a long, long farewell!

And farewell „Lilian“ . . .

Here she was interrupted by a loud laugh uttered over my shoulder. I turned to see from whom it came, but no one appeared. On turning again towards Lilian, she was gone. Immoveable with astonishment, I stood for some time stupified, but recovering my senses, I called several times, „Lilian, Lilian, dear Lilian, answer me!“ She appeared a long way off at the entrance of the valley, with her hands covering her face, and walking slowly towards her home. I now recollected my father, and considering that it would be useless to pursue this adventure any farther at present, summoning up my courage, I proceeded onwards to the village. I had scarcely walked twenty paces, when, to my utter surprise, this apparition stood before me again in the midst of the path, but when I approached, quitted it and appeared on the top of some rock or prominence at a distance, where her small figure whitening in the sun would seem to kiss its hand to me as I passed. In this way, she continued to accompany me, till the signs of population began to appear. She had gradually kept behind me as I approached the high road, and when I at length reached it, on looking round I perceived her standing on a high rock at some distance, the sunbeams glistening in her eyes, which were filled with tears, whilst she kissed her hand repeatedly, till she faded entirely from my view.

When I reached my father's house, I found him partially recovered. I accompanied him to Italy, where he had been ordered by his physicians — too late however for his preservation, he died within a few miles of Turin. My attention to him on his death-bed was necessarily unremitting; and this, combined with my own previous delicate state of health, occasioned a relapse of my nervous disorder. With some difficulty I recovered so much of my health as to think of returning to my native country, to which the desire of revisiting the Vale of the Waterfalls, and investigating its mysteries completely, was no small inducement. The unceasing attendance which my father's illness required upon my part, added to the novelty of scene and society, had prevented me from dwelling intensely on the extraordinary incidents which I so lately experienced; but my thoughts now reverted naturally to them, as well from my innate tendency to the romantic, as from the singularity of the facts themselves, and the influence of my late illness and my father's death, in rendering such melancholy recollection attractive. The cottage where my father died was situated on the borders of a lake in the bosom of a deep valley among the Piedmontese hills, and I was sitting, about the close of the evening, in the room that had been his, ruminating successivey on him and on Lilian. The window where I sat looked out on the lake which lay in calm unruffled stillness before me, and the blue mountains towards the west were just sinking into that mellow haze which characterises the softness of an Italian evening; the lattice was open, and I leaned forward to catch the summer breeze as it gently moved the tendrils of a jessamine which crept to the roof of the cottage. A rustic bench outside rose nearly to the level of the window; — Lilian came and sat down on it. I started at the sight, but looking steadfastly on the figure, I saw it melt gradually into air. In a little time it appeared standing on the bright surface of the lake, but disappeared in the same manner as before. Then on a rock at some distance, and again vanished. I had no doubt but this was a shadow raised by my own imagination, pursuing the same train of ideas intensely. Indeed the figure I now saw was very different from the original in the Vale of the Waterfalls. The form was evidently insubstantial; the figure, though preserving its characteristic outlines, was emaciated and stiff; the bloom had totally faded from its cheek and was replaced by the wan sickliness of death; the eyes were glazed and motionless. „Lilian is dead“ said I. Whilst I journeyed home, the figure occasionally appeared, but at each time more faintly than before, till it vanished entirely.

Upon reaching England, the Vale of the

Waterfalls was my first object. I quickly sought out the village near to which it lay, and pursuing my former steps, soon found myself in the midst of the valley. It was beautiful as ever, but methought appeared to wear less the air of enchantment than when I had left it. I turned to the cottage; it was in ruins. The bower was overgrown with nettles and tall weeds; the smooth plat had shot up into long rank grass that waved heavily in the breeze, and emitted a close suffocating odour. As I stood ruminating on these changes, my heart swelling with the melancholy conviction that Lilian was indeed no more, a peasant appeared on the hills, carrying a mattock and other instruments. Upon his approach I made inquiries concerning the widow and her daughter. He replied, that the person who had lived in the cottage was dead some months, that she never had any daughter to his knowledge, but lived quite alone; that the only person he had ever heard of in the valley, beside her, was a young man who came there for the recovery of his health, but he remained for a short time only; that the cottage now belonged to himself, and he was about repairing it for his own family. This account, to me, appeared very singular. I went to the entrance of the dreary glen, where I had experienced such horrors. The mountains seemed to have opened overhead, and the place was comparatively lightsome. I passed through it safely, and came to the circle of green bushes where I had found Lilian weeping. A rude stone cross stood in the midst. It was apparently of very great age, yet I never had observed it before. These things were still more extraordinary. On returning to the village, the inhabitants gave me the same account as the peasant had; and when I spoke of Lilian they seemed not to understand me. Many of them recognised me, yet I could gain no further satisfaction. They also called the vale by a different name.

I have frequently revisited this valley, but never could obtain any intelligence concerning the extraordinary being whom it was my fortune alone to have met there. An impenetrable veil seemed to have been drawn over her history, and I am at length compelled to give up all attempts at investigating it. That she was mortal and had actual existence, the evidence of my senses, and my disbelief in the theory of spirits visiting this world, induce me to assert; yet it is totally unaccountable how such a being could exist, and the whole world, with but one exception, remain ignorant of it. I have never been able to come to any conclusion upon this point; sometimes, indeed, I am inclined to think that this vision of Lilian of the Vale was a mere creation of my own brain, naturally very imaginative, and at the period of this adventure disturbed and overheated by the fever which accompanies a nervous disease such as mine.

Geronimo and Ghisola.

There are many tragical instances on record, of cruel parents who have tried to control the affections of their children; but as well might they endeavour to force backwards the pure mountain current into base and unnatural channels. Such attempts, whether of sordid parents or ungenerous rivals, redound only to the disgrace of the contrivers; for Love is a jealous deity, and commonly avenges himself by some memorable catastrophe.

Thus it befel to the ambitious Marquis of Ciampolo, when he aimed at matching his only daughter, Ghisola, with the unfortunate Alfieri; whereas her young heart was already devoted to her faithful Geronimo, a person of gentle birth and much merit, though of slender estate. For this reason, his virtues were slighted by all but Ghisola, who had much cause to grieve at her father's blindness; for Alfiery was a proud and jealous man, and did not scorn to disparage his rival by the most unworthy reports. He had, indeed, so little generosity, that although she pleaded the prepossession of her heart by another, he did not cease to pursue her; and finally, the Marquis discovering the reason of her rejection, the unhappy Geronimo was imperatively banished from her presence.

In this extremity, the disconsolate lovers made friends with a venerable oak, in the Marquis's park, which presented a convenient cavity for the reception of their scrolls; and in this way, this aged tree became the mute and faithful confidant of their secret correspondence. Its mossy and knotted trunk was inhabited by several squirrels, and its branches by various birds; and in its gnarled roots, a family of red ants had made their fortress, which afforded a sufficient excuse for Ghisola to stop often before the tree, as if to observe their curious and instructive labours. In this manner they exchanged their fondest professions, and conveyed the dearest aspirations of their hearts to each other.

But love is a purblind and imprudent passion, which, like the ostrich, conceals itself from its proper sense, and then foolishly imagines that it is shrouded from all other eyes. Thus, whenever Ghisola walked abroad, her steps wandered by attraction to the self same spot, her very existence seeming linked, like the life of a dryad, to her favourite tree. At last, these repeated visits attracting the curiosity of the vigilant Alfieri, his ingenuity soon divined the cause; and warily taking care to examine all the scrolls that passed between them, it happened that several schemes, which they plotted for a secret interview, were vexatiously disconcerted. The unsuspicious lovers, however, attributed these spiteful disappointments to the malice of chance; and thus their correspondence continued till towards the end of autumn, when the oak tree began to shed its last withered leaves; but Ghisola heeded not, so long as it afforded those other ones, which were more golden in her eyes than any upon the boughs.

One evil day, however, repairing as usual to the cavity, it was empty and treasureless, although her own deposit had been removed as heretofore; and the dews beneath, it appeared, had been lately brushed away by the foot of her dear Geronimo. She knew, notwithstanding, that at any risk he would not so have grieved her; wherefore, returning homewards with a heavy heart, she dreaded, not unreasonably, that she should discover what she pined for in the hands of her incensed father; but being deceived in this expectation, she spent the rest of the day in tears and despondence; for, rather than believe any negligence of Geronimo, she resolved that he must have met with some tragical adventure; wherefore his bleeding ghost, with many more such horrible phantasies, did not fail to visit her in her thoughts and dreams.

In the meanwhile, Geronimo was in equal despair at not having received any writings from Ghisola; but his doubts took another turn than hers, and justly alighted on the treacherous Alfieri. At the first hints of his suspicion, therefore, he ran to the house of his rival, where the domestics refused positively to admit him, declaring that their master, if not already deceased, was upon the very threshold of death. Geronimo naturally supposing this story to be a mere subterfuge, drew his sword, and with much ado forced his way up to the sick man's chamber, where he found him stretched out upon a couch, and covered from head to heel with a long cloak. The noise of the door disturbing him, Alfieri uncovered his face, and looked out with a countenance so horribly puckered by anguish and distorted, that Geronimo for an instant forgot his purpose, but recovering himself from the shock, he asked fiercely for the letters.

The dying wretch answered to this demand with a deep groan, and removing the cloak, he showed Geronimo his bare arm, which was swelled as large round nearly as a man's body, and quite black and livid to the shoulder; but the hand was redder in colour, and merely a lump of unshapely flesh, though without any perceptible wound.

„This,“ said he, pointing to the livid member, „is my punishment for a deep offence to you; and there is your cruel avenger.“

Geronimo, turning by his direction towards the table, at first sight discovered nothing deadly, but on looking within a little silver box, he discovered a small dead scorpion, the bite of which, in our climate, is frequently mortal. Alfieri then motioning to Geronimo to come nearer, continued with great difficulty in these words: —

„There is a certain old oak, with a cleft in it, in the Marquis's park, which is but too well known to us both. My evil fortune led me to discover its use to you: and my baseness to abuse that knowledge, for which I am suffering these torments. For putting my guilty hand into the hollow for your papers, which I blush to confess were my object, I was stung on my finger by this accursed reptile, who was lurking in the bottom of the hole. I have killed it as you see, though my own anguish commenced with its destruction. Notwithstanding, I took away the papers and ran hither, where, on looking at my hand, it was as scarlet as my shame; and my arm was already beginning to swell to this monstrous size, and the convulsed muscles were all writhing together like as many serpents. And now my pangs, together with the fever of my remorseless mind, have brought me to the extremity you behold." Saying which, he fell into a fresh fit of agony, so that the sweat issued in large drops from his forehead, and his eyes turned in their sockets with nothing but the whites upon Geronimo, whose flesh crept all over with compassion and dread.

This paroxysm passing over, he wiped away the foam from his mouth, and began to speak again, but in a much weaker voice and by syllables.

„You see," said he, „my injuries have returned, like ardent coals, upon my own head. I designed to have supplanted you, whereas I am myself removed from my place on the earth. Let me then depart with your forgiveness for the peace of my soul; whilst, on my part, I make you amends as far as I may. And first of all, take this box with its fatal contents to the Marquis, and bid him know by this token that God was adverse to our will. And because I did love, though vainly, let all my possession be laid at the same feet where I used to kneel; and beseech her, for charity's sake, to bestow her prayers on my departed soul. Tell her my pangs were bitter, and my fate cruel, except in preserving her from so horrible a calamity." He then fell backwards again upon the couch, and died.

As soon as he was laid out, Geronimo went and delivered the message to the Marquis, whom he found chiding with Ghisola for her melancholy. As he was much impressed with the dreadful scene he had witnessed, he described it very eloquently, so that both of his hearers were much affected, and especially at sight of the box with the dead scorpion. It cost Ghisola some fresh tears, which her lover did not reprove, to be told of the expressions which related to herself; but the Marquis was still more shocked at the relation, and confessing that it was the judgment of heaven, he no longer opposed himself to the union of Ghisola with Geronimo. He then caused the remains of Alfiery to be honourably buried; and it was observed that Geronimo shed the most tears of any one that wept over his tomb.

Thomas Hood.

Sonnet.

Sleep so unsound, 'tis not forgetfulness;
Little refreshes us: there is a sting
In memory, often we would calm and still;
But when it haunts our dreams, the pain of frights
The images upon our fancies press
In shape more horrible and with them bring,
Hobgoblin forms their gathering crowds to fill,
And people with dismay the dismal night.
Then reason watches not to calm our fears;
We have no wand th' illusions to dispel:
In clouds his slumbering mien the giant rears,
And necromancer works uncheck'd his spell.
We weary wake; but bless the dawn of day,
That drives our madden'd Fancy's forms away.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 39.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZE, A. A. M. M.

Thomas Hood.

Die Sphäre, in welcher ſich dieſer eigenthümliche und geiſtreiche Mann ausgezeichnet hat, iſt ihrer Natur nach ſo beſchränkt, daß ſelbſt ſeine gelungenſten Leiſtungen innerhalb derſelben nur in England wirklichen Anklang haben können, da ſie dem Ausländer zu große, faſt unüberwindliche Schwierigkeiten darbieten, indem zu ihrem vollkommenen Verſtändniß eine ſo genaue Kenntniß der engliſchen Sprache und Sitte nach allen ihren Richtungen gehört, daß es einem Fremden, wenn er nicht eine Reihe von Jahren in Großbritannien zugebracht hat, durchaus unmöglich iſt, in den wahren Sinn derſelben einzudringen. Es iſt nämlich die komiſche Satyre in allen ihren Gattungen, mit dem ganzen Reichthum von wunderbaren Wortſpielen, techniſchen Ausdrücken, Redensarten, offenen und verſteckten Anſpielungen u. ſ. w., welchen das geſellſchaftliche Leben der Britten in ſeiner ſcharf ausgeſprochenen Geſtaltung ſo bis in das Kleinſte ausgebildet hat. Hood's gelungenſte Erzeugniſſe, namentlich die Comic Annuals haben daher auf dem Feſtlande gar keine Leſer gefunden, und würden hier ganz unbemerkt vorüber gegangen ſein, wenn nicht alljährlich ſich ſämmtliche engliſche Zeitſchriften, gleichviel welche politiſche Farbe ſie tragen, zu deren Lobe vereinigten und ſich ausführlich über dieſelben verbreiteten, weshalb ſie denn doch die Aufmerkſamkeit des Freundes engliſcher Literatur auf dem Continente, der ſie jedoch bald unbefriedigt und verdrießlich wieder aus der Hand legt, anziehen mußten *). — Hood's übrige Schriften, namentlich ſeine lyriſchen Poeſieen und ſeine Erzählungen, fanden dagegen im Auslande und beſonders bei uns, verhältnißmäßig mehr Freunde als in ihrer Heimath. Ehe wir jedoch dieſelben kurz zu characteriſiren verſuchen, mögen einige biographiſche Notizen über ihren Verfaſſer vorangehn.

Thomas Hood ward 1799 in London geboren, wo ſein Vater als Buchhändler und Compagnon des angeſehenen Hauſes Vernor, Hood and Sharp lebte. Schon als Knabe verrieth er ſehr glückliche Anlagen und einen äußerſt lebhaften Geiſt. Er erhielt ſeine Erziehung in der Akademie eines Herrn Wanoſtrecht zu Camberwell, machte dann zur Wiederherſtellung ſeiner wankenden Geſundheit eine See-*) Um dem geneigten Leſer eine Probe dieſer Art und Weiſe zu geben, wollen wir hier eine der leichteſten Stellen in Proſa, aus einem der Comic Annuals mittheilen. Sie iſt aus den Skizzen von Nationalcharacteren, ein Bruchſtück der Schilderung des Irländers. He is a man with two ideas; no better than one, to wit a right one, and a wrong one, between which, like stools, his wit comes constantly to the ground. Thus it is as natural for him to blunder as to breathe, his Sign is Taurus: for he is constantly uttering Dilemmas with horns to them. — — Hence he is a Catholic by nationality; for the Pope makes Bulls likewise and is therefore a mere Irishman born at Home. For the rest of his Religion he confesses to at least nine of the Seven Mortal Sins; and above all Sabbath-Breaking, by which he understands eating Flesh of a Friday.

---

In his Politics he is commonly a Partisan; his main Ambition being a Trimmer, or as he describeth him, a Man who sits on both sides of the House at once. — — He hath a Scheme for reducing Tithes from a Tenth to a Fifth, and another for furthering the Education of the Poor, by means of Sunday-Schools twice a Week etc.

heit war ſehr. Darauf eine Zeitlang bei Verwandten zu Dundee. — Nach London zurückgekehrt, zeigte er Neigung für die bildenden Künſte, und ward zu ſeinem Oheim Robert Sands, dem bekannten ausgezeichneten Kupferſtecher in die Lehre gegeben. Hier verbrachte er zwei Jahre, vorzüglich mit Zeichnen beſchäftigt, gelegentlich auch wohl den Grabſtichel in die Hand nehmend, ganz beſonders aber ſeiner Neigung zum Dichten ſich hingebend. Mehrere ſeiner poetiſchen Productionen fanden Aufnahme in der Zeitſchrift „The London Magazine" und zogen bald die allgemeine Aufmerkſamkeit an. Er beſchloß nun dieſe neue glücklich eröffnete Bahn zu verfolgen, und gewann ſchnell eine ſehr ausgezeichnete Stellung in der Reihe der lebenden engliſchen Schriftſteller.

In ſeinen komiſchen Dichtungen tritt beſonders eine Fülle von Laune und Witz hervor, wie man ſie ſelten vereint findet, und der Verfaſſer derſelben erſcheint um deſto achtungswerther, als er ſein glückliches Talent nie weder zu perſönlicher Satyre noch zu Verſpottung des Edeln und Heiligen mißbrauchte. Freundlichkeit, Wohlwollen und Edelmuth bleiben ſelbſt in ſeinen ſatyriſchen Zeichnungen vorwaltende Charakterzüge. Seine ernſten Dichtungen zeichnen ſich auf der anderen Seite höchſt vortheilhaft aus durch Innigkeit, Anmuth, Wärme und Grazie; offenbar ſind die älteren engliſchen Dichter ſeine Vorbilder, ohne daß er die Fehler derſelben ängſtlich nachahmt, hat er ſie mit Erfolg in ihrer Natürlichkeit und Wahrheit zu erreichen geſtrebt.

Unter ſeinen zahlreichen Schriften ſind aus leicht begreiflichen Urſachen die „Whims and Oddities" und die Comic Annuals die geleſenſten. Auch ſeine National Tales, von denen wir hier einige mittheilen, fanden vielen Beifall; geringerer Theilnahme erfreuten ſich dagegen ſein „Plea of the Midsummer Fairies" und ſeine lyriſchen Poeſien, obwohl gerade ſie in hohem Grade die Aufmerkſamkeit der wirklich Gebildeten verdienen.

The Fall of the Leaf.

By Thomas Hood.

There is no vice that causes more calamities in human life, than the intemperate passion for gaming. How many noble and ingenious persons it hath reduced from wealth unto poverty; nay, from honesty to dishonour, and by still descending steps into the gulf of perdition. And yet how prevalent it is in all capital cities, where many of the chiefest merchants, and courtiers especially, are mere pitiful slaves of fortune, toiling like so many abject turnspits in her ignoble wheel. Such a man is worse off than a poor borrower, for all he has is at the momentary call of imperative chance; or rather he is more wretched than a very beggar, being mocked with an appearance of wealth, but as deceitful as if it turned, like the monies in the old Arabian story, into decaying leaves.

In our parent city of Rome, to aggravate her modern disgraces, this pestilent vice has lately fixed her abode, and has inflicted many deep wounds on the fame and fortunes of her proudest families. A number of noble youths have been sucked into the ruinous vortex, some of them being degraded at last into humble retainers upon rich men, but the most part perishing by an unnatural catastrophe; and if the same fate did not befal the young Marquis de Malaspini, it was only by favour of a circumstance which is not likely to happen a second time for any gamester.

This gentleman came into a handsome revenue at the death of his parents, whereupon, to dissipate his regrets, he travelled abroad, and his graceful manners procured him a distinguished reception at several courts. After two years spent in this manner he returned to Rome, where he had a magnificent palace on the banks of the Tiber, and which he further enriched with some valuable paintings and sculptures from abroad. His taste in these works was much admired; and his friends remarked with still greater satisfaction, that he was untainted by the courtly vices which he must have witnessed in his travels. It only remained to complete their wishes, that he should form a matrimonial alliance that should be worthy of himself, and he seemed likely to fulfil this hope in attaching himself to the beautiful Countess of Maraviglia. She was herself the heiress of an ancient and honourable house; so that the match was regarded with satisfaction by the relations on both sides, and especially as the young pair were most tenderly in love with each other.

For certain reasons, however, the nuptials were deferred for a time, thus affording leisure for the crafty machinations of the Devil, who delights, above all things, to cross a virtuous and happy marriage. Accordingly, he did not fail to make use of this judicious opportunity, but chose for his instrument the lady's own brother, a very profligate and a gamester, who soon fastened, like an evil genius, on the unlucky Malaspini.

It was a dismal shock to the lady, when she learned the nature of this connexion, which Malaspini himself discovered to her, by unconsciously dropping a die from his pocket in her presence. She immediately endeavoured, with all her influence, to reclaim him from the dreadful passion for play, which had now crept over him like a moral cancer, and already disputed the sovereignty of love; neither was it without some dreadful struggles of remorse on his own part and some useless victories, that he at last gave himself up to such desperate habits, but the power of his Mephistopheles prevailed, and the visits of Malaspini to the lady of his affections became still less frequent; he repairing instead to those nightly resorts where the greater portion of his estates was already forfeited.

At length, when the lady had not seen him for some days, and in the very last week before that which had been appointed for her marriage, she received a desperate letter from Malaspini, declaring that he was a ruined man, in fortune and hope; and that at the cost of his life even, he must renounce her hand for ever. He added, that if his pride would let him even propose himself, a beggar as he was, for her acceptance, he should yet despair too much of her pardon to make such an offer; whereas, if he could have read in the heart of the unhappy lady, he would have seen that she still preferred the beggar Malaspini, to the richest nobleman in the Popedom. With abundance of tears and sighs perusing his letter, her first impulse was to assure him of that loving truth; and to offer herself with her estates to him, in compensation of the spites of Fortune: but the wretched Malaspini had withdrawn himself no one knew whither, and she was constrained to content herself with grieving over his misfortunes, and purchasing such parts of his property as were exposed for sale by his plunderers. And now it became apparent what a villanous part his betrayer had taken; for, having thus stripped the unfortunate gentleman, he now aimed to rob him of his life also, that his treacheries might remain undiscovered. To this end he feigned a most vehement indignation at Malaspini's neglect and bad faith, as he termed it, towards his sister; pretending that it was an insult to be only washed out with his blood: and with these expressions, he sought him to kill him at any advantage. And no doubt he would have become a murderer, as well as a dishonest gamester, if Malaspini's shame and anguish had not drawn him out of the way; for he had hired a mean lodging in the suburbs, from which he never issued but at dusk, and then only to wander in the most unfrequented places.

It was now in the wane of Autumn, when some of the days are fine, and gorgeously decorated at morn and eve by the rich sun's embroideries; but others are dewy and dull, with cold nipping winds, inspiring comfortless fancies and thoughts of melancholy in every bosom. In such a dreary hour, Malaspini happened to walk abroad, and avoiding his own squandered estates, which it was not easy to do by reason of their extent, he wandered into a bye place in the neighbourhood. The place was very lonely and desolate, and without any near habitation, its main feature especially being a large tree, now stripped bare of its vernal honours, excepting one dry yellow leaf, which was shaking on a topmost bough to the cold evening wind, and threatening at every moment to fall to the damp, dewy earth. Before this dreary object Malaspini stopped some time in contemplation, commenting to himself on the desolate tree, and drawing many apt comparisons between its nakedness and his own beggarly condition.

„Alas! poor bankrupt,“ says he, „thou hast been plucked too, like me; but yet not so basely. Thou hast but showered thy green leaves on the grateful earth, which in another season will repay thee with sap and sustenance; but those whom I have fattened will not so much as lend again to my living. Thou wilt thus regain all thy green summer wealth, which I shall never do; and besides, thou art still better off than I am, with that one golden leaf to cheer thee, whereas I have been stripped even of my last ducat!“

With these and many more similar fancies he continued to aggrieve himself, till at last, being more sad than usual, his thoughts tended unto death, and he resolved, still watching that yellow leaf, to take its flight as the signal for his own departure.

„Chance,“ said he, „hath been my temporal ruin, and so let it now determine for me, in my last cast between life and death, which is all that its malice hath left me.“

Thus, in his extremity he still risked somewhat upon fortune; and very shortly the leaf being torn away by a sudden blast, it made two or three flutterings to and fro, and at last settled on the earth, at about a hundred paces from the tree. Malaspini instantly interpreted this as an omen that he ought to die; and following the leaf till it alighted, he fell to work on the same spot with his sword, intending to scoop *) himself a sort of rude hollow for a grave. He found a strange gloomy pleasure in this fanciful design, that made him labour very earnestly; and the soil besides being loose and sandy, he had soon cleared away about a foot below the surface. The earth then became suddenly more obstinate, and trying it here and there with his sword, it struck against some very hard substance; whereupon, digging a little further down, he discovered a considerable treasure.

There were coins of various nations, but all golden, in this petty mine; and in such quantity as made Malaspini doubt, for a moment, if it were not the mere mintage of his fancy. Assuring himself, however, that it was no dream, he gave many thanks to God for this timely providence; notwithstanding, he hesitated for a moment, to deliberate whether it was honest to avail himself of the money; but believing, as was most probable, that it was the plunder of some banditti, he was reconciled to the appropriation of it to his own necessities.

Loading himself, therefore, with as much gold as he could conveniently carry, he hastened with it to his humble quarters; and by making two or three more trips in the course of the night, he made himself master of the whole treasure. It was sufficient, on being reckoned, to maintain him in comfort for the rest of his life; but not being able to enjoy it in the scene of his humiliations, he resolved to reside abroad; and embarking in an English vessel at Naples, he was carried over safely to London.

It is held a deep disgrace amongst our Italian nobility for a gentleman to meddle with either trade or commerce; and yet, as we behold, they will condescend to retail their own produce, and wine especially, — yea, marry, and with an empty barrel, like any vintner's sign, hung out at their stately palaces. Malaspini perhaps disdained from the first these illiberal prejudices; or else he was taught to renounce them by the example of the London merchants, whom he saw in that great mart of the world, engrossing the universal seas, and enjoying the power and importance of princes, merely from the fruits of their traffic. At any rate, he embarked what money he possessed in various mercantile adventures, which ended so profitably, that in three years he had regained almost as large a fortune as he had formerly inherited. He then speedily returned to his native country, and redeeming his paternal estates, he was soon in a worthy condition to present himself to his beloved Countess, who was still single, and cherished him with all a woman's devotedness in her constant affection. They were therefore before long united, to the contentment of all Rome; her wicked relation having been slain some time before, in a brawl with his associates.

---

*) [illegible]

As for the fortunate wind-fall which had so befriended him, Malespini founded with it a noble hospital for orphans; and for this reason, that it belonged formerly to some fatherless children, from whom it had been withheld by their unnatural guardian. This wicked man it was who had buried the money in the sand; but when he found that his treasure was stolen, he went and hanged himself on the very tree that had caused its discovery.

The Lady in Love with Romance.

By Thomas Hood.

Many persons in Castille remember the old Knight Pedro de Pueblo, — Surnamed The Gross. In his person, he was extremely large and vulgar, with a most brutal countenance; and in his disposition so coarse and gluttonous, and withal so great a drunkard, that if one could believe in a transmigration of beasts, the spirit of a swine had passed into this man's body, for the discredit of human nature.

Now, truly, this was a proper suitor for the Lady Blanche, who, besides the comeliness of her person, was adorned with all those accomplishments which become a gentlewoman: she was moreover gifted with a most excellent wit; so that she not only played on the guitar and various musical instruments to admiration, but also she enriched the melody with most beautiful verses of her own composition. Her father, a great man, and very proud besides of the nobility of his blood, was not insensible of these her rare merits, but declaring that so precious a jewel deserved to be richly set in gold, and that rather than marry her below her estate he would devote her to a life of perpetual celibacy, he watched her with the vigilance of an Argus. To do them justice, the young gentlemen of the province omitted no stratagem to gain access to her presence, but all their attempts were as vain as the grasping of water; and at length her parent becoming more and more jealous of her admirers, she was confined to the solitude of her own chamber.

It was in this irksome seclusion that, reading constantly in novels and such works which refer to the ages of chivalry, she became suddenly smitten with such a new passion for the romantic, talking continually of knights and squires, and stratagems of love and war, that her father, doubting whither such a madness might tend, gave orders that all books should be removed from her chamber.

It was a grievous thing to think of that young lady, cheerful and beautiful as the day, confined thus, like a wild bird in an unnatural cage, and deprived of the common delights of liberty and nature. At length, that old Knight of Castille, coming, not with rope-ladders, nor disguised in woman's apparel, like some adventurers, but with a costly equipage, and a most golden reputation, he was permitted to lay his large person at her feet, and, contrary to all expectation, was regarded with an eye of favour.

At the first report of his reception, no one could sufficiently marvel how, in a man of such a countenance, she could behold any similarity with those brave and comely young cavaliers, who, it was thought, must have risen out of their graves in Palestine to behold such a wonder; but when they called to mind her grievous captivity, and how hopeless it was that she could be freed by any artifice from the vigilance of her father, they almost forgave her that she was ready to obtain her freedom by bestowing her hand on a first cousin to the Devil. A certain gallant gentleman, however, who was named Castello, was so offended by the news, that he would have slain the Knight, without any concern for the consequence to himself; but the Lady Blanche, hearing of his design, made haste to send him a message that by the same blow he would wound her quiet for ever.

In the mean time her father was overjoyed at the prospect of so rich a son-in-law as the Knight; for he was one of those parents, that would bestow their children upon Midas himself, notwithstanding that they should be turned into sordid gold at the first embrace. In a transport of joy, therefore, he made an unusual present of valuable jewels to his daughter, and told her withal, that in any reasonable request he would instantly indulge her. This liberal promise astonished Blanche not a little; but after a moment's musing she made answer.

„You know, Sir,“ she said, „my passion for romance, and how heartily I despise the fashion of these degenerate days, when every thing is performed in a dull formal manner, and the occurrence of to-day is but a pattern for the morrow. There is nothing done now so romantically as in those delightful times, when you could not divine, in one hour, the fate that should befal you in the next, as you may read of in those delicious works of which you have so cruelly deprived me. I beg, therefore, as I have so dutifully consulted your satisfaction in the choice of a husband, that you will so far indulge me, as to leave the manner of our marriage to my own discretion, which is, that it may be on the model of that in the history of Donna Eleanora, in which novel, if you remember, the lady being confined by her father as I am, contrives to conceal a lover in her closet, and making their escape together by a rope-ladder, they are happily united in marriage.“

„Now, by the Holy Virgin!“ replied her father, „this thing shall never be;“ and foreseeing a thousand difficulties, and above all that the Knight would be exceeding adverse to his part in the drama, he repented a thousand times over of the books which had filled her with such preposterous fancies. The lady, notwithstanding, was resolute; and declaring that otherwise she would kill herself rather than be crossed in her will, the old miser reluctantly acceded to her scheme. Accordingly it was concerted that the next evening, at dusk, the Knight should come and play his serenade under her lattice, whereupon, hearing his most ravishing music, she was to let fall a ladder of ropes, and so admit him to her chamber; her father, moreover, making his nightly rounds, she was to conceal her lover in her closet, and then, both descending by the ladder together, they were to take flight on a pair of fleet horses, which should be ready at the garden gate.

„And now,“ said she, „if you fail me in the smallest of these particulars, the Knight shall never have of me so much as a ring may embrace,“ and with this injunction they severally awaited the completion of their drama.

The next night, the Lady Blanche watched at her window, and in due season the Knight came with his twangling guitar; but, as if to make her sport of him for the last time, she affected to mistake his music.

„Ah!“ she cried, „here is a goodly serenade to sing one awake with; I prythee go away a mile hence, with thy execrable voice, or I will have thee answered with an arquebuse.“

All this time the Knight fretted himself into a violent rage, stamping and blaspheming all the blessed saints; but when he heard mention of the arquebuse, he made a motion to run away, which constrained the lady to recal him, and to cast down the ladder without any further ado. It was a perilous and painful journey for him, you may be sure, to climb up to a single story; but at length with great labour he clambered into the balcony, and in a humour that went nigh to mar the most charming romance that was ever invented. In short, he vowed not to stir a step further in the plot; but Blanche, telling him that for this first and last time he must needs fulfil her will, which would so speedily be resolved into his own; and seducing him besides with some little tokens of endearment, he allowed himself to be locked up in her closet.

The lady then laid herself down in bed, and her father knocking at the door soon after, she called out that he was at liberty to enter. He came in then, very gravely, with a dark lantern, and asking if his daughter was asleep, she replied that she was just on the skirts of a doze.

„Ah,“ quoth he, after bidding her a good night, „am I not a good father to humour thee thus, in all thy fantasies? In verity, I have forgotten the speech which I ought here to deliver;

but pray look well to thy footing, Blanche, and keep a firm hold of the ladder, for else thou wilt have a deadly fall, and I would not have thee to damage my carnations."

Hereupon he departed: and going back to his own chamber, he could not help praising God that this troublesome folly was so nearly at an end. It only remained for him now to receive the letter, which was to be sent to him, as if to procure his fatherly pardon and benediction; and this, after a space, being brought to him by a domestic, he read as follows: —

„Sir,

„If you had treated me with loving kindness as your daughter, I should most joyfully have reverenced you as my father: but, as you have always carried a purse where instead you ought to have worn a human heart, I have made free to bestow myself where that sort of love will not be wanting to my happiness. As for the huge Knight, whom you have thought fit to select for my husband, you will find him locked up in my closet. For the manner of my departure, I would not willingly have made you a party to your own disappointment; but that, from your excessive vigilance, it was hopeless for me to escape except by a ladder of your own planting. Necessity was the mother of my invention, and its father was Love. Excepting this performance, I was never romantic, and am not now; and, therefore, neither scorning your forgiveness, nor yet despairing at its denial, I am going to settle into that sober discretion which I hope is not foreign to my nature. Farewell. — Before you read this I am in the arms of my dear Josef Castello, a gentleman of such merit, that you will regain more honour with such a son, than you can have lost in your undutiful daughter,

„Blanche."

On reading this letter, the old man fell into the most ungovernable rage, and releasing the Knight from the closet, they reproached each other so bitterly, and quarrelled so long, as to make it hopeless that they could overtake the fugitives, even had they known the direction of their flight.

In this pleasant manner, the Lady Blanche of Castile made her escape from an almost hopeless captivity and an odious marriage; and the letter which she wrote is preserved unto this day, as an evidence of her wit. But her father never forgave her elopement; and when he was stretched even at the point of death, being importuned on this subject, he made answer that, „he could never forgive her, when he had never forgiven himself for her creation." And with these words on his lips he expired.

The Lace Maker.

There was a time — although departed long,
It lives but on the page of ancient song —
When staid simplicity, and guileless mirth,
Dwelt unmolested on our peaceful earth.
As yet to life's more cloistered walks unknown,
Ambition strove in distant courts alone;
And feverish luxury held remote its state;
And pomp to few unbarred its blazoned gate.
In ancient halls, its fitting place of rest,
Dwelt here Fidelity, an honoured guest;
And gentle courtesy, with winning power;
And honour, Princess of the cheerful bower.
No emulative pride, with vain display,
Forestalled to-morrow's gifts to come to-day;
Yet each to each a welcome could afford,
And sweet contentment graced the liberal board.
Then stood the mansion, as for centuries past
Its walls had felt the sunbeam and the blast,
With circling groves, and lawn, for pleasance made,
And shielded portal waiting for its shade;
Home of one race, nor destined to obey
From year to year a new possessor's sway:
Nor far remote, as scattered in repose,
The modest hamlet's quiet roofs arose,
Sweet toil's abodes, and such as to invite
Much peace by day, and dreamless rest by night.

How lightly then, while cares and wants were few,
The hours of industry unheeded flew!

When mists yet wreathed the path of morning grey,
Abroad the sturdy peasant took his way;
Yet left not, sheltered in his walls behind,
The listless hand or uncontriving mind.
Soon as the murmuring bee its toils begun,
And dew-drops glistened in the mounting sun —
The wheels' low sound amidst the quiet shade
Announced the matron at her busy trade;
While, early trained to labour, at her side,
Her graceful task the cottage maiden plied —
Well-skilled to weave, with studded pillow set,
In meshes intricate, the snow-white net;
And, o'er its verge, as if disporting, spread,
To guide in varying forms, the filmy thread.
Thus stole the day unweariedly along,
From silence rescued by the voice of song,
Or converse, staid and simple, as beseems
The even tenour of the rustic's themes —
Tales of departed [illegible], or festal gay,
The prompt of annual wake or bridal day,
Of slighted presage, ominous and true,
Or spectre, seen beside the churchyard yew,
How in past times of dark distrust and fear,
Tempests and clouds have marred the smiling year,
And mildew seared the crops with midnight stroke,
Or fiery levin cleft the forest oak;
Whose wheat looked fairest from the upland glade;
Who ruled in vestries; who the market swayed;
And whose the voice which, on the day of rest,
The choir in anthems old acknowledged best!

Few are those scenes of cheerful labour now,
With downcast look and melancholy brow,
In factories pent, where dim the sunlight steals
O'er shifting frames, and strife of maddened wheels;
From morn's pale glance till glimmering day declines,
The graceful form of childhood droops and pines,
Toil's sickly thrall! and, from its hapless birth,
Barred from that wealth ordained for all on earth.
Unfelt the breathings of the wind which brings
Joy in its voice and freshness on its wings;
Unseen those hues of splendour which adorn
The glowing eve, or pageantry of morn;
Unmarked each rolling season's course, or known
By different grades of bitterness alone;
But known too well the taint, which fatly spread,
Pollutes life's waters at their fountain-head;
Temptation's wiles, and crime's soon-quickened seed,
In whispered counsel, or in witnessed deed;
Affection's blight; blind error's stubborn will;
Want, first, nor least, prolific source of ill;
And, last, that wan disease, which day by day
Distorts and wastes, but far too stern to slay,
Despair's vain wish of quick release denies,
And links with pain each moment as it flies.

Oh! ye! who, nursed in golden hours, possess
The power, but bounded by the will, to bless;
Who know, by consciousness long felt, how dear
The voice of childhood to a parent's ear;
Say, in a land unknown to slavery's tread,
Why weeps the infant at a fate more dread?
Why, while on shores remote deliverance stands,
And the riven fetter falls from Afric's hands,
Domestic bondage? and than bondage worse,
Life's dawn exposed to sin's contagious curse?
Why, in that atmosphere of guilt and shame,
Does virgin innocence forget its name?
Why, from the scene of harsh oppression wrong,
Dwells execration on the lisping tongue?
And why, where busy commerce holds her reign,
Does fancy view a Syrian Moloch's fane?
When shall the care whose exercise secures
Another's need, a blessing bring on yours?
Then may our prayers, indeed, at mercy's throne,
For helpless orphanage and youth made known
Each peaceful Sabbath to the approving skies,
Mixed with no guilt of mockery arise,
And foreign calumny confuted flee;
And Britain vaunt, in truth, her name — THE FREE

HOLLINS.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nro 40.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Felicia Hemans.

Dieſe zarteſte und gefühlvollſte unter allen engliſchen Frauen, denen die Gabe des Geſanges zu Theil geworden, ward am 21ſten September 1793 zu Liverpool geboren. Ihr Vater war ein Irländer, Namens Browne, ihre Mutter eine Deutſche, und dieſe gemiſchte Abſtammung ſcheint von nicht geringem Einfluß auf ihren Charakter ſeit ihrer früheſten Jugend geweſen zu ſein. Ihre erſten Jahre verlebte ſie in den Thälern und auf den Bergen von Nord-Wales; die erhabenen und eigenthümlichen Scenen, welche ſie hier täglich vor Augen hatte, machten einen großen und bleibenden Eindruck auf ihr jugendliches Gemüth; dazu kam, daß ſie ſich ſchon früh mit vollſtem Eifer in das Studium von Shakespeare's Werken vertiefte. So wurden ihre natürlichen Anlagen auf ganz beſondere Weiſe ausgebildet, und noch ehe ſie ihr vierzehntes Jahr vollendet, war ſchon eine gedruckte Sammlung von Gedichten dem Publikum übergeben, die ſich großen Beifalls erfreute. Seit dieſer Zeit bis zu ihrem Tode ſchritt ſie unermüdlich auf der einmal ſo glücklich betretenen Bahn fort; jede neue Leiſtung ihrer Feder übertraf die vorige an Zartheit und Kraft; es ſchien, ſagt der engliſche Kritiker, dem wir dieſe kurze biographiſche Notiz verdanken, als ob die Minen ihres Geiſtes unerſchöpflich geweſen ſeien, denn ihre letzte Arbeit wird als ihre beſte betrachtet. Früh verheirathet, erfreute ſie ſich keiner glücklichen Ehe und trennte ſich von ihrem Gatten, nachdem ſie ihm fünf Söhne geboren. Dieſes Verhältniß ſcheint vorzüglich jene Wehmuth hervorgebracht zu haben, die ſich in allen ihren Werken offenbart und von ihr einmal in folgenden Zeilen ausgeſprochen wird:

> Have I not tried and striven and failed to bind
> One true heart unto me, whereon my own
> Might find a resting place.

Sie lebte mehrere Jahre in St. Asaph, dann in Wavertree bei Liverpool und endlich in Dublin, wo ſie am 16ten Mai 1835 ſtarb.

Ihr äußeres Weſen ſoll in genauem Einklang mit ihren Poeſieen geweſen ſein. Sie war in ihrer Jugend ſehr ſchön, aber Kummer und tiefes Sinnen machten ſie früh verblühen. Freunde beſchreiben uns ihre Geſtalt als äußerſt zart, ihre Geſichtszüge als edel, ſanft und ausdrucksvoll; reiches, braunes, lockiges Haar verlieh denſelben einen beſondern Reiz. Sie zeigte ſich im Umgange durchaus anſpruchslos, etwas zurückhaltend gegen Fremde, aber offen und herzlich, ja mitunter bis zur Luſtigkeit heiter gegen die Vertrauten ihres Herzens. Kurz, wie ihre Dichtungen, ſo athmete ihr ganzes Weſen die höchſte weibliche Liebenswürdigkeit.

Ihre Poeſieen werden ſich erhalten, ſo lange man die Sprache redet, in denen ſie geſchrieben wurden. Der hervorſtechendſte Charakterzug in denſelben iſt eine milde, [illegible], [illegible] Güte des Herzens, die ſich immer gleich bleibt, nie durch Leidenſchaft erregt, noch durch äußeren Einfluß gebeugt, zu dieſer geſellt ſich eine ſanfte Wehmuth, die nie in Unzufriedenheit übergeht, aber ſich oft in Sehnſucht nach einem beſſern Lande auflöſt. Wenige Dichter haben verhältnißmäßig ſo viel und dies ſo gut geſchrieben. Unter allen ihren Arbeiten findet ſich keine, die der Verfaſſerin unwürdig wäre. Ihre Poeſie iſt ungezwungen, gefällig und wohllautend, reich an Bildern und originellen Gedanken, in deren Behandlung ſie eben ſo glücklich als natürlich erſcheint. Am treffendſten, bemerkt ein engliſcher Schriftſteller, laſſen ſich die Dichtungen der Miſtreß Hemans einem Kirchengeſange vergleichen, tief feierlich und eindringlich, bewegend aber nicht aufregend, und eher die Gemüther, deren Glieder aufmerkſam ſind, zur Wehmuth als zur Erhebung ſtimmend.

The Prayer for Life.

By Mrs. Hemans.

> E vos, amigas!
> Cercai me em roda todas, e podendo,
> Defendei me da morte que me leva!
> FERREIRA.

O sunshine and fair Earth!
Sweet is your kindly mirth.
Angel of Death! yet, yet awhile delay!
Too sad it is to part,
Thus in my spring of heart,
With all the light and laughter of the day.

For me the falling leaf
Touches no chord of grief,
No dark weed in the rose's bosom lies:
Not one triumphal tone,
One hue of hope, is gone
From song or bloom beneath the summer skies.

Call me not hence away,
Death, Death! ere yet decay
Over the golden hours one shade hath thrown;
The poesy that dwells
Deep in green woods and dells,
Still to my spirit speaks of joy alone.

Yet not for this, O Death!
Not for the vernal breath
Of winds, that shake forth music from the trees;
Not for the splendour given
To Night's dark regal heaven,
Spoiler! I ask thee not reprieve for these

But for the happy love
Whose light, where'er I rove,
Kindles all nature in a sudden smile,
Shedding on branch and flower
A rainbow-tinted shower
Of richer life — spare, spare me yet awhile!

Too soon, too fast thou'rt come!
Too beautiful is home,
A home of gentle voices and kind eyes!
And I the loved of all,
On whom fond blessings fall
From every lip —oh! wilt thou rend such ties?

Sweet Sisters! weave a chain
My spirit to detain;
Hold me to earth with strong affection back!
Bind me with mighty love
Unto the stream, the grove,
Our daily paths — our life's familiar track!

Stay with me — gird me round!
Your voices bear a sound
Of hope — a light comes with you and departs;
Hush my soul's boding knell
That murmurs of farewell!
How can I leave this ring of kindest hearts?

Death! Grave! and are there those
That woo your dark repose
Midst the rich beauty of the glowing earth?
Surely about them lies
No world of loving eyes —
Leave me, oh! leave me unto home and hearth!

Clara Mandeville.

A Tale of British India.

(FOUNDED ON FACT.)

Of all the innumerable host of projectors, whose „bootless fabrics" of philanthropy or self-interest find toleration, at least, if not favour, in the eyes of a world compounded of theorists like themselves, the only class on whom the anathemas of youth, and even the censures of all, are unsparingly lavished, are those parents who, combining something of an „old world" sense of property in, and authority over their children, with a yet more unfeigned solicitude for their substantial happiness in life, venture to cast their old age in the prospect of uniting them to partners less showy perchance, but often more enduringly valuable, than those whom giddy inexperience, or fickle fancy, have made the gods of their youthful idolatry.

Far be it from me to affirm that parents should influence, beyond a certain point, far less constrain the inclinations of their children. All I claim on their part is pardon, at least, for the wish to place happiness within their reckless offspring's grasp, and for myself the privilege of recording one of the many instances in which persistence and regret were synonymous things.

Mr. Mandeville — and I knew him well — was a Civil servant of long standing and great eminence at one of our eastern presidencies. Partial to the country in which he had resided from youth to age, and engrossed by important judicial functions, he had deferred visiting Europe till nearly all that were dear to him there had departed. I left him a stranger on his native soil; and when he returned to India, it was with a chilled heart and repressed affections, and the secret determination to die, as he had lived — in the East.

But he did not return alone. A fair cousin, of the few ties had left him, consented — though from disparity of years, with some hesitation — to be the companion of his exile; and never for a moment did Lucy Warner regret the day when she exchanged her name for that of Mandeville. Confidence the most unbounded, affection the most tender and mutual, soon united her to the mild and generous husband, whose added years were soon forgotten in the maturity of worth with which they were conjoined.

They were but too happy; till, having lost several children — and, something whispered, in consequence of the delay in sending them home so natural to a parent advanced in life, and dubious of witnessing their return — a precisely opposite feeling of imperative duty induced Mandeville to insist on his wife's accompanying their only remaining child — a daughter — herself to England.

The sacrifice was great on both sides, and the struggle severe; but the child was equally precious and delicate, and parental solicitude prevailed. Nor, during the long ten years of watching over the precarious health of their mutual darling, could the anxious mother find one interval of sufficient ease of mind to enable her to return to India.

The object of all these solicitudes seemed at length suddenly to outgrow them. She expanded at once from a pale and sickly exotic into a blooming British rose — hardy enough in appearance to bear transplanting to the parental bosom which yearned to call over its dear and absent treasures.

Mrs. Mandeville lost not a moment in realising, as soon as prudence would permit, her husband's long cherished anticipations. She sailed for India with her daughter, a fine blooming girl of sixteen, the youthful and more animated fac simile of what her mother had been, when, as the bride of her worthy father, she embarked on the same voyage.

But she herself, alas! was sadly changed; not by years, for she as yet numbered few — but by the mining influence of climate and bereavement while in India, and anxiety and separation in England. She did not live to gladden the heart of Mandeville with that tried and cherished blessing which had so long been folded to it, and still longer so cruelly estranged. She died almost within the waters of the Ganges to which her torn and divided heart had ever unconsciously clung, and it was a stranger's office to bid a heart-broken father embrace his motherless child.

But it was soon that child's office and privilege to recall a smile, though a subdued one, to lips which never thought to smile again. The resemblance to her mother, at first so painful, which Clara bore, endeared her inexpressibly to her surviving parent; nay in his slightly enfeebled state of mind, as well as body, it established a kind of identity between them which even made his loss, though ever deplored, less sensibly felt.

Lucy, early married to one so much her senior, had been thoughtful, even in the midst of happiness; but Clara's gay disposition luxuriated in the sunshine of parental indulgence, like the bright flowers of the soil she trod. To contradict her, or deny aught to one so lovely and loving, never seemed to her doting father within the range of possibility; and Clara soon ruled, where her mother had found felicity in obeying.

Young, beautiful, and from her father's known emoluments, a supposed heiress, Clara was soon the idol of Calcutta, as well as of her father's heart; and as she fluttered through its lighted ball-rooms, bright and dazzling as the fire-flies of an eastern heaven, satellites of all ranks and ages were drawn into her sparkling track.

In the graceful abandon of early youth, she smiled at first almost alike on all; but least, perhaps, ere long, on him, whom of all the admiring throng her father would have wished to fix for ever at her feet. This was his own tried and valued friend of half a life-time — a man, whom to name, was to personify worth and honor, of years not near enough his own to share the loves and graces from the compact, but too remote from Clara's childish standard to let her see in Mr. Courtenay what he really was — a noble-looking finished gentleman of five-and-thirty, with manliness and candour stamped by nature on a brow, some prematurely scattered grey hairs on which served to enroll him in the school-girl list of ci-devants.

His fortune and high station, the dazzling mark at which the whole female artillery of Bengal had for years been aimed in vain, she was too young and disinterested to take into the account. But while it was so drawn in her father's eyes, compared with Courtenay's high integrity and intense capacities for domestic happiness, it could not in human nature be overlooked by a parent, whose own princely hospitalities, liberal as the heart that dictated them, would leave, as he rather suspected than cared to ascertain, but a scanty reversion for his indulged and expensively-educated daughter. The melancholy blank created by the absence of wife and child, he had insensibly filled up, by adopting every young creature who reminded him of blessings lost but to be resumed; and doubts, too well founded, of ever being survived by one among his many children, deferred economy till time and habit rendered it impracticable.

Mr. Mandeville, though too upright to have deceived for a moment on this score one serious aspirant to Clara's heart and hand, did not feel called upon to proclaim the state of his affairs to the host of flutterers who surrounded her, and most of whom it would have sufficed to disperse. To Courtenay alone, who was in this as in every thing else his second self, he had no reserves; and but spoke in perfect sincerity, when regretting the obstacle her slender expectations presented to his darling project, of giving her, in Courtenay, a protector after his own heart. The disclosure so much dreaded, had a precisely opposite effect from what Mandeville (spite of twenty years' knowledge of his friend) anticipated. It seemed to release Courtenay from the influence of some withering spell; and, on the strength of it, he, whom genuine diffidence had hitherto kept a distant lingerer in Clara's train, now ventured to betray the feelings which all, save herself, watched in wondering envy of her rare good fortune.

Her eyes and thoughts, alas! were otherwise employed; and her ear engrossed by the least amiable, perhaps, though not least fascinating, of the younger votaries at her feet. A gay young soldier of a cavalry corps up the country, on his way to England, chiefly for that maladie du pays, which sorry veterans are apt to translate by the harsh synonymes of idleness and dislike of hardships, was thrown in evil hour in Clara's daily path. She began by sympathy with his supposed illness and exile — and pitied — till she induced him, ere long, to forget both. There mingled something of gratified pride in renovating the bloom and cheering the spirits of the handsome reputed invalid; and when devotion to her bright eyes could throw home and country, and all on which he had eloquently expatiated, into utter oblivion, the triumph of conquest was unhappily complete.

The attentions of Brabazon — though all who have been in India can appreciate those of a penniless captain of dragoons to a rich civil servant's daughter — were not, to do him justice, entirely dictated by interest. He admired — for who could do otherwise — the cynosure of Calcutta, nay, returned her girlish devotion with such a passion as triumphant vanity and gratified ambition can dignify with the name of love.

Their liaison was soon the universal topic, and all, save the faithful Courtenay, seemed inclined to give place to the youthful Caesar, who had „come and seen," only to „conquer." But Mr. Mandeville — whom, as an absentee since his wife's death from festive scenes, the flirtation between his daughter and Brabazon was the last to reach — was shocked beyond measure by an attachment, which, while it overthrew the darling project of a life-time, threatened his only child with a lot so widely different from what he had planned for her.

On one hand, ease and affluence awaited her, under the guiding influence of a man of lofty talent and sterling principle, and one who, to a mother's feminine tenderness, would add a father's solicitude, and a lover's chivalrous devotion. On the other, there was a life of separation from her father and society — a life of certain hardship and privation, amid the thousand chances of Indian warfare, with a witty, thoughtless lad, already familiar with folly, if not vice — and as unfit as the babe unborn to guide a child like Clara through a path, beset with snares and thorns.

One expedient alone — when eloquence had been exhausted on one too loving not to listen, nay, with tears, though too long indulged to yield — her father hoped might work on her young suitor, if not upon his daughter. When he reminded Clara (though with all a parent's delicacy), that the ten years' double establishment her own weak health and lavish education imposed, had left him little beyond the salary which must die with him, she had thought too seldom on the subject to feel more than momentary disappointment; and when her father hinted more explicitly still, at the probable effect of the information he felt bound to impart on one less inexperienced in the world than herself, she unhesitatingly consented to stake on his own decision the chances of union with her lover.

This Mr. Mandeville hailed with transport, as nearly tantamount with its relinquishment; but to his horror and dismay, the exposé of his finances — though „nothing extenuated" by one who clung to it as the talisman that might save his child — had no effect in inducing Brabazon to retract his pretensions. For this conduct, which (as inferring disinterestedness) insensibly disarmed much of the good parent's hostility to the match, there was one simple reason, „never dreamed of in his philosophy," viz that Brabazon did not believe him! He looked upon the statement as purely apocryphal — as a fatherly manoeuvre to get rid of an unwelcome son-in-law; and when he protested, that with Miss Mandeville's future prospects, be they what they might, he was perfectly content, he merely signified (according to a young captain's usual estimate of the hoards of a thirty years' resident) his entire approbation of some twenty or perhaps thirty thousand pounds.

In vain did Mr. Mandeville reiterate and remonstrate: the soldier scorned to be out-generalled by a civilian, and stood firm. Clara appealed triumphantly to her father's accepted alternative, and more irresistibly still to the love which could deny her nothing, not even ruin! — and with the presentiments of one who saw his sole hope embark in a slight gilded vessel, on an ocean more treacherous still, Mr. Mandeville saw his wilful girl become the wife of the gay dragoon.

The separation, which might, even in the full tide of passion, have appalled poor Clara, — who, though she had not yet learned to think, could feel, and that acutely — was deferred by the interest of her father, which enabled him to detain the pair for a few short months of bridal festivity at Calcutta. But reported disturbances in the upper provinces, soon left a soldier, even a carpet one, no option; and Brabazon, and the wife worlds would not have detained behind him, set out together for his regiment.

The shock of this parting, and its cause, though the rumoured danger proved imaginary, Mr. Mandeville never entirely recovered. He vegetated on, during a couple of years of feverish anxiety, watching the tone of his daughter's letters for indications of altered feelings, which it would have been death to find realised — half thankful that Brabazon still seemed all the world to her — half mortified to think that, separated from him by some thousands of miles, she could taste unmingled happiness!

Thus all his remaining energies centered in providing. As long as life lasted, the ample emoluments of his office were shared with, or rather lavished on the young couple. Luxuries unknown in the camp, followed, nay, even preceded their frequent removals; and nearly the last act of parental solicitude (a prophetic and most important one) was enquiring into, and paying up, the long arrears of his improvident son-in-law's contribution to the military fund — on which, something whispered, his poor girl's subsistence might, one day or other, depend. This done, his long undermined constitution fell an easy prey to a prevailing epidemic, and Clara, who had been importuning with reviving filial anxiety her husband to let her visit her father, received, in the act of embarking, the news of his sudden death.

It was not destined, like other misfortunes, to stand long single. To the pangs of natural grief, and secret self-upbraiding, were soon added the more degrading annoyances arising from the extent of Brabazon's disappointment. As long as Mr. Mandeville lived, his splendid allowance and liberal presents kept pace with even a spendthrift's expectations; and though soon irritable and capricious (as gamblers, whether on turf or billiard table — and Brabazon was both — proverbially are), he had too good reasons for keeping well with his father-in-law, to quarrel with or neglect his wife. But when the will was opened, and a paltry sum of three thousand pounds (fully as much more having been, to his secret vexation, appropriated to cover the arrears before mentioned) proved to be the whole splendid dowry of the wife whose imaginary expectations — for he could not complain of deception in the matter — had led him into expences far beyond an officer's limited means, he reproached the unoffending Clara with the very pertinacity of affection which had made her prefer him to affluence and Courtenay!

His downward progress in the career of dissipation, was, from this moment, rapid and headlong. Difficulties which he had not the courage to look in the face, were encreased at the gaming table, and then drowned in the midnight bowl; and his finances now forbidding the riotous hospitality from which even Clara's gay disposition had early shrunk, she was left whole days and nights in the lonely bungalow, while her husband revived, by a course of intemperance, the threatening symptoms which had sent him once before — fatally, alas! for her peace! — to Calcutta to embark for Europe.

It was now that Clara, weakened in mind and body by her sorrows and approaching confinement, first learned to feel acutely the bitterness of her own chosen lot. But it was not till she had wept (scarce cheered by a transient gleam of reviving affection in its father) over the marble features of her dead infant, that a full sense of all she had owed to her own father, and made him suffer, took possession of her altered mind. Alas! it was too late; and remorse sometimes taught her to consider the removal of her babe as an act of special retribution.

She had little leisure to brood over these painful reminiscences, for dissipation and disease are alike foes to duty; and Brabazon, at best but an indifferent soldier, taxed severely his commanding officer's compassionate indulgence. His mind as well as body were, ere long, so weakened by a short but headlong course of riot, that his dismissal on furlough promised as much benefit to the regiment as to himself; and it was with feelings of deep mortification as well as sorrow that Clara set out to return with him to that Calcutta which had witnessed their inauspicious nuptials.

The first part of the monotonous and usually uneventful voyage was performed as comfortably as slender means, and, consequently, limited accommodations, would permit. Only two or three ordinary native servants (independent of the boatmen) assisted Clara in her fatiguing attendance on an irritable and capricious invalid, whom the disgraceful circumstances of what he felt to be a virtual retreat from the service, preyed upon, though they could not reform.

His health seemed, however, gradually amending under the influence of change of air and scene; when, towards afternoon of one of the hottest and most oppressive days the travellers had experienced, he was suddenly seized, after indiscreet exposure, with symptoms too much resembling those of the Indian malady since so fatally known in Europe. The remedies — if such there be — were too familiar not to be at hand. They were administered; and in the temporary rally they occasioned, his removal to some spot where coolness and shelter superior to those of the budgerow could be obtained, became indispensable. In vain his anxious wife strained her eyes, and interrogated her attendants, in the hope of some pagoda or choultry within a reasonable distance from the river, to which it might be possible, without risk of his life, to carry the sufferer. None such existed. At length one of the boatmen, who had on a former occasion accompanied European travellers thither, recollected a cave in the hills (at this point closely approaching the river), which promised, if the invalid could reach it alive, the requisite shade and shelter.

He thought he might be able to thread the path to it, through the jungle, if guided by shouts from the boat, in the proper direction of the sharp conical hill in whose bowels he knew the cavern to be situated; and a rude palanquin being formed of a mattress from the boat lashed across the oars, a sufficient number of bearers set forward, accompanied on foot by the weeping Clara, to whom terror and anxiety lent activity for an exercise so little familiar to Indian females.

To enhance the other painful circumstances under which the journey was performed, there were wellfounded apprehensions among the natives of the tigers with which they knew the jungle swarmed; and ever and anon, when Clara, either absorbed in more distressing reflections, or insensibly withdrawn from them by the exquisite beauty of the scenery, was inclined to forget this formidable peril, she was painfully reminded of it by the screech and whirr of some stately peacock, whose sure instinct of danger quickened that of the pusillanimous unarmed natives.

The chief servant flourished indeed, in idle demonstration of protection, his poor master's costly fowling-piece; but slight was the dependence which in case of real danger a helpless woman could place in the courage and fidelity of mercenaries, long irregularly paid, and half alienated by Brabazon's capricious treatment. In Providence, and Providence alone could poor Clara now confide — with the humility which penitence teaches, and the trust religion only can inspire.

With difficulty, and occasional deviation from the right course, they at length gained the cave. The shattered nerves of Clara recoiled from the simultaneous shout given by the bearers, to ascertain that no fierce inmate of the forest had anticipated them in selecting the cavern for his lair; and in the moment of breathless suspense which succeeded, when the post of each Indian at the foot of the nearest tree left it but too easy

... graves (in the event of their fears being realised) the fate of the helpless immoveable victim in the litter. — Clara paid the penalty of long years of thoughtlessness and folly. All was at length pronounced safe. One bolder than the rest kindled a torch to explore the cavern, whose low and narrow entrance — hardly admitting of the rude litter being dragged rather than carried through it — gave little promise of the extent and loftiness of the excavation within.

Though far inferior in these points to the more celebrated caves once used as places of worship in various parts of India, that which they now entered bore the traces of gigantic labour and elaborate though barbarous sculpture. At its further end, too dimly lighted by the narrow opening to dispense with the torches which the natives (rendered provident by their recollection of its darkness) had fortunately brought with them — was deposited, on a couch of branches hastily collected in the jungle, the mattress of the exhausted patient, whom the motion of the litter and the giant strides of Indian bearers had sunk in total and apparently hopeless stupor.

Such arrangements as circumstances permitted were made for his sojourn in a place which it was more than probable he would never quit alive; and before the rapid nightfall of a tropical climate, the once gay, indulged Clara was left all but alone — amid the half-scared owls and bats of a dreary abandoned cavern, surrounded by the symbols of Indian idolatry — with the fast-expiring human idol, to whom she had sacrificed with equal infatuation, name, influence, her own happiness and that of a parent — stiffening before her into a ghastliness of repose little inferior to that of the grim demon whose vices he had emulated!

All within the cavern was solitude and desolation. The bearers had fled, availing themselves of the brief twilight, to the necessary care of their host, which their presence and large fires could alone protect from the depredation of midnight marauders, and the visits of the wild denizens of the forest, — whose incessant roar came, softened perhaps, but deepened by the windings of the cavern into strange unearthly groanings, upon Clara's wakeful shuddering ear.

The head servant — on whose lately insolent demeanour compassion for his mistress seemed to have worked a pitying change — had gone out at her earnest entreaty, armed with a torch in one hand, and their sole weapon, the gun before-mentioned, in the other, to fetch water from a spring, to moisten lips which the thirst of disease and death was parching into agony. The two other Hindoos had stationed themselves outside the cavern, to feed with unslumbering vigilance the fire at its entrance on which their safety depended; and Clara was thus alone with the well-nigh insensible wreck of all she had loved so madly — nay, still at this moment loved, through unworthiness and neglect; for whose immortal part, fast fitting to its dread account, the long polluted echoes of this heathen fane were waked that livelong night with many a christian prayer.

She prayed too for herself — for pardon for the past, and guidance for the future — and for that special guardianship of the widow, which she felt it would soon be hers to claim from heaven alone. Relations in India she had none; and from the friends of her father, alienated no doubt by her unfeeling conduct, what had she to expect but reproaches or avoidance?

In such orisons and such reflections the long night was spent. With the last expiring torch of her store, the flickering gleam of life she yet watched over was gradually extinguished.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Das BRITISH MUSEUM [illegible]

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nro 41.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Clara Manderville.

A Tale of British India.

(FOUNDED ON FACT.)

(Concluded from our last.)

APPALLED by the prolonged sound of the last sigh of mortality in such a scene and hour, and oppressed by a sense of invincible terror, Clara flew to the entrance of the cave, to call the slumbering attendants, and breathe a moment the invigorating air.

The transition seemed as to paradise, from the sickly atmosphere of that murky cavern, to the sparkling beauty of Eastern scenics — beneath hills, clothed to their airy summits with odoriferous shrubs, and amid a forest whose waving branches were spangled with diamond dew-drops, and gemmed with birds of every rainbow hue, whose matin song, if inferior in harmony to that of the choristers of Europe, yet repaid in wildness and variety the absence of her native melodies.

The contrast was overpowering, from the stillness of desolation and mortality within to the flush of vegetation and tumult of life without; and Clara would have shrunk in natural revulsion of feeling from a gaiety so discordant, had she not recoiled in real alarm at the unaccountable absence of the servants, and the glimpse — for it was no more — which she caught of a wild-looking native in the savage garb of the hill country, armed not only with their peculiar bow and arrows, but a formidable glittering creese or dagger — who was loitering, in lieu of her scared attendants, beside the embers of their abandoned fire.

Clara now gave herself up for lost, and prayed fervently for escape from the worse than death and pillage which perhaps awaited her. She had thrown herself on the body of her husband — partly from inextinguishable remains of affection, partly from the hope of protection even his inanimate remains might afford — when the sound of cheerful European voices gave rise to another rush of emotion as overwhelming as the sense of utter abandonment which preceded.

The cave was, even in the brilliancy of morning, too dimly lighted to be at once explored by eyes fresh from the glare without; and two Europeans, a gentleman and his servant, attended by several natives, had advanced some way into it, ere they perceived, with an astonishment better to be conceived than expressed, the melancholy spectacle exhibited by the dead English officer, and the scarce less pallid being by whom he was in death convulsively embraced.

An exclamation from the leader of the party smote like a knell of judgment, on the ear, while it yet involuntarily spoke comfort to the heart of poor Clara. It was the voice of the rejected, long-forgotten Courtenay, whom Providence, at this her greatest need, had sent, at once to humble and console her! It came associated with all the now embittered, yet ever cherished memories of her home and father — and for the first time during her brief but intense agony, she found relief in tears.

The runaway servants, re-assured by the presence of the stranger's numerous retinue, now came in; the one who had gone for water, with a tale, probable enough to be true, of such pressing danger in the dusk from tigers, as left him no alternative but to remain in a tall tree until daylight; the others, (whom similar fears had basely withdrawn from their watch, careless of the fate of the helpless pair within,) from the river, whither they pretended to have but just gone to ascertain the fate of the boatmen.

One thing only was evident — that the fair sufferer within had been basely deserted by cowardly menials, and that she must be rescued from hands so unworthy of confidence. This resolution, so inevitable in a Briton and a countryman, was adopted by Courtenay before even a suspicion crossed him of ever having seen its object. But when, slowly rising like a spectre from the rude bier of her once gay, handsome bridegroom, Clara Mandeville stood before him, with dishevelled hair, and speech rendered incoherent by the rapid events and torturing anxieties of the last twenty-four hours, and implored him, as her father's friend, to lay her husband in a Christian grave — the firmness which had never before deserted him fairly gave way to emotions the most complicated and painful. Pity, however, and sympathy of the tenderest kind, of course predominated; and, after insisting on bearing her out of the dismal cave into the morning breeze, and preparing for her a couch of fresh boughs under the impervious shade of a huge banian tree, her heaven-sent protector lost not a moment in making the more melancholy arrangements, which the climate rendered indispensable, for the speedy and honourable interment of his once-envied rival.

The nearest settlement was too distant to admit of the removal thither of the senseless remains; and when, in absence of the beautiful burial service of the liturgy, its most affecting portion (the fourteenth chapter of Corinthians) was read over them by the deep, mild voice of Courtenay from the Bible (hastily procured from his boat) which, since first placed by a mother's hand amid his slender boyish wardrobe, had been his inseparable companion through life — even the heart of a wife felt no lack of a holier ritual, or a more soothing ministry!

The place of sepulture chosen was the cave itself, both as less exposed to the depredations of wild animals, and more easily identified in memory than a nameless spot in a trackless forest; and a slab of rock, which Nature herself had detached, formed an appropriate grave-stone.

When the last sad duties to the dead were completed, the next thought of Courtenay was for the comfort of the survivor. Gladly would he have been her escort to Calcutta, whither, no doubt, she might wish to proceed, but duty called him in a precisely opposite direction; and to allow her to perform the long, remaining voyage with none but native attendants of such doubtful fidelity, was not for a moment to be thought of.

Through the medium of a billet, as delicacy forbade his personal intrusion, he requested her permission to precede her, by a few hours, to the nearest military station up the river, and to prepare for her cordial reception the lady of the commandant, a particular friend of his own; to which he added, partly from consideration for her superior accommodation, but chiefly from distrust of her native servants, the proposal of an exchange of boats, by which he could be enabled to leave her in charge of his own tried and obsequious domestics.

To all this the humbled, heart-broken Clara could only signify her tearful acquiescence. Her nerves and spirits shrunk alike from the perils of the voyage to Calcutta, and from a return to that scene of her giddy triumphs and ill-starred marriage. Placing herself, therefore, implicitly under the guidance of one whom she considered as her dear father's delegated representative, she saw him depart, and sunk at length, surrounded by a guard of vigilant defenders, into a long slumber of exhaustion.

On her awaking, she was conducted, with the respect a princess might have commanded, to the spacious barge of office, fitted up with every eastern luxury, in which Courtenay had embarked on a tour of inspection into some reported abuses in the collection of the revenue in the upper provinces. How strange and complicated were her feelings while taking possession of a state and accommodation which might, but for her own rashness, have been legitimately hers!

Engrossed as she was by more painful and pressing anxieties, two objects in the cabin riveted her attention, — the simple book shelf whence had hastily been snatched (from amid comrades worthy of itself) the Bible used in the late and funeral rites, and — sharper than a thousand daggers — the picture of her dear, lost, too indulgent father! She gazed on it till her brain wavered, and her heart melted beneath its melancholy smile — then kissing it with frantic self-upbraiding, rushed up on deck for air.

Daily, during the three days' tedious passage up-stream to M——, did she revisit, with mingled emotions, this cherished likeness; and there, under the deep teaching of Affliction and Religion, did she for ever abjure the follies which had grieved a parent, and the sentiments which had given rise to them. To live henceforward as would have pleased her father, for others, not herself, was her inalienable resolution; and as it was made in pious diffidence, it was registered at a higher tribunal, and, in the strength of a higher power, maintained!

As the first step of merited self-abasement, Clara resolved to accept the charitable good offices of Courtenay and his female friend, in the spirit in which they were tendered, with no rebellious feelings of pride, but simple, unmixed gratitude to Heaven and its appointed agents. This feeling, and her recent grief, imparted to her manner such a touching and unaffected humility, that Mrs. G——, who had remembered but to dread or despise the silly, undutiful Clara Mandeville, felt disposed to take to her heart, as well as home, the chastened, widowed Mrs. Dalmaine.

Courtenay, whom instinctive delicacy still taught to defer their meeting, only awaited the arrival of his own boat to proceed on his mission; on his return from which, in about five months, he hoped to be permitted to see his old friend's daughter in safety to Calcutta, or whithersoever else she should wish to be escorted. Till then, she was the [illegible], and soon deeply-endeared guest, of the wife of the commandant at M——, in whose valuable society (for she declined all other) her tardy mental education was at length perfected.

A life of regularity and peace, while the past was disarmed of its sting by present piety and virtuous resolve for the future, soon brought again the charm, if not the bloom, of beauty to Clara's faded cheek. The widow's dress, so trying to most styles of countenance, harmonized, as though designed for it, with the meek Madonna expression which had supplanted the saucy smile so tantalizing in former days to the infatuated Courtenay. When she smiled now, that smile was irresistible — it seemed a tribute gently yielded to some pleasurable feeling in others which the fair smiler had herself for ever, though calmly and unostentatiously, abjured.

Such was Clara, when, at the end of some months longer than he had anticipated, Courtenay announced his approaching arrival at M—. This event compelled her to come to some determination regarding her future projects. To remain with her kind friend at M—, however tempting, was not to be indulged in; and the fittest task which the now zealously cultivated benevolent feelings of Clara could suggest — was the devotion of her society and attentions to soothe the declining years of a maiden sister of her father's, whom she remembered as having been kind to her childhood, when in England. To this old lady, her scanty pension would prevent her being a burden, while her resemblance to her father would render every trial which age or infirmity might impose, comparatively light.

This resolution, formed and communicated to

Mrs. G —— before Mr. Courtenay arrived, enabled Clara to encounter with more of fortitude and less of embarrassment, a meeting so fraught with painful reminiscences. Courtenay struggled less successfully for composure — especially since her wonderful return to her former self (the starry smile and laughing eye excepted) brought Calcutta rather than the Cave of B* before his unprepared mind's eye.

There was that in the demeanour of both — in their ill concealed confusion, and incoherent enquiries, and evident fear of any save the commonest topics — which convinced Mrs. G —— that all would end as it should do, in the triumph of a virtuous steady attachment over painful recollections and honest scruples, and a genuine sense of disparity, no longer in years, but in worth and merit.

This induced her to venture on the present detention of the letter actually written by Clara to old Aunt Mandeville in England and to sanction by her presence in quality of chaperon, the voyage of Mrs. Brabazon, under the escort of Courtenay, to Calcutta.

When abreast of the Cave of B——, natural feelings prompted poor Clara to wish to revisit it — and the wish was too amiable to find opposers in either Courtenay or Mrs. G——. While repassing, cheered by such friendly supporters, the well-remembered jungle, which she had so despairingly traversed only a short year before, Clara's heart swelled with gratitude, as well as with the emotion inseparable from the abrupt dissolution of ties so close, however uncongenial.

It was a satisfaction to the latter feeling to find the grave and its rude tombstone undisturbed; nay more, a private order from Courtenay had graced it with a plain inscription, commemorating the decease at this romantic spot of a youthful British officer. For whom this delicate tribute was in reality destined, it was not difficult to divine. It was felt and acknowledged with such a sweet mixture of grace and confusion, that Mrs. G——, one of those strong-minded, straight forward persons who, by abjuring false delicacy, often so discreetly cut the Gordian knots which finer natures find it difficult to untie — took a hand of each, and said, with a solemnity of manner suitable to the scene and circumstances — „My dear friends, strange as may seem to you the place and time I have rather availed myself of than chosen — I do not know that earth could, after all, afford a fitter — for the one to express, or the other to avow, sentiments to which on one side at least, this cavern and its incidents gave birth. Yonder grave has closed over an ill-starred union. If spirits partake our feelings, and any thing could add a drop of gladness to the bliss of Clara's sainted father — it would be seeing her faith plighted and heart devoted to one, who has wasted in devotion to her the best years of his life, and who can ill afford to yield to punctilio and etiquette a share of its remaining happiness.

„That you, Courtenay, love, and have ever loved Clara, your joyless solitary condition, so foreign from your nature, may amply convince her. That she esteems, nay I might on any other spot be tempted to say, loves you — that blush and downcast eye save her the effort of denying. Here, then, where first your fates were strangely joined by Providence on earth, let them be finally united for Eternity! The voice from yonder grave, far from reproving, would bless and sanction the union. It is not pure kind love like yours that need shrink from the awful presence of the dead. From that of the living, now that the ice is broken, and my office done — I will release you."

So saying, this singular woman walked to the mouth of the cave, where she was soon followed by those, whose streaming eyes, if not their lips, thanked her, for smoothing their path to mutual happiness.

My tale is at an end. — Years after these events, I saw Clara in England, the happy, honoured wife of the man of her father's choice; and as I contrasted him with the being her own rash preference had well nigh linked her to for life, I ended, as I began, by surmising, that parents might sometimes, if not always, be the best judges of their children's happiness!

The Splendid Annual.

By the Author of „Sayings and Doings."

Literature, even in this literary age, is not the ordinary pursuit of the citizens of London, although every merchant is necessarily a man of letters, and underwriters are as common as cucumbers. Notwithstanding, however, my being a citizen, I am tempted to disclose the miseries and misfortunes of my life in these pages, because having heard the „Anniversary" called a splendid annual, I hope for sympathy from its readers, seeing that I have been a „splendid annual" myself.

My name is Scroggs — I am an Alderman — I was Sheriff — I have been Lord Mayor — and the three great eras of my existence were the year of my shrievalty, the year of my mayoralty, and the year after it. Until I had passed through this ordeal I had no conception of the extremes of happiness and wretchedness to which a human being may be carried, nor ever believed that society presented to its members, an eminence so exalted as that which I once touched, or imagined a fall so great as that which I experienced.

I came originally from that place to which persons of bad character are said to be sent — I mean Coventry, where my father for many years contributed his share to the success of parliamentary candidates, the happiness of new married couples, and even the gratification of ambitious courtiers, by taking part in the manufacture of ribands for election cockades, wedding favours, and cordons of chivalry; but trade failed, and, like his betters, he became bankrupt, but, unlike his betters, without any consequent advantage to himself; and I, at the age of fifteen, was thrown upon the world with nothing but a strong constitution, a moderate education, and fifteen shillings and eleven pence three farthings in my pocket.

With these qualifications I started from my native town on a pedestrian excursion to London; and although I fell into none of those romantic adventures of which I had read at school, I met with more kindness than the world generally gets credit for, and on the fourth day after my departure, having slept soundly, if not magnificently, every night, and dined with an appetite which my mode of travelling was admirably calculated to stimulate, reached the great metropolis, having preserved of my patrimony, no less a sum than nine shillings and seven pence.

The bells of one of the churches in the city were ringing merrily as I descended the heights of Islington; and were it not that my patronymic Scroggs never could, under the most improved system of campanology, be jingled into any thing harmonious, I have no doubt I, like my great predecessor Whittington, might have heard in that peal a prediction of my future exaltation; certain it is I did not; and, wearied with my journey, I took up my lodging for the night at a very humble house near Smithfield, to which I had been kindly recommended by the driver of a return postchaise, of whose liberal offer of the moiety of his bar to town I had availed myself at Barnet.

As it is not my intention to deduce a moral from my progress in the world at this period of my life, I need not here dilate upon the good policy of honesty, or the advantages of temperance and perseverance, by which I worked my way upwards, until after meriting the confidence of an excellent master, I found myself enjoying it fully. To his business I succeeded at his death, having several years before, with his sanction, married a young and deserving woman, about my own age, of whose prudence and skill in household matters I had long had a daily experience. In the subordinate character of his sole domestic servant, in which she figured when I first knew her, she had but few opportunities of displaying her intellectual qualities, but when she rose in the world, and felt the cheering influence of prosperity, her mind, like a balloon soaring into regions where the bright sun beams on it, expanded, and she became, as she remains, the kind unsophisticated partner of my sorrows and my pleasures, the friend of my heart, and the guiding star of my destinies.

To be brief, Providence blessed my efforts and increased my means; I became a wholesale dealer in every thing, from barrels of gunpowder down to pickled herrings; in the civic acceptation of the world I was a merchant, amongst the vulgar I am called a drysalter. I accumulated wealth; with my fortune my family also grew, and one male Scroppe, and four female ditto, grace my board at least once in every week; for I hold it an article of faith to have a sirloin of roasted beef upon my table on Sundays, and all my children round me to partake of it: this may be prejudice — no matter — so long as he could afford it, my poor father did so before me; I plead that precedent, and am not ashamed of the custom.

Passing over the minor gradations of my life, the removal from one residence to another, the enlargement of this warehouse, the rebuilding of that, the anxiety of a canvass for common council man, activity in the company of which I am liveryman, inquests, and vestries, and ward meetings, and all the other pleasing toils to which an active citizen is subject, let us come at once to the first marked epoch of my life — the year of my Shrievalty. The announcement of my nomination and election filled Mrs. S. with delight; and when I took my children to Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, to look at the gay chariot brushing up for me, I confess I felt proud and happy to be able to show my progeny the arms of London, those of the Spectacle Makers Company, and those of the Scroppes (recently found at a trivial expense) all figuring upon the same pannels. They looked magnificent upon the pea-green ground, and the wheels, „white picked out crimson," looked so chaste, and the hammercloth, and the fringe, and the festoons, and the Scroppe' crests all looked so rich, and the silk linings and white tassels, and the squabs and the yellow cushions and the crimson carpet looked so comfortable, that, as I stood contemplating the equipage, I said to myself, „What have I done to deserve this? — O that my poor father were alive to see his boy Jack going down to Westminster, to chop sticks and count hobnails, in a carriage like this!" My children were like mad things: and in the afternoon, when I put on my first new brown court suit (lined, like my chariot, with white silk) and fitted up with cut steel buttons, just to try the effect, it all appeared like a dream: the sword, which I tried on, every night for half an hour after I went up to bed, to practise walking with it, was very inconvenient at first; but use is second nature; and so by rehearsing and rehearsing I made myself perfect before that auspicious day when Sheriffs flourish and geese prevail — namely, the twenty-ninth of September.

The twelve months which followed were very delightful, for independently of the positive honour and éclat they produced, I had the Mayoralty in prospectu (having attained my aldermanic gown by an immense majority the preceding year,) and as I used during the sessions to sit in my box at the Old Bailey, with my bag at my back and my bouquet on my book, my thoughts were wholly devoted to one object of contemplation; culprits stood trembling to hear the verdict of a jury, and I regarded them not; convicts knelt to receive the fatal fiat of the Recorder, and I heeded not their sufferings, as I watched the Lord Mayor seated in the centre of the bench, with the sword of justice stuck up in a goblet over his head — there, thought I, if I live two years, shall I sit — however, even as it was, it was very agreeable. When executions, the chief drawbacks to my delight, happened, I found, after a little seasoning, I took the thing coolly, and enjoyed my toast and tea after the patients were turned off, just as if nothing had happened; for, in my time, we hanged at eight and breakfasted at a quarter after, so that without much hurry we were able to finish our muffins just in time for the cutting down at nine. I had to go to the House of Commons with a petition, and to Court with an address — trying situations for one of the Scroppes — however, the want of state in parliament, and the very little attention paid to us by the members, put me quite at my ease in Westminster; while the gracious urbanity of our accomplished Monarch on his throne made me equally comfortable at St. James's. Still I was but a secondary person, or rather only one of two secondary persons — the chief of bailiffs and principal Jack Ketch; there was a step to gain — and, as I often mentioned in confidence to Mrs. Scroggs, I was sure my heart would never be still until I had reached the pinnacle.

Behold at length the time arrived! — Guildhall crowded to excess — the hustings thronged — the aldermen retire — they return — their choice is announced to the people — it has fallen upon John Ebenezer Scroggs, Esq. Alderman and spectacle maker — a sudden shout is heard — „Scroggs for ever!“ resounds — the whole assembly seems to vanish from my sight — I come forward — am invested with the chain — I bow — make a speech — tumble over the train of the Recorder, and tread upon the tenderest toe of Mr. Deputy Fade — leave the hall in ecstasy, and drive home to Mrs. Scroggs in a state of mind bordering upon insanity.

The days wore on, each one seemed as long as a week, until at length the eighth of November arrived, and then did it seem certain that I should be Lord Mayor — I was sworn in — the civic insignia were delivered to me — I returned them to the proper officers — my chaplain was near me — the esquires of my household were behind me — the thing was done — never shall I forget the tingling sensation I felt in my ear when I was first called „My Lord“ — I even doubted if it were addressed to me, and hesitated to answer — but it was so — the reign of splendour had begun, and, after going through the accustomed ceremonies, I got home and retired to bed early, in order to be fresh for the fatigues of the ensuing day.

Sleep I did not — how was it to be expected? — some part of the night I was in consultation with Mrs. Scroggs upon the different arrangements; settling about the girls, their places at the banquet, and their partners at the ball; the wind down the chimney sounded like the shouts of the people; the cocks crowing in the mews at the back of the house I took for trumpets sounding my approach; and the ordinary incidental noises in the family I fancied the popguns at Stangate, announcing my disembarkation at Westminster — thus I tossed and tumbled until the long wished-for day dawned, and I jumped up anxiously to realise the visions of the night. I was not long at my toilet — I was soon shaved and dressed — but just as I was settling myself comfortably into my beautiful brown broadcloth inexpressibles, crack went something, and I discovered that a seam had ripped half a foot long. Had it been consistent with the dignity of a Lord Mayor to swear, I should, I believe, at that moment, have anathematised the offending tailor; — as it was, what was to be done? — I heard trumpets in earnest, carriages drawing up and setting down; sheriffs, and chaplains, mace bearers, train bearers, sword bearers, water bailiffs, remembrancers, Mr. Common Hunt, the Town clerk, and the deputy town clerk, all bustling about — the bells ringing — and I late; with a hole in my inexpressibles! There was but one remedy — my wife's maid, kind, intelligent creature, civil and obliging, and ready to turn her hand to any thing, came to my aid, and in less than fifteen minutes her activity, exerted in the midst of the confusion, repaired the injury and turned me out fit to be seen by the whole corporation of London.

When I was dressed, I tapped at Mrs. Scroggs's door, went in, and asked her if she thought I should do; the dear soul, after settling my point lace frill (which she had been good enough to pick off her own petticoat on purpose) and putting my bag straight, gave me the sweetest smile imaginable.

„I wish your Lordship health and happiness,“ said she.

„Sally,“ said I, „your Ladyship is an angel;“ and so, having kissed each of my daughters, who were in progress of dressing, I descended the stairs, to begin the auspicious day in which I reached the apex of my greatness. Never shall I forget the bows — the civilities —

the congratulations — Sheriffs bending before me — the Recorder smiling — the Common Serjeant at my feet — the pageant was intoxicating; and when, after having breakfasted, I stepped into that glazed and gilded house upon wheels, called the state coach, and saw my sword bearer pop himself into one of the boots, with the sword of state in his hand, I was lost in ecstasy, I threw myself back upon the seat of the vehicle with all imaginable dignity, but not without damage, for in the midst of my ease and elegance I snapped off the cut steel hilt of my sword, by accidentally bumping the whole weight of my body right, or rather wrong, directly upon the top of it.

But what was a sword hilt or a bruise to me? I was the Lord Mayor — the greatest man of the greatest city of the greatest nation in the world. The people realized my anticipations, and „Bravo, Scroggs!" and „Scroggs for ever!" again resounded, as we proceeded slowly and majestically towards the River, through a fog, which prevented our being advantageously seen, and which got down the throat of the sword bearer, who coughed incessantly during our progress, much to my annoyance, not to speak of the ungraceful movements which his convulsive barkings gave to the red velvet scabbard of the official glaive as it stuck out of the window of the coach.

We embarked in my barge; a new scene of splendour awaited me, guns, shouts, music, flags, banners, in short, every thing that fancy could paint or a water bailiff provide; there, in the gilded bark, was prepared a cold collation — I ate, but tasted nothing — fowls, patés, tongue, game, beef, ham, all had the same flavour; champagne, hock, and Madeira were all alike to me — Lord Mayor was all I saw, all I heard, all I swallowed: every thing was pervaded by the one captivating word, and the repeated appeal to „my Lordship" was sweeter than nectar.

At Westminster, having been presented and received, I desired — I — John Ebenezer Scroggs, of Coventry — I desired the Recorder to invite the Judges to dine with me — I — who remember when two of the oldest and most innocent of the twelve, came the circuit, trembling at the sight of them, and believing them some extraordinary creatures upon whom all the hair and fur I saw, grew naturally — I, not only to ask these formidable beings to dine with me, but, as if I thought it beneath my dignity to do so in my proper person, deputing a judge of my own to do it for me; I never shall forget their bows in return — Chinese mandarins on a chimney-piece are fools to them.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Farewell to Abbotsford.

Home of the gifted! fare thee well,
And a blessing on thee rest,
While the heather waves its purple bell,
O'er moor and mountain crest;
While stream to stream around thee calls,
And banks with broom are drest,
Glad be the harping in thy halls —
A blessing on thee rest!

While the high voice from thee sent forth
Bids rock and cairn reply,
Wakening the spirits of the North,
Like a chieftain's gathering cry;
While its deep master-tones hold sway,
As a king's o'er every breast,
Home of the Legend and the Lay,
A blessing on thee rest!

Joy to thy hearth, and board, and bower,
'Mong honours to thy line!
And hearts of proof, and hands of power,
And bright names worthy thine!
By the merry step of childhood still
May thy free sward be prest!
While one proud pulse in the land can thrill,
A blessing on thee rest!

Mrs. Hemans.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. N.ro 12.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Walter Savage Landor

ward am 30. Januar 1775 zu Ipſley-Court, dem Sitz ſeiner alten angeſehenen Familie, in Warwickſhire geboren. Er erhielt ſeine erſte wiſſenſchaftliche Bildung zu Rugby, und hatte bereits zu einer Zeit, wo er noch zu jung für die Univerſität war, alle ſeine Mitſchüler überflügelt, ſo daß er, um den Zwiſchenraum auszufüllen, der Leitung eines Herrn Langley übergeben wurde. Ein Jahr ſpäter bezog er die Univerſität Oxford und ſtudirte hier im Trinity-College unter der beſonderen Aufſicht des gelehrten Benwell. Sein unabhängiger Geiſt verleitete ihn jedoch zu Vergehen gegen die dort herrſchende Disciplin, und er ward demzufolge relegirt (rusticated). Bei der erſten Inſurrection in Spanien begab er ſich zu dem Vicekönig von Gallizien, Blake, und unterſtützte dieſelbe ſowohl durch ſeine perſönliche Mitwirkung wie durch bedeutende Geldgeſchenke. Nach der Aufhebung der Conſtitution legte er jedoch in die Hände des Don Pedro Cevallos alle empfangenen Beweiſe der königlichen Anerkennung und Gnade nieder, äußerte ſeine Geſinnung auf ſehr entſchiedene Weiſe und kehrte nach England zurück. Er vermählte ſich 1811 mit einem Fräulein von Neuveville, und begab ſich dann im Herbſt 1815 nach Italien, wo er anfangs im Pallaſt der Medicis zu Florenz wohnte, und dann ſpäter die ſchöne Villa Gherardesca in Fieſole kaufte, die er ſeitdem nur in kurzen Zwiſchenräumen verlaſſen hat.

Keine ſeiner Schriften hat ſich einer allgemeinen Theilnahme zu erfreuen gehabt, und doch könnte man in jeder, ohne Unterſchied, eine Menge Stellen finden, die einem gewandteren oder weniger eigenſinnigen Manne einen bleibenden Ruf erworben haben würden. Sie ſind bis zum Ueberfließen reich an tiefen und großen Gedanken, aber zu deutlich ſieht man ihnen an, daß es ihrem Verfaſſer nicht um den Beifall der Menge zu thun iſt, ja daß ihm ſogar daran liegt, ihr ſeine Verachtung zu zeigen. — Es leidet keinen Zweifel, bemerkt ein engliſcher Kritiker ſehr treffend, daß Landor der Welt ſich als ein weit größerer Mann g[illegible]den würde, wenn ihn das Schickſal weniger begünſtigt hätte. — Hat ſich jedoch ſein Ruhm a[illegible]l weit verbreitet, ſo wird er dagegen deſto nachhaltiger ſein; denn Reichthum der Phantaſie, W[illegible] Geſinnung, Kühnheit der Anſchauung, Tiefe und Kraft ſind Eigenſchaften, welche jener Mann im höchſten Grade beſitzt.

Er hat nur einen Band Poeſieen unter dem Titel „Gebir", Count Julian and other Poems by W. S. L." herausgegeben; ſeine bedeutendſten Dichtungen finden ſich jedoch in ſeinen proſaiſchen Schriften, unter welchen die „Imaginary Conversations" und „Pericles and Aspasia" die ausgezeichnetſten ſind, verſtreut. — Wir theilen hier folgende Probe aus den Imaginary Conversations mit, in der Hoffnung, daß ſie nicht verfehlen werde, die Aufmerkſamkeit des Leſers auf dieſen bedeutenden, in Deutſchland faſt gar nicht gekannten Geiſt, dauernd zu lenken.

Imaginary Conversations.

By Walter Savage Landor, Esq.

I.

Rhadamistus and Zenobia.

Zenobia. — My beloved! my beloved! I can endure the motion of the horse no longer; his weariness makes his pace so tiresome to me. Surely we have ridden far, very far from home! and how shall we ever pass the wide and rocky stream, among the whirlpools of the rapid and the deep Araxes?

Rhadamistus. — Alight, then, dear Zenobia! And does Rhadamistus once more embrace you? Can it be?

Zen. — „Can it cease to be?“ you would have said, my Rhadamistus! — Hark! where are those horns and trumpets? on which side of the water are they? Now they seem to come from the mountains, and now along the river. You, my Rhadamistus, could escape somewhere lower.

Rhad. — Wherefore? — with whom? — and whither in all Asia?

Zen. — Fly! there are armed men climbing up the cliffs.

Rhad. — It was only the sound of the waves in the hollows of them, and the masses of pebbles that rolled down from under you as you knelt to listen.

Zen. — Turn round — look behind! is it dust yonder, or smoke? and is it the sun, or what is it, shining so crimson? Not shining any longer now, but deep and dull purple, embodying into gloom.

Rhad. — It is the sun, about to set at mid-day; we shall soon see no more of him.

Zen. — Indeed! what an ill omen! but how can you tell that? Do not think it; I do not. Alas! alas! the dust and the sounds are nearer.

Rhad. — Prepare, then, my Zenobia!

Zen. — I was always prepared for it.

Rhad. — What reason, oh, unconfiding girl! from the day of our union, have I ever given you to murmur, to suspect?

Zen. — None, none: your love, even in these sad moments, raises me above the reach of fortune. How can it pain me and why do I repine? Worse may it pain me — but let that love never pass away!

Rhad. — Was it then the loss of power and kingdom for which Zenobia was prepared?

Zen. — The kingdom was lost when Rhadamistus lost the affection of his subjects. Why did they not love you? how could they but? Tell me so strange a thing.

Rhad. — Fables, fables! about the death of Mithridates and his children.

Zen. — What about them?

Rhad. — In all governments there are secrets.

Zen. — But between us?

Rhad. — No longer — time presses — not a moment is left us — not a refuge — not a hope.

Zen. — Then why draw the sword?

Rhad. — Wanted I courage? — did I not fight as becomes a king?

Zen. — True, most true.

Rhad. — Is my resolution lost to me? did I but dream I had it?

Zen. — Nobody is very near yet; nor can they cross the dell where we did. Those are fled who could have shewn the pathway. Think not of defending me. Listen! look! what thousands are coming! The protecting blade above my head can only provoke the enemy. And do you still keep it there? You grasp my arm too hard — can you look unkindly? Can it be? O, think again, and spare me, Rhadamistus! From the vengeance of man, from the judgments of Heaven, the unborn may preserve my husband.

Rhad. — We must die! They advance; they see us; they rush forward!

Zen. — Me, me would you strike? Rather let me leap from the precipice.

Rhad. — Hold! whither would your desperation? — are you again within my grasp?

Zen. — O, my beloved! never let me call you cruel! let me love you in the last hour of seeing you as in the first — I must, I must — and be it my thought in death that you love me no! I would have cast away my life to save you from remorse: it may do that and more, preserved by you. Listen! listen! among those who pursue us there are many fathers; childless by his own hand, none. Do not kill our baby — the best of our hopes when we had many — the baby not yet ours! Who shall then plead for you, my unhappy husband?

Rhad. — My honour, and before me, sole arbiter and sole audience of our cause. Bethink you, Zenobia, of the indignities — not bearing on my fortunes — but inmatured over your beauty! What said I? did I bid you think of them? Rather die than imagine, or than question me, what they are! Let me endure two deaths before my own, crueller than wounds, or than age, or than servitude, could inflict on me, rather than make me name them.

Zen. — Strike! Lose not a moment so precious! Why hesitate now, my generous, brave defender?

Rhad. — Zenobia! do you bid it?

Zen. — Courage is no longer a crime in you. Hear the shouts, the threats, the imprecations! Hear them, my beloved! let me no more!

Rhad. — Embrace me not, Zenobia! Loose me, loose me!

Zen. — I cannot: thrust me away! Divorce, but with death! the disobedient wife, no longer your Zenobia. (He strikes.) Oh! oh! one innocent head — in how few days — should have reposed — no, not upon this blood. Swim across! is there a descent — an easy one, a sure one, any where? I might have found it for you! Ill-spent time! heedless woman!

Rhad. — An arrow hath pierced me: more are showering round us. Go, my life's flower! the blighted branch drops after. Away! forth into the stream! strength is yet left me for it. (He throws her into the river.) She sinks not! O last calamity! She sinks! she sinks! Now both are well, and fearless! One look more! grant one more look! On what? where was it? which whirl? which ripple? they are gone too. How calm is the haven of the most troubled life! I enter it! Rebels! traitors! slaves! Subjects! why gape ye? why halt ye? On, on, dastards! O that ye dared to follow! (He plunges into the Araxes.)

II.

Philip II. and Dona Juana Coello.

Dona Juana. — Condescend, O my king! to hear me.

Philip. — By what means, Dona Juana, have you obtained this admission to my presence?

Dona J. — Sire, by right of my sex and my misfortunes.

Philip. — And what misfortune of yours, pray, madam, is it in my power to remove or alleviate?

Dona J. — Sire! All wise, O most potent monarch! and nearly all the sorrows that exist on earth — the providence of God having placed the larger part of the known world under the sceptre or the influence of your majesty.

Philip (ironically). — And the more suffering part, no doubt. God, and his mother, and the blessed saints, have exalted me to my station, that I may bring chastisement on the perverse and rebellious, and ward it off from the dutiful and obedient. I have now little leisure: to the point, then.

Dona J. — O, sire! my husband has offended: I know not how.

Philip. — Nor should you. His offence is against the state.

Dona J. — He has been secretary many years to your majesty; and in times and circumstances the most trying he has ever been a faithful vassal. The riches he possessed flowed in great measure from royal bounty: none from treason, none from peculation, none from abuse of power.

Philip. — Know you his steps, his thoughts?

Dona J. — I have always shared them.

Philip. — Always? no, madam. Let me tell you, he aspires too high.

Dona J. — O, sire! that is a generous fault, the fault of every one who loves glory, of every true Spaniard, and, above all, of Antonio Perez.

Philip. — When did he first begin to look so loftily?

Dona J. — When first he aspired to serve your majesty.

Philip. — Has he no gratitude, no sense of duty, no feeling of nothingness, as becomes a subject? I made him what he is. Tell me no more I enriched him; that is little — beside, I know not that I did it; and I could only wish to have done it, that I might undo it. I cannot remember that he has had any thing from me beside the salary of his offices; but those who accept my money for any services would just as readily accept it from my enemies. They care no more from whose hand it comes than whose effigy it bears.

Dona J. — He had enough and abundantly from his offices; nor indeed was he without a patrimony, nor I without a dower.

Philip. — He should have minded his business: he should have taken example from Scovedo.

Dona J. — Now, it becomes not me to express astonishment, or even to feel it, in the august presence.

Philip. — Something very like astonishment produces good effects occasionally. Madam, would you wish further audience?

Dona J. — Too graciously vouchsafed me! Sire, Antonio Perez, my husband, is accused of being privy to the assassination —

Philip. — Unmannerly, ill-featured expression! —

Dona J. — Of his colleague Scovedo. I come to entreat, on the part of his family and of mine, that he may be brought to trial speedily and openly. If your majesty will indulge us with this further act of royal clemency and favour, I engage that a crime so detestable, a crime from which the nature of Don Antonio is abhorrent, shall be removed for ever from our house.

Philip. — At my good pleasure I may confront him with his accomplices.

Dona J. — Alas! alas! who are the guilty?

Philip. — Who? who? — (aside) Suspicious, audacious woman! Some have suspected those about the Princess of Evoli, and have watched her.

Dona J. — Kind soul! may never harm befall her from their wiles! Beauty, that should fill the world with light and happiness, brings only evil spirits into it, and is blighted by malignity and grief. Who upon earth could see the Princess of Evoli, and not be softened?

Philip. — The injured — the insulted.

Dona J. — Alas! even she, then, serves the purposes of the envious. From the plant that gives honey to the bee, the spider and wasp draw poison.

Philip. — You know the lady very intimately.

Dona J. — She honours me with her notice.

Philip. — She honours your husband too with her notice, does she not?

Dona J. — Most highly.

Philip. — Then, madam, by the saints, he dies!

Dona J. — Oh, sire! recall the threat!

Philip. — We never threaten — we sentence.

Dona J. — He is innocent! By the beloved of God — by the Fountain of Truth and Purity — he is innocent!

Philip. — And she too — and she too, marvel of virtue! A brazen breast would split with laughter. She! Evoli — Evoli —

Dona J. — Is as innocent as he. Oh, sire! this beautiful and gentle lady —

Philip. — Ay, ay, very gentle; she brings men's heads to the scaffold if they have ever lain in her lap.

Dona J. — The unsuspicious, generous princess —

Philip. — Killed the poor fool Scovedo.

Dona J. — Pardon me, sire; she hardly knew him, and bore no ill will toward him.

Philip. — Nor toward Perez; at worst, not very spiteful. Dead secretaries and dead rats should drive off living ones. He was useful to me — I mean Scovedo — even when alive; I cannot afford one like him every day. Do you hear, Dona Juana!

Dona J. — Perfectly, sire.

Philip. — And understand?

Dona J. — As well as I dare.

Philip. — Could you live in privacy, with your accomplishments and your beauty?

Dona J. — Alas! I wish it had always been my lot!

Philip. I may promote you to that enviable situation.

Dona J. — My husband, now he has lost the countenance of your majesty, would retreat with me from the world.

Philip. — It is not in open places that serpents hatch their eggs. God protects me — I must protect the state. Perez is unworthy of you.

Dona J. — Sire, if I thought him so, I would try to make him worthy.

Philip. — There are offences that women cannot pardon.

Dona J. — Then they should retire, and learn how.

Philip. — That insolent and ungrateful man wrongs and despises you. He too, among the rest, presumes to love the Princess of Eboli.

Dona J. — Who does not?

Philip. — Who shall dare? Perez, I tell you again, has declared his audacious passion to her!

Dona J. — Then God forgive him his impetuosity and sinfulness! If she rejected him, he is punished.

Philip. — If — if! Do you pretend, do you imagine, she would listen to one like him? Do you reason about it — do you calculate on it — do you sigh and weep at it, as if in your spite and stupidity you could believe it? By the blood of the martyrs, I will drain the last drop of that traitor's! — Off! unclasp my knee! I cannot wait for the words in your throat!

The Splendid Annual.

By the Author of „Sayings and Doings."

(Concluded from our last)

Then came the return — we landed once more in the scene of my dignity — at the corner of Fleet Street we found the Lady Mayoress waiting for the procession — there she was Sally Scroggs (her maiden name was Snob) — there was my own Sally, with a plume of feathers that half filled the coach, and Jenny and Maria and young Sally, all with their backs to my horses, which were pawing the mud and snorting and smoking like steam engines, with nostrils like safety valves, and four of my footmen hanging behind the coach, like bees in a swarm. There had not been so much riband in my family since my poor father's failure at Coventry — And yet how often, over and over again, although he had been dead more than twenty years, did I, during that morning, in the midst of my splendour, think of him, and wish that he could see me in my greatness — Yes, even in the midst of my triumph I seemed to defer to my good kind parent — in heaven, as I hope and trust — as if I were anxious for his judgment and his opinion as to how I should perform the arduous and manifold duties of the day.

Up Ludgate Hill we moved — the fog grew thicker and thicker — but then the beautiful women at the windows — those up high could only see my horses and the paste buckles in my shoes; every now and then, I bowed condescendingly to people I had never seen before, in order to show my courtesy and my chain and collar, which I had discovered during the morning shone the better for being shaken.

At length we reached Guildhall — as I crossed the beautiful building, lighted splendidly, and filled with well dressed company, and heard the deafening shouts which rent the fane as I entered it, I really was overcome — I retired to a private room — refreshed my dress, rubbed up my chain, which the damp had tarnished, and prepared to receive my guests. They came, and — shall I ever forget it? — dinner was announced; the bands played „O the roast beef of old England!" Onwards we went, a Prince of the blood, of the blood royal of my country, led out my Sally — my own Sally — the Lady Mayoress! the Lord High Chancellor handed out young Sally; — I saw it done — I thought I should have choked; the Prime Minister took Maria; the Lord Privy Seal gave his arm to Jenny; and my wife's mother, Mrs. Nash, was honoured by the protection of the Right Honourable the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. — Oh, if my poor father could but have seen that!

I would be tiresome to dwell upon the pleasures of the happy year, thus auspiciously begun, in detail; each month brought its delights, each week its festival; public meetings under the sanction of the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor; concerts and balls under the patronage of the Lady Mayoress; Easter and its dinner, Bluecoat boys and buns; processions here, excursions there. — Summer came, and then we had swan-hopping up the river, and white-baiting down the river; Yantlet Creek below, the navigation barge above; music, flags, streamers, guns, and company; turtle every day in the week; peas at a pound a pint, and grapes at a guinea a pound; dabbling in rosewater served in gold, not to speak of the loving cup, with Mr. Common Hunt, in full dress, at my elbow; my dinners were talked of, Cits grew jealous, and I was idolized.

The days, which before seemed like weeks, were now turned to minutes; scarcely had I swallowed my breakfast before I was in my justice-room; and before I had mittimused half a dozen paupers for beggary, I was called away to luncheon; this barely over, in comes a deputation or a dispatch, and so on till dinner, which was barely ended before supper was announced. We all became enchanted with the Mansion House; my girls grew graceful by the confidence their high station gave them; Maria refused a good offer because her lover chanced to have an ill sounding name; we had all got settled in our rooms, the establishment had begun to know and appreciate us; we had just become in fact easy in our dignity and happy in our position, when lo and behold! the ninth of November came again — the anniversary of my exaltation, the consummation of my downfall.

Again did we go in state to Guildhall, again were we toasted and addressed, again were we handed in, and led out, again flirted with cabinet ministers and danced with ambassadors, and at two o'clock in the morning drove home from the scene of gaiety to our old residence in Budge Row. — Never in this world did pickled herrings and turpentine smell so powerfully as on that night when we entered the house; and although my wife and the young ones stuck to the drinkables at Guildhall, their natural feelings would have way, and a sort of shuddering disgust seemed to fill their minds on their return home, — the passage looked so narrow — the drawing-rooms looked so small — the staircase seemed so dark — our apartments appeared so low, — however, being tired, we all slept well, at least I did, for I was in no humour to talk to Sally, and the only topic I could think upon before I dropped into my slumber, was a calculation of the amount of expense which I had incurred during the just expired year of my greatness.

In the morning we assembled at breakfast, — a note lay on the table, addressed — „Mrs. Scroggs, Budge Row." The girls, one after the other, took it up, read the superscription, and laid it down again. A visitor was announced — a neighbour and kind friend, a man of wealth and importance — what were his first words? — they were the first I had heard from a stranger since my job, — „How are you, Scroggs, done up, eh?"

Scroggs! no obsequiousness, no deference, no respect; — no, „my lord, I hope your lordship passed an agreeable night — and how is her ladyship and your lordship's amiable daughters?" — not a bit of it — „How's Mrs. S. and the gals?" This was quite natural, all as it had been, all perhaps as it should be — but how oblike what I was, only one day before! The very servants, who, when amidst the strapping, stall-fed, gold-laced lacqueys of the Mansion House, (transferred with the chairs and tables from one Lord Mayor to another) dared not speak nor look, nor say their lives were their own, strutted about the house, and banged the doors, and talked of their ,,Missus," as if she had been an apple woman.

So much for domestic miseries; — I went out; I was shoved in Cheapside in the most unceremonious manner; my right eye had a narrow escape of being poked out by the tray of a brawny butcher's boy, who, when I civilly remonstrated, turned round and said, ,,Vy, I says, who are you I vonder, as is so partiklar about your daylight." I felt an involuntary shudder, — to-day, thought I, I am John Ebenezer Scruggs — two days ago I was Lord Mayor; and so the rencontre ended, evidently to the advantage of the bristly brute. It was however too much for me — the effect of contrast was too powerful, the change was too sudden — and I determined to go to Brighton for a few weeks to refresh myself, and be weaned from my dignity.

We went — we drove to the Royal Hotel; in the hall stood one of his Majesty's ministers, one of my former guests, speaking to his lady and daughter; my girls passed close to him, — he had handed one of them to dinner the year before, but he appeared entirely to have forgotten her. By and by, when we were going out in a fly to take the air, one of the waiters desired the fly man to pull off, because Sir Something Somebody's carriage could not come up, — it was clear that the name of Scruggs had lost its influence.

We secluded ourselves in a private house, where we did nothing but sigh and look at the sea. We had been totally spoiled for our proper sphere, and could not get into a better: the indifference of our inferiors mortified us, and the familiarity of our equals disgusted us, — our potentiality was gone, and we were so much degraded that a puppy of a fellow had the impertinence to ask Jenny if she was going to one of the Old Ship balls. ,,Of course," said the coxcomb, ,,I don't mean the ,Almacks,' for they are uncommonly select."

In short, do what we would, go where we might, we were outraged and annoyed, or at least thought ourselves so; and beyond all bitterness was the reflection, that the days of our dignity and delight never might return. There were at Brighton no less than three men who called me Jack, and that, out of flies or in libraries, and one of these chose occasionally, by way of making himself particularly agreeable, to address me by the familiar appellation of Jacky. At length, and that only three weeks after my fall, an overgrown tallow chandler met us on the Steyne, and stopped our party to observe, ,,as how he thought he owed me for two barrels of coal tar, for doing over his pigstyes." This settled it, — we departed from Brighton, and made a tour of the coast; but we never rallied; and business, which must be minded, drove us before Christmas to Budge Row, where we are again settled down.

Maria has grown thin — Sarah has turned methodist — and Jenny, who danced with his Excellency the Portuguese Ambassador, who was called angelic by the Right Honourable the Lord Privy Seal, and who moreover refused a man of fortune because he had an ugly name, is going to be married to Lieutenant Sludge, on the half pay of the Royal Marines — and what then? — I am sure if it were not for the females of my family I should be perfectly at my ease in my proper sphere, out of which the course of our civic constitution raised me. It was unpleasant at first: — but I have toiled long and laboured hard; I have done my duty, and Providence has blessed my works. If we were discomposed at the sudden change in our station, I it is who was to blame for having aspired to honours which I knew were not to last. However the ambition was not dishonourable, nor did I disgrace the station while I held it; and when I see, as in the present year, that station filled by a man of education and talent, of high character and ample fortune, I discover no cause to repent of having been one of his predecessors. Indeed I ought to apologise for making public the weakness by which we were all affected; especially as I have myself already learned to laugh at what we all severely felt at first — the miseries of a SPLENDID ANNUAL.

The Voice of Praise.

There is a voice of magic power
To charm the old, delight the young —
In lordly hall, in rustic bower,
In every clime, in every tongue,
Howe'er its sweet vibration rung,
In whispers low, in poet's lays,
There lives not one who has not hung
Enraptur'd on the voice of praise.

The timid child, at that soft voice,
Lifts for a moment's space the eye;
It bids the fluttering heart rejoice,
And stays the step prepar'd to fly:
'Tis pleasure breathes that short quick sigh,
And flushes o'er that rosy face;
Whilst shame and infant modesty
Shrink back with hesitating grace.

The lovely maiden's dimpled cheek
At that sweet voice still deeper glows;
Her quivering lips in vain would seek
To hide the bliss her eyes disclose;
The charm her sweet confusion shows
Oft springs from some low broken word.
O praise! to her how sweetly flows
Thine accent from the loved one heard!

The hero, when a people's voice
Proclaim their darling victor near,
Feels he not then his soul rejoice,
Their shouts of love, of praise, to hear?
Yes! fame to generous minds is dear —
It pierces to their inmost core;
He weeps, who never shed a tear;
He trembles, who ne'er shook before.

The poet too — ah! well I deem,
Small is the need the tale to tell;
Who knows not that his thought, his dream,
On thee at noon, at midnight, dwell!
Who knows not that the magic spell
Can charm his every care away!
In memory cheer his gloomy cell;
In hope can lend a deathless day?

'Tis sweet to watch affection's eye;
To mark the tear with love replete;
To feel the softly-breathing sigh,
When Friendship's lips the tones repeat;
But oh! a thousand times more sweet,
The praise of those we love to hear!
Like balmy showers in summer heat,
It falls upon the greedy ear.

The lover lulls his rankling wound,
By dwelling on his fair one's name;
The mother listens for the sound
Of her young warrior's growing fame.
Thy voice can sooth the mourning dame,
Of her soul's wedded partner riven,
Who cherishes the hallow'd flame,
Parted on earth, to meet in heaven! —

That voice can quiet passion's mood;
Can humble merit raise on high;
And from the wise, and from the good,
It breathes immortality.
There is a lip, there is an eye,
Where most I love to see it shine,
To hear it speak, to feel it sigh —
My mother, need I say 'tis thine!

MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 43.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Introduction

of

„Ernest Maltravers"

By E. L. Bulwer.

Some four miles distant from one of our northern manufacturing towns, in the year 18—, was a wide and desolate common; — a more dreary spot it is impossible to conceive — the herbage grew up in sickly patches from the midst of a black and stony soil. Not a tree was to be seen in the whole of the comfortless expanse. Nature herself had seemed to desert the solitude, as if scared by the ceaseless din of the neighbouring forges, and even Art, which presses all things into service, had disdained to cull use or beauty from these unpromising demesnes. There was something weird and primeval in the aspect of the place. Especially when in the long nights of winter you beheld the distant fires and lights, which give to the vicinity of certain manufactories so preternatural an appearance, streaming red and wild over the waste. So abandoned by man appeared the spot, that you found it difficult to imagine that it was only from human fires that its bleak and barren desolation was illumined. For miles along the moor you detected no vestige of any habitation; but as you approached the verge nearest to the town, you could just perceive at a little distance from the main road, by which the common was intersected, a small, solitary, and miserable hovel.

Within this lone abode, at the time in which my story opens, were seated two persons. The one was a man of about fifty years of age, and in a squalid and wretched garb which was yet relieved by an affection of ill-sorted finery: a silk handkerchief, which boasted the ornament of a large brooch of false stones, was twisted jauntily round a muscular but meagre throat. His tattered breeches were also decorated by buckles, one of pinchbeck, and one of steel. His frame was thin, but broad and sinewy, indicative of considerable strength. His countenance was prematurely marked by deep furrows, and his grizzled hair waved over a low, rugged, and forbidding brow, on which there hung an everlasting frown that no smile from the lips (and the man smiled often) could chase away. It was a face that spoke of long-continued and hardened vice — it was one on which the Past had written indelible characters. The brand of the hangman could not have stamped it more plainly, nor have more unequivocally warned the suspicion of honest or timid men.

He was employed in counting some few and paltry coins, which, though an easy enough matter to ascertain their value, he told and retold, as if the act could increase the amount. „There must be some mistake here, Alice," he said, in a low and muttered tone; we can't be so low — you know I had two pounds in the drawer but Monday, and now — — Alice, you must have stolen some of the money — curse you!"

The person thus addressed sate at the opposite side of the smouldering and sullen fire: she now looked quietly up, — and her face singularly contrasted that of the man.

She seemed about fifteen years of age, and her complexion was remarkably pure and delicate, even despite the sunburnt tinge which her habits of toil had brought it. Her auburn hair hung in loose and natural curls over her forehead, and its luxuriance was remarkable even in one so young. Her countenance was beautiful, nay, even faultless, in its small and childlike features, but the expression pained you — it was so vacant. In repose it was almost the expression of an idiot — but when she spoke, or smiled, or even moved a muscle, the eyes, colour, lips, kindled into a life which proved that the intellect was still there, though but imperfectly awakened....

„I did not steal any, father," she said, in a quiet voice, „but I should like to have taken some, only I knew you would beat me if I did.

„And what do you want money for?"

„To get food when I'm hungered."

„Nothing else?"

„I don't know."

The girl paused — „Why don't you let me," she said after a while, „why don't you let me go and work with the other girls at the factory? I should make money there for you and me both."

The man smiled — such a smile — it seemed to bring into sudden play all the revolting characteristics of his countenance. „Child," he said, „you are just fifteen, and a sad fool you are: perhaps if you went to the factory, you would get away from me; and what should I do without you? No, I think, as you are so pretty, you might get more money another way."

The girl did not seem to understand this allusion, but repeated, earnestly, „I should like to go to the factory."

„Stuff!" said the man, angrily, „I have three minds to —

Here he was interrupted by a loud knock at the door of the hovel.

The man grew pale. „What can that be?" he muttered. „The hour is late — near eleven. Again — again! Ask who knocks, Alice."

The girl stood spell-bound a moment at the door; and as she stood, her form, rounded yet slight, her earnest look, her varying colour, her tender youth, and a singular grace of attitude and gesture, would have inspired an artist with the very ideal of rustic beauty.

After a pause, she placed her lips to a chink in the door, and repeated her father's question.

„Pray pardon me," said a clear, loud, yet courteous voice, „but seeing a light at your window, I have ventured to ask if any one within will conduct me to *; I will pay the service handsomely."

„Open the door, Alley," said the owner of the hut.

The girl drew a large wooden bolt from the door; and a tall figure crossed the threshold.

The new-comer was in the first bloom of youth, perhaps about eighteen years of age, and his air and appearance surprised both sire and daughter. Alone, on foot, at such an hour, it was impossible for any one to mistake him for other than a gentleman; yet his dress was plain, and somewhat soiled by dust, and he carried a small knapsack on his shoulder. As he entered, he lifted his hat with something of foreign urbanity, and a profusion of fair brown hair fell partially over a high and commanding forehead. His features were handsome, without being eminently so, and his aspect at once bold and prepossessing.

„I am much obliged by your civility," he said, advancing carelessly, and addressing the man, who surveyed him with a scrutinising eye; „and trust, my good fellow, that you will increase the obligation by accompanying me to ****

„You can't miss your way well," said the man, surlily: „the lights will direct you."

„They have rather misled me, for they seem to surround the whole common, and there is no path across it that I can discern; however, if you will put me in the right way, I will not trouble you further."

„It is very late," replied the churlish landlord, equivocally.

„The better reason why I should be at*. Come, my good friend, put on your hat, and I'll give you half-a-guinea for your trouble."

The man advanced; then halted; again surveyed his guest, and said „Are you quite alone, sir?"

„Quite."

„Probably you are known at*?"

„Not I. But what matters that to you? I am a stranger in these parts."

„It is full four miles."

„So far, and I am fearfully tired already!" exclaimed the young man, with impatience. As he spoke, he drew out his watch. „Past eleven, too!"

The watch caught the eye of the cottager; that evil eye sparkled. He passed his hand over his brow. „I am thinking, sir," he said, in a more civil tone than he had yet assumed, „that if you are so tired, and the hour is so late, you might almost as well ——"

„What?" exclaimed the stranger, half stamping petulantly.

„I don't like to mention it; but my poor roof is at your service, and I would go with you to* at day-break to-morrow."

The stranger stared at the cottager, and then at the dingy walls of the hut. He was about, very abruptly, to reject the hospitable proposal, when his eye rested suddenly on the form of Alice, who stood, eager-eyed, and open-mouthed, gazing on the handsome intruder. As she caught his eye, she blushed deeply, and turned aside. The view seemed to change the intentions of the stranger. He hesitated a moment; then muttered between his teeth: and sinking his knapsack to the ground, he cast himself into a chair beside the fire, stretched his limbs, and cried gaily, „So be it, my host: shut up your house again. Bring me a cup of beer, and a crust of bread, and so much for supper! As for bed, this chair will do vastly well."

„Perhaps we can manage better for you than that chair," answered the host. „But our best accommodation must seem bad enough to a gentleman: we are very poor people — hard-working, but very poor."

„Never mind me," answered the stranger, busying himself in stirring the fire; „I am tolerably well accustomed to greater hardships than sleeping on a chair, in an honest man's house; and though you are poor, I will take it for granted you are honest."

The man grinned; and turning to Alice, bade her spread what their larder would afford. Some crusts of bread, some cold potatoes, and some tolerably strong beer, composed all the fare set before the traveller.

Despite his previous boasts, the young man made rather a wry face at these Socratic preparations, while he drew his chair to the board. But his look grew more gay as he caught Alice's eye; and as she lingered by the table, and faltered out some hesitating words of apology, he seized her hand, and squeezing it tenderly — „Prettiest of lasses," said he; and while he spoke he gazed on her with undisguised admiration — „a man who has travelled on foot all day, through the ugliest country within the three seas, is sufficiently refreshed at night by the sight of so fair a face."

Alice hastily withdrew her hand, and went and seated herself in a corner of the room, whence she continued to look at the stranger with her usual vacant gaze, but with a half smile upon her rosy lips.

Alice's father looked hard at the young people. „Eat, sir," said he, with a sort of chuckle, „and no fine words; poor Alice is honest, as you said just now."

„To be sure," answered the traveller, employing with great zeal a set of strong, even and dazzling teeth at the tough crusts; „to be sure she is. I did not mean to offend you; but the fact is, that I am half a foreigner, and abroad, you know, one may say a civil thing to a pretty girl, without hurting her feelings, or her father's either.“

„Half a foreigner! why you talk English as well as I do,“ said the host, whose intonation and words were, on the whole, a little above his station.

The stranger smiled. „Thank you for the compliment,“ said he. „What I meant was, that I have been a great deal abroad; in fact, I have just returned from Germany. But I am English-born.“

„And going home?“

„Yes.“

„Far from hence?“

„About thirty miles, I believe.“

„You are young, sir, to be alone?“

The traveller made no answer, but finished his uninviting repast, and drew his chair again to the fire. He then thought he had sufficiently ministered to his host's curiosity to allow him to attend to his own.

„You work at the factories, I suppose?“ said he.

„I do, sir — bad times.“

„And your pretty daughter?“

„Minds the house.“

„Have you no other children?“

„No; one mouth besides my own is as much as I can feed, and that scarcely. But you would like to rest now; you can have my bed, sir, — I can sleep here.“

„By no means,“ said the stranger, quickly; „just put a few more coals on the fire, and leave me to make myself comfortable.“

The man rose, and did not press his offer, but left the room for a supply of fuel. Alice remained in her corner.

„Sweetheart,“ said the traveller, looking round, and satisfying himself that they were alone; „I should sleep well if I could get one kiss from those coral lips.“

Alice hid her face with her hands.

„Do I vex you?“

„Oh no, sir.“

At this assurance the traveller rose, and approached Alice softly. He drew away her hands from her face, when she said gently, „Have you much money about you?“

„O the mercenary baggage!“ said the traveller to himself; and then replied aloud, „Why, pretty one? — Do you sell your kisses so high then?“

Alice frowned, and tossed the hair from her brow. „If you have money,“ she said, in a whisper, „don't say so to father. Don't sleep if you can help it. I'm afraid — hush — he comes!“

The young man returned to his seat with an altered manner. And as his host entered, he for the first time surveyed him closely. The imperfect glimmer of the half-dying and single candle, threw into strong lights and shades the marked, rugged, and ferocious features of the cottager; and the eye of the traveller, glancing from the face to the limbs and frame, saw that whatever the mind might design of evil, the body might well execute.

The traveller sank into a gloomy reverie. The wind howled — the rain beat — through the casement shone no solitary star — all was dark and sombre; — should he proceed alone — might he not suffer a greater danger upon that wide and desert moor — might not the host follow — assault him in the dark? He had no weapon, save a stick. But within, he had at least a rude resource in the large kitchen-poker that was beside him. At all events, it would be better to wait for the present. He might at any time, when alone, withdraw the bolt from the door, and slip out unobserved.

Such was the fruit of his meditations while his host plyed the fire.

„You will sleep sound to-night,“ said his entertainer, smiling.

„Humph! Why I am over-fatigued; I dare say it will be an hour or two before I fall asleep; but when I once am asleep, I sleep like a rock!“

„Come, Alice,“ said her father, „let us leave the gentleman. Good night, sir.“

„Good night — good night,“ returned the traveller, yawning.

The father and daughter disappeared through a door in the corner of the room. The guest heard them ascend the creaking stairs — all was still.

„Fool that I am!“ said the traveller to himself; „will nothing teach me that I am no longer a student at Gottingen, or cure me of these pedestrian adventures? Had it not been for that girl's big blue eyes, I should be safe at* by this time; if, indeed, the grim father had not murdered me by the road. However, we'll balk him yet; another half-hour, and I am on the moor: we must give him time. And in the mean while here is the poker. At the worst it is but one to one; but the churl is strongly built.“

Although the traveller thus endeavoured to cheer his courage, his heart beat more loudly than its wont. He kept his eyes stationed on the door by which the cottagers had vanished, and his hand on the massive poker.

While the stranger was thus employed below, Alice, instead of turning to her own narrow cell, went into her father's room.

The cottager was seated at the foot of his bed, muttering to himself, and with eyes fixed on the ground.

The girl stood before him, gazing on his face and with her arms lightly crossed above her bosom.

„It must be worth twenty guineas,“ said the host abruptly to himself.

„What is it to you, father, what the gentleman's watch is worth?“

The man started.

„You mean,“ continued Alice, quietly, you mean to do some injury to that young man; but you shall not.“

The cottager's face grew black as night. „How,“ he began, in a loud voice, but suddenly dropped the tone into a deep growl „how dare you talk to me so? — go to bed, go to bed.“

„No, father.“

„No?“

„I will not stir from this room until daybreak.“

„We will soon see that,“ said the man with an oath.

„Touch me, and I will alarm the gentleman, and tell him that —“

„What?“

The girl approached her father, placed her lips to his ear, and whispered, „That you intend to murder him.“

The cottager's frame trembled from head to foot; he shut his eyes and gasped painfully for breath; „Alice,“ said he gently, after a pause — „Alice, we are often nearly starving.“

I am — you never!“

„Wretch, you! if I do drink too much one day, I pinch for it the next. But go to bed, I say — I mean no harm to the young man. Think you I would twist myself a rope? — no, no; — go along, go along.“

Alice's face, which had before been earnest, and almost intelligent, now relapsed into its wonted vacant stare.

„To be sure, father, they would hang you if you cut his throat. Don't forget that; — good night;“ — and so saying, she walked to her own opposite chamber.

Left alone, the host pressed his hand tightly to his forehead, and remained motionless for nearly half an hour. „If that cursed girl would but sleep,“ he muttered at last, turning round, „it might be done at once. And there's the pond behind, as deep as a well; and I might say at day-break that the boy had bolted. He seems quite a stranger here — nobody 'll miss him. He must have plenty of blunt to give half-a-guinea for a companion for four miles! I want money, and I won't work — if I can help it, at least.“

While he thus soliloquized, the air seemed to oppress him; he opened the window, he leant out — the rain beat upon him. He closed the window with an oath; took off his shoes, stole to the threshold, and, by the candle which he shaded with his hand, surveyed the opposite door. It was closed. He then bent anxiously forward and listened.

„All's quiet,“ thought he; „perhaps he sleeps already. I will steal down. If Jack Walters would but come to night, the job could be done charmingly.“

With that he crept gently down the stairs. In a corner, at the foot of the staircase, lay sundry matters, a few faggots, and a cleaver.*) He caught up the last. „Aha," he muttered, „and there's the sledge hammer) somewhere for Walters. Leaning himself against the door, he then applied his eye to a chink which admitted a dim view of the room within lighted fitfully by the fire.

It was about this time that the stranger deemed it advisable to commence his retreat. The slight and suppressed sound of voices, which at first he had heard above in the conversation of the father and child, had died away. The stillness at once encouraged and warned him. He stole to the front-door, softly undid the bolt, and found the door locked and the key missing. He had not observed that during his repast, and ere his suspicions had been aroused, his host, in replacing the bar and relocking the entrance, had abstracted the key. His fears were now confirmed. His next thought was the window — the shutter only protected it half way, and was easily removed; but the aperture of the lattice, which only opened in part, like most cottage casements, was far too small to admit his person. His only means of escape was in breaking the whole window; a matter not to be effected without noise and consequent risk.

He paused in despair. He was naturally of a strong nerved and gallant temperament, nor unaccustomed to those perils of life and limb which German students delight to brave; but his heart well nigh failed him at that moment. The silence became distinct and burthensome to him, and a chill moisture gathered to his brow. While he stood irresolute and in suspense, striving to collect his thoughts, his ear, preternaturally sharpened by fear, caught the faint muffled sound of creeping footsteps — he heard the stairs creak. The sound broke the spell. The previous vague apprehension gave way, when the danger became actually at hand. His presence of mind returned at once. He went back quickly to the fire-place, seized the poker, and began stirring the fire, and coughing loud, and indicating as vigorously as possible that he was wide awake.

He felt that he was watched — he felt that he was in momently peril. He felt that the appearance of slumber would be the signal for a mortal conflict. Time passed, all remained silent; nearly half an hour had elapsed, since he had heard the steps upon the stairs. His situation began to prey upon his nerves, it irritated them — it became intolerable. It was not now fear that he experienced, it was the overwrought sense of mortal enmity — the consciousness that a man may feel who knows that the eye of a tiger is on him, and who, while in suspense he has regained his courage, foresees that sooner or later the spring must come. The suspense itself becomes an agony, and he desires to expedite the deadly struggle he cannot shun.

Utterly incapable any longer to bear his own sensations, the traveller rose at last, fixed his eyes upon the fatal door, and was about to cry aloud to the listener to enter, when he heard a low tap at the window; it was twice repeated; and at the third time a low voice pronounced the name of Darvil. It was clear, then, that accomplices had arrived; it was no longer against one man he should have to contend. He drew his breath hard, and listened with throbbing ears. He heard steps without upon the plashing soil; they retired, — all was still.

He paused a few minutes, and walked deliberately and firmly to the inner door at which he fancied his host stationed; with a steady hand he attempted to undo the bolt; it was fastened on the opposite side. „So!" said he, bitterly, and grinding his teeth; „I must die like a rat in a cage. Well, I'll die biting."

He returned to his former post, drew himself up to his full height, and stood grasping his homely weapon, prepared for the worst, and not altogether unelated with a proud consciousness of his own natural advantages of activity, stature, strength, and daring. Minutes rolled on; the silence was broken by some one at the inner door; he heard the bolt gently withdrawn. He raised his weapon with both hands, and started to find the intruder was only Alice. She came in with bare feet, and pale as marble, her finger on her lips.

---

*) Beil. ) Schmiedehammer.

She approached — she touched him.

„They are in the shed behind,“ she whispered, „looking for the sledge-hammer — they mean to murder you; get you gone — quick.“

„How? — the door is locked.“

„Stay. I have taken the key from his room.“

She gained the door, applied the key — the door yielded. The traveller threw his knapsack once more over his shoulder and made but one stride to the threshold. The girl stopped him. „Don't say anything about it; he is my father — they would hang him.“

„No, no. But you? — are safe, I trust; depend on my gratitude. I shall be at  to-morrow — the best inn — seek me if you can! Which way now?“

„Keep to the left.“

The stranger was already several paces distant; through the darkness, and in the midst of the rain, he fled on with the speed of youth. The girl lingered an instant, sighed, then laughed aloud; closed and re-barred the door, and was creeping back, when from the inner entrance advanced the grim father, and another man, of broad, short, sinewy frame, his arms bare, and wielding a large hammer.

„How?“ asked the host; „Alice here, and — hell and the devil, have you let him go?“

„I told you that you should not harm him.“

With a violent oath, the ruffian struck his daughter to the ground, sprang over her body, unbarred the door, and, accompanied by his comrade, set off in vague pursuit of his intended victim.

The day dawned; it was a mild, damp, hazy morning; the sod sank deep beneath the foot, the roads were heavy with mire, and the rain of the last night lay here and there in broad shallow pools. Towards the town, waggons, carts, pedestrian groups were already moving; and, now and then, you caught the sharp horn of some early coach, wheeling its be-cloaked outside and be-night-capped inside passengers along the northern thoroughfare.

A young man bounded over a stile into the road just opposite to the mile-stone, that declared him to be one mile from ****.

„Thank heaven!“ he said, almost aloud. „After spending the night wandering about morasses like a will-o'-the-wisp, I approach a town at last. Thank heaven again and for all its mercies this night! I breathe freely — I am safe.“

He walked on somewhat rapidly; he passed a slow waggon — he passed a group of mechanics — he passed a drove of sheep, and now he saw walking leisurely before him a single figure. It was a girl, in a worn and humble dress; who seemed to seek her weary way with pain and languor. He was about also to pass her, when he heard a low cry. He turned, and beheld in the way-farer his preserver of the previous night.

„Heavens! is it indeed you? can I believe my eyes?“

„I was coming to seek you, sir,“ said the girl, faintly. „I too have escaped; I shall never go back to father, I have no roof to cover my head now.“

„Poor child! but how is this? Did they ill-use you for releasing me?“

„Father knocked me down; and beat me again when he came back; but that is not all,“ she added, in a very low tone.

„What else?“

The girl grew red and white by turns, she set her teeth rigidly, stopped short, and then walking on quicker than before, replied, — „It don't matter; I will never go back — I'm alone now. What, what shall I do?“ and she wrung her hands.

The traveller's pity was deeply moved. „My good girl, said he earnestly, you have saved my life, and I am not ungrateful. Here,“ (and he placed some gold in her hand,)“ get yourself a lodging, food and rest; you look as if you wanted them; and see me again this evening when it is dark, and we can talk unobserved.“

The girl took the money passively, and looked up in his face while he spoke; the look was so unsuspecting, and the whole countenance was so beautifully modest and virgin-like, that had any evil passion prompted the traveller's last words — it must have fled scared and abashed as he met the gaze.

„My poor girl," said he, embarrassed, and after a short pause; — „you are very young, and very, very pretty. In this town you will be exposed to many temptations: take care where you lodge; you have, no doubt, friends here?"

„Friends — what are friends?" answered Alice.

„Have you no relations; no mother's kin?"

„None."

„Do you know where to ask shelter?"

„No, sir; for I can't go where father goes, lest he should find me out."

„Well, then, seek some quiet inn, and meet me this evening, just here, half-a-mile from the town, at seven. I will try and think of something for you in the meanwhile; but you seem tired, you walk with pain; perhaps it will fatigue you to come — I mean, you had rather perhaps rest another day."

„Oh! no; no! it will do me good to see you again, sir."

The young man's eyes met hers, and hers were not withdrawn; their soft blue was suffused with tears — they penetrated his soul.

He turned away hastily, and saw that they were already the subject of curious observation to the various passengers that overtook them. „Don't forget!" he whispered, and strode on with a pace that soon brought him to the town.

He inquired for the principal hotel — entered it with an air that bespoke that nameless consciousness of superiority which belongs to those accustomed to purchase welcome, wherever welcome is bought and sold — and before a blazing fire and no unsubstantial breakfast, forgot all the terrors of the past night, or rather felt rejoiced to think he had added a new and strange hazard to the catalogue of adventures, already experienced by Ernest Maltravers.

Ye Mariners of England.

Ye Mariners of England!
That guard our native seas;
Whose flag has brav'd, a thousand years
The battle and the breeze!
Your glorious standard launch again
To match another foe,
And sweep through the deep,
While the stormy tempests blow;
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy tempests blow.

The spirit of your fathers
Shall start from every wave;
For the deck it was their field of fame
And ocean was their grave:
Where Blake and mighty Nelson fell
Your manly hearts shall glow,
As ye sweep through the deep,
While the stormy tempests blow;
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy tempests blow.

Britannia need no bulwark,
No towers along the steep;
Her march is o'er the mountain waves,
Her home is on the deep.
With thunders from her native oak,
She quells the flood below;
As they roar on the shore,
When the stormy tempests blow;
When the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy tempests blow.

The meteor flag of England
Shall yet terrific burn;
Till danger's troubled night depart,
And the star of peace return.
Then, then, ye ocean-warriors
Our song and feast shall flow
To the fame of your name,
When the storm has ceas'd to blow;
When the fiery fight is heard no more,
And the storm has ceas'd to blow.

Thomas Campbell.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. Nro 44.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Kurze Uebersicht der neueſten engliſchen Literatur.

(Fortſetzung.)

II. Das engliſche Zeitungsweſen.

Wenn ein Deutſcher, der ſein Leben und ſeine Verhältniſſe auf den Kreis einer kleinen Stadt oder einer Provinz beſchränkt haben — und dies Schickſal trifft die meiſten unſerer Landsleute, denn leider hat unſer ganzes Leben ſelbſt in den größten Städten, Hamburg und Wien etwa ausgenommen, immer einmal vorherrſchend Kleinſtädtiſches — wenn, ſage ich, ein Solcher, übrigens ein gebildeter und wohlunterrichteter Mann, vernimmt oder lieſt, daß die Zeitungspreſſe in London der, ſeiner Wirkung nach, bedeutendſte moraliſche Hebel der Welt ſei, ſo wird er entweder mit tiefer Devotion das als glaubwürdig annehmen, wie wir das überhaupt bei allem übertriebenen Lobe des Auslandes zu thun pflegen, oder er wird, falls er zu den Skeptikern gehört, welche ſeit den letzten zwanzig Jahren, wie Pilze, überall hervorſchießen und auch dem [illegible] keinen Schein zu [illegible] ſuchen, höhniſch lachend den Kopf ſchütteln, wie über eine Lüge, die zu ungeheuer ſei, als daß irgend Jemand, und hätte er auch nur [illegible] Sinne, [illegible] glauben könnte. Sein Unglauben wird aber nicht darauf beruhen, daß er die einzelnen Punkte, welche die Baſis jener Behauptung bilden, genau prüft, ſondern daß er — und darin liegt leider unſer allgemeiner und größter Fehler — deutſchen Maßſtab an ausländiſche Zuſtände legt und dieſe mit jenem meſſen will. Zugegeben, ſolches Verfahren wäre richtig, ſo hätte er allerdings auch das größte Recht, gegen ſolche Uebertreibung zu eifern; denn wenn man unſer deutſches Zeitſchriften- und Zeitungsweſen bei Lichte betrachtet, was iſt es? — ein beſtändiges Drehen im vorgeſchriebenen Kreiſe, und nicht einmal, mit den Worten des Dichters:

Mit viel Behagen,
Wie junge Katzen mit dem Schwanz;

Zuſammenſtellen von Tagesneuigkeiten, [illegible] Geſchwätz, daß ſich um die kleinſtädtiſchen Intereſſen dreht u. ſ. w., aber nirgends ein freier Blick in das Allgemeine, nirgends jene kühne Speculation, die, wie ein Blitz, über [illegible] Länder und lange Jahrhunderte geht, und [illegible] und [illegible] der [illegible] Menſchheit [illegible], [illegible] vom richtigen Geſichtspunkte ausgehend, [illegible] haben [illegible], wenn es [illegible], großartig und genial ſich erweiſt. — Darin liegt auch der große Unterſchied, mit [illegible] die Zeitungen nur [illegible] Seite, der Tagesneuigkeiten wegen, um das [illegible] zu [illegible], der Engländer, und ſelbſt der Franzoſe, aber [illegible] nach dem [illegible] zu [illegible] befindet, in dieſem [illegible] über die [illegible] geleitet zu werden und einen feſten Ausgangspunkt zu gewinnen. Daher iſt der raiſonnirende Artikel (the leading article nennen ihn die Engländer ſehr paſſend und bezeichnend) über die vorzüglichſten Intereſſen des Tages die Hauptſache in einer engliſchen Zeitung, wogegen deutſche Zeitungen ihn entweder gar nicht haben, oder, wenn ſie verſuchen, ihn zu bringen, deutſche Leſer ihn als überflüſſiges Geſchwätz betrachten und es noch keinem Verſuche dieſer Art gelungen iſt, ſich Eingang bei der Menge, und wirklichen, allgemeinen Beifall zu verſchaffen. Dazu kommt nun noch unſere weltbekannte [illegible], unſere [illegible], der Umſtand, daß wir nie vergeſſen, welches Gehalt wir haben und welche [illegible], ſelbſt nicht bei Tiſche, noch in unſeren Geſellſchaften u. ſ. w. — mit einem Worte, uns fehlt der wahre Weltbürgerſinn, der durchaus nothwendig iſt, um ein ſolches Zeitungsweſen, wie das engliſche, hervorzubringen, und die Wechſelwirkung, von demſelben genährt und geſtärkt zu werden. — Daher werden und müſſen alle derartigen Unternehmungen bei uns, und wenn ſie auch noch ſo großartig angelegt ſind, ſchon in ihrer Entſtehung ſcheitern, und nur Handels- und Staatszeitungen können bei uns gedeihen, weil die erſteren eine Nothwendigkeit des täglichen Verkehrs für Hinz und Kunz ſind, und die letzteren nicht des Beifalls der Menge zu ihrem Gedeihen bedürfen. —

Wir haben dieſe flüchtigen Bemerkungen, die eigentlich der Stoff zu einer ſehr langen Abhandlung ſein könnten, nur hingeworfen, um unſere Leſer gleich von vorn herein über den deutſchen Standpunkt hinweg, und möglichſt auf eine Höhe zu heben, von der aus er eine freie, durch nichts beſchränkte Ausſicht über das ihm zu eröffnende Feld haben könne; denn allerdings wird ihm Manches in der folgenden Darſtellung, welche wir unſeren früheren Betrachtungen über die moderne engliſche Literatur, to show the very age and body of the time, its form and pressure *), nachzuliefern für nöthig fanden, mit deutſchem, nicht an freiſinnige Formen gewöhntem Auge unglaublich ſcheinen, obgleich nichts leichter zu beweiſen iſt, als die eben aufgeſtellte Behauptung, daß die engliſchen Zeitungen den ſtärkſten moraliſchen Hebel der Welt bilden. — Bekannte Thatſache wird dazu hinlänglich ſein: Die engliſchen Zeitungen waren es zuerſt, welche mit großer Heftigkeit gegen die ſchändliche Behandlung der Negerſklaven in den engliſch-oſtindiſchen Colonien eiferten, die allgemeine Aufmerkſamkeit darauf hinlenkten, und die ſo die völlige Abſchaffung der Sklaverei in dieſen Regionen auf ewige Zeiten veranlaßten und durchſetzten, nicht aber hier allein wirkten, ſondern ähnliche Maßregeln an den amerikaniſchen Küſten vorbereiteten. — Wie bedeutend ſie ferner für die Reform wirkten, iſt zu allgemein bekannt, als daß es hier brauchte wiederholt zu werden.

Die engliſchen Zeitſchriften zerfallen ihrer Tendenz nach in politiſche oder literariſche. — Jene, die eigentlichen Zeitungen, erſcheinen entweder täglich, oder an beſtimmten Tagen der Woche, Morgens oder Abends; ſie ſind entweder miniſteriell oder opponirend, ſelten aber ſelbſt entſchieden, je nachdem die inneren politiſchen Verhältniſſe ſich geſtalten, wechſeln ſie auch, obwohl ihren Grundprincipien meiſt ſtandhaft treu bleibend. Eine nähere Darſtellung derſelben wird das deutlicher machen, wir gehen daher zum Einzelnen über.

Für die bedeutendſte Londoner Zeitung wird allgemein the Times erklärt, das beruht theils auf ihrer Verbreitung, theils auf ihrer Wirkſamkeit; ſie entſtand zuerſt während den letzten Decennien des 18ten Jahrhunderts, nahm 1788 ihren jetzigen Namen an und gewann ſeit dem Zeitraum 1813 ihre hohe Bedeutung. — Die gewöhnliche tägliche Auflage beträgt 10,000 Exemplare, und hat, nach mäßigem Ueberſchlag, 100,000 Leſer. Die vorzüglichſten Redacteurs derſelben waren und ſind zum Theil noch: Walter, Vater und Sohn, die jetzigen Beſitzer; Sir John Stoddart, bekannt wegen ſeiner heftigen Angriffe gegen Napoleon während deſſen glänzendſter Periode; Herr Barnes, höchſt vortheilhaft bekannt durch ſeine public characters; Captain Sterling, Mr. Alſager, und außer dieſen noch an die 100 Mitarbeiter. Die gewöhnlichen Koſten betragen ungefähr 100,000 Pfund Sterling jährlich, der Werth des ganzen Inſtitutes wird auf 500,000 Pfund Sterling, dem Rein-Ertrag auf 50,000 Pfund Sterling durchſchnittlich angeſchlagen. The Times erſcheint täglich im größten Format (double sheets). Sie hat in allen Theilen der Welt Correſpondenten, und wichtige Nachrichten werden ihr gewöhnlich durch eigene Couriere überbracht.

The Morning Herald, ſeit 1780 beſtehend, war lange ein gefürchteter Rival der Times, kam aber dann, durch allerlei Verhältniſſe gebeugt, um 1820 auf eine Auflage von nur 1200 Exemplaren herab, und hob ſich erſt dann allmählig wieder durch ſehr gute Berichte über Polizeiverhandlungen, die einen Herrn Wight, den jetzigen Redacteur des Blattes, zum Verfaſſer hatten. Sie zeichnete ſich von nun an durch entſchiedene Anhänglichkeit an den [illegible] Torismus aus, iſt aber jetzt ſehr gemäßigt, und iſt

---

*) Shakſpeare: Hamlet A. III. Sc. 2.

in der letzten Zeit conſervativ geworden. Es iſt das Eigenthum der Familie Thwaites, wie einen Theil von [illegible] Sterling haben, und erfreut ſich mit dem, zu ihm gehörenden Whitehall-Chronicle, das dreimal wöchentlich erſcheint, eines täglichen Vertriebes von 7000 Exemplaren.

Das Morning Chronicle ward 1769 geſtiftet, gehörte anfangs einer Geſellſchaft von Gelehrten, dann einem Herrn James Perry, der auch zugleich deſſen Redacteur, und ein in moraliſcher, wie in politiſcher Hinſicht höchſt ausgezeichneter Mann war, und durch eine innige Verbindung mit Fox, Sheridan und den andern Häuptern der Whigpartei ſehr kräftig wirkte. Nach ſeinem 1821 erfolgten Tode, kaufte ein Hr. Clement das Journal um 40000 Pfd. Sterling, ein Herr Black war der Hauptredacteur, neben ihm arbeitete der rühmlichſt bekannte Mr. Albany Fonblanque. 1834 ging es in andere Hände über, kam ins Sinken, erholte ſich aber wieder ſehr kräftig ſeit dem Sturz des Miniſteriums Melbourne, deſſen Partei es ſtets ergriff, und erfreut ſich eines Abſatzes von 6000 Exemplaren; ſein Beiblatt the Evening Chronicle, welches drei Mal wöchentlich erſcheint, hat einen Debit von 1000 Exemplaren. — Die Correſpondenz der auswärtigen, namentlich franzöſiſchen und ſpaniſchen, Politik leitet der in Paris lebende, als Dichter und Romanſchriftſteller höchſt ausgezeichnete, Eyre Evans Crowe.

Die Morning-Post entſtand 1772, erfreut ſich, wenn auch nicht des ausgebreitetſten, doch des ſicherſten und gewählteſten Publicums, und wird vortrefflich und mit großer Conſequenz — denn ſie iſt gewiß auf Seite der Tory's — redigirt. Als Hauptmitarbeiter werden Mr. Winthrop Praed, Parlamentsmitglied, Mr. Croker und Lord Ellenborough genannt. Die Morning-Post gehört zum größten Theil der Familie Byrne. — Der Abſatz beläuft ſich auf ungefähr 3000 Exemplare.

Der Morning-Advertiser ward, wunderlich genug, 1794 von einer Geſellſchaft von Gaſtwirthen begründet, und gehört denſelben noch. — Für die Einlage von 100 Guineen und ein vollſtändiges Abonnement kann jeder [illegible] angehende Gaſtwirth in London Miteigenthümer werden. Das Journal wird durch einen gewählten Ausſchuß verwaltet, und eine Quote des reinen Ertrags für die Unterſtützung ehemaliger verarmter Miteigner, ſo wie für eine Erziehungsanſtalt zum Beſten der hinterlaſſenen Kinder derſelben verwendet. Hauptredacteur iſt ein Herr Anderton. Es iſt ein durchaus unabhängiges, entſchiedenen liberales, im Intereſſe des Volkes redigirtes Journal, welches, [illegible] der [illegible] der Leitung erhielen, und der Schnelligkeit und des Reichthums der Berichte mit allen übrigen würdig wetteifert. Sein Abſatz beläuft ſich auf 5000 Exemplare.

Der Public-Ledger iſt dem Alter nach der erſte; er ward 1760 gegründet; die erſte, der Bedeutſamkeit nach aber die letzte der am Morgen erſcheinenden Londoner Zeitungen, und hat mehrere Mal den Eigenthümer, wie den Titel geändert. Sie iſt im Intereſſe der Tory-Partei, hat die Herren Stevens und [illegible] zu Redacteuren, und heißt jetzt the Constitutional. Ihr Abſatz beträgt im Durchſchnitt nur 500 Exemplare täglich; ſie würde noch weniger Abnehmer haben, wenn nicht ihre vielen Annoncen ſie zum [illegible] Vehikel für Handel und Schifffahrt machten.

Die hier genannten ſind die vorzüglichſten am Morgen erſcheinenden Zeitungen; zu den am Abend herauskommenden gehören folgende:

(Fortſetzung folgt.)

Some Passages in the Life of Francis Lowerfish, Esq.

Chapter the First.

— I depart,
Whither, I know not; but the hour's gone by Childe Harold.

I could endure this sort of thing no longer; I felt that I could not. I would pay no more rent. My creditors must consent to remain so a little yet until I could turn myself round. I settled this in my own mind during the preceding night, — a night of restless and feverish anxiety. The pleasures of reading are manifold, and while they had me in their books, a record of strange and intense interest would never be wanting to them. I would say to them, in the words of my favourite author,

"— [illegible] — Be there —"

And there, an' it please you, it must continue to remain.

Filled with this irrevocable resolution, I arose and dressed myself. I must leave my lodgings that very day. It would be well also to arrange and take a mental inventory of my wearing apparel, and goods, chattels, and appurtenances, of whatever description. New lodgings are strange, and sometimes dangerous domiciles. Honesty is a scarce article — very few have Blackstone at their fingers' ends. I found, then, after I had completed my toilet, my extra wardrobe to consist of one pair of azure unwhisperables, in a rapid decline from exposure to incessant thorough-drafts — a shirt which had stuck to me through good and evil report, with more adhesive attachment than did the shirt of Nessus, the Centaur, to the limbs of Hercules — and two pair of old, exceeding old stockings, such as, to judge them by their appearance, might have been knitted by Mary Queen of Scots, for her husband Darnley.

Over and above this abundance of gear, I could boast a razor, better fitted to take off the beards of oysters than of men — a small tooth-brush, and a large-tooth comb, the bristles of one about equal in number to the teeth of the other — a superannuated hair-brush that could make itself useful as a battledore — and a locket, presented to me by my cousin Ellen, of inestimable worth to me, but of no great intrinsic value — indeed, a nominal relative of mine, whose house may at any time be recognized by its fanciful decoration of three gilded balls, had apprised me, only a few days previously, that the bijou in question was not worth ninepence.

Having packed up these several articles in as portable and invisible a shape as possible, and having, as a mere matter of form and ceremony, taken the gauge of my pockets, with a view to a final assurance that there was, indeed, no current coin of the realm remaining in them, I turned towards the scanty furniture of my bedroom, and took a farewell of that ancient jumble, bidding it at the same time to take notice that this was to be considered the last leave-taking of Frank Loverfish, Esq.

But now it may behove me to state why I made so precipitate a retreat from my lodging. This in few words. In the first place, Gripe, a sheriff's officer for the County of Middlesex, a man who had paralyzed more shoulder-blades than any two bailiffs extant, was on the look out after me. I had heard — heard of, nay I had seen him. He was pervading Pentonville like a pestilence, and he wanted to take measure of me, on an old suit, with a long piece of parchment. In the second place, my landlord had disgusted me. Some men are absurdly unreasonable. He wanted his little bill. He resided, as I have hinted, at Pentonville. He was by name Sullen, by profession a milkman, by habit a drunkard. Pentonville was a pleasant place — very much so. Milk is nutritious, the breath of cows wholesome. Nor was Sullen, during the earlier period of my sojourn with him, either an unamiable or an unintellectual character. It was he who exploded the vulgar error that gentlemen in his line put chalk into their milk. He was decisive upon the point. He said it was not chalk.

But as time wore away, a change much to be deprecated took place in the manners and behaviour of my landlord. Whether it was that his cows yielded milk less kindly than heretofore, or that he himself possessed less of the milk of human kindness, was at that time a problem to me, until at length the unworthy truth flashed upon me. Yes, I saw by the gradually increasing blueness, which was now become blackness of his physiognomie, and the half-and-half pepper and salt expression in the face of his wife (a worthy woman, too), that they expected long arrears of rent from me. They wanted their little bill.

I know it is unreasonable to expect invariable suavity from those to whom money is due. In some few instances that have come under my own knowledge such affability has been withheld. Was it for me to disturb the account? On no account, also, would I disturb myself. I forgave, while I pitied, the frailty of human nature, and was their inmate for a few months longer, that they might hereafter palliate to themselves their otherwise parsimony, their inherent haste. While I remained with them I was the most quiet lodger they ever had. They brought me into a habit of early rising. I rose up with the sun, and when I came home at night, such was my kind and truly humane horror of disturbing their repose, that I adopted a ghostlike gliding, inaudible even to myself.

Every thing must have an end. One night I had, as usual, crept silently into bed, where I lay for some time speculating on the best means of making one sovereign, of which I had become possessed, go as far as three; and during this process of expansion, I fell into a doze. The arms of Morpheus must have been jerked out of the sockets, as awaking with a start, I sprang up in bed. Could it be? Yes. A heavy and unsteadfast foot was stamping down, or rather up the stairs, while frequent tumblings against the wainscot led to the momentary conviction that Sullen, accompanied by his crew, was about to intrude into my chamber, the door of which was now burst open. Sullen, however, had come alone, much disguised in liquor (but I knew him too well), and planting the weight of his detested carcase upon my toes, heaved forth a heavy sigh.

„Well,“ presently hiccuped the bloated malt-worm, with a voice as though he said — „Here I am.“

„Well,“ I responded in a soothing tone that might have excited the envy of the late Mr Daffy, whose invaluable elixir has been found so efficacious when applied to infants, „Well, Mr. Sullen.“

„I want some money, Mr. Lavendish,“ roared the vulgar and unreasonable brute, „and I can't wait no longer for it. Here have we been more than ten months a waiting, and never seen a farthing the blessed time. Come, tip up, now — I'll stand no more nonsense.“

I am no coward — far from it; yet, I confess I was panic-struck. To have attempted to give battle to the excited brute would have been useless. I could no more have stood against him, than a small keg could have vied with the Heidelberg tun. Involuntarily seizing my pocket, I produced the sovereign.

„If half of this,“ I was about to say, „will be of any service,“ etc.

„I'll have it all,“ bellowed the miscreant, falling forward and grasping my treasure; „and now, Mr. Lavendish, you're a gentleman —“ and he staggered towards the door, „and may stay here a little longer, if you like.“

It was but small satisfaction to me to hear the base felon fall, head-over-heels, down stairs. It only accelerated the departure of my entire capital, which was now gone from me for ever.

That night preceded the morning of my departure. — What did the filthy hog mean? Not paid him a farthing for ten months! — Rubbish! But I had intended to pay him, which is the same thing, or as near to it as may be. — Oh! the selfishness of mankind!

With a feeling of manly indignation at the meanness of the world, I walked boldly down stairs, and there I paid my respects to the good woman, who, it seemed, had been somewhat annoyed by the plunder of the previous night; and concealing my few articles of wearing-apparel as well as I could, left the house, with a shudder at the means some people adopt of looking after what they call their interests.

Chapter the second.

—— Alone with care!

[illegible] Montgomery.

I had a friend residing in Goswell-street, to whom I straight-way bent my steps. Magson was a clerk in the Mint, and took breakfast precisely at eight every morning. I had the length of his coffee-pot, and knew accurately the diameter of his hot rolls. Magson was a very respectable, worthy, good kind of a man; that is to say, he kept his landlady civil, had a tame tailor, never drank more than two glasses of grog, never smoked more than one cigar, and was always in bed by the eleventh hour. Yet Magson had his faults. He was one of those men who would do nothing for you if he knew you wanted it; but if he thought you were „about something,“ would lend his assistance readily enough. He would not help a lame dog over the stile, but would obsequiously open the gate for any well-conditioned cat that could exercise its due proportion of legs. He would put no shoulder to the wheel if your waggon were stuck in the mud; but when you had borrowed three pair of fresh horses, and were travelling along the high road in triumph, he would come behind the waggon with his walking-stick, and give it a plaguy hard push — „and no mistake,'' as he was wont to say. With this estimable friend I was now taking my morning coffee.

During this refreshing meal, I had full leisure to peruse the index of Magson's mind, as printed in his face. To this index I added a supplement of good qualities, which my present situation rendered me prone to ascribe to him. But no; I felt it would not do. I saw that I must not reveal to him my forlorn plight. There are some men whom you can never understand. Magson was one of the utterly unintelligible. As he played with his watch-chain ostentatiously, I could have asked him for the loan of ten pounds; when he carefully brushed his hat, with an anxious scrutiny of its minute defects, I felt that a doit would have been denied. But, for what purpose had I come? Some compromise between ten pounds and a doit must be effected. He was going — he was off to his office.

„By the by, Magson,'' said I, with an air of sudden reminiscence, placing my hand upon my pocket as though doubtful of its vacuity. „I find I have come out without any loose silver about me — lend me a few shillings, will you?''

Had I attempted the man's existence with a breakfast knife, he could not have been more astounded.

„Loose silver,'' he stammered; „I don't know — I think I have a few shillings: what are you about just now?''

„Oh! many things — very busy, very busy — yes, those five half crowns will just do — thank ye — I shall be your way again next Wednesday.''

„Well, I shall be happy to see you then,'' said the discomfited curmudgeon — „you're getting on, are you?''

„I believe you I am!'' said I, with an important nod; „as much as I can do to get my meals sometimes — so engaged.''

„I am truly glad to hear it,'' replied Magson, pressing my hand as though it were a sponge, and we parted at the street-door with mutual expressions of goodwill and regard. Upon my life, the manner of the man compelled me to make a second application to him some time afterwards. There is a great deal in manner. I looked upon him as Dryden's treasure-seeker did upon a piece of shining ore which he suddenly turned up.

„I knew he would be gold another day.''

During the afternoon I dropped in accidentally upon my agreeable companion, Shelter. He lived in Paul's Chain, and was something in Doctors Commons. Shelter was a fine, generous fellow, but he never had any money about him, except at quarter-day, and then you must nick the minute, or the chance was hopeless. That was the worst of it — I have several times been subjected to much inconvenience from that circumstance. He enjoyed, however, an enviable degree of credit at the Star, whither, in a twinkling of it, we repaired.

Here I recounted to him my distresses, and vented much moral reprehension of Magson's meanness of soul, and calculating scepticism of character. He laughed heartily at my distresses, and threw up his eyes at the false prudence of our common friend.

„By the by,'' said he, after the second glass, „what a ninny you must be, Loosefish, to take a lodging — a mere paltry lodging in which you can never acquire respect, or exact the attention your station in life demands?''

I started.

„Don't you see,'' he resumed, „you're perpetually harassed for little trifling miserable sums altogether beneath a gentleman's notice? don't you see how you lower your character in the estimation of the world? Besides, to be obliged to take your meals at coffee-shops and eating houses — pshaw! you lower your respectability, Loosefish.''

„Well, but how can I help that?" was a natural question of mine.

„Superadd board to your lodging!" cried Skelter in a loud oracular voice.

I had never thought of that before. Very strange! I had never dreamed of it before.

„Board!" I exclaimed, „why, Skelter, you astonish me."

„Do I?" said Skelter, stroking his chin with an air of superior knowledge of the world.

„Why, Skelter," and I leaned across the table; „they take breakfast at these places at nine o'clock every morning."

„Precisely so," cried Skelter, rubbing his hair.

„Lunch about one."

Skelter nodded his head. „Go on."

„Dine at five; sometimes fish, and always a hot joint on table;" and here I motioned as though carving a leg of mutton.

„I believe you there is," said Skelter, „and cold again there."

„And tea and supper into the bargain. Oh! Skelter, you're a good fellow — but why didn't you tell me this before?"

„Be quiet," said my friend, „don't agitate yourself. Mark me: in a boarding-house you are an independent man. They dare not give you warning. They haven't the heart to do it. You have eaten and drunk at their table."

„Not yet," said I; „but very soon will do."

„That's right — mind, this is no mere dry lodging, but money out of pocket. Every additional joint fixes you more firmly; and when you have eaten about a hundred legs of mutton, you have erected a centipede which they dare not grapple with."

Skelter and I parted at midnight, — he to his own boarding-house (I wanted an introduction, but he said one was enough), and I to any house that might still be open.

As I walked down Fleet-street and turned up Chancery-lane, how I longed, like a full-freighted vessel of a merchantman, that I could go on board instantly. I was inwardly resolved, however, to put myself on regular diet the very next day, and in the mean while, a public-house arrested my attention, in which probably I might secure a bed.

The landlord, as I entered the house, was staring with all his might at a wizened lemon suspended from a hook in a small net; and yawning (for by this strange process he had been endeavouring to stave off slumber) demanded my pleasure.

„Can I have a bed here to-night," I inquired with my accustomed suavity.

„Certainly, sir," replied the host, „if you do not mind sleeping with another gentleman in the room."

„Not in the least. Misery, landlord, makes a man acquainted with strange bedfellows, as our great bard says."

„Ah!" said the host, as though he understood something, but did not exactly know what. „Here, Betsy, show this gentleman the room."

„This honest fellow sleeps soundly," thought I, when the girl had retired and left me alone with my companion, „if snoring conduces to slumber, he is fast enough."

I stumbled accidentally against the bed. For this I was sorry at the time, for I would not willingly mar the repose of any human being. The unknown turned himself round with a blasphemous grunt, and I saw his face gradually collapse into quiescent unconsciousness.

I saw his face awhile, as I have stated, and moved not, for I had no power to move. It was Gripe, the bailiff! My Pentonville persecutor lay before me. „Abide wolf! mock bear!" and his withering digits were harmlessly expanded on the counterpane. Now could I have devised engines for his life, but that my senses promptly returning, warned me to provide for my own safety. With the cautious retrogression of a crab, therefore, I left the dreaded sleeper, and forthwith applied the little funnel of an extinguisher to the candle, which was perhaps the very wisest thing I ever did in my life. Slinking into bed, I lay in horrible suspense. Perhaps he might be dreaming of me, and would arise while I slept, and by some preternatural instinct lay hands upon his quaking victim. Awaking from uneasy repose, I arose about five in the morning, with a sort of tic douloureux in my left shoulder, impossible to be described.

The coat of my ruthless companion lay beside me. I took it up and examined the contents of the pockets. Amongst other slips of parchment (I think they term them writs) was one calling upon the sheriff of Middlesex, greeting, to secure me forthwith, stating that I owed 34l. 5s. to two gentlemen of similar names, and describing me as at present employed in „running up and down my bailiwick." This and the other similar documents I destroyed, and dressing myself hastily, took my leave in deep disgust of a man who, hardened by long and debasing custom, had evidently quite forgotten that liberty is not only the birthright but the privilege of Englishmen.

(To be concluded in our next.)

The Solitary Tomb.

Not a leaf of the tree which stood near me was stirr'd,
Tho' a breath might have mov'd it so lightly;
Not a farewell note from a sweet singing bird
Bade adieu to the sun setting brightly.

The sky was cloudless and calm, except
In the west, where the sun was descending;
And there the rich tints of the rainbow slept,
As his beams with their beauty were blending.

And the evening star, with its ray so clear,
So tremulous, soft, and tender,
Had lit up its lamp, and shot down from its sphere
Its dewy, delightful splendour.

And I stood all alone on that gentle hill,
With a landscape so lovely before me;
And its spirit and tone, so serene and still,
Seem'd silently gathering o'er me.

Far off was the Deben, whose briny flood
By its winding banks was sweeping;
And close by the foot of the hill where I stood
The dead in their damp graves were sleeping.

How lonely and lovely their resting-place seem'd!
An enclosure which care could not enter;
And how sweetly the grey lights of evening gleam'd
On the solitary tomb in its centre!

When, at morn or at eve, I have wander'd near,
And in various lights have view'd it;
With what different forms, to friendship dear,
Hath the magic of fancy endued it!

It hath sometimes seem'd like a lonely sail,
A white speck on the emerald billow;
And at times, like a lamb in a low grassy vale,
Stretch'd in peace on its verdant pillow.

But no image of gloom, or of care, or of strife,
Hath it e'er given birth to, one minute;
For lamented in death, as beloved in life,
Was he who now slumbers within it.

He was one who, in youth, on the stormy seas,
Was a far and a fearless ranger;
Who, borne on the billow and blown by the breeze,
Had deem'd lightly of death or of danger.

Yet in this rude school had his heart still kept
All the freshness of gentlest feeling;
Nor in woman's warm eye hath a tear ever slept
More of meekness and kindness revealing.

And here, when the bustle of youth was past,
He liv'd, — and he lov'd — and he died too; —
Oh! why was affection which death could but blast,
A more lengthen'd enjoyment denied to?

But here he slumber's; and many there are
Who love that lone tomb, and revere it;
And one far off, like even's dewy star,
Tho' at distance, in fancy dwells near it.

Barton.

The BRITISH MUSEUM [illegible]

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 15.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Some Passages in the Life of Francis Lonnerfish, Esq.

(Continued from our last.)

Chapter the Third.

— Bed and Board, &c.
[illegible]

[illegible]

It was a highly respectable house which I stopped in [illegible]. It was in George-street, Tottenham-court-road — a place, I believe, only remarkable for its vicinity to the Middlesex hospital, having no historical recollections connected with it to recommend its adoption to the antiquary or the curious. But I have no such predilections, being naturally more solicitous about the future for myself, than about the past connected with others. „Board and Lodging.“ It had a pleasing look with it, nicely printed, as it was, on a large white card. It reminded me of a tablecloth with the first course just served. It excited hunger.

I knocked and was admitted. Now, let me remark, I think it very strange that women, keeping expensive establishments of this nature, do not exercise more caution. I know that my features are prepossessing. I am aware that I was born „formed to make women take“ to their own interests, but surely, a reference should have been required. I think so. I may, however, be mistaken. Mrs. Moon, the worthy landlady, was pleased to remark that my face was a letter of recommendation, a sentiment in which her truly amiable daughter, Miss Eliza Moon, concurred, and I sat down to dinner, that very afternoon, with an excellent appetite.

Besides myself, there were two other gentlemen to whom my hostess introduced me. Mr. Trotter, an elderly gentleman with powdered hair and benignant expression of face, and a young gentleman, Mr. Cherubini Cox, whose chief personal points consisted of no eyebrows, a set of teeth like split filberts, and a voice, as though he had swallowed the bassoon.

At night, when the elderly gentleman had borne away his chamber candlestick, Mrs. Moon imparted to me in confidence that her „more than brother“ Mr. Trotter was a merchant who had left off business, that he was very wealthy, and lived upon an annuity payable once a year, and had money out in all directions, and that he was like a second father to her girl, and had promised to present her with a marriage portion. Miss Eliza Moon on her part descanted upon the merits of Mr. Cherubini Cox, who had retired into the back parlour. He was so well connected, so very respectable, so amiable, so quiet, so pleasant. He was walking the hospitals, and was passionately fond of music. His instrument was the violoncello; whose tones, by the by, were now rumbling through the keyhole like groans of indisposed malefactors.

1) [illegible]

These recitals were gratifying to me. I was touched, nay, affected by the generosity of Trotter. I yearned towards Cox, whom I already looked upon as a friend. In return, I opened my heart, and hinted my affairs to this worthy couple. I was unexpectedly detained in London by a lawsuit involving a vast sum. I had foolishly sent on my wardrobe (except a small change of linen) to Paris, where my father, the General, had long resided; and I did not know whether I should not break off the match with Miss Ponsonby. Those wealthy aristocrats always thought so much of themselves. This discourse having made an evident impression, I retired to my very comfortable apartment.

For three weeks all went on smoothly enough: but during the fourth, methought I discovered a slight diminution in the cordiality, — on the fifth, I imagined (I am sensitively alive to such things) a degree of coolness; — and on the sixth, I felt sure that a storm was brewing for me. The wort of my landlady's wrath was already fermenting.

„The sky was changed, and such a change; oh! night" was nothing to the pitchy expression on the countenance of my landlady and her daughter. Discontent nestled in their brows, malignity took lodgings in their eyes, distrust and disgust seemed to loom from the very peaks of their noses. What was to be done? I tried Magnus for five pounds, but it wouldn't do — it was with the most strange difficulty that I succeeded in securing one, a sum, of course, too paltry to think of tendering even in part payment.

And here I found Walker's theory imperfect. It is necessary to sacrifice some little specie for the first month or two, in order to secure a footing. I am thoroughly convinced that a man is a gainer by that process in the longrun. It compromises the principle, I grant, but the end justifies the means.

For now, I was fairly at a nonplus — I could not see my way clearly — the board was giving way from under me. I saw I must soon be, like the times of the melancholy Hamlet, „out of joint." In vain I started at the knock of the postman — in vain I cursed the dilatoriness of my Parisian Correspondent. How many times did I walk into the city to inquire at the Post Office whether there was not some strange mistake, some keeping back of the letters, some misdirection. How many interviews did I solicit with Sir Francis Freeling upon that very point.

When overcredulous people once begin to suspect, it is astonishing what sceptics they are. When doubt begins, farewell fiction and its uses. They doubted me. The worst construction was put upon my credit: they made a marked distinction between me and Cherubini Cox — there was a wide difference between their treatment of Trotter and of me. This was ungracious; nay, it was unkind. I particularly remarked that they invariably gave me the knuckle of the leg of mutton — the frostbitten potato was mine, my tea was not of the first water, and my bed was never half made. How will a senseless idolatry at the shrine of mammon warp the affections and corrupt the heart! — But I pitied and forgave the poor misguided creatures.

Something must be accomplished to re-establish my equality. I am free to confess that I am not partial to the knuckle end; that the potato is a vegetable by no means improved by exposure to the frost; that full-flavoured Hyson is preferable to the last faint twang of Twankay, and that a featherbed is no great shakes unless it be well shaken.

My thoughts alternately ran upon Cherubini Cox, and trotted up to Trotter. The former was fond of music. Good. Music is soothing, and I believe softens the sympathies. But then he was walking the hospitals. His soul was callous, doubtless; he had seen too much of misery to be affected by a recital of pecuniary accidents. He, who could witness unmoved a poor creature's leg taken off, would hardly listen to me if I told him that I had not a leg to stand upon. But Trotter — the benevolent, the exemplary, the kind, the wealthy Trotter! He was the man for my money — or, rather, I was the man for his.

I gave Trotter the preference. I would permit him to confer an obligation upon me.

One night I was left alone with the philanthropist. The ladies had gone to a minor theatre with tickets; Cox was rasping away at his violoncello in the back parlour. Trotter was dozing over the fire, with the cat on one knee, and a cotton pocket-handkerchief on the other. He looked the impersonation of disinterestedness. Ten pounds! It was a trifle.

A cough is no bad introduction to subjects of this nature. I was seized with an opportune fit, which awoke him.

„I am really very rude to fall asleep in your company," said the benevolent creature.

„Not in the least, Mr. Trotter," said I with a polite bow. The time was come. I trembled with agitation.

„Will you excuse, Mr. Trotter," I resumed, „the liberty I am about to take, in asking a very extraordinary favour. My agent, sir, has been culpably remiss — my remittances have not yet come to hand, and that excellent and truly intelligent woman — Mrs. Moon, I mean — is naturally solicitous — excessively so — about my little" — (here I smiled and interposed „ahem!"); — my absurdly small account."

„My dear Mr. Lounsdale, how can I serve you?" said my companion, looking about the room with an air of vague surprise.

„Simply and briefly, sir, by the trifling loan of ten pounds — for a very short time."

Trotter fell back in his chair with the most original face ever invented.

„My dear good sir," said he, „this is the most extraordinary application — "

„Peculiar, I admit," said I, slightly chopfallen, „but let me hope not offensively bold, or —"

„No — no — I'm not offended; far from it!" cried he, „but then, to make such a request to me — to me — "

„Nay, Mr. Trotter," and I smiled seductively, and shook my head — „I have long marked your nature — your qualities of head and heart —"

I paused, for my friend was cogitating deeply. There was a long silence, only broken by occasional bursts of anguish from the overwrought violoncello, which Cox, seemingly excited to frenzy, was wreaking himself upon in the back parlour.

„Mr. Lounsdale," said Trotter, at length, in a tone perfectly novel to my ear — "you are a man of the world — I can see that — so am I. — You have placed confidence in me — it shall not be broken. Can you be secret?"

I bowed.

„You want ten pounds," continued Trotter, lowering his voice, and pushing his finger towards the door of the back parlour; „you have been living here upon speculation — without any certain means, eh? Come, confess it."

„Sir!" cried I with becoming indignation, „do not presume —"

„I know you have," said Trotter; „a word in your ear: — so have I."

It was now my turn to fall back in my chair, while Trotter indulged in a series of regularly measured winks.

„Good Heavens! Trotter, you astonish me; you must be joking!"

„A fact," said the wealthy old gentleman.

„Why, you've been living here six months!"

„More," said Trotter; „and the deuce a farthing have I paid. But a certain person will very soon be Mrs. Trotter."

I could have hugged to my bosom the ingenious, but I fear I must call him, the unprincipled old gentleman.

„I'll tell you what I'll do," said he. „You mustn't stay here; you'll disconcert my plans — they'll, perhaps, suspect me. I'll guarantee the debt you owe them. I'll take it upon myself, and when I'm married you shall have twenty pounds. But, lord! a young fellow like you need never want money. Were you ever in love?"

„I have felt that passion, Trotter; but marriage —"

„The thing I mean," said he. „Have you ever thought about it?"

„Why, no," said I, „not so deeply, perhaps —"

„As its importance demands," interrupted Trotter, „only think: a rich widow, with freeholds, or long leases; or a soft spinster with hard cash as a set-off."

„Not to be had, old fellow, not to be had."

„Ay, but to be imagined, young fellow. Here's a secret for you that, if you have any friends, shall melt them; that will thaw the most Hyperborean tailor; that will provide furniture, linen, fixtures, every thing. Say you are going to be married."

„Say you're going to be married!" It had a plausible and pleasing degree of fiction to recommend it.

„Try it short," said Trotter. „Going to be married," and he repeated the golden sentence as though parading it for my inspection.

„Going to be married!" it was still better. „Trotter," cried I, and I took up my candle, „it will do. — Good night, God bless you!"

How unaccountable that I never should have hit upon it! Why, my uncle in the country, whom I had given up in despair, must come down upon so special a plea. It was worth a cool hundred or two at least. Even Magson would be practicable after this. „Going to be married!" I slept upon it.

Chapter the fourth.

The gods are just, and of our pleasant vices
Make instruments to scourge us.

SHAKSPEARE.

I tried the new invention upon a tailor in Oxford street the very next morning. It succeeded to admiration, and within a week I was in a situation to take leave of Mrs. and Miss Moon and the two gentlemen, in a suit of superfine Saxony that might have defied the criticism of a Brummel.

„To you, dear madam," said I, addressing my kind hostess, while a tear worked its passage into my eye; „to you I feel that I shall be eternally indebted." And here I think I may take credit to myself for the utterance of stern and open truth. „But to Mr. Trotter," I continued, „I acknowledge myself under an obligation which can never be effaced."

„He is indeed a kind soul," cried Mrs. Moon, turning a soft eye upon the counterfeit Crœsus, who bowed deprecatingly. „Every thing has been satisfactorily arranged, Mr. Lowerfish; we shall be happy to see you whenever you pass our way. Good bye. — Farewell!"

Amid heartfelt valedictions of this nature, I withdrew.

The talismanic influence of this small sentence, „Going to be married," comprising as it does, only four words, was altogether beyond my fondest hopes. I gave credit to Trotter for the discovery, and others gave me credit for the application. I actually got Magson to accept a bill for me for twenty-five pounds on the strength of it, which, with the assistance of Shelter, I got discounted, as they call it: that is to say (such is the sickening self-hauteur of man) after deducting five pounds for commission, the agent compelled me to take a hundred bottles of blacking, forty-five pipkins, a gross of door-mats, and a ton of glue, handing me over a paltry balance containing three bad halfcrowns, two pocketpieces, and a light sovereign.

I was fain, however, to content myself, and disposed of my incongruous merchandise at a tremendous sacrifice — passed the bad halfcrowns with a sedate visage — „lightly come, lightly go," exchanged the light sovereign for twenty shillings; and generously gave the pocketpieces to the poor.

But a man can't be going to be married for ever. A bride must be forthcoming; there must be some producible person — some feasible female. The world goes round, and the world's affairs won't always square. Some of my creditors became impertinently importunate. They wished to know to whom I was espoused — when the hymeneal altar would be lighted for me — when the honeymoon would rise. In vain I rang the changes upon Trotter, his immense fortune, and his only child. Some hinted their belief that Trotter was a phantom, and his daughbe a fetch. Some, when I mentioned Trotter, said something touching one „Walker," while others cried „All a hum," — „A regular do," — „A swindling transaction," and the like. In a word, it is impossible to describe the base, the cruel insults to which I was subjected.

And now Magson's bill was falling due. The days of grace had commenced; the day after to-morrow, and procrastination must cease. Needless to say, it was hardly convenient to me to meet this bill; the alternative, therefore, must be to run away from it. How did I curse the foolish delicacy that had withheld me from writing to my uncle Grindley, explaining my connubial intentions, and soliciting fifty pounds to enable me to carry into effect that desirable arrangement. I had felt, however, that an abrupt intimation of that nature might prove fatal to my cousin Olive, whose love for me was altogether of a romantic character. Magson, then, must be once more applied to. I must raise ten pounds under pretence of taking up the bill, and then start into the country, and rely upon splendid eloquence, embellished by the most persuasive, and if necessary, pathetic diction. Some affected purists would, I know, condemn this step as rash and unadvised; I can only say that it is frequently resorted to by persons of the highest respectability.

The very first thing on the following morning, I found myself at Magson's door. As I entered, the odour of coffee was pleasingly fragrant, and the girl was just bringing in the hot rolls.

„Magson," said I, shaking him heartily by the hand, „I am come to breakfast with you; your bill falls due to-morrow. I can't wait half an hour — must conduct Charlotte to the morning concert — we're to be married, you dog, on Tuesday next."

„Well, that is most extraordinary," said Magson; „the very day on which I am to be married."

„You — you going to be married!" And I gazed at the old-fashioned juvenile with astonishment. „Well, but let me tell you. Ten pounds —."

„Two years ago," interrupted Magson, cutting an arch in the centre piece of a hot roll, „I went into the country on a month's leave. There I met a young lady and her excellent parent, with whom I became acquainted. I renewed the intimacy last year, when I paid my addresses to the young lady, which were rejected. But this year, on renewing my proposals, the old gentleman gave his consent, stating that he believed his daughter's objection to me had been weakened, an attachment she had formerly conceived for some worthless spendthrift of a nephew of his, having subsided."

„Well, my dear fellow, I give you joy," said I, not paying much attention to this narrative; „but touching business: I want you to lend me ten pounds for a day or two, to enable me to meet your bill. I must not appear to want money, you know, until I get my wife's property."

„Impossible, Loosefish, impossible!" cried Magson, setting down his coffee-cup. „Didn't you tell me that the bill should be taken up? It must be taken up. Your father-in-law, Mr. —"

„Trotter," said I.

„Mr. Trotter will lend you fifty pounds instantly." (Poor, short-sighted wretch, how little he knew Trotter!)

„Besides," he continued, „I want every farthing I can lay my hands upon at this moment. I must cut a dash for a month or two. I told the old fellow I had six hundred a-year in the Mint, and, you know, I only get a hundred and fifty. The girl has less."

Here was a sordid villain! At that moment I could have drugged his coffee with belladonna. „And so you won't lend me the ten pounds? Very well, Mr. Magson."

„I can't," he replied; „and I wish you'd be off now. I expect my wife that is to be, and her father, every instant. Ah! here they are. Now, go, that's a good fellow."

Urged by curiosity, I approached the window. „Ha! can it be?" cried I, in an ecstasy.

„Can it be? — It is," said Magson.

„My uncle and cousin," I rejoined; and rushing to the street-door, which I opened, I flung myself into the arms of the old gentleman, embraced my cousin with that warmth which is my chief and most amiable characteristic, and drew them into the parlour.

Magson's face, as we entered, assumed the sourness of small beer with which thunder has been making too free. „Very strange!" said he; „a most extraordinary coincidence."

„Very," replied the old gentleman, wiping his forehead. „So, then, nephew, you know Mr. Magson?"

„He was a friend," said I, with blandness, „but now — oh! uncle — well, how have you been?" And I drew my chair towards my relatives, and entered into an interesting conversation.

„Lancelot, a word with you for one moment," cried Magson, with an air of chagrin. I approached him.

„Now, can't you be off," said he, appealing to me; „you see you are not wanted; you can meet your friends some other time."

I turned away from him in disgust. „Oh! my dear uncle," said I, with emotion, „what a viper you were about to take to your bosom! Oh! my beloved cousin, how nearly were you sacrificed! What do you think that monster gets per annum at the Mint?"

„Six hundred on the rise," said Grindley.

„One hundred and fifty, and the salaries are about to be reduced; and to my certain knowledge his mother keeps a cakeshop in futile opposition to the Chelsea bun-house!"

Magson held down his head in utter confusion, while the head of my revered uncle appeared to be twisting round on a pivot with inconceivable rapidity, so instantaneously did his eyes glare upon every article in the room.

„Let us retire from the odious wretch!" said Ellen with a thrill of horror.

„Nay, hear me," cried the crest-fallen culprit. „It is true I have been guilty of duplicity, but let me plead my love for —"

I generously rushed between Magson and the enraged parent, and caught the descending walking-stick ere it clove upon the skull of the former.

„Leave him to his conscience," said I with dignity, and I drew my cousin's arm between my own. „Adieu, sir!" and we marched in triumph from the forlorn villain.

We walked a considerable distance, unconscious of the direction we were taking; the old gentleman practising immense strides in front, and my cousin and I exchanging explanations and confessions of mutual love.

„By the by, uncle," said I, suddenly stopping, „this is not the way to your inn, is it? I must accompany you there."

„No, no, you shan't," cried Grindley, „we will go home with you to-day. I will have it so. You have laid me under an obligation I shall never forget. You shan't repeat it. Where do you live?"

Just reconciled to my uncle, and entitled to expect some return at his hands, I put it to the candid reader whether, lover of truth in general as I am, I was not justified in withholding from Grindley the fact that I was then occupying an attic in Rose and Crown-court, Borough-market?

„Why," said I, „my health has obliged me to take furnished apartments in the New Road; but that's a great distance."

„Distance!" cried the less topographical Grindley; „why here we are in the New Road — you must be mad, nephew!"

I was nearly so at this disastrous circumstance. „Ay, we shall soon be there now," said I woefully, and the old gentleman stepped out with increased vigour.

„Where the devil do you live, boy?" cried he at length; and he threw open his coat and gave his bald pate the benefit of fresh air.

„Oh, here we are now — I see," I remarked, summoning resolution from despair, and leading the way through a small forecourt to a house, in the parlour window of which „Furnished Apartments" were visible.

„Step up stairs into the first floor," said I, as the door opened, „I will be with you instantly. My dear madam," and I drew the landlady into the parlour, — „will you permit us to occupy your first floor room for an hour or two? A friend of mine from the country, very tired, hates taverns, member of the temperance society — eh?"

„Certainly, sir," said the landlady to this unexpected application.

„You're a good woman," cried I, in a transport, „here, pray accept this five-shilling piece, and I wish with this other one, you'd send out for a bottle of wine, and bring it up with three glasses; will you?"

Making a funny face, to propitiate the good lady, I hastened up stairs.

„Well, my dear nephew, and how are you getting on," kindly inquired my uncle.

„Why, tolerably, sir, only tolerably — want of capital debars me from taking advantage of many opportunities."

„Well, but nephew, satisfy me that you can do good with it, and you shall not want money; besides, there was an attachment between you and my girl here, and if you will but be commonly prudent, you may still win her."

„I am prudent enough now," said I with a deep sigh. „Ah! those follies of my youth, how I detest them! I will have none of them now."

„What! no dissipation?" cried Grindley.

„None."

„No drinking?"

„Mention it not — it makes me ill to think of —"

Here the goodnatured hostess entered with the bottle of wine.

„For you," said I, laying my hand on Grindley's arm, „I myself can't touch it."

„No debts?" pursued the interested parent.

„Not a farthing in the world. I paid them off to the uttermost penny long ago; but the good lady of the house wishes to speak to me — what is it, Madam?

„Pray, sir, is your name Lonsdale?" said the woman.

„Of course it is, ha! ha!" and I turned to Grindley: „she's fond of a joke." I marvelled how she could know my name.

„A gentleman below, will insist upon seeing you."

„Oh! that Magson has been dogging our steps. Shall I go and kick him down stairs?"

I had just turned for that purpose, when a fearful apparition made itself manifest. Taking off his hat, smoothing his straight hair over his forehead, and making a strange bow, Gripe the bailiff stood before me!

In great emergencies what strange expedients present themselves.

„Ah! Gripe, is that you?" said I, winking and nodding; „glad to see you; let me introduce you to my uncle and cousin."

„Come, none o' that ere nonsense," cried the savage, fixing his cudgel under his arm, and producing the slip, which he gave to me in return for the slip I had heretofore given him: „I arrest this ere gemman, — Mr. Lonsdale, — and so don't you, sir, and don't you, marm, be humbugged by none o' his stories. Why, he's the slipperiest cove as is."

Let me draw a long black veil over the degrading scene that followed. Suffice it to say, my uncle booked inside places for two in that night's mail, and Gripe, at the same time, booked an inside place for one in the King's Bench.

I am there at this moment, preparing what is technically called a schedule, in order that I may take advantage of a benevolent act, intended for those whose means are in an inverse ratio to their debts.

The Enchantress.

By L. E. Landon.

Water — the mighty, the pure, the beautiful, the unfathomable — where is thy element so glorious as it is in thine own domain, the deep sea? What an infinity of power is in the far Atlantic, the boundary of two separate worlds, apart like those of memory and of hope! or in the bright Pacific, whose tides are turned to gold by a southern sun, and in whose bosom sleep a thousand isles, each covered with the verdure, the flowers, and the fruit of Eden! But, amid all thy hereditary kingdoms, to which hast thou given beauty, as a birthright, lavishly as thou hast to thy favourite Mediterranean? The silence of a summer night is now sleeping on its bosom, where the bright stars are mirrored, as if in its depths they had another home and another heaven. A spirit, cleaving air midway between the two, might have paused to ask which was sea, and which was sky. The shadows of earth and earthly things, resting cloud-like upon the waters, alone showed which was the home and which the mirror of the celestial host.

But the distant planets were not the only lights reflected from the sea; an illuminated villa, upon the extreme point of a small rising on the coast, flung down a flood of radiance from a thousand lamps. From the terrace came the breath of the orange-plants, whose white flowers were turned to silver in the light which fell on them from the windows. Within the halls were assembled the fairest and noblest of Sicily.

Every one, they say, has a genius for something — that of Count Arezzi was for festivals. A king, or more, the Athenian Pericles, might have welcomed his most favoured guests in such a chamber. The walls were painted in fresco, as artists paint whose present is a dream of beauty, and whose future is an immortality. Each fresco was a scene in Arcadia; and the nymphs, who were there gathering their harvest of roses, were only less lovely than the Sicilian maidens that flitted past. Among them was one much darker than her companions; her Eastern mother had bequeathed to her her black hair and her olive skin; in her eye was that brightness, and on her cheek was that freshness, which belong only to the earliest hour of youth — the blush had been too fleeting to burn, the smile too clear to cast that shadow which even light flings as it lingers. But to-night the colour was heightened, the eyes wore a deeper shade, for the lash of the downcast lash was upon them, and the sweet half-opened mouth was too earnest for a smile.

Lolah was listening to those charmed words which change the girl at once into the woman — we step not over the threshold of childhood till led by Love. Alas, this knowledge is almost always heralded by a sorrow! That morning had Lolah heard from her stern uncle, that the love she bore to her cousin Leoni di Montefiore was a childish toy, and as such was to be put away; and all her happiness had been destroyed by having to reflect upon it. Poor Lolah! how hard it is to teach the young that life is made up of many parts; and that wealth, rank, power, are more to be desired than affection! To-night she was listening to Leoni — and who ever thought of the future when the present has first taught us we love and are beloved? — still, her eyes were filled with tears, and her heart had heavier than usual. Leoni spoke of hope; but is not hope only a more gentle word for fear? And yet, with that mysterious contradiction which makes the fever of human existence, neither would have renounced the certainty of the other's affection for the careless content of yesterday. Strange, that ignorance should be our best happiness in this life, and yet be the one we are ever striving to destroy!

Leoni and his cousin stood in one of the deep windows; she leaning as if to inhale the fragrance of an Indian rose, and mark a flower which, brought from a far land, seemed more delicate than its bright companions. A pedestal of the green malachite stood beside, and on it a vase carved with the sacrifice of Iphigenia; these shut them out from the rest of the dancers.

„My father," exclaimed Leoni, „gave his daughters to her bartery;" — Then a bitter thought of the wasted heritage, which had made his noble name a bitter satire than an aid, for a moment caused the lover to pause.

(To be continued in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 46.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.

THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Enchantress.

By L. E. Landon.

(Continued from our last.)

„Hush, Leoni! — but my uncle has just crossed the room; let me go, ere he finds me talking to you.“

Leilah waited not for an answer; another moment, and she had passed her slender arm through that of one of her companions, and was lost in the crowd. It was so sudden, Leoni scarcely believed she was gone: surely her sweet low sigh was on the air — no! it was but the breath of the Bengal rose. His eye wandered round; it fell on the sculptured vase, and there stood the blossom hollow, a witness to the sacrifice of its youngest and loveliest child.

„Even so, my gentle Leilah, will the altar be thy tomb.“

Leoni started, for a figure now stepped from the shade of the column: not only his last words, but their whole conversation must have been heard.

„Yes, Don Leoni,“ said the intruder, replying rather to his thoughts than look, „I have heard your discourse; pardon me when I say it was wilfully overheard. It is long since I have hearkened to the eager and happy words of young affection, and I listened as if to music; and, like music, they have died in hearing.“

Leoni thought he would as soon that the dialogue had not been quite so attractive — strange, that it should be so to the cold and proud Donna Medora!

Again his companion answered to his thoughts — „You marvel at my speech; I could wonder myself at this still lingering sympathy with the human lot of humanity; but mortal breath and mortal frame cannot quite break away from mortal ties. Don Leoni, I pity you — I wish to serve you: I know not, if in giving you wealth I give you happiness; but wealth I can give. This is not the place for such words as mine must be. Breathe not to living ear what I have said: my power to serve you depends on your silence. Come to-morrow to our palace.“

Medora turned from him, and descended the terrace. The weakness of our nature — how soon any strong emotion masters it! Leoni stood breathless with surprise and hope: he had twice or thrice before seen Donna Medora, and he had heard much of her. Young — she had seen but three-and-twenty summers deepen into autumn; beautiful — for it was as if Heaven had set its seal on her perfect face, — her life was one of sadness and solitude. The cathedral where she knelt, the poor whom she aided, the sick-room of her aged father, and her own lonely chamber — these were the haunts of Medora. When about seventeen, a severe illness had stricken her even unto death; almost by a miracle she was restored to life, but never to youth — the shadow of the grave, to which she had so nearly approached, seemed to rest upon her. Her glad laugh never again made the air musical as with the singing of a bird in spring; her light step forgot the dance; and her lute was given to another. The sympathy she once had for joy was now kept entire for sorrow; but the mother who died in her arms, the father whose long and sickly age she soothed and supported, thought her nature had, in so nearly approaching heaven, caught something of its elements. And Lelah, who, as a distant relative, sometimes visited Don Manfredi's chamber, said that Modora was almost an angel; and added — „I should think her quite one, but that I do not hear her, and that she seems unhappy."

It was reported that love and religion had held a bitter conflict in her heart. Before her illness she had been betrothed to a young cavalier; on her recovery she refused to fulfil her engagement, alleging that the instability of life had taught her the vanity of human ties: all she now asked, was to devote what remained of existence to her aged parents. Remonstrances, prayers, were alike unavailing; and the young Count [illegible] became one of the Knights of Malta. Some years had since passed; and in the gay and hurrying circle of Palermo, Modora's name was rarely mentioned.

Leoni dwelt upon her promise of assistance; but the more he reflected, the more hopeless it seemed. How could she give wealth, the daughter of one of Sicily's poorest nobles?

Our young Sicilian was naturally of a daring and reckless temper; and resolving to hope, without analyzing why or wherefore, he re-entered the saloon. He danced no more with Lelah; yet he had the satisfaction of seeing her look sad and languid while dancing with another. But how restless was the night that followed! Hope is feverish enough at all times; what must it be when stimulated by curiosity!

The first blush of morning awakened Leoni from his light slumbers: he looked out; the hue of the sky was that too of the sea; the waves of the Mediterranean floated on as if freighted with roses; yet how Leoni wished they were glittering with the stern colourless light of noon! Never say that time is of equal length: the movement of the hours is as irregular as the beating of the heart which measures them. A year of ordinary life, if counted by hopes, fears, and fancies, was in that lingering morning. At length, noon sounded from many a turret; and, regardless of the heat, the young Count hurried to the palazzo.

When he reached the pier, a crowd of boatmen offered their services.

„What ho! Michele and Stefano! I have tried the swiftness of the Santa Catherina before now. Remember, I am as impatient as . . . ."

„Your lordship always is," replied Stefano, who, having no answer always ready, always answered.

Leoni jumped into the boat, whose celerity showed that the wax taper her pious rowers offered to Santa Catherina yearly on the day of her fête, was not thrown away; though, perhaps, the activity of the brothers who rowed did as much as their piety towards sending the little vessel swiftly through the waters.

„You want to land," said Michele, „at San Marco's steps?" turning the head of the boat to the accustomed landing-place.

The steps to which San Marco lent his name had been worthy many a sequin to them; for the winding path to the left led to Lelah's villa.

„No, no," replied Leoni; „to the Nymph's Cove."

„Signor," returned Michele, „those steps lead on to Count Manfredi's garden."

„And it is thither I am going."

The boatmen exchanged looks of astonishment bordering on dismay, which was not diminished by the silence of the usually gay cavalier. Meanwhile Leoni leant back in the boat: as the interview drew nigh, a feeling of fear — not fear, that was what none of his house had ever yet known — but of awe, stole over him. Many a mood had that morning passed through his mind; disbelief — but surely the sad seriousness of such a one as Donna Medora could never stoop to mockery! — then hope, like a sweet summer-shower, when dark clouds break away into sudden light — till all his thoughts fixed on one mysterious circumstance — that he was the only person who had seen her the preceding evening. The Count d'Arezzi himself was not aware that she had been among his guests.

While musing on the singularity of this, they arrived at the landing-place, and found the Senora's page in waiting. Dumb from his birth, the boy Julio had been brought up in the Manfredi family, where his weak frame and want of language had exempted him from all but the lightest tasks.

„What would the Senora Laleh say to this visit?" cried Stefano, the moment his master was out of hearing. „The lady Medora is beautiful as an angel; I marvel we never rowed cavalier hither before."

„We never have; but I have, and in an evil hour. Well had it been for my first master if he had never looked on a face so fair and so false. I remember when I was wont of an evening to row the Count Rivoli to this very spot. We used to see a white veil waving among the trees — it was the Senora watching his approach: they were very happy then. But I know not how it was, unless it be the inconstancy of woman; for change is as natural to them as it is to sea. The lady Medora was taken dangerously ill: during her fearful sickness, never was truer lover than my master; the shrine of our Lady was laden with gifts; and night after night he paced beneath the window of her room, — till she who lay dying above, could scarcely look paler than he who watched below. And yet, on her recovery she refused to wed him. She declared, that, in her danger, she had made a vow not to marry. They say the young Count knelt at her feet, but in vain; and for her sake he forswore the face of woman and his native country. Count Rivoli is now a Knight of Malta. What has the Senora Medora to do with another lover?"

„Well, yonder gallant's step is not much like a lover's," replied Stefano, as a bend in the path enabled them to see the slow and hesitating pace at which Lovel followed his guide.

The boy who led the way walked feebly and languidly, and therefore hurried him not. The gloom of the neglected garden added to that on his spirits; and the wild eyes and pale face of his dumb attendant seemed to fix his attention painfully. It was a countenance whose unhappiness was catching; for Lovel thought how terrible was his lot, debarred from that noblest privilege of humanity, interchange of thought, and its sweetest interchange of feelings! The boy stopped suddenly at the door of a summer-house so hidden by the dark branches of the pine-trees around, that the stranger might have passed it by unnoticed. They entered together; the page approached his mistress, pointed to the visitor, and then left the room.

Without rising from her own seat, Medora signed to Lovel to take the one opposite. At first she seemed so absorbed in thought, that even his entrance was insufficient to rouse her; she evidently hesitated to speak, as if she had not yet resolved on the purport of her words. Her young and impetuous companion found the silence very oppressive; but even his impetuosity was subdued by the gloom around him.

Panelled *) with the scarce woods of other lands, whose cornices were carved in quaint wreaths of flowers, mingled with crests of divers shapes and the family arms, it was obvious that a rich though barbarous taste had here once lavished its wealth. But Time had, as usual, laughed the works of man to scorn; and pomp amidst its decay sickened over its vanity. The colours were all merged in the heavy black of age; the gildings were tarnished; and the cornices broken and defaced. The temple, of which but a few fallen columns remain — the mighty city, whose stately fragments are strewed in the desert — are sublime, not sorrowful. But the desolation of yesterday comes home to every one's heart, — to-morrow its portion may be his own; and the faded tapestry, the discoloured floor, and the mouldering painting, speak of sorrow which still exists, and poverty which is still endured.

---

*) [illegible]

Leoni gazed round the gloomy banquet-room, and remembered a festival which had been given there: he was a child at the time, and perhaps his memory lent something of its own gaiety to the scene. But he was roused from his reverie by Medora's voice.

„My silence, Count," said she, „must seem strange; but when you have heard the story I am about to reveal, you will not marvel that I hesitate to speak words which are even as those of Fate. You love, and you are beloved; surely you might be happy. There is but one obstacle, that of wealth. Leoni, I can make you rich — rich as the fabled kings, who poured forth gold like water: dare you accept the offer?"

„On what conditions?" exclaimed Leoni, almost unconsciously clasping the cross of the order which hung at his neck.

„On none," returned his companion. „Fear not my conditions, but your own use of the wealth I can bestow. Dare you take your destiny into your own hands? But I will place my life before you, and then judge for yourself."

Medora rose from her seat.

„Not here, where the uncharmed air might bear away my words, dare I tell my history. Count Leoni, you have heard of wondrous and fearful secrets, whose spell is over stars and over spirits; you have heard of mortals to whom immortal power is given — such power is mine. You deem you are speaking to your cousin — would that you were! I have but the borrowed likeness of her whose life long since reached its appointed boundary. Give me your hand, and in a few minutes we shall be in my own dwelling, amid those immeasurable deserts where only my story may be communicated. Do you consent to accompany me?"

Leoni answered by taking the hand extended towards him. Even as he touched it, a dense vapour filled the room; he felt himself raised with a sudden and dizzy velocity; he leant back; the cloud was as the wave on which a swimmer floats, borne by no effort of his own; and a pleasant sensation of sleep came over him. He was roused by the light touch of his companion, and startled into consciousness. They were standing on the top of a mighty tower; one of those, whose height, seen from below, seems to reach even unto the heavens — but the summit once gained, we only find what an immeasurable upward distance remains. A hot bright noon filled the air with light, but not with fertility; for far as the eye could reach — and the clear colourless atmosphere seemed to extend the sight even to infinity — spread an arid desert, as if sand were an element, and only shared its empire with the sky. But immediately around the tower lay the giant ruins of a once glorious city; one of those built when the world was in the strength of its youth, and reared buildings which were the work of a life: the cradle and the grave were then far apart. Now the shadow of the last rests upon the first, and all life groans beneath the weight and darkness thereof. Then the marble of the quarry and the gold of the mine lay on the surface; the fertile soil of the East yielded forth its abundance; and the labour, which was in man's destiny, needed not to be all given to that sad and perpetual strife with hunger which belongs to our worn-out and weary age.

It seemed, however, as if Time had long paused in his work of destruction; the vast masses of carved granite, the broken columns, the shattered walls where once four chariots drove abreast, all remained as they had done for ages. Year after year the burning sunshine forbade the rain to fall, and speedily dried up the dews of night; no green moss, no creeping plant, as in his native Italy, hid the ruin which they were aiding: the bare white marble shone distinct from the sands.

Leoni turned to his companion; her face and garb were wholly changed: she stood upon her native tower, and had resumed her native shape. As Medora, she had been so like his own Leilah — a slight, low figure, whose grace was that of childhood; the same sweet pleading eyes; alike, save that hope gave its gladness to the face of Leilah, while that of Medora had all the mournfulness of memory. But the glorious beauty of the being at his side, though it wore the shape, had scarce the semblance of mortality. The face had that high and ideal cast of beauty which made the divinities of Greece divine; for the mind was embodied in the features. The large blue eyes were of the colour of the noon, when heaven is full of light; they looked upon you like the far-off shining of some vast and lonely planet. Her garb and turban had an Oriental splendour; a silver veil mingled with her rich profusion of hair, which was bound by strings of costly pearls. Round her arm was coiled a band of gold, and on her hand she bore a signet of some strange clear stone, covered with mystic characters. Her height and step were like a queen's, such as might have beseemed the young Empress of Palmyra, ere she walked in the triumph of the Roman conqueror.

„I may not enter," said she, „the hall of my father's tomb but in mine own shape: follow me."

Casting the golden sandals from her feet, she led the way down a flight of black marble steps. They paused at the foot of the tower; two enormous doors flew open, and though it was the bright light of noon he had left behind, Leoni stood dazzled at the glory of the hall. The crystal roof was traversed by a shining zodiac, lit by a pale unearthly flame; the black marble floor was covered with inscriptions in gold, but they were in unknown ciphers: Leoni observed, however, that they were similar to those on the girdle and the border of his companion's robe. The gigantic pillars which supported the vast dome were also of black marble, covered, in like manner, with golden hieroglyphics. Between them were immense vases, each one a varying mosaic of precious stones, and filled with the same pale flame which lighted the zodiac above. In the centre of the hall stood a huge crystal globe, and upon its summit a funeral urn of the purest alabaster, on which neither figure nor sign was graven. Around were placed seven silver tripods, whereon were burning aloe-rose woods, which filled the air with their perfume.

„In yonder urn," said Medora, „lie the ashes of my father. I have obtained that gift in search of which his life was spent; and yet I would that our mingled ashes were strewn on those elements we have mastered, and in vain."

She now seated herself on a radiant throne opposite, and Leoni leant on the lion's skin at her feet. We have said that Leoni was of a race to whom fear was unknown, yet he felt his heart beat quicker than ordinary, and his glance quailed before the melancholy and spiritual beauty of the eyes now shining upon him.

„You see in me," said his mysterious companion, „the only living descendant of those Eastern Magi to whom the stars revealed their mysteries, and spirits gave their power. Age after age did sages add to that knowledge which, by bequeathing to their posterity, they trusted would in time combine to conquer their mortality. But the glorious race perished from the earth, till only my father was left, and I his orphan child. Marvels and knowledge paid his life of fasting and study. All the spirits of the elements bowed down before him; but the future was still hidden from his eyes, and Death was omnipotent. His power of working evil had no bounds, but his power of good was limited; and yet it was good that he desired. How dared he put in motion those mighty changes, which seemed to promise such happiness on earth, while he was ignorant of what their results might be? and of what avail was the joy he might pour out on life, over whose next hour the grave might close, and only make the parting breath more bitter from the blessings which it was leaving behind?

„I was no unworthy daughter of such a sire; I advanced in those divine studies even to his wish, and looked to the future with a hope which many years had deadened in himself, but from which I caught no omen of ultimate success. Alas! he mastered not his destiny: I have said before, his ashes are in yonder urn. A few unwholesome dews on a summer night were mightther than all his science. For a time I struggled not with despair; but youth is buoyant, and habit is strong. Again I pored over the mystic scroll — again I called on the spirits with spell and with sign. Many a mystery was revealed, many a wonder grew familiar; but still Death remained at the end of all things, as before. One night I was on the terrace of my tower. Above me was the deep blue sky, with its stars — worlds filled, perchance, with the intelligence which I sought. On the desert below was the phantom of a great city. I looked on its small and miserable streets, where hunger and cold reigned paramount, and man was as wretched as if flung but yesterday on the earth, and there had been as yet no time for art to yield its assistance, or labour to bring forth its fruit. I gazed next on scenes of festivity, but they were not glad; for I looked from the wreath into the head it encircled, and from the carcanet of gems to the heart which beat beneath — and I saw envy, and hate, and repining, and remorse. I turned my last glance on the palace within its walls; but there the purple was spread as a pall, and the voice of sorrow and the cry of pain were loud on the air. I bade the shadows roll away upon the winds, and rose depressed and in sorrow. I was not alone: one of those glorious Spirits, whose sphere was far beyond the power of our science, whose existence we rather surmised than knew, stood beside me.

„From that hour a new existence opened before me. I loved, and I was beloved — love, to which imagination gave poetry, and mind gave strength, was the new element added to my being. Alas! how little do the miserable race to which I belong know of such a feeling! They blend a moment's vanity, a moment's gratification, into a temporary excitement, and they call it love. Such are the many, and the many make the wretchedness of earth. And yet your own heart, Lionel, and that of my gentle cousin, may witness for my words, there are such things as truth, and tenderness, and devotion in the world; and such redeem the darkness and degradation of its lot. Nay, more — if ever the mystery of our destiny be unravelled, and happiness be wrought out of wisdom, it will be the work of Love.

„It matters little to tell you of my blessedness; but my very heart was filled with the light of those radiant eyes, which were to me what the sun is to the world. Yet one dark shadow rested on my soul, beyond even their influence. Death had been the awful conqueror with whom my race had so often struggled, and to whom they had so often yielded. A mortal, I loved an immortal, and the fear of separation was ever before me; yet a long and a happy time passed away before my fear found words.

„It was one evening we were floating over the earth, and the crimson cloud on which we lay was the one where the sun's last look had rested. Its gleam fell on a small nook, while all around was fast melting into shade. Still, it was a sad spot which was thus brightened — it was a new-made grave. Over the others the long grass grew luxuriantly, and speckled, too, by many small and fragrant flowers; but on this, the dark-brown earth had been freshly turned up, and the red worm writhed restlessly about its disturbed habitation. Some roses had been scattered, but they were withered; their sweet leaves were already damp and discoloured. All were the present and outward signs of our eternal doom — to perish in corruption.

„The shadows of the evening fell, deepening the gloom into darkness — the one last bright ray had long been past, when a youth came from the adjacent valley. That grave but yesterday received one who was to have been his bride — his betrothed from childhood, for whose sake he had been to far lands and gathered much wealth, but who had pined in his absence and died. He flung himself on the loathsome place, and the night-wind bore around the ravings of his despair. Woe for that selfishness which belonged to my mortality! I felt at that moment more of terror than of pity. I thought of myself. Thus must I, with all my power, my science, and loved by one into whose sphere Death comes not, even thus must I perish! True, the rich spices, the perfumed woods, the fragrant oils, which would feed the sacred fire of my funeral pyre, would save my mortal remains from that corruption which makes the disgust of death even worse than its dread. A few odoriferous ashes alone would be left for my urn. Yet not the less must I share the common doom of my race, — I must die!

„Nay, my beautiful!" said the voice, which was to me as the fiat of life and of death, so utterly did it fill my existence; „why should we thus yield to a vague terror? Listen, my beloved! I know where the waters of the fountains of life roll their eternal waves — I know I can bear you thither and bid you drink from their source, and over lips so hallowed Death hath no longer dominion. But, alas! I know not what may be the punishment. Like yourselves, the knowledge of our race goes on increasing, and our experience, like your own, hath its agonies. None have dared what I am about to dare, and the future of my deed is even to me a secret. But what may not be borne for that draught which makes my loved one as immortal as my love!"

„I gazed on the glorious hope which lighted up his radiant brow, and I said to him, ‚Give me an immortality which must be thine.' Worlds rolling on worlds lay beneath our feet when we stood beside the waters of life. A joyful pride swelled in my heart. I, the last and the weakest of my race, had won that prize which its bravest and its sages had found too mighty for their grasp. A sound as of a storm rushing over ocean startled me when I stooped to drink, the sparkled waves rose into tumultuous eddies, their fiery billows parted, and from amid them appeared the dark and terrible Spirit of Necessity. The cloud of his awful face grew deeper as it turned on me. ‚Child of a sinful and a fallen kind!' said he, and he spoke the language most familiar to my ear, which yet seemed like that of another world, ‚who have ever measured by their own small wisdom that which is infinite — drink, and be immortal! Be immortal, without the wisdom or the power belonging unto immortality. Drink!'

„I shrank from the starry waters as they rose to my lip, but a power stronger than my will compelled me to their taste. The draught ran through my veins like ice. Slowly I turned to where my once-worshipped lover was leaning. The same change had passed over both. Our eyes met, and each looked into the other's heart, and there dwelt hate — bitter, loathing, and eternal hate. I had changed my nature; I was no longer the gentle, up-looking mortal he had loved. I had changed my nature; he was no longer to me the one glorious and adored being. We gazed on each other with fear and abhorrence. The dark power, whose awful brow was fixed upon us like Fate, again was shrouded in the blinding waters. By an impulse neither could control, the Spirit and I flung ourselves down the steep blue air, but apart, and each murmuring, ‚Never! never!' And that word ‚never' told our destiny. Never could either feel again that sweet, [illegible] of happiness, which, if it be a lie, is worth all truth. Never more could each belong to the world of the other.

„Our feelings are as little in our power as the bodily structure they animate. My love had been sudden, uncontrollable, and born not of my own will — and such was my hate. As little could I master the sick shudder his image now called up, as I could the passionate beating of the heart it had once caused. I stood alone in my solitary hall — I gazed on the eternal fire burning over the tomb of my father, and I wished it were burning over mine. For the first time I felt the limitations of humanity. The desire of my race was in me accomplished — I was immortal; and what was this immortality? A dark and unconscious future. Alas, we had mistaken life for infinity! What was my knowledge? it only served to show its own vanity; what was my power, when its exercise only served to work out the decrees of an inexorable necessity? I had parted myself from my kind, but I had not acquired the nature of a spirit. I had lost of humanity but its illusions, and they alone are what render it supportable. The mystic scroll over which I had once pored with such intensenow, were now flung aside; what could they teach me? Time was to me but one great vacancy; how could I fill it up, who had neither labour nor excitement? I sat me down mournfully, and thought of the past. Why, when love is perished, should its memory remain? I had said to myself, So long as I have life, one deep feeling must absorb my existence. A change — and that too of my own earnest seeking — had passed over my being; and the past, which had been so precious, was now as a frightful phantom.

(To be continued in our next.)

Christmas-Day.

Yet once more, and once more, awake, my Harp,
From silence and neglect — one lofty strain,
Lofty, yet wilder than the winds of Heaven,
And speaking mysteries more than words can tell,
I ask of thee, for I, with hymnings high,
Would join the dirge of the departing year.

Yet with no wintry garland from the woods,
Wrought of the leafless branch of ivy sear,
Wreathe I thy tresses, dark December! now;
Me higher quarrels call, with loudest song,
And fearful joy to celebrate the day
Of the Redeemer. — Near two thousand suns
Have set their seals upon the rolling lapse
Of generations, since the day spring first
Beam'd from on high! — Now to the mighty mass
Of that increasing aggregate we add
One unit more. Space, in comparison,
How small, yet mark'd with how much misery;
Wars, famines, and the fury, Pestilence,
Over the nations hanging her dread scourge;
The oppressed too, in silent bitterness,
Weeping their sufferance; and the arm of wrong,
Forcing the scanty portion from the weak,
And steeping the lone widow's couch with tears.
So has the year been character'd with woe
In Christian land, and mark'd with wrongs and crimes.
Yet 'twas not thus He taught — not thus He lived,
Whose birth we this day celebrate with prayer
And much thanksgiving. — He, a man of woes,
Went on the way appointed, — path, though rude,
Yet borne with patience still: — He came to cheer
The broken-hearted, to raise up the sick,
And on the wandering and benighted mind
To pour the light of truth. — O task divine!
O more than angel teacher! He had words
To soothe the barking waves, and hush the winds;
And when the soul was toss'd in troubled seas,
Wrapt in thick darkness and the howling storm,
He, pointing to the star of peace on high,
Arm'd it with holy fortitude, and bade it smile
At the surrounding wreck. —
When with deep agony his heart was rack'd,
Not for himself the tear-drop dew'd his cheek,
For them He wept, for them to Heaven He pray'd,
His persecutors — „Father, pardon them,
They know not what they do."
Angels of Heaven,
Ye who beheld Him fainting on the cross,
And did him homage, say, may mortal join
The hallelujahs of the risen God?
Will the faint voice and grovelling song be heard
Amid the seraphim in light divine?
Yes, He will deign, the Prince of Peace will deign,
For mercy, to accept the hymn of faith,
Low though it be and humble. — Lord of Life,
The Christ, the Comforter, thine advent now
Fills my uprising soul. I mount, I fly
Far o'er the skies, beyond the rolling orbs:
The bonds of flesh dissolve, and earth recedes,
And care, and pain, and sorrow are no more.

Henry Kirke White.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. Nro 47.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Enchantress.

By L. E. Landon.

(Continued from our last.)

The love which alters, in its inconstancy may set up a new idol, and worship again with a pleasant blindness; but the love which leaves the heart with a full knowledge of its own vanity and nothingness, — which saith, The object of my passion still remains, but it is worthless I [illegible] it — never more can I renew my early [illegible] I marvel how I ever could have loved — a smile, I disdain the weakness of my former self; — oh, the end of such love is indeed despair!

„Do you mark yonder black marble slab, which is spread as over a tomb? It covers the most silvery fountain that ever mirrored the golden light of noon, or caught the fall of the evening dew, in an element bright as themselves. The radiant likeness of a Spirit rests on those waters. I bade him give duration to the shadow he flung upon the wave, that I might gaze on it during his absence. The first act of my inconstancy was to shut it from my sight. There must that black marble rest for ever.

„Why need I tell you of the desolation with which centuries have passed over my head? At length I resolved to leave my solitude, to visit the earth; to seek, if I could not recall, my humanity; to interest myself in my species, and help even while I despised them. The thousand hues of sunset were deepening into the rich purple of twilight, when I passed over a Sicilian palace. Lemon and orange trees crowded the terrace, and their odours floated upwards towards an apartment where every casement was flung open for the sake of air. One emaciated hand stretched out on the purple silk coverlet, the other extended towards an aged female beside, reclined a young and beautiful girl; she was dying. A week of fever had done the work of years, life had burst fiercely out; and the fragile tenement, wasted and worn away, lay in that languid repose which is the harbinger of death. The long black hair hung in pall-like masses; it had been loosened in the restlessness of pain. Her mother kept bathing the marble temples with aromatics, but they throbbed no longer, and the sufferer motioned to her to desist. She now asked rest rather than relief; but life yet put forth its last energy in affection, and clasping her mother's hand, she turned her large soft eyes to her father. He stood watching her; as though, while he watched, life could not escape. Suddenly, a slight convulsion passed over the form of the dying girl; she gasped as if for air, and raised herself on her pillow without assistance, but sank back with the effort; — she was dead. A wild scream broke from the mother, and she fell senseless by the bed. The father caught the lifeless hands of his child, and, mad with despair, implored her not to leave him. Loud sobs came from the farther part of the chamber; there was now no one to disturb by that passion of sorrow.

„Human misery is an awful sight. The old nurse approached the corse; she smoothed the long dark hair, — she placed a chaplet of roses on the brow, and a few fresh flowers in the lifeless hand. The rich light from the open casement fell on the white dress, and still whiter face, with a mocking cheerfulness. The aged creature could restrain her grief no longer; she rushed to [illegible] darker part of the room, and wept. A thought struck me: over the departed I had no power; but I could spare the agony of the living. Yes, I would take upon myself human relations, would bind myself by human ties, — I would be to them even as a daughter. The next moment I had assumed the shape of their child.

„Far in an unfrequented track of the southern seas lies a small island; there are aged trees and early blossoms; and amid them myriads of shining insects and bright-winged birds make the solitude glad with life; but they are its sole inhabitants. Once, driven away by a tempest from its ordinary course, a ship discovered the little isle. The Spaniards landed; they took possession in the name of the Madonna, and with pieces of grey rock piled up a cross. Human eye has never since dwelt on that lovely and lonely shore; but beneath the shadow of that cross lie the mortal remains of your cousin Medora. — Gradually I allowed some sign of returning life to appear; the old nurse, who was kneeling over the body, was the first to exclaim, ‚Bring a looking glass, for there is breath within those lips.' The slight cloud left on the mirror was as the very atmosphere of hope; eyes dim with weeping, cheeks pale with watching, were lighted up on the instant.

„I felt a new and keen happiness in the happiness I had given. It needs not to tell how I gradually recovered, and how the parents, whose very life seemed bound up in their child's, were never weary of gazing on their recovered treasure. But a grief of which I had not dreamt awaited me. Medora had been betrothed to a young Sicilian nobleman. The moment an interview was permitted, the lover was at my feet, full of that hope and that joy he was never to know again. You are aware how the marriage was broken off, on the plea of a vow to the Virgin made in the extremity of danger; but you know not the agony I inflicted, or that I endured, in listening to the passionate despair of Ravelli; and when he said, 'Your death I might have borne — it was the will of God, and life would have lived on a hope beyond the grave; but thus to find you changed to me, to think that you can hold our love an offence in the sight of Heaven, and that I, who have loved, and who do love you so unutterably, that I should be the first sacrifice you offer up, — this, Medora, is more than I can bear!'

In listening thus, how I repented me of my rash interference with the course of human life! If I had given joy, I had also caused more sorrow; and, worse, I had reason to question whether the grief of the marriage thus broken off did not embitter, despite of all my care, the brief period of Donna Maria's life.

I have now little more to say of myself. The last few years have been devoted to [illegible] declining age; wearisome has [illegible] been, and still I have clung to it. I own, [illegible] the fatal truth, that my lot is but an awful solitude, without duties or affections — those ties and blessings of humanity. — And now for the wealth I offer you: I know not of its consequences, but I know those consequences can be but in your own acts. I do no more than a mere mortal might. On this interview there is imposed the condition — secrecy, on the possession of riches there is none. The spirits of riches are the first and the meanest which yield to science: it shall be my care that they reach you in simple and ordinary channels. Speak!"

„Give me," exclaimed Leoni, „give me wealth; give me Lelah!"

A purple cloud filled the glorious hall; again stupor overwhelmed him; again he awakened, and there he was in the lonely summer-room, and Medora, with her pale child-like face and black garments, at his side; but he met the large dark eyes filled with a strange wild light, and he knew it was no dream.

„Leave me now," said Medora; „but on your life be silent. Life and secrecy are one. Farewell!"

Dizzy with expectation, Leoni returned to the boat. The clock of San Francesco's abbey struck; he had been away but one hour. Pallid and abstracted, there was something in his look that effectually silenced the boatmen; they remained in gloomy stillness after he had left them.

„He has met with a refusal," at length said Tomaso.

„Father say, that there is evil in the dreary palace and that pale girl, and that their influence is on him. The lady Medora is kind and generous, but there is a curse fallen on her; and when did ever gift of hers turn to good?"

„The notary Signor Grazia awaits your pleasure," said a domestic, on Leoni's entrance to the palace.

The notary's business was soon told. The Marchese Guzman, a distant relative of the young Count, had made him his heir; and boundless was the wealth the aged miser left behind him. That evening saw Leoni a welcome guest at his uncle's, and but a few weeks had past, ere orange-flowers bound the bridal tresses of his gentle cousin. The same day died Count Manfredi; and, as if her life were one with his, young Medora breathed her last at the very moment of her father's death. —

„One, two, three; so late, so very late," exclaimed the Countess di Montefiore, „and Leoni still from home; there was a time when I dreamed not of keeping these solitary vigils."

Wearily Lelah rose from the velvet ottoman, and again the hour was struck by one of their own clocks, a few minutes later than the Abbey. It was surmounted [illegible] the time-piece was a rare device of a skilled artist by a sweet and lively air — one of those Neapolitan barcarolles which, like the glad music of Memnon's lyre, seemed inspired by the morning sunshine.

„Mockery," sighed the youthful watcher, „for the flight of time to be told in music!"

She began to pace the room, — that common resource of extreme lassitude, when sleep, to which the will consents not, hangs heavy on the eyelids. Truly night was made for sleep; since to its wakeful hours belongs an oppression unknown to the very dreariest hours of day. The stillness is so deep, the solitude so unbroken, the fever brought on by want of rest so weakens the nerves, that the imagination exercises despotic and unwholesome power, till, if the heart have a fear or a sorrow, up it arises in all the force and terror of gigantic exaggeration.

The Countess had long since dismissed her attendants; yet the pearls still braided her hair, which hung nearly to her feet, in two large plaits; and a white silk robe, carelessly fastened at the waist, shrouding her whole figure in its loose folds, gave her something of that ghost-like appearance with which our fancy invests the habitants of another world. And truly, with her pale cheek and melancholy eyes, she looked like a spirit wandering mournfully around the scene of former pleasures. Yet what luxury was there not gathered in that gorgeous room? The purple silk curtains excluded the night-dews, while they allowed the air to enter freighted with odours from the orange-trees on the terrace below. The nuns of the Convent of St. Valerio, so celebrated for their skill in embroidery, had exerted their finest art in transferring all the flowers of spring to the white velvet ottomans; you might have asked, which was real — the rose on the cushion, or that which hung from the crystal vase? The jewels lavished on the toys scattered round, had been held a noble dower by the fairest maiden in Sicily. On the walls were pictures, each one a world of thought and of beauty. The Grecian landscapes of Gaspar Poussin, who delighted in the graceful nymph, and the marble fane which recalled a mythology all poetry, as if in his dreams he had dwelt in Thessaly. The rugged scenes which Salvator Rosa loved to delineate — the forest, dark with impenetrable depths; the bare and jagged rock, rough as if Nature had forgotten it; the aged pine riven by the lightning, and beside it some bandit, desolate and stricken as the tree by which he stood, but with a cruel defiance in his looks, as though he longed to revenge on all the injuries he had received from a few. Near at hand hung one of the glad earths and sunny skies in which the more buoyant spirit of Claude Lorraine revelled, as if its native element were sunshine. There were portraits too, the noble and the beautiful of her race; faces which told a whole history — and yet Lolah marked them not.

But one twelvemonth had she been a bride, and her husband's presence was unfamiliar to his home. Day after day did some unkind friend — for when do friends not delight in the sorrow of the prosperous? — come to her with tales how the Count's wealth was lavished on others less lovely than herself. And even that very evening had her father been with her, telling her that no wealth could hold out against Leoni's reckless prodigality — against his mad passion for gaming. In pity to the gentle creature, who could only lean on his bosom and weep, he might not tell her that the husband of her love was an object of universal suspicion, and that sorcery and the once stainless name of Montefiore were coupled together. He left her with those words of fondness which are never, and those words of comfort which ever are, said in vain. Wretched she had long been, but not till to-night had she owned the truth even to herself — owned that all her dreams of happiness, all the fairy creations of her fancy, had melted away, like the gardens and palaces she had seen painted on the air in the Bay of Naples.

Weak, selfish, and vain, Leoni's was the very nature which wealth corrupts; he looked upon it but as the source of self-gratification. He forgot that the power with which the rich man is endued, is a sacred duty, whose neglect brings its own punishment; and that he who seeks pleasure with reference to himself, not others, will ever find that pleasure is only another name for discontent. At first Lolah was the idol of his heart — she became his bride — and a few happy weeks were passed in retirement and bliss; but Leoni soon looked beyond the small circle of the heart. They went to Palermo, and there he took delight in magnificence; his vanity exulted in glittering display, it was gratified by envy and wonder. Fête succeeded fête, till he himself grew weary of his prodigal hospitality; he craved for variety; and Lolah's timid and gentle temper was ill fitted to be the check he needed. Gambling soon became a habit; his enormous losses were an excitement; he knew he could repair them with a wish — he cared not, therefore, for the money he lost; but he desired to conquer fortune, and held success to be the triumph of skill. In the early part of his career, that evil and grudging feeling with which people regard great and sudden wealth, exhausted itself in prophecies of the certain ruin to which the young spendthrift Count was hastening; and when these prophecies were not fulfilled, their utterers were disappointed; they viewed it as a sin that he had proved their omens untrue. In sad truth, half our forebodings of our neighbours are but our own wishes, which we are ashamed to utter in any other form.

Gradually, the crowds at the Montefiore palace grew less noble; those whose consequence was diminished by its splendour, were the first to turn away; their example was followed by those who had nothing to gain; then went those who are ever led by example; — till the palace only gathered the dissipated and the dishonoured; the needy, who made want their plea, for even they needed excuse; and the gamester, who was reckless whither he went, so that he indulged his passion. Old friends one after another became cold, and new friends were insolent and familiar. All this cut deep, and Leoni plunged still more madly into every possible excess; and when all other aids to forgetfulness failed, the red wine-cup was drained for oblivion.

Pale and sad the young Countess passed the weary hours in her splendid solitude; she felt the loss of friends less than Leoni, for had she not lost her husband? That evening had, however, been spent from home; it was the time of the Carnival — she had been to a masque as an Indian maiden; and now sat up for Leoni's return, half in girlish vanity, half because she could not bear the day to close without seeing him; she knew that he would let himself in by a private portal, which he had had expressly made, and that he must cross that chamber on his way to his own. Chilly and fatigued, she again drew the rich flower-wrought cashmere around her; for a moment she sat, her cheek resting on her hand; at length she leaned back on the ottoman, and sunk into disturbed and half-conscious slumber. She was roused by a noise — and starting up to meet Leoni, saw a stranger in the act of putting aside the curtains of the window through which he was entering. Excess of terror made her speechless for a moment; when the man, who was in the garb of a boatman, said:

„For the love of the saints, be calm, lady! I would lay down my life in your service; just hear me."

Lolah now recognized Stefano, who had before their marriage brought her many a note and flower from Leoni.

„Is the Count within?" asked he anxiously.

„I expect him every instant; but tell me your business at this strange hour."

Stefano hesitated.

„Perhaps it were best I should, and yet — do you know where I could find his Excellency?"

Lolah shook her head mournfully.

„Lady, I must then tell you all;" and he looked aside, and spoke hastily, as if unwilling to watch the misery his words must cause, „Lady, to-morrow this palace will be seized by the officers of the Inquisition, the Count — now may Rosalie punish his enemies! is accused of sorcery — to-morrow he will be arrested. My brother is one of their servants; but the Count is our old patron — he gave me a hint — I rowed hither — by means of a fishing-hook I fastened a rope to the balcony, and sprung up; I know every room of the palace, and thought to take my chance of meeting the Count Leoni; my boat lies below — a ship will sail from the bay at the break of day — they need sail fast, for they have better wine aboard than they would wish to have known in Palermo."

„Holy Virgin! if my husband should not return!" exclaimed Lolah, wringing her hands in an agony. Stefano had not a word of comfort for such an emergency. Suddenly the Countess rose from her seat: „I will trust in the blessed saints for his return: what is the latest period that we can escape?"

„It will not be light this half hour, and I will answer for his safe pilotage while dark; but if the day once break, the fishermen will be abroad, and there will not be a chance of escape."

Lolah sank on her knees, and remained for a few moments with her face hidden between her hands in earnest prayer. Rising from the ground, she hastily addressed Stefano.

„Will you remain here and wait as long as you dare for the Count's arrival? I will return in a few minutes; I only go to make some brief preparation for our flight."

„Your flight?" ejaculated the boatman, „you are in no danger."

„It matters not," answered she passionately; „I will not leave my husband's side."

Ten minutes had scarcely elapsed, when she re-appeared in a plain dark travelling dress, and dragging with her a large horseman's cloak.

„This will conceal him, as he must stay for no change of apparel. But can it be so long? why, it is a quarter of an hour since you told me we had but half a one;" and the gay and fairy chime of the time-piece told four o'clock.

„It is very dark still," said she, looking from the window.

„Yes, lady, it is very dark, the moon set an hour ago; but do not you lean out, the night-dew is falling heavily."

Again Lolah turned to the time-piece, the hand marked that five minutes more had passed away; she looked to Stefano, but he only shook his head and muttered some indistinct sound. A little rosary of coral and of the many-coloured lavas of Vesuvius hung at her waist — she prized it, for it was her dead mother's gift to her in her earliest childhood, and it was linked with the hope and affection of other years: her hand trembled so that she could not count the beads, but she repeated the prayers, at first audibly, and then the words died away in faint murmurs; at length she herself knew not what she was uttering. Her cheek, which had been pale as the funereal marble, burned with crimson, her lips were white and apart — the fever of her mind had communicated itself to her frame. With an unsteady step she again approached the balcony — „Tell me," said she, faintly, „is there a grey streak amid those clouds? I cannot see."

„Lady, it is still dark; hist!" at this moment, a distant step was heard in the corridor; nothing but hearing made intense by anxiety could have caught it.

„Mother of God! I thank thee, it is Leoni!"

She sprang forward; but her head grew dizzy, and she leant for a moment against the table for support. Leoni entered the room, haggard with his excited vigil, his cloak disordered, his rich vest left open at the throat, as if in the agitation of the gaming-table he had loosened it to give himself air; a contraction, seemingly habitual, darkened his forehead; he was young still, but the expression and colours of youth were gone. He advanced moodily and abstractedly, when his eye was caught by the appearance of Stefano, who had lost not a moment in fastening the coils of the rope to the balcony.

„Robber!" shouted he; but the hand which sought his sword was arrested by Lelah's light touch on his arm.

„Be still, for your sweet life's sake," said she, in so earnest whisper, that fixed his attention at once; „yonder faithful creature has risked his for your's; we must fly, or to-morrow dawns for you in the dungeons of the Inquisition; all is ready for flight, only come."

Leoni turned still paler; then rallying with the high courage of his race, exclaimed, „Who dares accuse me? and what is my crime?"

„That matters not," said Stefano; „my brother gave me the hint; you fly to-night; or are a prisoner in the morning. In the name of the good St. Rosalie, don't stand talking; you have lost time enough already; we have settled every thing while waiting for you; — as if any good Christian ever kept such hours!" but these last words were muttered in an under-tone.

„Come, my husband, there will be opportunity enough for explanation; fling this cloak round you, and follow me," said the Countess, stepping onwards.

„Never, Lelah," rejoined Montefiore, startled by the danger, which a conscious feeling in his own heart foreboded was true; „never shall you be exposed to the hardship and danger of such a flight, for me, so worthless, so neglectful!" But she was already at the foot of the ladder.

„Come, Signor; ten minutes more, and we are lost!"

Leoni followed, though almost unconsciously; and in an instant more, Stefano was steering his boat into the bay.

„Lelah, why are you here?" burst from him in the bitter accents of self-reproach, as he felt her head sink on his shoulder.

„Nay, my Leoni," said the low sweet voice on which he once hung with such passionate love, „where should I be but where rests all my earthly happiness? with my head on your heart, Leoni, love mine, I am very, very happy!"

(To be concluded in our next.)

The eighth Sleeper of Ephesus.

It happened one day, in a certain merry party of Genoese, that their conversation fell at last on the noted miracle of Ephesus. Most of the company treated the story of the Seven Sleepers as a pleasant fable, and many shrewd conceits and witty jests were passed on the occasion. Some of the gentlemen, inventing dreams for those drowsy personages, provoked much mirth by their allusions; whilst others speculated satirically on the changes in manners, which they must have remarked after their century of slumber—all of the listeners being highly diverted, excepting one sober gentleman, who made a thousand wry faces at the discourse.

At length, taking an opportunity to address them, he lectured them very seriously in defence of the miracle, calling them so many heretics and infidels; and saying that he saw no reason why the history should not be believed as well as any other legend of the holy fathers. Then, after many other curious arguments, he brought the example of the dormouse, which sleeps throughout a whole winter, affirming, that the Ephesian Christians, being laid in a cold place, like a rocky cavern or a sepulchre, might reasonably have remained torpid for a hundred years.

His companions, feigning themselves to be converted, flattered him on to proceed in a discourse which was so diverting, some of them replenishing his glass continually with wine — of which, through talking till he became thirsty, he partook very freely. At last after uttering a volume of follies and extravagances, he dropped his head upon the table and fell into a profound doze; during which interval, his merry companions plotted a scheme against him, which they promised themselves would afford some excellent sport. Carrying him softly therefore to an upper chamber, they laid him upon an old bed of state, very quaintly furnished and decorated in the style of the gothic ages. Thence repairing to a private theatre in the house, which belonged to their entertainer, they arrayed themselves in some Bohemian habits, very grotesque and fanciful, and disguised their faces with paint; and then sending one of their number to keep watch in the bed-chamber, they awaited in this masquerade the awaking of the credulous sleeper.

In an hour or thereabouts, the watcher, perceiving that the other began to yawn, ran instantly to his comrades, who, hurrying up to the chamber, found their Ephesian sitting upright in bed, and wondering about him at the uncouth mouldering furniture. One of them then speaking for the rest, began to congratulate him on his revival out of so tedious a slumber, persuading him, by help of the others and a legion of lies, that he had slept out a hundred years. He thereupon asking them who they were, they answered they were his dutiful great grandchildren, who had kept watch over him by turns ever since they were juveniles. In proof of this, they showed him how dilapidated the bed had become since he had slept in it, nobody daring to remove him against the advice of the physicians.

,,I perceive it well,'' said he, ,,the golden embroideries are indeed very much tarnished — and the hangings in truth, as tattered as any of our old Genoese standards that were carried against the Turks. These faded heraldries too, upon the head-cloth, have been thoroughly fretted by the moths. I notice also, my dear great grandchildren, by your garments, how much the fashions have altered since my time, though you have kept our ancient language very purely, which is owing of course to the invention of printing. The trees, likewise, and the park, I observe, have much the same appearance that I remember a century since — but the serene aspect of nature does not alter so constantly like our frivolous human customs.''

Then recollecting himself, he began to make inquiries concerning his former acquaintance, and in particular about one Giuseppe Rossi — the same wag that in his mummery was then standing before him. They told him he had been dead and buried, fourscore years ago.

,,Now, God be praised!'' he answered; ,,for that same fellow was a most pestilent coxcomb, who, pretending to be a wit, thought himself licensed to ridicule men of worth and gravity with the most shameful buffooneries. The world must have been much comforted by his death, and especially if he took with him his fellow mountebank, Guidolphi, who was as laborious a jester, but duller.''

In this strain, going through the names of all those that were with him in the room, he praised God heartily that he was rid of such a generation of knaves and fools and profane heretics; and then recollecting himself afresh,

„Of course, my great grandchildren," said he, „I am a widower?"

His wife, who was amongst the maskers, at this question began to prick up her ears, and answering for herself, she said,

„Alas! the good woman that was thy partner has been dead these seventy-three years, and has left thee desolate."

At this news the sleeper began to rub his hands together very briskly, „Then there was a cursed shrew gone;" whereupon his wife striking him in a fury on the cheek, she let fall her mask through this indiscretion; and so awaked him out of his marvellous dream.

Thomas Hood.

The Alhambra.

Palace of beauty! where the Moorish Lord,
King of the bow, the bridle, and the sword,
Sat like a Genie in the diamond's blaze.
Oh! to have seen thee in the ancient days,
When at thy morning gates the coursers stood,
The „thousand," milk white, Yemen's fiery blood,
In pearl and ruby harness'd for the king,
And thro' thy portal's pour'd the gorgeous flood,
Of jewell'd Sheik and Emir hastening,
Before the sky the dawning purple show'd
Their turbans at the Caliph's feet to fling.
Lovely thy morn, — thy ev'ning lovelier still,
When at the waking of the first blue star
That trembled on the Atalaya hill,
The splendours of the trumpet's voice arose,
Brilliant and bold, and yet no sound of war,
It summon'd all thy beauty from repose,
The starr'd slumber of the burning noon.
Then in the slant sun all thy fountains shone,
Shooting the sparkling column from the vase
Of crystal cool, and falling in a haze
Of rainbow hues on floors of porphyry,
And the rich bordering beds of every bloom
That breathes to African or Indian sky.
Carnation, tuberose, thick anemone,
Pure lily: that its virgin head low waved
Beneath the fountain drops, yet still would come
Like hearts by love and destiny enslaved,
That see, and shrink, — and yet will seek their doom.

Then was the harping of the minstrels heard,
In the deep arbours, or the regal hall,
Hushing the tumult of the festival,
When the pale bard his kindling eyeball rear'd,
And told of eastern glories, silken hosts,
Tower'd elephants, and chiefs in topaz arm'd;
Or of the myriads from the cloudy coasts
Of the far western sea, the sons of blood,
The iron men of tournament and feud,
That round the bulwarks of their fathers swarm'd,
Doomed by the Moslem scymetar to fall;
Till the red cross was hurl'd from Salem's wall.

Where are thy pomps, Alhambra, earthly sun,
That had no rival, and no second? — gone!
Thy glory down the arch of time has roll'd,
Like the great day-star to the ocean dim,
The billows of the ages o'er thee swim,
Gloomy and fathomless; thy tale is told.
Where is thy horn of battle? that but blown
Brought every chief of Afric from his throne;
Brought every spear of Afric from the wall;
Brought every charger barbed from the stall,
Till all its tribes sat mounted on the shore;
Waiting the waving of thy torch to pour
The living deluge on the fields of Spain.
Queen of earth's loveliness, there was a stain
Upon thy brow — the stain of guilt and gore,
Thy course was bright, bold, treach'rous, — and 'tis o'er.
The spear and diadem are from thee gone;
Silence is now sole monarch on thy throne!

Croly.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. N.o 48.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Enchantress.

By L. E. Landon.

(Concluded from our last.)

Gently his arm enfolded the confiding and childlike form that rested upon him, and all the memory of their early tenderness gushed into his thoughts; while she, with a woman's engrossing devotedness, forgot every thing but that her husband was once more her own.

„You must just pass for two runaways," said Stefano, „who have bribed me to row you beyond a powerful noble's reach, and who mean to stay from Palermo, till, for the daughter's sake, the lover be forgiven."

„Whither are we going?" asked Montefiore.

„On board yonder vessel, which bears a smuggling cargo; and pray you, at the port where she stops, lose no time in embarking for another. Do you remember the Marchese di Sezzaga?"

„Ay, the stripling! the sweeping away of whose ducats is the only instance of luck that ever awaited me at that accursed rouge-et-noir table."

„I doubt you owe something of your present flight to him; he is nephew to the Grand Inquisitor."

„And my husband is then the victim of his idle revenge!" cried the Countess, in a tone of affright.

Stefano made no answer: the next moment they were close to the ship, and he, fastening the boat to its side by a rope, sprung on board, to be spokesman for the party. Lelah trembled as the fragile bark rocked to and fro beneath the dark stern of the vessel, from which hung a lantern, whose dim light showed what she deemed their perilous position. Leoni might have felt the beating of the heart pillowed on his own; but he had himself been so long the sole object of his thoughts, that his wife's fear, not being shared by himself, never entered his mind.

„How provoking it is that I should have lost my last rouleau! I have not a ducat; and you hurried me so, that I had no time to bring away any thing!" exclaimed he, peevishly. „What the devil terms shall we come to with these rascals without money?"

„I have here three rouleaux," said the Countess; „I should have brought away more gold, but for its weight — I therefore preferred my diamonds, as to their sale we must look for our future support."

A smile passed over Montefiore's face; dearly did Lelah love his smile; but now rather, a thousand times rather would she have met his darkest frown.

„All is settled; you are to give the Captain fifty crowns on arriving in port; for the sake of his own pretty Agnes, he said he would not be hard upon two young lovers: — I thought," added Stefano, in a whisper, „I might so promise, as I knew my lady had brought jewels away with her."

„Give me the rouleaux," said the Count, „and do you take them, Stefano; and when I return I will increase them a hundredfold."

„Keep your money, good your Excellency; what I have done was in honour and love for your noble house. Keep your gold; it would little benefit me, I trow!"

Leoni rose in anger, and began hastily to ascend the side of the ship. Stefano helped the Countess, who, as with his aid she climbed the knotted ropes, whispered,

„Take the gold, and lay it out in masses at the shrine of St. Rosalie, and this ring — my father gave it me; he will thankfully redeem it, and bless you, as his child does now."

„Come, come, Stefano, here's what will furnish you with many a merry night;" and Montefiore again pressed the money into Stefano's hand, who did not now reject it: the voice in which he muttered his good wishes was inaudible; and as he sprung into his boat, the tears of a three-year-old child stood in the eyes of the hardy rower. The captain civilly showed the fugitives into a small cabin; and a fresh breeze filling the sails, bore them rapidly from Sicily.

Next morning, all was astonishment and consternation in Palermo; there was the palace with its splendid ornaments, the almost regal train of servants; there were the gorgeous dresses, there were the golden caskets filled with jewels and perfumes; but where were the Count and Countess? The domestics searched every room in dismay; not only were they gone, but not a vestige remained of their flight. A strange suspicion rose in every mind, pale and affrighted they crowded together, and then scarcely found speech. What if the demon, for whose wealth their lord had bartered his immortal soul — what if he had exacted, at length, his fearful tribute — had he carried off his victim bodily? But then the countess, their gentle and pious mistress, could she be involved in such awful doom? — A loud knocking at the portal broke off the discourse; every one hurried to the door — to admit the officers of the Inquisition. All search was fruitless, all inquiry vain. The palace was confiscated, and its rich furniture sold; the Marchese di Montefiore was summoned to appear on a charge of sorcery; he came not to answer the accusation, and sentence of outlawry was passed against him. A thousand wild rumours were afloat, which finally merged in one — that unearthly retribution had been exacted for unearthly riches. Yet there were two in Palermo who knew the truth; the father of Lolah, who died shortly after, a lonely and broken-hearted man; and Stefano — but he kept the secret as one of life and death; and when he perished in a storm at sea, it was buried with him in the deep and fathomless waters.

But now to return to our fugitives. At the first port they touched, they re-embarked, and finally landed at Marseilles; a small but lovely cottage on the sea-shore received them, an olive plantation encircled the house, and the Provence rose looked in at the casements. The far plains were covered with heath and thyme on one side, and on the other was the sea, where the rich vessels of the merchants seemed to sail in and out for ever. Fear and fatigue had severely tried a frame so frail as that of Lolah; and her husband's apprehension on her account for a time recalled his love: — perhaps they are more inseparable than we are ready to admit. Leoni felt that he was the only link between Lolah and life — his care the barrier between her and death: at length his gentle watchfulness was rewarded by the smile returning to her lip, and the rose to her cheek. Lolah thought she was very happy; in truth, from her birth, nature and fortune had been at variance: her delicate health unfitted her for either crowds or late hours — a constitutional timidity made her shrink from strangers — she had neither the talents which require, nor the spirits which enjoy an enlarged sphere of action: the affectionate monotony of her present life was just suited to her.

Not so to her husband, who soon desired more activity, more variety, more excitement:

a thousand times did he ask himself of what avail was his boundless wealth, if he made it not the minister of pleasure? Every evening that he marked the sea redden beneath the setting sun, he vowed it should be the last. At length he resolved on leaving their cottage; and, after travelling for a few days, they settled in a superb château near Lyons. Lelah trembled at the magnificence which again surrounded them. Once she ventured to remonstrate on their lavish expenditure; but Leoni only laughed, and said, „You will not find here the miserable suspicions of the Sicilians; and great part of my wealth was placed abroad. First we will dazzle these provincials, and then proceed to Paris."

In fact, Leoni feared yet to enter that most [illegible] capital; he wished to be somewhat forgotten of his countrymen, before he risked meeting with them. Half Lyons was soon collected at the château: what was splendour to Leoni, unless it were envied and admired? Perhaps the secret of this character was, that he was a very vain man, and yet had nothing in himself whereby that vanity was gratified; this forced him upon external resources. Again he delighted in bewildering by his magnificence, and astonishing by its extent. But in this enjoyment Lelah took no part; in this new display of riches, she saw but a confirmation of the suspicions which had driven them from Palermo: and Leoni — to whom, in spite of his selfishness, her devotion, her uncomplaining abandonment of home, friends, name, for his sake, had endeared her more and more, and who felt that Lelah was his only link with the past, the sole remembrance of his early and happy youth — Leoni felt keenly the barrier that doubt drew between his wife and himself. He was mortified to think that his very power degraded him in her eyes; that she confounded him with the alchymists and sorcerers, whom he despised as they were despised in that military and feudal age. A thousand times he was on the point of revealing his secret, and then again the memory of the mystery so mysteriously enjoined arose within him. A visitor at their fêtes, a passer-by on the road, who caught sight of the youthful couple, would have envied their happiness; but whosoever could have looked within on the hidden depths of their troubled minds, would have seen fear, discontent, sorrow for the past, and misgiving for the future.

One night there was a superb entertainment; the Countess presided, pale and melancholy; the Count, weary of himself, and therefore of his guests, secretly compared them with the brilliant groups that had assembled in his palaces at Palermo, and thought how little his provincial set were worthy of the cost and taste bestowed upon them. In reality, display had lost its novelty, and consequently its charm in his eyes. The evening had not half passed away, when Lelah was astonished by his coming up to her and whispering, „For Heaven's sake, find some excuse for dismissing these people! Illness will do; for I am sure you look pale enough."

She might have re-echoed her husband's words, for he himself looked wild and haggard. Still, it was near midnight when their guests dispersed; and Leoni — on returning from conducting la Présidente de Lauville, always the latest of the late, to her huge family coach — silently approached one of the windows, and stepping out upon the terrace, stood as if absorbed in the lovely view — and lovely indeed it was. Below, was a smooth turf, which sloped down to a lake, whose surface reflected the moonshine broken and tremulous; the moon herself was rising on the other side of the château, and so was invisible; but her light lay silvery on the grass, and lent a softness, sweeter even than colour, to many-shaped beds, which were filled with flowers. In the middle of the garden was a fountain; to a certain height the water shot up in a bright and straight column, suddenly the stream divided and came down in a glittering shower to the marble basin below; and the falling of this fountain was the only sound that broke the perfect stillness. A quiet step approached, a soft hand was laid on his arm, and Lelah whispered, „Is it not beautiful?" How often will the lips frame some indifferent question, when the heart is full of the most important!

„Will you then regret to leave it?“ said Leoni, as they wandered through the maze of odoriferous flower-pots, „for we must go to-morrow.“

Lolah gazed upon his face, but words died on her lips.

„That wearisome Madame de Lauville,“ continued he, „entertained me this evening with her delight that she should soon have a worthy guest to introduce to me; for that in a week's time the Count Gonzaga, the nephew of the great cardinal, would spend a few days at her house, on his way to the south of France; and she was so sure I should find him a charming acquaintance. Plague on the old simpleton, and the Count too! what cursed chance brings him here?“

„My Leoni, why should you fear him?“ murmured Lolah.

„Fear him, nonsense! But it would be very disagreeable to have the old and foolish story which banished us from Palermo, set abroad in Lyons:“ and, lost in gloomy meditation, he sank on a carved stone seat by the lake. For a moment the Countess stood irresolute by his side — suddenly dropping on one knee, she leant her beautiful head on his arm, and watching his countenance with those eloquent eyes which had never looked upon him but in love, said, in a low pleading voice,

„Leoni mine, my heart has never had one thought hidden from you, how can you bear to shut yours so utterly from me?“

„He made her no answer except by kissing her eyes, as if he might not see and resist their eloquent pleading: but his young wife had gained courage — the worst was over — and her very fondness, which made his anger such a thing of fear, now urged her to endeavour to persuade, if she could not convince. She implored him to say what was the secret of his wealth; to justify its possession, if possible — if not, to fling it from him: what lot could there be in life which she would not be ready to share with him? Had his wealth made him happy? oh, no! it had sown division between them; it had exiled him from his own land; it was now about to force him to become a wanderer again.

„I tell you, my beloved husband, this secret is to me even as death; I kneel to the Madonna, and my thoughts are not with prayer; in society I shrink from every eye with a vague but ever present fear — a word, a look, sends the colour from my cheek, and curdles the life-blood at my heart; and yet I know not what I dread: and sleep, oh, sleep is very terrible! for then, Leoni, you tell me what it is death to hear, and I start from my pillow — but when I waken I disbelieve your guilt: — you guilty, Leoni? oh, no! no!“ and again her head sank, while the moonlight fell on her pale cheek, and eyes glistening with earnestness and tears.

Weak and self-indulgent, accustomed to yield to all things to the impulse of the moment, Leoni was a very unfit person to be intrusted with a mystery and a secret: he sufficed not to himself; he felt weary of his unshared thoughts; and at this moment he was irresolute — he would even have wished to throw all the responsibility of decision on the fragile and gentle creature by his side.

In the deep stillness of that moonlit midnight he told her all; his voice died in silence, which was interrupted by a faint shriek from his wife; she pointed to the lake, but strong terror made her speechless — a faint silvery outline of a form was seen in the distant air; it came nearer, and the shadow fell dark upon the wave; a stately and lovely female slowly advanced across the water, which yielded not beneath her shining feet. The flashing of her radiant eyes fell upon the culprit — she raised her hand, whereon shone the starry talisman as it shone when she bade the spirits give him wealth unbounded and at a wish. She beckoned Leoni. A power was on him which forced him to obey — he sprung towards the lake — he sank below the surface — twice he emerged from the bright waves, again they closed over his head, and the moon shone upon one unbroken line of light. The strange and beautiful being gazed on the spot with a look of horror; she wrung her hands as it in the helplessness of despair — a low cry came upon the wind, and its mysterious utterer had disappeared. An influence stronger than even fear or love had riveted Lolah like a statue to the place; but as that figure melted into air, a terrible life returned to her — she rushed towards the lake, and with one wild shriek plunged into its depths.

Next morning, the birds were singing among the boughs, the bees were gathering their early honey amid the flowers, the sun had turned the lake into a sheet of gold — when the servants were drawn to the spot by a light-blue scarf floating on the waters; they knew it was what their mistress had worn the night before. The silver flowers embroidered on it, glittering in the sunshine, first caught the eye; assistance was procured, and the bodies were soon found. The wreath of white lilies yet bound the raven tresses of Lolah, some of whose lengths had become entangled round the neck of her husband. They parted them not, but carried them to the château. Ere noon, every inhabitant of Lyons had mourned over their youthful, but marble-like beauty. None knew their history; none ever solved the mystery of their fate — but there were many affectionate hearts that grew sorrowful for their sake — and kind hands buried them together in the same grave.

One morning a marble urn was found upon their tomb, though none could tell who placed it there. On it was exquisitely carved a veiled female figure, with hands clasped as if in prayer, and head bowed down as if weeping; she was kneeling at the foot of the Cross: on scroll below was graven with one single word — Submission!

Madeline.

There lived in Toledo a young gentleman, so passionately loved by a young lady of the same city, that on his sudden decease she made a vow to think of no other; and having neither relations nor friends, except her dear brother Juan, who was then abroad, she hired a small house, and lived almost the life of a hermit. Being young and handsome, however, and possessed besides of a plentiful fortune, she was much annoyed by the young gallants of the place, who practised so many stratagems to get speech of her, and molested her so continually, that to free herself from their importunities, both now and for the future, she exchanged her dress for a man's apparel, and privately withdrew to another city. By favour of her complexion, which was a brunette's and the solitary manner of her life, she was enabled to preserve this disguise; and it might have been expected that she would have met with few adventures; but on the contrary, she had barely sojourned a month in this new dwelling, and in this unwonted garb, when she was visited with still sterner inquietudes than in those she had so lately resigned.

At the beginning of her troubles, it happened, one evening, in going out a little distance, that she was delayed in the street by seeing a young woman, who, sitting on some stone steps, and with scanty rags to cover her, was nursing a beautiful infant at her breast and weeping bitterly. At this painful spectacle, the charitable Madeline immediately cast her purse into the poor mother's lap, and the woman eagerly seizing the gift, and clasping it to her bosom, began to implore the blessing of God upon so charitable and Christian-like a gentleman. But an instant had scarcely been gone, when on looking up, and more completely discerning the countenance of her benefactor, she suddenly desisted.

„Ah, wretch!“ she cried, do you come hither to insult me? Go again to your false ding; and the curse of a wife and of a mother be upon you!“ Then casting away the purse, and bending herself down over her child, and crying, „Alas! my poor babe, shall we eat from the hand that has ruined thy father?“ — she resumed her weeping.

The tender Madeline was greatly afflicted at being so painfully mistaken; and hastening home, she deliberated with herself whether she should any longer retain an apparel which had subjected her to so painful an occurrence; but recalling her former persecutions, and trusting that so strange an adventure could scarcely befal her a second time, she continued in her masculine disguise. And now, thinking of the comfort and protection which her dear brother Juan might be to her in such troubles, she became vehemently anxious for his return; and the more so, because she could obtain no tidings of him whatever. On the morrow, therefore, she went forth to make inquiry; and forsaking her usual road, and especially the quarter where she had encountered with that unfortunate woman, she trusted reasonably to meet with no other such misery.

Now it chanced that the road which she had chosen on this day led close beside a cemetery; and just at the moment when she arrived by the gates, there came also a funeral, so that she was obliged to stand aside during the procession. Madeline was much struck by the splendour of the escutcheons; but still more by the general expression of sorrow amongst the people; and inquiring of a bye-stander the name of the deceased: — „What!“ said the man, „have ye not heard of the villanous murder of our good lord, the Don Felix de Castro? — the hot curse of God fall on the wicked Cain that slew him!“ and with that, he uttered so many more dreadful imprecations as made her blood run cold to hear him.

In the meantime, the mourners one by one had almost entered; and the last one was just stepping by, with her hands clasped and a countenance of the deepest sorrow, when casting her eyes on Madeline, she uttered a piercing shriek, and pointing with her finger, cried, „That is he, that is he who murdered my poor brother!“

At this exclamation, the people eagerly pressed towards the quarter whither she pointed; but Madeline, shrinking back from the piercing glance of the lady, was so hidden by the gate as to be unnoticed; and the next man being seized on suspicion, and a great tumult arising, she was enabled to make her escape. „Alas!“ she sighed inwardly, „what sin have I committed, that this cruel fortune pursues me whithersoever I turn. Alas, what have I done;“ and walking sorrowfully in these meditations, she was suddenly accosted by a strange domestic.

„Senor,“ he said, „my lady desires most earnestly to see you; nay, you must needs come;“ and thereupon leading the way into an ancient, noble-looking mansion, the bewildered Madeline, silent and wondering, was introduced to a large apartment. At the further end a lady attired in deep mourning, like a widow, was reclining on a black velvet sofa; the curtains were black, the pictures were framed also in black, and the whole room was so furnished in that dismal colour, that it looked like a very palace of grief.

At sight of Madeline, the lady rose hastily and ran a few steps forward; but her limbs failing, she stopped short, and rested with both hands on a little table which stood in the centre of the room. Her figure was tall and graceful, but so wasted, that it seemed as if it must needs bend to that attitude; and her countenance was so thin and pale, and yet withal so beautiful, that Madeline could not behold it without tears of pity. After a pause, the lady cried in a low voice, „Ah, cruel, how could you desert me! See how I have grieved for you!“ and therewith unbinding her hair, so that it fell about her face, it was as grey as in a woman of fourscore!

„Alas!“ she said, „it was black once, when I gave thee a lock for a keep-sake; but it was fitting it should change when thou hast changed;“ and leaning her face on her hands she sobbed heavily.

At these words, the tender Madeline approached to console her; but the lady pushing her gently aside, exclaimed mournfully, „It is too late now!“ and then casting herself on the sofa, gave way to such a passion of grief, and trembled so exceedingly, that it seemed as if life and sorrow would part asunder on the spot. Madeline kneeling down, and swearing that she had never injured her, besought her to moderate a transport which broke her heart only to gaze upon; and the lady moving her lips, but unable to make any reply, then drew from her bosom a small miniature; and sobbing out, „Oh, Juan, Juan!“ hid her face again upon the cushion.

At sight of the picture, the miserable Madeline was in her own turn speechless; and remembering instantly the beggar and the mourner, whose mistakes were thus illustrated by the unhappy lady — she comprehended at once the full measure of her wretchedness. „Oh, Juan, Juan,“ she groaned, „is it thus horribly that I must hear of thee!“ and stretching herself upon the carpet, she uttered such piercing cries, that the lady, alarmed by a grief which surpassed even her own, endeavoured to raise her, and happening to tear open the bosom of her dress, the sex of Madeline was discovered. „Alas, poor wretch! hast thou too been deceived,“ cried the lady — „and by the same false Juan;“ and enfolding Madeline in her arms, the two unfortunates wept together for the space of many minutes.

In the mean time, a domestic abruptly entered; and exclaiming that the murderer of Don Felix was condemned, and that he had seen him conducted to prison, he delivered into the hands of his mistress a fragment of a letter, which she read as follows: —

„Most dear and injured lady,

„Before this shocks your eyes, your ears will be stung with the news that it is I who have killed your kinsman; and knowing that by the same blow I have slain your peace, I am not less stained by your tears than by his blood which is shed. My wretched life will speedily make atonement for this last offence; but that I should have requited your admirable constancy and affection by so unworthy a return of cruelty and falsehood, is a crime that scorches up my tears before I can shed them; and makes me to despair, that I cannot pray even on the threshold of death. And yet, I am not quite the wretch you may account me, except in misery; but desiring only to die as the most unhappy man in this unhappy world, I have withheld many particulars which might otherwise intercede for me with my judges. But I desire to die and to pass away from both hatred and pity, if any such befal me; but above all, to perish from a remembrance whereof I am most unworthy: and when I am but a clod, and a poor remnant of dust, you may haply forgive, for mortality's sake, the many faults and human sins which did once inhabit it.

„I am only a few brief hours short of this consummation: and the life which was bestowed for your misery and mine will be extinguished for ever. My blood is running its last course through its veins — and the light and air of which all others so largely partake, is scantily measured out to me. Do not curse me — do not forget that which you once were to me, though unrelated to my crimes; but if my name may still live where my lips have been, put your pardon into a prayer for my soul against its last sunrise. Only one more request. I have a sister in Toledo who tenderly loves me, and believes that I am still abroad. If it be a thing possible, confirm her still in that happy delusion — or tell her that I am dead, but not how. As I have concealed my true name, I hope that this deadly reproach may be spared to her, and now from the very confines of the grave —“

It was a painful thing to hear the afflicted lady reading thus far betwixt her groans — but the remainder was written in so wavering a hand, and withal so stained and blotted, that, like the meaning of death itself, it surpassed discovery. At length, „Let me go,“ cried Madeline, „let me go and liberate him! If they mistake me thus for my brother Juan, the gaoler will not be able to distinguish him from me, and in this manner he may escape and so have more years for repentance and make his peace with God.“ Hereupon, wildly clapping her hands, as if for joy at this fortunate thought, she entreated so earnestly for a womanly dress that it was given to her, and throwing it over her man's apparel, she made the best of her way to the prison. But, alas! the countenance of the miserable Juan was so changed by sickness and sharp anguish of mind, that for want of a more happy token she was constrained to recognize him by his bonds. Her fond stratagem therefore would have been hopeless, if Juan besides had not been so resolute, as he was, in his opposition to her entreaties. She was obliged, therefore, to content herself with mingling tears with him till night, in his dungeon, — and then struggling, tearing her fine hair, as though it had been guilty of her grief, she was removed from him by main force, and in that manner conveyed back to the lady's residence.

For some hours she expended her breath only in raving and the most passionate arguments of distress, — but afterwards she became so fearfully calm, neither speaking, nor weeping, nor listening to what was addressed to her, merely remarking about midnight, that she heard the din of the workmen upon the scaffold — and which, though heard by no other person at so great a distance, was confirmed afterwards to have been a truth. In this state, with her eyes fixed and her lips moving, but without any utterance, she remained till morning in a kind of lethargy — and therein so much more happy than her unfortunate companion, who at every sound of the great bell which is always tolled against the death of a convict, started and sobbed and shook, as if each stroke was made against her own heart. But of Madeline, on the contrary, it was noted that even when the doleful procession was passing immediately under the window at which she was present, she only shivered a little, as if at a cool breath of air, and then turning slowly away, and desiring to be laid in bed, she fell into a slumber, as profound nearly as death itself. But it was not her blessed fate to die so quickly, although on the next morning the unhappy partner of her grief was found dead upon her pillow, still and cold, and with so sorrowful an expression about her countenance, as might well rejoice the beholder that she was divorced from a life of so deep a trouble.

As for Madeline, she took no visible note of this occurrence, nor seemed to have any return of reason till the third day, when growing more and more restless, and at length wandering out into the city, she was observed to tear down one of the proclamations for the execution, which were still attached to the walls. After this, she was no more seen in the neighbourhood, and it was feared she had violently made away with her life; but by later accounts from Toledo it was ascertained that she had wandered back, bare-footed and quite a maniac, to that city.

She was for some years the wonder and the pity of its inhabitants, and when I have been in Toledo with my uncle Francis, I have seen this poor crazed Madeline, as they called her, with her long loose hair and her fine face, so pale and thin, and so calm-looking, that it seemed to be only held alive by her large black eyes. She was always mild and gentle, and if you provoked it, would freely converse with you; but oftentimes in the midst of her discourse, whether cheerful or sad, she would pause and sigh, and say in a different voice, „Oh, Juan, Juan!“ and with these two words, simple though they be, she made every heart ache that heard her.

The Snow.

The silvery snow! — the silvery snow! —
Like a glory it falls on the fields below;
And the trees with their diamond branches appear
Like the fairy growth of some magical sphere;
While soft as music, and wild and white,
It glitters and floats in the pale moonlight,
And spangles the river and fount as they flow;
Oh! who has not loved the bright, beautiful snow!

The silvery snow, and the crinkling frost —
How merry we go when the Earth seems lost;
Like spirits that rise from the dust of Time,
To live in a purer and holier clime! —
A new creation without a stain —
Lovely as Heaven's own pure domain!
But, oh! like the many fair hopes of our years,
It glitters awhile — and then melts into tears!

Swain.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 49.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Kurze Ueberſicht der neueſten engliſchen Literatur.

II. Das engliſche Zeitungsweſen.

(Schluß.)

The Globe, ein ſchon ſeit langer Zeit beſtehendes Journal, das allmählig mehrere andere Abendblätter in ſich vereinigte, wie den Traveller, den Statesman, den True Briton, die Evening Chronicle und die Nation, und ſeit 1835 von einem Herrn Wilſon vortrefflich redigirt wird. Sein Abſatz beläuft ſich auf 3000 Exemplare und der Werth des ganzen Inſtitutes wird auf 30,000 Pf. St. angeſchlagen, da namentlich ſeine Inſerate eine beträchtliche Summe eintragen. Es iſt miniſteriell und viele ſeiner Hauptartikel über ausländiſche Politik ſollen aus der Feder des Lord Palmerſton ſelbſt fließen, obgleich dies von Unterrichteten in Zweifel gezogen wird. Früher ſtand der Globe mit einer Morgenzeitung, the Morning Press, in Verbindung; dieſe hörte aber ſchon vor einer Reihe von Jahren auf zu erſcheinen, ohne daß eben die Wirkſamkeit und Ausbreitung des Globe dadurch geſchwächt wurde.

Die glänzendſte Zeit des zweiten Abendblattes, The Courier, war während des franzöſiſchen Krieges, wo es ſich eines täglichen Debits von 10,000 Exemplaren erfreute, der in einzelnen Fällen ſich bis auf 16,000 Exemplare und darüber erhöhte; namentlich wurde es von der Geiſtlichkeit ſehr protegirt und galt als das einzige Organ der Regierung. Später erlitt es jedoch bedeutende Abnahme, vorzüglich dadurch, daß es zu häufig während der Jahre 1827 bis 1830 die Farbe änderte. Dann trat es entſchieden auf Canning's Seite, da ſein Redacteur, ein Mr. Mudford, ein vertrauter Freund dieſes Miniſters war, und kehrte endlich nach Canning's leider zu frühem Tode auf die Seite der Tories zurück. Unter Lord Grey wurde es darauf wieder gemäßigt liberal, bis es zuletzt, nachdem es eben ſo oft ſeine Dirigenten gewechſelt hatte, eine Art von unabhängiger Mitte behauptet und unter der Leitung des jetzigen Redacteurs, eines Mr. Hodgkins, ſich durch Schnelligkeit und Genauigkeit der Berichte vortheilhaft auszeichnet. Sein Werth wird auf 80,000 Pf. St., der jährliche Ertrag auf 12,000 bis 15,000 Pf. St., da ſeine Inſerate ein Bedeutendes eintragen, geſchätzt. Der frühere Abſatz belief ſich, wie bereits bemerkt, auf 10,000 Exemplare, hat ſich natürlich aber bei dem Schwanken in den Principien nicht auf gleicher Höhe erhalten, ſondern bedeutend abgenommen. — Der Courier iſt das Eigenthum von 24 Beſitzern, an deren Spitze James Stuart ſteht.

The Sun, ein mehr als 40 Jahr altes Blatt verdankt ſeinen Aufſchwung einem Mr. Murdo Young, der, früher Redacteur, gegenwärtig Eigenthümer deſſelben iſt. Sein Abſatz beläuft ſich auf 3000 Exemplare täglich. Es zeichnet ſich vorzüglich durch die Schnelligkeit und Genauigkeit ſeiner Parlamentsberichte und durch ſeine literäriſchen Kritiken aus, da es jedes neue Buch von einiger Bedeutung zugleich zur Anzeige bringt und am erſten jedes Monates auch alle periodiſchen Erſcheinungen von Wichtigkeit beurtheilt. Der Koſtenaufwand für dieſe Zeitung beläuft ſich jährlich auf 12000 Pf. St.

The Standard ward 1827 als Stütze der Partei Wellington gegen das Miniſterium Canning geſtiftet; nächſt dem „Sun" iſt es die größte Abendzeitung dem Formate nach, da es ſechs Columnen umfaßt. Seine Redacteurs ſind Dr. Gifford und Dr. Maginn. Es zeichnet ſich durch treues Feſthalten an ſeinen Grundſätzen, durch äußerſt gewandte Dialectik und durch ſtrenge Vermeidung aller kleinlichen Privatneckereien aus, und konnte in letzterer Hinſicht den meiſten von unſeren deutſchen Zeitblättern als ein muſterhaftes Vorbild aufgeſtellt werden. — Der jährliche reine Gewinn des Standard, der ein Eigenthum des Mr. Charles Baldwin iſt, ſoll nahe an 10,000 Pfd. St. betragen. —

The True Sun wurde 1832 als Oppoſition gegen the Sun von einem Herrn Grant geſtiftet, und neigte ſich dem Radicalismus zu; anfangs erweckte es große Hoffnung, ſeine pecuniären Verhältniſſe verſchlimmerten ſich jedoch und ſo kam es in die Hände mehrerer Unternehmer, die es jedoch auch nicht in die Höhe bringen konnten und über 40000 Pfd. St. dabei zugeſetzt haben ſollen. Sein Abſatz überſteigt jetzt nicht mehr die Zahl von 1000 Exemplaren. Es gehört gegenwärtig dem Herrn Daniel Whittle Harvey, Parlamentsmitglied für Southwark. In ſeinen Grundſätzen iſt es ſich immer ſehr treu geblieben und wirkt beſonders als Anwald der arbeitenden Klaſſe.

Die hier aufgeführten ſind die bedeutendſten täglich herauskommenden Zeitungen, ihnen folgen nach der von uns beobachteten Ordnung die politiſchen Wochenblätter, von denen als die bekannteſten genannt werden:

The Examiner, ein ſeit 20 Jahren beſtehendes, auf Seite der Radicalen ſich haltendes Blatt, berühmt durch den Geiſt, Scharfſinn und Witz mit dem es redigirt wird. Früher ſtand es unter der Leitung des bekannten John Hunt, und Männer wie Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Keats, Shelley nahmen Theil an demſelben und lieferten beſonders ausgezeichnete literariſche und Theaterkritiken. Gegenwärtig beſitzt und redigirt Albany Fonblanque den Examiner und verleiht ihm einen beſondern Werth durch die ſarkaſtiſche und populaire Art, mit der er ſeine Artikel abfaßt. Er iſt ein eben ſo gewandter als treuer Vertheidiger der Rechte des Volkes. — Der Abſatz ſeines Blattes wird auf 3000 Exemplare geſchätzt.

Daſſelbe Anſehn wie der Examiner, genießt der Spectator unter der Leitung eines Herrn Rintoul. Dieſes Blatt iſt vollkommen liberal und unabhängig, alle ſeine Artikel ſind höchſt elegant ſtyliſirt, ſelbſt wenn die Verfaſſer ſich, was hin und wieder geſchieht, bei der Vertheidigung ihrer Grundſätze von ihrem Eifer fortreißen laſſen und heftig werden. — Die Aufſätze über Literatur, Kunſt und Muſik werden außerordentlich ihrer Feinheit und Wahrheit wegen gelobt. — Das Blatt hat nur 2500 Abonnenten, trägt aber demungeachtet ein Beträchtliches ein, da jede Nummer 9 Pence (8 Sgr.) koſtet.

Der Atlas, was das Format betrifft, eine der größten engliſchen Zeitungen, iſt gemäßigt liberal und hat das mit dem Spectator gemein, daß es ebenfalls vortreffliche Aufſätze über Literatur und Kunſt bringt, und ſich großer Unpartheilichkeit befleißigt; ſein Redacteur iſt ein Mr. Robert Bell. Der Abſatz betrug anfänglich 8000 Exemplare, hat aber beträchtlich abgenommen. Es gehört einem Herrn Whiting, Buchdrucker in London.

The Observer gehört zugleich mit einem andern wöchentlich erſcheinenden Journal Bell's Life in London als Eigenthum einem Herrn Clement; der Abſatz beider Zeitſchriften ſoll zwiſchen 15 und 20000 Exemplaren betragen. — Der Observer iſt ein bereits dreißig Jahr altes Blatt, hat eine gemäßigt liberale Tendenz und zeichnet ſich durch Eleganz und anſtändigen Ton in ſeinen Artikeln aus. Großes Lob erwirbt es ſich durch die Genauigkeit, mit der es die Verhandlungen in den Gerichtshöfen mittheilt, ſowie durch ſeinen Reichthum an Berichten über intereſſante Vorfälle in London, und ſeine vortrefflichen literariſchen Ueberſichten. — Bell's Life in London macht ſich dagegen durch den ſcherzhaften Ton und den Reichthum an Neuigkeiten beliebt und gehört zu den geleſenſten engliſchen Blättern. — Einen beſonderen Reiz verleihen ihm ſeine humoriſtiſchen Holzſchnitte mit ihren poetiſchen Erklärungen. Es iſt gemäßigt liberal und independent.

The weekly Dispatch hat den ſtärkſten Abſatz unter allen Wochenblättern, da ſein Debit die Zahl von 30000 Exemplaren überſteigt. Es iſt radical geſinnt, freimüthig und kühn, und wird von einem Herrn Smith vortrefflich geleitet. — Die politiſchen Artikel ſchreibt ein Herr Williams, die dramaturgiſchen, früher, ein in dieſem Fache mit Lob genannter Mr. Gumming.

Bell's weekly Messenger muß zunächſt als eins der verbreitetſten Londoner Wochenblätter genannt werden, da ſein Abſatz ſich auf 13,000 Exemplare beläuft. Er trägt, früher neutral, jetzt die Farbe der conſervativen Partei, zeichnet ſich aber durch einen ſehr anſtändigen und ſtreng ſittlichen Ton aus, und wird namentlich viel von den Familien auf dem Lande geleſen. Dieſes Blatt gehört den Erben eines Herrn Bell, der es gründete; es iſt derſelbe, welcher die bekannte, ſtark verbreitete und für die Zeit ihres erſten Erſcheinens ſehr elegante Bell's Standard Edition of the British Poets beſorgte.

Bell's New Weekly Messenger ward dagegen von einem Sohne des eben Genannten im Jahre 1832 in Oppoſition zu dem vorigen Blatte geſtiftet; es hat eine entſchiedene liberale Tendenz, welche, ob-wohl mit Feuer, und Beredſamkeit, doch höchſt populär und allgemein verſtändlich verfolgt wird; auch beſchäftigt es ſich gern mit Literatur und Kunſt und giebt jedes Mal neben dem Urtheil Auszüge aus den beſprochenen Werken. Ferner liefert es von Zeit zu Zeit gute und intereſſante Holzſchnitte. Sein Abſatz beträgt 3000 Exemplare und iſt im Steigen begriffen.

The Sunday Times ward 1822 von einem Herrn Daniel Whittle Harvey gegründet, und kam ſo ſchnell in Flor, daß der Beſitzer dieſe Zeitung bereits nach einigen Jahren für 14000 Pf. St. wieder verkaufen konnte. Es wechſelte darauf mehrere Male Eigenthümer und Redakteur und ging von ſeinem früher behaupteten Juſte-Milieu zu eifrigem Liberalismus über. The Sunday Times ſteht in hoher Achtung bei dem Publicum; ſein Abſatz überſteigt die Zahl von 5000 Exemplaren.

Der John Bull, 1820 geſtiftet um die verſtorbene Königin Caroline auf alle nur erdenkliche Weiſe anzugreifen, erfüllte dieſen Auftrag ſo gut, daß er ſich den entſchiedenen Haß des Volkes, aber auch die lebhafteſte Protection der Ariſtokraten erwarb und außerordentlich ſchnell in Aufnahme kam. Allmälig ſtimmte er ſeinen ſchmähenden Ton um, und wandte ſich nach dem Tode der Königin anderen Intereſſen
zu. — In neueſter Zeit iſt dieſes Blatt der heftigſte Gegner der Reformer und der Vorkämpfer für Kirche und Regierung geworden. Unter ſeinen Mitarbeitern werden Theodore Hook, Croker und Mud-ford genannt. — Das Vortrefflichſte in demſelben ſind ſeine Hauptartikel (leading articles), ſonſt enthält es wenig Neues und zum größten Theil Inſerate. Im erſten Jahr nach ſeinem Erſcheinen hatte es 10,000 Abonnenten, eine Zahl, die ſich jedoch bis auf 6000 vermindert hat. Sein furchtbarſter Nebenbuhler unter den Londoner Wochenblättern iſt:

The Age, im Jahre 1825 geſtiftet und toryſtiſch geſinnt. Es wurde mit Witz und Scharfſinn redigirt, war oft perſönlich, und verwickelte ſich dadurch in viele Injurienprozeſſe, wodurch es natürlich allgemeines Aufſehen erregte und viele Leſer fand. — Später kam es in die Hände des Herrn Weſtma-cott, der es mit vielem Geiſt leitete und es ſo in die Höhe brachte, daß es ihm bald mit einem jährli-chen reinen Ertrag von 2000 Pfd. St. lohnte. Der Abſatz wird auf circa 9000 Exemplare geſchätzt.

The Satirist, wird in derſelben Weiſe redigirt wie das vorige Wochenblatt, iſt aber in ſeinen politiſchen Prinzipien demſelben durchaus entgegengeſetzt und entſchieden liberal, jedoch dabei vollkommen unpartheiiſch. Seine Aufſätze ſind mit Laune, Witz und Schärfe geſchrieben, mehr komiſch als boshaft, doch hält es ſich nicht von Perſönlichkeiten frei, und iſt daher oft, gleich den beiden vorigen, in Injurienprozeſſe verwickelt; ſein Abſatz ſoll ſich auf 4500 Exemplare belaufen und noch im Steigen ſein.

The News, entſtand ſchon 1805, und ward von den beiden Hunt geſtiftet; es war und iſt entſchieden radical. — Anfangs erfreute ſich dieſes Blatt des enormen Debits von 25000 Exemplaren; ſpäter aber, in andere Hände übergehend, gerieth es in ein fortwährendes Sinken, hat jetzt kaum 2000 Abnehmer, und ſcheint, trotz aller angewandten Mühe und Koſten, ſich nicht wieder heben zu können. Seine politiſchen Artikel ſind geiſtvoll und gut geſchrieben, die literariſchen dagegen ein Muſter von Seichtheit und Oberflächlichkeit.

Die bisher genannten ſind die vorzüglichſten, wöchentlich erſcheinenden, politiſchen Zeitungen; zu de-nen zweiten Ranges derſelben Klaſſe gehören noch folgende minder wichtige, auf deren kurze Angabe wir uns hier beſchränken wollen: The weekly true Sun ein mit dem Abendblatte the true Sun verbundenes Inſtitut; The County Chronicle, eine Art von Leſefrüchten, mit wenigen Originalartikeln, wird viel auf dem Lande geleſen; The London weekly Journal, ein dem vorigen verwandtes Blatt; the Mark Lane Express, eine Zeitung für den Landmann mit durchaus liberaler Politik; the Agriculturist ein für die Pächter u. ſ. w. beſtimmtes Journal, in ſeinen politiſchen Anſichten conſervativ geſinnt; the weekly Post, ein mit dem Morning post in Verbindung ſtehendes Blatt. Außer dieſen erſcheinen noch drei geiſtliche Zeitungen wöchentlich: the Patriot, das Organ der calviniſch-evangeliſchen Diſſenters, entſchieden liberal, the Christian Advocate, das Organ der liberaleren Wesley-Methodists, gemäßigt liberal und the Watchman das Organ der ſtrengen Wesley-Methodists, conſervativ. Endlich ſind hier noch das Court Journal, die Naval and Military Gazette und the United Service Gazette deren Zweck und Tendenz ſchon ihr Titel ausſpricht, zu erwähnen.

Der Geſammtabſatz der Londoner Tageblätter wird auf 60000; der der Wochenblätter auf 100,000, im Allem alſo auf 160,000 Exemplare angeſchlagen. In Hinſicht der Tendenz iſt das liberale Prinzip verhältnißmäßig das vorherrſchende, am wenigſten wird dagegen die conſervative Partei von den Zeitungen vertheidigt, da dieſer in Allem nur 11 Journale zu Gebote ſtehn.

Wir behalten uns vor, der Darſtellung der nicht politiſchen Zeitſchriften Londons, einem beſonderen Artikel zu widmen, der binnen Kurzem folgen ſoll.

The Image-man.

On the entire coast of England (which almost every tourist is familiar with) there is perhaps no part strewed with so many pretty objects and delightful watering-places, as the south; and especially the shores of Sussex, which, however, long previous to their being celebrated as the landing-place of that bold king, William the Conqueror, were often made the scenes of savage warfare between the more barbarous nations of the period. Amongst these spots of ancient renown, there is one worthy of every visitor's attention.

In a valley between two of the most lofty ranges of cliffs which skirt these shores for miles, — and so near the sea that the very thresholds of the houses are, in spring tides, washed by it, — lies the secluded little town of S——. Like many other places, it has felt the change of time and taste; for, a few years since it was not only a borough of some importance, but a bathing-place much frequented. Now, however, it is deprived of its parliamentary privilege, and visitors seem to prefer to its extensive beach and sands, the more lively shores of Brighton and Eastbourne, within a morning's drive of either of which it is situated. In approaching S—— from the fragrant and velvety downs, that, rising behind, shelter it from the north, there are several objects of interest; which from their being considered as the lions of the place, it is scarcely fair to pass over without notice.

First, the straggling and now almost tenantless village of B—, with its solitary sign of the Ploughshare, where entertainment might be had „for man and beast," and an honest old landlady met with in the person of Widow Walls. Poor old dame! it was in her neat parlour, over a dish of Sussex sausages, and a glass of Newhaven ale (so celebrated in the annals of John Barleycorn) that the materials of this story were collected. Perhaps the walls had often echoed with it before, for the widow seemed to have it all at her finger's end, and had known the dramatis personæ, from having occasionally accommodated their friends with a bed. Nor did she forget to tell you she had taken tea more than once in the oak-pannelled room, whereinto the reader is shortly to be introduced. The road hence to S—, lies through the churchyard of that place, where the vast number of tombstones would, at first sight, bespeak the spot unhealthy, and of great mortality. But whilst listening to the murmuring ocean at the foot almost of the spectator, he will soon resolve the sad enigma; or should his eye perchance roam to a distant corner of the burial-ground, it will fix upon one hillock larger than the rest. This is headed by a small slab, bearing the following melancholy inscription:— „Here lie interred the bodies of forty brave sailors, who in the night of the 22d of March 17—, in a heavy storm off this town, were shipwrecked on board the brig Ellen, when it is believed all hands perished." — And leaving the consecrated spot, to enter the town, — by the side of the road, in a small shrubbery of evergreens, which, with a row of lofty elms, shelters it from the rude gaze of strangers, stands a comfortable though old-looking manor-house. It is one of the best mansions in the place; and its gray smoke curling upwards to lose itself in the evening sky, with its latticed windows reflecting the golden light of sunset, serve the shepherds as a landmark, when, having penned up their flocks for the night, they come from the hills to take their evening meal in the bosom of their contented and industrious families.

This dwelling is now inhabited by a wealthy grazier; but twenty years ago it belonged to a middle-aged lady, who with an only daughter and two attached domestics, after having spent the greater part of her life in the heart of the city of London, retired thither, to end her declining days in seclusion and peace. — But it was not so ordained. —

It was on a lovely summer's night in June (from which our tale commences) that Mrs. and Miss Graham sat near the open window of a large oak-room up stairs (which had been fitted up as a drawing-room), listening to the faithful tide; and enjoying the breeze, which, from their vicinity to the sea, might be felt to freshen and cool the sultry air.

„Will you not finish your charming tale, my love? You know how delighted we were with it, and I long to hear its conclusion."

Dr. Johnson's Rasselas was in Emily's hand, half closed, and she raised it to her eyes as if to read; but she remained silent, looking towards the sea, and the book fell listlessly into her lap.

„Why, my child, my Emily — you have lost the page; — but let me see — I can find it — and I will read to you." With this the old lady took up the book, at the same time kissing her child's forehead. Happily, she saw not the tear stealing down Emily's cheek; happily! — for she had watched the glad gambols of her childhood, she had seen her ripen into womanhood without a cloud upon her brow, or a tear within her blue eyes, save when she spoke of him who was snatched from her just as her fond childish heart began to know and love a father.

„Emily, dear, why, what can be the matter? where are your spirits to-night? I must not see you thus. You walked too far on the beach to-day, and have tired yourself."

Emily was still silent, and seemed unconscious of her mother's solicitude, as, with strained eyes, she appeared to be watching some speck upon the sea. The sun was fast sinking below the watery horizon; and, by its golden light, in the distant offing, in a few seconds, an object could more plainly be perceived.

There was a ship riding at anchor; and Emily watched it which such anxiety, that her mother's curiosity was directed to the same quarter; but being unable to make it out without a telescope, she went to her boudoir for the glass, with which she at once obtained a clear view of the ship.

In an instant there was a flash. The vessel had fired a gun; and the report not only startled them, but Emily turned deathly pale, and, uttering a faint shriek, would have fallen from her chair, had not her mother, agitated as she herself was, been near to support her. Poor Emily's was, however, but a momentary unconsciousness, and a little water sprinkled on her face speedily recovered her. As Mrs. Graham was leading her from the window, she saw her eyes turned once more to the sea, and at that instant a boat put from the shore, which was soon lost sight of in the mist now gathering upon the water.

In crossing the room to the sofa, a letter fell from Emily's bosom. There was no agitation on her part to recover it, although it could not have escaped her mother's notice, nor could the blush which dyed Emily's face and neck do other than betray her. With eyes fixed on the ground, she saw her mother pick up the letter; and as she returned it to her daughter, suspicion for the first time flashed across the matron's mind.

It is impossible for any who have spent both infancy and childhood at home — who have looked up to and reverenced but one, and that one a parent — to disguise those feelings and emotions of the heart which once, and only once, in life can fix there.

It was even so with Emily Graham: — for to her nature dissimulation was a stranger; and that nature betrayed itself, as, looking in her mother's face, in a fond and faltering voice she begged her to take again the letter — to read it — to destroy it, if she wished — but to forgive her.

An appeal to such a mother as Mrs. Graham could not be in vain; who folding the trembling girl in her arms, all was for the moment forgotten. Shortly after this they parted for the night, and each sought her sleepless pillow.

When Mrs. Graham entered the breakfast-room next morning she found Emily already there, and occupied on the balcony with her flowers. Her earliest amusement was generally to take the telescope, and watch the little fishing-vessels bearing to land, laden with their finny treasures. On this morning, however, she had not used the glass, nor once had dared to look towards the sea. But her heart had told her the worst; for at intervals throughout the tedious night she had dreamt, that object was no longer to be seen; and as the sails bore its proud bow through the distant waters, she felt hopeless and forsaken.

The morning's salutation from mother to child was as affectionate as ever; and if Mrs. Graham's manner was at all altered, it had only become more sorrowful, for she could not entertain towards Emily the feelings of displeasure. She had in fact a true parent's heart, near which the devotion of her daughter had, like the ivy round the oak, been twining its earliest shoots; and but for the event of yesterday, the widow would indeed have felt happy. But, the letter, the unhappy letter — which she had read over and over again with the deepest regret — had thrown a cloud over poor Emily's prospects — and the mother feared, sooner or later, it might destroy them.

The next few days passed away but heavily at —— House; and with the hope that, by leaving S—— for a short time, it would again appear more cheerful, Mrs. Graham readily intrusted it, with all its little valuables and comforts, to the care of her old gardener and his wife — their only, but faithful domestics.

Brighton, however, and its thousand gaieties, did but little towards dissipating Emily Graham's sadness. Her aunt, whose circle of acquaintance was of the most attractive kind, neglected no opportunity of taking her into society; nor could she feel otherwise than disappointed, when she saw her solicitude on this point useless. Emily was ever by her side (for Mrs. Graham seldom accompanied them), and when compelled to leave it, as she sometimes was for the gay dance or to take her share in the musical performance of the night, Miss Oldham saw how painful such scenes were to her. To wean her heart from what it had intently fixed itself on, seemed impossible and cruel; and rather than weary her spirits longer with their present mode of life, Mrs. Graham at once took Emily back to S——; for those familiar objects around our homes can often restore the fading spirits, when gayer and brighter scenes tend only to depress them.

Autumn had now fled, and winter came and passed away. But neither time, nor home, brought to Emily what her mother prayed for. To her, alas! both night and day were tedious; till „hope deferred“ cankered the bud of health, and sickened for ever the too confiding heart.

Throughout this period, there was one whose name was held sacred — and that name, written by his hand, would have been to her a fresh existence — a proof that he yet lived.

But it came not — and day after day, month after month, did she turn from her window, where she had stood to watch the trusty postman on his rounds, in tears and disappointment. By the following spring, Emily Graham was so altered a creature, that none but those around her could have at first sight recognised her person. While nature had played upon her cheek, without the poison of neglected affection to mingle there its ashy hues, all was bright and beautiful; but now she lived a sick and broken-hearted girl. The head practitioner of S—— tried his skill in vain; and consoling poor Mrs. Graham with no assurance that her daughter was not consumptive, he advised her removal to Town, where other authorities might be consulted. This step was of course immediately adopted. By easy journeys, Mrs. and Miss Graham arrived in London, and very shortly afterwards took up their residence in Spring Gardens. — There, reader, must we for the present leave them. Your wish, no doubt, will be, that the life of poor Emily Graham may have had its charm renewed, and that her only parent may be blessed and comforted, by one whose love alone can sweeten her declining years. — —

Time, that faithful monitor of man, has kept upon the wing through ten of his chill winters, and it is on a fine evening in the early autumn of 1825, when our tale resumes itself.

But the scene is altogether changed. There is no expanse of ocean for the eye to roam over; — no beetling cliffs, nor lofty downs, to enhance the grandeur of our present scene. No, there will be found simply the fair and cultivated face of nature, studded here and there with a few cottages and modern villas, inhabited principally by retired tradesmen.

The house we are about to enter may be briefly described. It stands removed about fifty yards from the high western road, within twelve miles of Town, and is remarkable for its appearance of neatness and seclusion. It may, however, be more intimately recognised by a plain whitewashed front, with only four extremely narrow windows, like those found in almshouses; and by a good-sized flower-garden with lawn, between it and the road, from which it is greatly hidden by a row of tall and regular poplars.

It was on the evening just mentioned, when two elderly females were sitting at the parlour-window busied with their work; and in an old-fashioned chair, in a retired part of the room, a third figure might also be perceived, principally by her snow-white dress. But the features of this party could scarcely be distinguished, as it was nearly twilight.

The lady nearest the window appeared to be watching the garden-gate, which a servant, who had gone down to the adjacent village, had very carelessly left half open; but her attention seemed most awakened by some small white figures, peeping at the moment above it. The curiosity of this lady was changed to fear, as she heard heavy footsteps on the path; but especially so when the tall figure of a man presented himself directly in front of the window.

Her alarm, however, after a while subsided; for the stranger seemed only one of those harmless and wandering foreigners who earn a scanty pittance by hawking their images from place to place. After a few words, uttered with a deep voice, he lowered the heavy tray of casts from his head, to place it on a bench near the window; and, pointing to several of the busts, such as Milton's, Shakespeare's, etc., he begged the ladies, in the most beseeching manner, to purchase one of them.

The distinct, though melancholy tone, in which he pronounced the names of his earthy treasures, proved at once, that if an Italian, he had acquired a pure English accent; nor did his appearance altogether stamp the foreigner. His figure was unusually tall, and, in spite of the dirty and almost ragged suit he wore, commanding. A large leathern cap, stuck sideways on his head, showed a high and swarthy forehead, and from beneath it escaped a profusion of light hair, curling loosely down each side of his sun-burnt face. Although youth and health had fled his furrowed cheek, his full grey eyes gave to the whole a pleasing yet sorrowful expression.

So earnestly did the man endeavour to obtain custom, that the old ladies at length took compassion on him; and whilst one of them threw up the casement to select a cast, the other left the room, and returned immediately with a large horn of beer, and a plate full of cold meat and bread.

The man's eyes thanked her eloquently for her hospitality. He took the cup and hastily emptied it; for his parched and darkened lips betrayed his thirst.

The draught evidently revived him, and after partaking of the eatables, he inquired how far it was to London?

„My good man,“ answered one of the ladies, as she took a half-crown from her pocket to pay for a bust of Milton she had selected, „you are nearly twelve miles from London: it is now eight o'clock, and getting dark; you cannot walk so far to-night. Had you not better stop and sleep at the small inn at the end of the village? The old woman who keeps it will charge you very little for a bed; besides, here is an extra shilling to pay for it.“

The itinerant leaned against the window-sill; and as he took the money, his chest heaved heavily, and he drew his thin and yellow hand across his eyes, for tears stood in them.

The ladies felt for him, and listened.

„I had once strength in these limbs," said he, „and a heart that feared nothing. But now I am quite weary; I am indeed unable to go much further, for I have walked to day more than thirty miles, with this load upon my head, destitute of refreshment. Oh! a curse on my unhappy fate! — but it was my own seeking. Why did I first leave my home!"

This language of the stranger betrayed him. He evidently belonged not to those wandering tribes who come yearly to England for their bread, nor had he been always used to suffering and hardship.

Here he would have departed: — he was stooping for his load; but the compassion of his hearers had been won, and their interest so much excited that they questioned him further.

„Had he no friends in England, none who could protect him from want?" — He answered rather haughtily, and without disguise:

„Whilst my father lived, I wanted nothing. I was his only son, and he doated on me too much to embitter any moment of my life. But I became a wretch — yes, a wretch! While but a youth, heedless of his prayers and entreaties, I dashed so madly into the path of dissipation, that ere I learnt to reflect, it was too late! — — my prospects were all ruined, and I was homeless and a wanderer."

(To be concluded in our next.)

The Sabbath Morning.

How still the morning of the hallow'd day!
Mute is the voice of rural labour, hush'd
The ploughboy's whistle, and the milkmaid's song.
The scythe lies glitt'ring in the dewy wreath
Of tedded grass, mingled with fading flowers,
That yester-morn bloom'd waving in the breeze!
Sounds the most faint attract the ear — the hum
Of early bee, the trickling of the dew,
The distant bleating mid-way up the hill.
Calmness sits thron'd on yon unmoving cloud.
To him who wanders o'er the upland leas,
The blackbird's notes come mellower from the dales;
And sweeter from the sky the gladsome lark
Warbles his heaven-tuned song; the lulling brook
Murmurs more gently down the deep-worn glen;
While from yon lowly roof, whose curling smoke
O'ermounts the mist, is heard, at intervals,
The voice of psalms, the simple song of praise. —

Hail, Sabbath! thee I hail, the poor man's day!
On other days the man of toil is doom'd
To eat his joyless bread, lonely; the ground
Both seat and board; screen'd from the winter's cold
And summer's heat by neighbouring hedge or tree;
But on this day, embosom'd in his home,
He shares the frugal meal with those he loves;
With those he loves he shares the heartfelt joy
Of giving thanks to God, — not thanks of form,
A word and a grimace, but reverently,
With cover'd face, and upward earnest eye.

Hail, Sabbath! thee I hail, the poor man's day:
The pale mechanic now has leave to breathe
The morning air, pure from the city's smoke;
While wandering slowly up the river side,
He meditates on Him, whose power he marks
In each green tree that proudly spreads the bough
As in the tiny dew-bent flowers that bloom
Around it's root; and while he thus surveys,
With elevated joy, each rural charm,
He hopes, yet fears presumption in the hope,
That heaven may be one Sabbath without end.

GRAHAME.

Vom BRITISH MUSEUM erſcheint wöchentlich eine Nummer. Die Poſtämter verſenden die Nummern wöchentlich, die Buchhandlungen monatlich. — Abonnements-Preis für 26 Nummern oder 6 Monat 1 Thlr. 9 ſgr. Ein Abonnement unter 26 Nummern findet nicht Statt. Zu beziehen durch alle Buchhandlungen und Poſtämter.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

1838. N.ro 50.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

Boz.

Dieſen wunderlichen Namen führt ein engliſcher Schriftſteller vor ſeinen Werken, der eigentlich Charles Dickens heißt, noch in der Blüthe ſeiner Jahre ſteht, ſich dem Stande eines Rechtsgelehrten widmete, und Reporter *) bei einer engliſchen Zeitſchrift war. Dies iſt Alles, was bisher über ſeine Lebensverhältniſſe ſich ermitteln ließ, und wir verdanken ſelbſt dies Wenige nur der brieflichen Mittheilung eines in London lebenden gelehrten Freundes. — Dickens trat zuerſt in engliſchen Journalen, namentlich in The Library of Fiction mit kleinen aus dem Leben entlehnten Skizzen und Sittenſchilderungen auf, fand großen Beifall und verſuchte ſich dann in einer größeren Arbeit, Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club, welche in monatlichen Lieferungen nach Art einer Zeitung erſchien, von dem bekannten witzigen Zeichner Seymour mit Illuſtrationen, wie es die Engländer nennen, begleitet wurde und einen ſo reißenden Abſatz fand, daß der Verkauf die Zahl von dreißigtauſend Exemplaren überſtieg. — Außer dieſem Buche lieferte D. noch: Sketches illustrative of Every Day Life and Every Day People, the Memoirs of Joseph Grimaldi (des berühmten, kürzlich verſtorbenen engliſchen Clowns) und neuerlichſt the Life of J. Nickleby, von dem bis jetzt 7 Lieferungen erſchienen ſind.

Der faſt unglaubliche Beifall, den Dickens' Leiſtungen fanden, beruht auf der Wahrheit und Genauigkeit ſeiner Schilderungen, die das engliſche Leben, namentlich in den mittleren Kreiſen bis in die kleinſten Einzelnheiten verfolgen, dem äußerſt glücklichen Humor, der reichen Erfindung und geſchickten Verknüpfung der Situationen und der echten Herzlichkeit und Liebe zum Menſchengeſchlecht, die, trotz dem komiſchen Gewande, aus Allem, was er ſchreibt, hervorleuchtet und ſelbſt den poſſenhafteſten Characteren eine unverwüſtliche Liebenswürdigkeit verleiht. Darin, daß Boz zu gleicher Zeit das Herz zu rühren und den Verſtand zu beſchäftigen und zu ergötzen verſteht, und doch ſtets ſich innerhalb der Schranken der reellſten Wirklichkeit mit der größten Conſequenz bewegt, liegt eben der zauberhafte Reiz ſeiner Schriften und das Geheimniß ſeines Erfolgs.

---

*) So heißen die Berichterſtatter der Parlamentsverhandlungen für die engliſchen Zeitungen. Da ein ſolcher Poſten gründliche Kenntniſſe, Gewandtheit, Scharfſinn und Klugheit erfordert, ſo werden oft junge wiſſenſchaftlich gebildete und höchſt talentvolle Männer dazu genommen und ſehr gut honorirt. Der Reporter iſt gewöhnlich die erſte Stufe zum Redacteur eines politiſchen Journals.

The Tuggs's at Ramsgate.

By Boz.

Once upon a time, there dwelt, in a narrow street on the Surrey side of the water, within three minutes' walk of the old London Bridge, Mr. Joseph Tuggs — a little, dark-faced man, with shiny hair, twinkling eyes, short legs, and a body of very considerable thickness, measuring from the centre button of his waistcoat in front, to the ornamental buttons of his coat behind. The figure of the amiable Mrs. Tuggs, if not perfectly symmetrical was decidedly comfortable; and the form of her only daughter, the accomplished Miss Charlotte Tuggs, was fast ripening into that state of luxuriant plumpness, which had enchanted the eyes, and captivated the heart, of Mr. Joseph Tuggs in his earlier days. Mr Simon Tuggs, his only son, and Miss Charlotte Tuggs's only brother, was as differently formed in body, as he was differently constituted in mind, from the remainder of his family. There was that elongation in his thoughtful face, and that tendency to weakness in his interesting legs which tells so forcibly of a great mind and romantic disposition. The slightest traits of character in such a being, possess no mean interest for speculative minds. He usually appeared in public in capacious shoes, with black cotton stockings; and was observed to be particularly attached to a black glazed stock, without tie or ornament of any description.

There is perhaps no profession, however useful, no pursuit, however meritorious, which can escape the petty attacks of vulgar minds. Mr. Joseph Tuggs was a grocer. It might be supposed that a grocer was beyond the breath of calumny: but no, — the neighbours stigmatised him as a chandler; and the poisonous voice of envy distinctly asserted that he dispensed tea and coffee by the quartern, retailed sugar by the ounce, cheese by the slice, tobacco by the screw, and butter by the pat. These taunts, however, were lost upon the Tuggs's. Mr. Tuggs attended to the grocery department, Mrs. Tuggs to the cheese-mongery, and Miss Tuggs to her education. Mr. Simon Tuggs kept his father's books, and his own counsel.

One fine spring afternoon, the latter gentleman was seated on a tub of weekly Dorset behind the little red desk with a wooden rail, which ornamented a corner of the counter, when a stranger dismounted from a cab, and hastily entered the shop: he was habited in black cloth, and bore with him a green umbrella and a blue bag.

„Mr Tuggs?“ said the stranger, inquiringly.

„My name is Tuggs,“ replied Mr. Simon.

„It's the other Mr Tuggs,“ said the stranger, looking towards the glass door which led into the parlour behind the shop, and on the inside of which, the round face of Mr. Tuggs, senior, was distinctly visible, peeping over the curtain.

Mr. Simon gracefully waved his pen, as if in intimation of his wish that his father would advance, and Mr. Joseph Tuggs with considerable celerity removed his face from the curtain, and placed it before the stranger.

„I come from the Temple,“ said the man with the bag.

„From the Temple!“ said Mrs. Tuggs, flinging open the door of the little parlour, and disclosing Miss Tuggs in perspective.

„From the Temple!“ said Miss Tuggs and Mr. Simon Tuggs at the same moment.

„From the Temple!“ said Mr. Joseph Tuggs, turning as pale as a Dutch cheese.

„From the Temple,“ repeated the man with the bag; „from Mr. Cower's the solicitor's. Mr. Tuggs, I congratulate you, sir! Ladies, I wish you joy of your prosperity! We have been successful.“ And the man with the bag, leisurely divested himself of his umbrella and glove, as a preliminary to shaking hands with Mr. Joseph Tuggs.

Now the words „we have been successful,“ had no sooner issued from the mouth of the man with the bag, than Mr. Simon Tuggs rose from the tub of weekly Dorset, opened his eyes very wide, gasped for breath, made figures of eight in the air with his pen, and finally fell into the arms of his anxious mother, and fainted away, without the slightest ostensible cause or pretence.

„Water!“ screamed Mrs. Tuggs.

„Look up, my son,“ exclaimed Mr. Tuggs.

„Simon! Dear Simon!“ shrieked Miss Tuggs.

„I'm better now,“ said Mr. Simon Tuggs — „What! Successful!“ And then, as corroborative evidence of his being better, he fainted away again, and was borne into the little parlour by the united efforts of the remainder of the family and the man with the bag.

To a casual spectator, or to any one unacquainted with the position of the family, this fainting would have been unaccountable. To those who understood the mission of the man with the bag, and were moreover acquainted with the excitability of the nerves of Mr. Simon Tuggs, it was quite comprehensible. A long-pending lawsuit, respecting the validity of a will, had been unexpectedly decided; and Mr. Joseph Tuggs was the possessor of twenty thousand pounds.

A prolonged consultation took place that night in the little parlour — a consultation that was to settle the future destinies of the Tuggs's. The shop was shut up at an unusually early hour; and many were the unavailing kicks bestowed upon the closed door by applicants for quarterns of sugar, or half-quarterns of bread, or penn'orths of pepper, which were to have been „left till Saturday,“ but which fortune had decreed were to be left alone altogether.

„We must certainly give up business,“ said Miss Tuggs.

„Oh, decidedly,“ said Mrs. Tuggs.

„Simon shall go to the bar,“ said Mr. Joseph Tuggs.

„And I shall always sign myself ‚Cymon‘ in future,“ said his son.

„And I shall call myself Charlotta,“ said Miss Tuggs.

„And you must always call me ‚Ma,‘ and father ‚Pa,“ said Mrs. Tuggs.

„Yes, and Pa must leave off all his vulgar habits,“ interposed Miss Tuggs.

„I'll take care o' all that,“ responded Mr. Joseph Tuggs, complacently. — He was at that very moment eating pickled salmon with a pocket-knife.

„We must leave town immediately,“ said Mr. Cymon Tuggs.

Every body concurred that this was an indispensable preliminary to being genteel. The question then arose — Where should they go?

„Gravesend,“ mildly suggested Mr. Joseph Tuggs. The idea was unanimously scouted. Gravesend was low.

„Margate,“ insinuated Mrs. Tuggs. Worse and worse — nobody there but tradespeople.

„Brighton!“ Mr. Cymon Tuggs opposed an insurmountable objection. All the coaches had been upset in their turn within the last three weeks; each coach had averaged two passengers killed, and six wounded; and in every case the newspapers had distinctly understood that „no blame whatever was attributable to the coachman.“

„Ramsgate!“ ejaculated Mr. Cymon, thoughtfully. — To be sure: how stupid they must have been not to have thought of that before. Ramsgate was just the place of all others that they ought to go to.

Two months after this conversation, the City of London Ramsgate steamer was running gaily down the river. Her flag was flying, her band was playing, her passengers were conversing; every thing about her seemed gay and lively. — No wonder, the Tuggs's were on board.

„Charming, a'nt it?“ said Mr. Joseph Tuggs, in a bottlegreen greatcoat, with a velvet collar of the same, and a blue travelling cap with a gold band.

„Soul-inspiring,“ replied Mr. Cymon Tuggs — he was entered at the bar — „Soul-inspiring!“

„Delightful morning, sir,“ said a stoutish, military-looking gentleman in a blue surtout, buttoned up to his chin, and white trousers chained down to the soles of his boots.

Mr. Cymon Tuggs took upon himself the responsibility of answering the observation. „Heavenly!“ he replied.

„You are an enthusiastic admirer of the beauties of Nature, sir?“ said the military gentleman, deferentially.

„I am, sir,“ replied Mr. Cymon Tuggs. „Travelled much, sir?“ inquired the military gentleman.

„Not much,“ replied Mr. Cymon Tuggs. „You've been on the continent, of course?“ inquired the military gentleman.

„Not exactly,“ replied Mr. Cymon Tuggs, in a qualified tone, as if he wished it to be implied that he had gone half way and come back again.

„You of course intend your son to make the grand tour, sir?“ said the military gentleman, addressing Mr. Joseph Tuggs.

As Mr. Joseph Tuggs did not precisely understand what the grand tour was, or how such an article was manufactured, he replied, „Of course.“ Just as he said the word, there came tripping up from her seat at the stern of the vessel, a young lady in a puce-coloured silk cloak, and boots of the same, with long black ringlets, large black eyes, brief petticoats, and unexceptionable ankles.

„Walter, my dear,“ said the young lady to the military gentleman.

„Yes, Belinda, my love,“ responded the military gentleman to the black-eyed young lady.

„What have you left me alone so long for?“ said the young lady. „I have been stared out of countenance by those rude young men.“

„What! stared at!“ exclaimed the military gentleman, with an emphasis which made Mr. Cymon Tuggs withdraw his eyes from the young lady's face with inconceivable rapidity.

„Which young men — where?“ and the military gentleman clenched his fist, and glared fearfully on the cigar-smokers around.

„Be calm, Walter, I entreat,“ said the young lady.

„I won't,“ said the military gentleman.

„Do, sir,“ interposed Mr. Cymon Tuggs. „They a'nt worth notice.“

„No no—they are not indeed,“ urged the young lady.

„I will be calm,“ said the military gentleman. „You speak truly, sir. I thank you for a timely remonstrance, which may have spared me the guilt of manslaughter;“ and calming his wrath, the military gentleman wrung Mr. Cymon Tuggs by the hand.

„My sister, sir,“ said Mr. Cymon Tuggs; seeing that the military gentleman was casting an admiring look towards Miss Charlotta.

„My wife, ma'am — Mrs. Captain Waters,“ said the military gentleman, presenting the black-eyed young lady.

„My mother, ma'am — Mrs. Tuggs,“ said Mr. Cymon. The military gentleman and his wife murmured enchanting courtesies; and the Tuggs's looked as unembarrassed as they could.

„Walter, my dear,“ said the black-eyed young lady, after they had sat chatting with the Tuggs's some half hour.

„Yes, my love,“ said the military gentleman.

„Don't you think this gentleman (with an inclination of the head towards Mr. Cymon Tuggs) is very like the Marquis Carriwini.“

„God bless me, very!“ said the military gentleman.

„It struck me, the moment I saw him,“ said the young lady; gazing intently, and with a melancholy air, on the scarlet countenance of Mr. Cymon Tuggs. Mr. Cymon Tuggs looked at every body; and finding that every body was looking at him, appeared to feel some temporary difficulty in disposing of his eyesight.

„So exactly the air of the marquis,“ said the military gentleman.

„Quite extraordinary!“ sighed the military gentleman's lady.

„You don't know the marquis, sir?“ inquired the military gentleman.

Mr. Cymon Tuggs stammered a negative.

„If you did,“ continued Captain Walter Waters, „you would feel how much reason you have to be proud of the resemblance — a most elegant man, with a most prepossessing appearance.“

„He is — he is indeed!“ exclaimed Belinda Waters energetically; and as her eye caught that of Mr. Cymon Tuggs, she withdrew it from his features in bashful confusion.

All this was highly gratifying to the feelings of the Tuggs's; and when in the course of further conversation, it was discovered that Miss Charlotta Tuggs was the fac simile of a titled relative of Mrs. Belinda Waters; and that Mrs. Tuggs herself was the very picture of the Dowager Duchess of Dobbleton; their delight in the acquisition of so genteel and friendly an acquaintance, knew no bounds. Even the dignity of Captain Walter Waters relaxed to such a degree, that he suffered himself to be prevailed upon by Mr. Joseph Tuggs, to partake of cold pigeon-pie and sherry on deck; and a most delightful conversation, aided by these agreeable stimulants, was prolonged until they ran alongside Ramsgate Pier.

„Good by'e, dear!“ said Mrs. Captain Waters to Miss Charlotta Tuggs, just before the bustle of landing commenced; „we shall see you on the sands in the morning: and as we are sure to have found lodgings before then, I hope we shall be inseparables for many weeks to come.“

„Oh! I hope so,“ said Miss Charlotta Tuggs, emphatically.

„Tickets, ladies and gen'lm'n,“ said the man on the paddle-box.

„Want a porter, sir?“ inquired a dozen men in smockfrocks.

„Now, my dear—“ said Captain Waters.

„Good by'e,“ said Mrs. Captain Waters—„good by'e! Mr. Cymon!“ and with a pressure of the hand that threw the amiable young man's nerves into a state of considerable derangement, Mrs. Captain Waters disappeared among the crowd. A pair of puce-coloured boots were seen ascending the steps, a white handkerchief fluttered, a black eye gleamed: the Waters's were gone, and Mr. Cymon Tuggs was alone indeed.

Silently and abstractedly did that too sensitive youth follow his revered parents, and a train of smockfrocks and wheelbarrows, along the pier, until the bustle of the scene around recalled him to himself. The sun was shining brightly — the sea, dancing to its own music, rolled merrily in; crowds of people promenaded to and fro; young ladies tittered, old ladies talked, nursemaids displayed their charms to the greatest possible advantage, and their sweet little charges ran up and down, and to and fro, and in and out, under the feet, and between the legs of the assembled concourse, in the most playful and exhilarating manner possible. There were old gentlemen trying to make out objects through long telescopes, and young ones making objects of themselves in open shirt-collars; ladies carrying about portable chairs, and portable chairs carrying about invalids. Parties were waiting on the pier for parties who had come by the steam-boat; and nothing was to be heard but talking, laughing, welcoming, and merriment.

„Fly, sir?“ exclaimed a chorus of fourteen men and six boys, the moment that Mr. Joseph Tuggs, at the head of his little party, had set foot in the street.

„Here's the gen'lm'n at last!“ said one, touching his hat with mock politeness. „Werry glad to see you, sir—been waitin' for you these six weeks. Jump in, if you please, sir.“

„Nice light fly, and a fast trotter, sir,“ said another; „fourteen mile a hour, and surroundin' objects rendered inwisible by hextreme welocity!“

„Large fly for your luggage, sir,“ cried a third. „Werry large fly here, sir—reg'lar bluebottle!“

„Here's your fly, sir!“ shouted another aspiring charioteer, mounting the box, and inducing an old grey horse to indulge in some imperfect reminiscences of a canter. „Look at him, sir! —temper of a lamb and haction of a steam-ingin.“

Resisting even the temptation of securing the services of so valuable a quadruped as the last named, Mr. Joseph Tuggs beckoned to the proprietor of a dingy conveyance of a greenish hue, lined with faded striped calico; and the luggage and the family having been deposited therein, the animal in the shafts, after describing circles in the road for a quarter of an hour, at last consented to depart in quest of lodgings.

„How many beds have you got?“ screamed Mrs. Tuggs out of the fly, to the woman who opened the door of the first house, which displayed a bill, intimating that apartments were to be let within.

„How many did you want, ma'am?“ was of course the reply.

„Three.“

„Will you step in, ma'am?“ Down got Mrs. Tuggs. The family were delighted. Splendid view of the sea from the front windows—charming! A short pause. Back came Mrs. Tuggs again.—One parlour, and a mattress.

„Why the devil didn't they say so at first?“ inquired Mr. Joseph Tuggs, rather pettishly.

„Don't know,“ said Mrs. Tuggs.

„Wretches!“ exclaimed the nervous Cymon. Another hill — another stoppage. Same question — same answer — similar result.

„What do they mean by this?“ inquired Mr. Joseph Tuggs, thoroughly out of temper.

„Don't know,“ said the placid Mrs. Tuggs.

„Gevin the vay here, sir,“ said the driver, by way of accounting for the circumstance in a satisfactory manner; and off they went again, to make fresh inquiries, and encounter fresh disappointments.

It had grown dusk when the „fly“ — the rate of whose progress greatly belied its name — after climbing up four or five perpendicular hills, stopped before the door of a dusty house, with a bay window, from which you could obtain a beautiful glimpse of the sea — if you thrust half your body out of it, at the imminent peril of falling into the area. Mrs. Tuggs alighted.

(To be continued in our next.)

The Image-man.

(Concluded from our last.)

Having uttered this, the stranger's agony betrayed its truth and he abruptly paused.

„But your friends cannot all be lost to you!“ exclaimed the elder of the two ladies, as she concealed her aged and tearful eyes with her handkerchief.

„Yes, they must all be dead, and she—“ here his voice faltered, „she must be dead also: she, whom I nightly prayed for, is lost, lost to me for ever.---Yes, there was one, whose voice and image were once always with me, and I worshipped them! Our lives were so connected, from the first moment of meeting, that unless we breathed the same air, and watched the sun rise and set together, our days were lonely, and our nights wretched. At last, a sudden impulse of my temper separated us, and I fled from England's happy shores and from her—but still with a promise to return.

„I found myself shortly afterwards in Paris. Its gaieties consumed all my means, and I conceived that fatal passion which has brought me to what I am—gambling. In indulging it, I found myself eternally disgraced, and under that disgrace I tried to stifle what I felt. I prayed, I swore, to think of her no more! The oath itself made me faithless, and I deserted her!

„After two miserable years spent wholly in the haunts of dissipation, I came back to my native land. Here, though I deserved it not, fortune awaited me; and oh! how wickedly did I squander it!“

„But did you not still love the poor girl you had deserted?“

The man answered not.

„Go to her; ask her forgiveness, at least. Perhaps she yet lives; and it would make her happy to forgive you.“

„Oh, no, madam — that cannot be. I had no sooner landed in England, than with hurried steps I sought out the spot we had once called our own, thinking to see her walking there alone — for I heard that her love for me still continued, although I was worthless of it — but she was not there. In the suspense of such an hour, I paced the few streets of the town which was so well known to me. But amongst the many strangers there (for my long absence had made them such), I searched for her in vain. At length I reached her home, the doors of which I had never entered, for our meetings had been all clandestine; but I had watched her enter them, and every object was dearly familiar to me. Whilst I stood there a carriage stopped at the gate; the door opened, and I saw — oh, heavens! not her — but one belonging to her, in the deepest mourning. She wore the black dress of sorrow, as I with a sickly fancy concluded, for a child whom I had sacrificed. That thought, that conviction, went to my brain; upon the earth I sank senseless; and when I dared to raise myself from it, I fixed for a moment my swimming eyes upon the house — upon the window — her window — and from the spot I rushed into the dreary distance, and never saw it more. Oh! had she been spared but to have heard me ask forgiveness; though my presence must have poisoned the pure air about her, it would have been one of the most blessed moments of my life!“

„And where, my poor man, did you then bend your steps?“

„To London, madam — to that sink of infamy. The victim of sorrow and despair, the black clouds of the fate hung so densely around me, that I could not penetrate them. My old passion of gaming sprung up with tenfold violence; and enabled to feed it still further, by the considerable fortune left me by my poor father (whose eyes death had closed, whilst I was roving in other lands), I plunged at once into its deepest gulph. This fortune was indeed to me a bane; for it led me into the society of men of fashion, who associated with me on account of it alone; and whilst my gold lasted, they made me the toast, the god of their midnight revels. But the flattery and hollowness of my depraved associates, instead of gratifying me, made me hate myself the more; and this hatred I tried to foster by intoxication into revenge.“

„Unfortunate man,“ exclaimed one of the ladies, „who could deserve your revenge?“

„Myself! no other than myself. Oftentimes in a phrenzied state from drinking, as I watched the lamps of mirth burn down into their sockets, I have vowed to sate that revenge — by my own hand — by suicide.“

A sigh of pity here escaped the lips of those who listened.

„But (continued he) the guilty are but cowards — for as often as I advanced a few steps nearer my end, have I shrunk back from it, appalled.“

„How long did you continue such a life?“

„So long as the last shilling of my fortune remained — although, in those scenes of guilt, the film has fallen at moments from my eyes, that I might see once more her fading image — her wraith — her warning wraith — beckoning me away! But what did I see? the same bright face and form? — Its appearance haunts me still! Her figure was the same — her features were the same — and she moved as a thing of life. But — oh, horrible to tell! — reason had fled that noble mind. She stood before me in my visions a maniac!“

The agitated man again paused, and passed his feverish hand over his brow, whilst his hearers sat trembling and silent.

He shortly resumed.

„But my revelry at length was at an end. Her spectre had not scared me from those scenes; for I sought them till they vanished from me and left me to starve.

„So used was I to misery, that I bore against it long — until nature grew importunate; and to satisfy her I begged — though it almost choked me — first of midnight friends. But they, all of them, were poor, they said, and could not give: — then in the open streets of London did I ask for bread; whilst, through many a winter's night, have I wanted shelter from the benumbing cold and snow, and, worn to the last thread of strength, sunk senseless at a door, where I have slept till some pitying stranger has awakened and relieved me.

„One morning I was furnished with a warm and plentiful meal; and the kind man who fed me urged me to seek some plan of earning my bread. I did so. I seized on the first, though the most wretched means of life which offered — my present vocation.

„Through every part of England have I travelled with this heavy tray; and the more toil I could have well endured with her bright smile to cheer me on — but she is lost to me for ever, and I am hopeless! One day, well I remember it! on my way back to Town to procure more images from an Italian who made them there, I came accidentally on a large house, and having but one figure left, I knocked recklessly at the door — for I was hungry and would have parted with it for a slice of bread, having that day tasted nothing. The servant who answered my unwelcome summons, abused me for my impudence, and tried to thrust me away, threatening to set his mastiff on me if I remained there longer. I stood in anger, and could have struck him to the earth, as a recollection of the past flashed on my mind. The house, whose doors were closed against me — the servant, who had thrust me from them — and the dog that might have torn these wearied limbs — were all — but a few short years since — my father's; and would have been his son's, but for the accursed passion which had robbed him of them.

„With hasty paces, for my eyes could not bear its recognition, I left that painful spot, and as I passed the silver stream, and the green wood, which had been the chosen haunts of my boyhood, I felt, what peace it would have been to end my galled life near them.“

The wretched man's history was now told: and, sinking on the seat near the window, he buried his face within his freckled hands, and gave free vent to long-suppressed tears. But a further trial yet awaited him; the greatest and the saddest of them all; how little dreamt he of it!

The night by this had closed in, and the dews fell chill and heavily, as the image-man rose suddenly from his seat, anxious, for that night at least, to procure some place of rest. With this view he tried to raise the load upon his head, but so feeble was he that he was obliged to rest it some moments on his arm. Ere he left the spot, his look was turned in gratitude towards his benefactors, who could now be distinctly seen by the lights which the servant at that instant brought into the room. — The stranger's eyes seemed fixed: some indistinct words fell from his lips; he would have spoken, but the effort was too mighty for him. Nought could have moved him from the spot — he stood there as it were spell-bound. What had so arrested his glance? Something as colourless and speechless as a statue. As it moved unconsciously towards the light, a full glare fell upon it.—The man at length instinctively approached a glass-door that opened into the parlour. He unclosed it---one foot was already in the room: he would have sprung forward, and touched the uplifted hand of that figure, which seemed scarce earthly, but for a shriek that pierced his very soul---so loud, so appalling was it, as it burst from the broken heart of this realization of the wanderer's vision. Yes, it was she—now a poor maniac—but once the loved, the deserted Emily Graham.

In that sad moment have they met again. Reason, that had taken flight from her fast-withering form, returned for one instant, whilst she uttered, for the last time on this side her grave, the branded yet still loved name of HENRY MONTAGUE.

Where is the stranger now? Is he bending over that drooping flower, which had wanted but his cherishing, to bloom on in happiness? Is he chafing her stony hands till the ebb of life reflows?—till those eyes have lost their glassy stare, and behold him once again?

No—he is lost in the darkness of the night---There lie his broken images---but he has fled.

Did you ever, reader,—in passing up that lane of bustle and banking-houses, Lombardstreet, notice,---near the centre of it, a church?---its name you may easily make out by a London Guide. If so, let the tale you have just perused, induce you to worship your Creator there next Sunday. And as you bend your humble knee, remember that you are in the house of death,---that numbers are entombed beneath your feet, some of whom, perhaps, you have known and spoken with.

There are, however, two graves, side by side, in the middle aisle of the church, that may perhaps arrest your eye. The step of man has worn away some of the letters; but with a little care you may readily make out the name of the two Emily Grahams, mother and child. The younger, through the mercy of heaven, was carried to the tomb first; and the mouldering hand of time could have destroyed but little of the lineaments of the child, when, by the same mercy, the mother followed.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 51.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Tuggs's at Ramsgate.

By Boz.

(Concluded from our last.)

One ground-floor sitting-room, and three cells with beds in them up stairs—a double house—family on the opposite side—five children milk-and-watering in the parlour, and one dear little boy, expelled for bad behaviour, screaming on his back in the passage.

„What's the terms?“ said Mrs. Tuggs. The mistress of the house was deliberating on the expediency of putting on an extra guinea; so she coughed slightly, and affected not to hear the question.

„What's the terms?“ said Mrs. Tuggs, in a louder key.

„Five guineas a week, ma'am, with attendance,“ replied the lodging-house keeper. (Attendance means the privilege of ringing the bell as often as you like, for your own personal amusement.)

„Rather dear,“ said Mrs. Tuggs.

„Oh dear, no, ma'am,“ replied the mistress of the house, with a benign smile of pity at the ignorance of manners and customs, which the observation betrayed. „Very cheap.“

Such an authority was indisputable. Mrs. Tuggs paid a week's rent in advance, and took the lodging for a month. In an hour's time, the family were seated at tea in their new abode.

„Capital srimps!“ said Mr. Joseph Tuggs.

Mr. Cymon eyed his father with a rebellious scowl, as he emphatically said „Shrimps.“

„Well then, shrimps,“ said Mr. Joseph Tuggs, „srimps or shrimps, don't much matter.“

There was pity, blended with malignity, in Mr. Cymon's eye, as he replied. „Don't matter, father! What would Captain Waters say, if he heard such vulgarity!“

„Or what would dear Mrs. Captain Waters say,“ added Charlotta, „if she saw mother—ma, I mean—eating them whole, heads and all!“

„It won't bear thinking of!“ ejaculated Mr. Cymon, with a shudder. „How different,“ he thought, „from the Dowager Duchess of Dubbleton!“

„Very pretty woman, Mrs. Captain Waters, is she not, Cymon?“ inquired Miss Charlotta.

A glow of nervous excitement passed over the countenance of Mr. Cymon Tuggs, as he replied, „An angel of beauty!“

„Hallo!“ said Mr. Joseph Tuggs, „Hallo, Cymon my boy, take care—married lady you know;“ and he winked one of his twinkling eyes, knowingly.

„Why,“ exclaimed Cymon, starting up with an ebullition of fury, as unexpected as alarming, „Why am I to be reminded of that blight of my happiness, and ruin of my hopes! Why am I to be taunted with the miseries which are heaped upon my head! Is it not enough to—to—to—!“

and the orator paused; but whether for want of words, or lack of breath, was never distinctly ascertained.

There was an impressive solemnity in the tone of this address, and in the air with which the romantic Cymon at its conclusion rang the bell, and demanded a flat candlestick, which effectually forbade a reply. He stalked dramatically to bed, and the Tuggs's went to bed too, half an hour afterwards, in a state of considerable mystification and perplexity.

If the pier had presented a scene of life and bustle to the Tuggs's on their first landing at Ramsgate, it was far surpassed by the appearance of the sands on the morning after their arrival. It was a fine, bright, clear day, with a light breeze from the sea. There were the same ladies and gentlemen, the same children, the same nursemaids, the same telescopes, the same portable chairs; the ladies were employed in needlework, or watch-guard making, or knitting, or reading novels: the gentlemen were reading newspapers and magazines, the children were digging holes in the sand with wooden spades, and collecting water therein: the nursemaids with their youngest charges in arms, were running back with the waves after them: and now and then a little sailing-boat either departed with a gay and talkative cargo of passengers, or returned with a very silent, and particularly uncomfortable-looking one.

„Well, I never!" exclaimed Mrs. Tuggs, as she and Mr. Joseph Tuggs, and Miss Charlotta Tuggs, and Mr. Cymon Tuggs, with their eight feet in a corresponding number of yellow shoes, seated themselves on four rush-bottomed chairs which, being placed in a soft part of the sand, forthwith sunk down some two feet and a half.— „Well, I never!"

Mr. Cymon, by an exertion of great personal strength, uprooted the chairs, and removed them further back.

„Why, I'm bless'd if there a'nt some ladies a-going in!" exclaimed Mr. Joseph Tuggs, with intense astonishment.

„Lor pa!" exclaimed Miss Charlotta.

„There is! my dear," said Mr. Joseph Tuggs. And, sure enough, four young ladies, each furnished with a towel, tripped up the steps of a bathing machine; in went the horse, floundering about in the water: round turned the machine, down sat the driver, and presently out burst the young ladies aforesaid, with four distinct splashes.

„Well, that's sing'ler, too," ejaculated Mr. Joseph Tuggs, after an awkward pause. Mr. Cymon coughed slightly.

„Why, here's some gentlemen a-going in on this side," exclaimed Mrs. Tuggs, in a tone of horror.

Three machines — three horses — three flounderings — three turning round — three splashes — three gentlemen, disporting themselves in the water, like so many dolphins.

„Well, that's sing'ler," said Mr. Joseph Tuggs again. Miss Charlotta coughed this time, and another pause ensued. It was agreeably broken.

„How d'ye do, dear? We have been looking for you all the morning," said a voice to Miss Charlotta Tuggs. Mrs. Captain Waters was the owner of it.

„How d'ye do?" said Captain Walter Waters, all suavity: and a most cordial interchange of greeting ensued.

„Belinda, my love," said Captain Walter Waters, applying his glass to his eye, and looking in the direction of the sea.

„Yes, my dear," replied Mrs. Captain Waters.

„There's Harry Thompson."

„Where?" said Belinda, applying her glass to her eye.

„Bathing."

„Lor, so it is! He don't see us, does he?"

„No, I don't think he does," replied the captain. — „Bless my soul, how very singular!"

„What?" inquired Belinda.

„There's Mary Golding, too."

„Lor! — where?" (Up went the glass again.)

„There," said the captain, pointing to one of the young ladies before noticed, who, in her bathing costume, looked as if she were enveloped in a patent Mackintosh, of scanty dimensions.

„So it is, I declare!" exclaimed Mrs. Captain

Waters. — „How very curious we should see them both!“

„Very,“ said the captain, with perfect coolness.

„It's the reg'lar thing here, you see,“ whispered Mr. Cymon Tuggs to his father.

„I see it is,“ whispered Mr. Joseph Tuggs in reply. „Queer though—an't it?“ Mr. Cymon Tuggs nodded assent.

„What do you think of doing with yourselves this morning?“ inquired the captain. — „Shall we lunch at Pegwell?“

„I should like that very much indeed,“ interposed Mrs. Tuggs. She had never heard of Pegwell before; but the word „lunch“ had reached her ears, and it sounded very agreeably.

„How shall we go?“ inquired the captain; „it's too warm to walk.“

„A shay?“ suggested Mr. Joseph Tuggs.

„Chaise,“ whispered Mr. Cymon.

„I should think one would be enough,“ said Joseph Tuggs aloud, quite unconscious of the meaning of the correction. „However, two shays, if you like.“

„I should like a donkey so much,“ said Belinda.

„Oh, so should I!“ echoed Charlotta Tuggs.

„Well, we can have a fly,“ suggested the captain, „and you can have a couple of donkeys.“

A fresh difficulty arose. Mrs. Captain Waters declared it would be decidedly improper for two ladies to ride alone. The remedy was obvious. Perhaps young Mr. Tuggs would be gallant enough to accompany them.

Mr. Cymon Tuggs blushed, smiled, looked vacant, and faintly protested he was no horseman. The objection was at once overruled. A fly was speedily found; and three donkeys — which the proprietor declared on his solemn asseveration to be „three parts blood, and the other corn“ — were engaged in the service.

„Kum up!“ shouted one of the two boys who followed behind to propel the donkeys, when Belinda Waters and Charlotta Tuggs had been hoisted, and pushed, and pulled into their respective saddles.

„Hi — hi — hi!“ groaned the other boy behind Mr. Cymon Tuggs. Away went the donkey, with the stirrups jingling against the heels of Cymon's boots nearly scraping the ground.

„Way — way! Wo—o—o—o—!“ cried Mr. Cymon Tuggs as well as he could, in the midst of the jolting.

„Don't make it gallop!“ screamed Mrs. Captain Waters, behind.

„My donkey will go into the public-house!“ shrieked Miss Tuggs, in the rear.

„Hi — hi — hi!“ groaned both the boys together; and on went the donkeys as if nothing would ever stop them.

Every thing has an end, however; and even the galloping of donkeys will cease in time. The animal which Mr. Cymon Tuggs bestrode, feeling sundry uncomfortable tugs at the bit, the object of which he could by no means understand, abruptly sided against a brick wall, and expressed his uneasiness by grinding Mr. Cymon Tuggs's leg on the rough surface. Mrs. Captain Waters's donkey, apparently under the influence of some playfulness of spirit, rushed suddenly, head first, into a hedge, and declined to come out again: and the quadruped on which Miss Tuggs was mounted expressed his delight at this humorous proceeding by firmly planting his fore-feet against the ground, and kicking up his hind-legs in a very agile, but somewhat alarming manner.

This abrupt termination to the rapidity of the ride naturally occasioned some confusion. Both the ladies indulged in vehement screaming for several minutes; and Mr. Cymon Tuggs, besides sustaining intense bodily pain, had the additional mental anguish of witnessing their distressing situation, without the power to rescue them, by reason of his leg being firmly screwed in, between the animal and the wall. The efforts of the boys, however, assisted by the ingenious expedient of twisting the tail of the most rebellious donkey, restored order in a much shorter time than could have reasonably been expected, and the little party jogged slowly on together.

„Now let'em walk,“ said Mr. Cymon Tuggs. „It's cruel to over-drive 'em.“

„Werry well, sir,“ replied the boy, with a grin at his companion, as if he understood Mr. Cymon to mean that the cruelty applied less to the animals than to their riders.

„What a lovely day, dear!“ said Charlotta.

„Charming, enchanting, dear!“ responded Mrs. Captain Waters. „What a beautiful prospect, Mr. Tuggs!“

Cymon looked full in Belinda's face, as he responded — „Beautiful, indeed!“ The lady cast down her eyes, and suffered the animal she was riding to fall a little back. Cymon Tuggs instinctively did the same.

There was a brief silence, broken only by a sigh from Mr. Cymon Tuggs.

„Mr. Cymon,“ said the lady suddenly, in a low tone, „Mr. Cymon — I am another's.“

Mr. Cymon expressed his perfect concurrence in a statement which it was quite impossible to controvert.

„If I had not been,“ — resumed Belinda; and there she stopped.

„What — what?“ said Mr. Cymon earnestly. „Do not torture me. What would you say?“

„If I had not been“ — continued Mrs. Captain Waters — „If in earlier life, it had been my fate to have known, and been beloved by a noble youth — a kindred soul — a congenial spirit — one capable of feeling and appreciating the sentiments which —“

„Heavens! what do I hear?“ exclaimed Mr. Cymon Tuggs. „Is it possible! can I believe my — Come up.“ (This last unsentimental parenthesis was addressed to the donkey, who with his head between his fore-legs, appeared to be examining the state of his shoes with great anxiety.)

„Hi — hi — hi,“ said the boys behind. „Come up,“ expostulated Cymon Tuggs again. „Hi — hi — hi,“ repeated the boys: and whether it was that the animal felt indignant at the tone of Mr. Tuggs's command, or alarmed by the noise of the deputy proprietor's boots running behind him, or whether he burned with a noble emulation to outstrip the other donkeys, certain it is that he no sooner heard the second series of „hi — hi's,“ than he started away with a celerity of pace which jerked Mr. Cymon's hat off instantaneously, and carried him to the Pegwell Bay hotel in no time, where he deposited his rider without giving him the trouble of dismounting, by sagaciously pitching him over his head, into the very door of the tavern.

Great was the confusion of Mr. Cymon Tuggs, when he was set right end uppermost by two waiters; considerable was the alarm of Mrs. Tuggs in behalf of her son; and agonizing were the apprehensions of Mrs. Captain Waters on his account. It was speedily discovered, however, that he had not sustained much more injury than the donkey — he was grazed, and the animal was grazing — and then it was a delightful party to be sure! Mr. and Mrs. Tuggs, and the captain, had ordered lunch in the little garden behind: — small saucers of large shrimps, dabs of butter, crusty loaves, and bottled ale. The sky was without a cloud, there were flower-pots and turf before them; and the sea at the foot of the cliff, stretching away as far as the eye could discern any thing at all, and vessels in the distance with sails as white, and as small, as nicely got-up cambric handkerchiefs. The shrimps were delightful, the ale better, and the captain even more pleasant than either. Mrs. Captain Waters was in such spirits after lunch; chasing, first the captain across the turf, and among the flower-pots, and then Mr. Cymon Tuggs, and then Miss Tuggs, laughing too, quite boisterously. But as the captain said, it didn't matter; who knew what they were, there? For all the people of the house knew, they might be common people. To which Mr. Joseph Tuggs responded, „To be sure,“ and then they went down the steep wooden steps a little farther on, which lead to the bottom of the cliff, and looked at the crabs, and the seaweed, and the eels, till it was more than fully time to go back to Ramsgate again, and finally Mr. Cymon Tuggs ascended the steps last, and Mrs. Captain Waters last but one: and Mr. Cymon Tuggs discovered that the foot and ankle of Mrs. Captain Waters, were even more unexceptionable than he had at first supposed.

Taking a donkey towards his ordinary place of residence, is a very different thing, and a feat much more easily to be accomplished, than taking him from it: it requires a great deal of foresight and presence of mind in the one case, to anticipate the numerous flights of his discursive imagination; while in the other, all you have to do is to hold on, and place a blind confidence in the animal. Mr. Cymon Tuggs adopted the latter expedient on his return; and his nerves were so little discomposed by the journey, that he distinctly understood they were all to meet again at the library in the evening.

The library was crowded. There were the same ladies and the same gentlemen that had been on the sands in the morning, and on the pier the day before. There were young ladies in maroon-coloured gowns and black velvet bracelets, dispensing fancy articles in the shop, and presiding over games of chance in the concert-room. There were marriageable daughters, and marriage-making mammas, gaming, and promenading, and turning over music, and flirting. There were some male beaux doing the sentimental in whispers, and others doing the ferocious in mustaches. There were Mrs. Tuggs in amber, Miss Tuggs in sky-blue, and Mrs. Captain Waters in pink. There was Captain Waters in a braided surtout: there was Mr. Cymon Tuggs in pumps, and a gilt waistcoat; and moreover, there was Mr. Joseph Tuggs in a blue coat, and a shirt-frill.

„Number three, eight, and eleven,“ cried one of the young ladies in maroon-coloured gowns.

„Number three, eight, and eleven,“ echoed another young lady in the same uniform.

„Number three's gone,“ said the first young lady. „Number eight and eleven.“

„Number eight and eleven,“ echoed the second young lady.

„Number eight's gone, Mary Ann,“ said the first young lady.

„Number eleven,“ screamed the second.

„The numbers are all taken now, Ladies, if you please,“ said the first; and the representatives of numbers three, eight, and eleven, and the rest of the numbers, crowded round the table.

„Will you throw, ma'am?“ said the presiding goddess, handing the dice-box to the eldest daughter of a stout lady, with four girls.

There was a profound silence among the lookers-on.

„Throw, Jane, my dear,“ said the stout lady — an interesting display of bashfulness — a little blushing in a cambric handkerchief — a whispering to a younger sister.

„Amelia, my dear, throw for your sister,“ said the stout lady; and then she turned to a walking advertisement of Rowland's Macassar, who stood next her, and said, „Jane is so very modest and retiring; but I can't be angry with her for it. An artless and unsophisticated girl is so truly amiable, that I often wish Amelia was more like her sister.“

The gentleman with the whiskers, whispered his admiring approval; and the artless young lady glanced across, to observe the effect of her most unqualified simplicity.

„Now, my dear!“ said the stout lady. Miss Amelia threw — eight for her sister, ten for herself.

„Nice figure, Amelia,“ whispered the stout lady, to a thin youth beside her.

„Beautiful!“

„And such a spirit. I am like you in that respect. I can not help admiring that life and vivacity. Ah! (a sigh) I wish I could make poor Jane a little more like my dear Amelia!“

The young gentleman cordially acquiesced in the sentiment: and both he, and the individual first addressed, were perfectly contented.

„Who's this?“ inquired Mr. Cymon Tuggs of Mrs. Captain Waters, as a short female, in a blue velvet hat and feathers, was led into the orchestra, by a fat man in black tights, and cloudy Berlins.

„Mrs. Tippin, of the London theatres,“ replied Belinda, referring to the programme of the concert.

(To be concluded in our next.)

Grave Doings.

My gentle reader — start not at learning that I have been, in my time, a RESURRECTIONIST. Let not this appalling word, this humiliating confession, conjure up in your fancy a throng of vampire-like images and associations, or earn your „Physician's“ dismissal from your hearts and hearths. It is your own groundless fears, my fair trembler! — your own superstitious prejudices — that have driven me, and will drive many others of my brethren, to such dreadful doings as those hereafter detailed. Come, come, let us have one word of reason between us on the abstract question — and then for my tale. You expect us to cure you of disease, and yet deny us the only means of learning how? You would have us bring you the ore of skill and experience, yet forbid us to break the soil, or sink a shaft! Is this fair, fair reader? Is this reasonable?

What I am now going to describe was my first and last exploit in the way of body-stealing. It was a grotesque, if not a ludicrous scene, and occurred during the period of my „walking the hospitals,“ as it is called, which occupied the two seasons immediately after my leaving Cambridge. A young, and rather interesting female was admitted a patient at the hospital I attended; her case baffled all our skill, and her symptoms even defied diagnosis. Now, it seemed an enlargement of the heart — now, an ossification — then this, that, and the other; and, at last, it was plain we knew nothing at all about the matter — no, not even whether her disorder was organic or functional, primary or symptomatic — or whether it was really the heart that was at fault. She received no benefit at all under the fluctuating schemes of treatment we pursued, and, at length, fell into dying circumstances. As soon as her friends were apprized of her situation, and had an inkling of our intention to open the body, they insisted on removing her immediately to the hospital, that she might „die at home.“ In vain did Sir —— and his dressers expostulate vehemently with them, and represent, in exaggerated terms, the imminent peril attending such a step. Her two brothers avowed their apprehension of our designs, and were inflexible in exercising their right of removing their sister. I used all my rhetoric on the occasion, but in vain; and, at last, said to the young men, „Well, if you are afraid only of our dissecting her, we can get hold of her, if we are so disposed, as easily if she die with you as with us.“

„Well — we'll try that, measter,“ replied the elder, while his Herculean fist oscillated somewhat significantly before my eyes. The poor girl was removed accordingly to her father's house, which was at a certain village, about five miles from London, and survived her arrival scarcely ten minutes! We soon contrived to receive intelligence of the event; and as I and Sir —'s two dressers had taken great interest in the case throughout, and felt intense curiosity about the real nature of the disease, we met together and entered into a solemn compact, that, come what might, we would have her body out of the ground. A trusty spy informed us of the time, and exact place of the girl's burial; and on expressing to Sir —— our determination about the matter, he patted me on the back, saying, „Ah, my fine fellow! — if you have sense enough — dangerous,“ etc. etc. Was it not skilfully said? The Baronet further told us, he felt himself so curious about the matter, that if fifty pounds would be of use to us in furthering our purpose, they were at our service. It needed not this, nor a glance at the éclat with which the successful issue of the affair would be attended among our fellow students, to spur our resolves.

The notable scheme was finally adjusted at my rooms in the Borough. M —— and E ——, Sir ——'s dressers, and myself, with an experienced „grab“ — that is to say, a professional resurrectionist — were to set off from the Borough about nine o'clock the next evening — which would be the third day after the burial — in a glass coach, provided with all „appliances and means to boot.“ During the day, however, our friend, the grab, suffered so severely from an overnight's excess, as to disappoint us of his invaluable assistance. This unexpected contretemps nearly put an end to our project; for the few other grabs we knew, were absent on professional tours! Luckily, however, I bethought me of a poor Irish porter — a sort of „ne'er-do-weel" hanger-on at the hospital — whom I had several times hired to go on errands. This man I sent for to my rooms, and, in the presence of my two coadjutors, persuaded, threatened, and bothered him into acquiescence, promising him half-a-guinea for his evening's work — and as much whisky as he could drink prudently. As Mr. Tip — that was the name he went by — had some personal acquaintance with the sick grab, he succeeded in borrowing his chief tools; with which, in a sack large enough to contain our expected prize, he repaired to my rooms about nine o'clock, while the coach was standing at the door. Our Jehu had received a quiet douceur in addition to the hire of himself and coach. As soon as we had exhibited sundry doses of Irish cordial to our friend Tip — under the effects of which he became quite „bouncible," and vaunted about the feat he was to take a prominent part in — and equipped ourselves in our worst clothes, and white topcoats, we entered the vehicle — four in number — and drove off. The weather had been exceedingly capricious all the evening — moonlight, rain, thunder, and lightning, fitfully alternating. The only thing we were anxious about, was the darkness, to shield us from all possible observation. I must own, that, in analyzing the feelings that prompted me to undertake and go through with this affair, the mere love of adventure operated quite as powerfully as the wish to benefit the cause of anatomical science. A midnight expedition to the tombs! — It took our fancy amazingly; and then — Mr ——'s cunning hint about the „danger" — and our „spirit!"

The garrulous Tip supplied us with amusement all the way down—rattle, rattle, rattle, incessantly; but as soon as we had arrived at that part of the road where we were to stop and caught sight of —— church, with its hoary steeple grey — glistening in the fading moonlight, as though it were standing sentinel over the graves around it, one of which we were going so rashly to violate — Tip's spirits began to falter a little. He said little—and that at intervals. To be very candid with the reader, none of us felt over much at our ease. Our expedition began to wear a somewhat hairbrained aspect, and to be environed with formidable contingencies which we had not taken sufficiently into our calculations. What, for instance, if the two stout fellows, the brothers, should be out watching their sister's grave? They were not likely to stand on much ceremony with us. And then the manual difficulties! E—— was the only one of us that had ever assisted at the exhumation of a body—and the rest of us were likely to prove but bungling workmen. However, we had gone too far to think of retreating. We none of us spoke our misgivings, but the silence that reigned within the coach was tolerably significant. In contemplation, however, of some such contingency, we had put a bottle of brandy in the coach pocket; and before we drew up, had all four of us drunk pretty deeply of it. At length, the coach turned down a by-lane to the left, which led directly to the churchyard wall; and after moving a few steps down it, in order to shelter our vehicle from the observation of highway passengers, the coach stopped, and the driver opened the door.

„Come, Tip," said I, „out with you."

„Get out did you say, sir? To be sure I will—Och! to be sure I will." But there was small show of alacrity in his movements as he descended the steps; for, while I was speaking, I was interrupted by the solemn clangour of the church clock announcing the hour of midnight. The sounds seemed to warn us against what we were going to do.

„'Tis a cowld night, yer honours," said Tip, in an under tone, as we successively alighted, and stood together, looking up and down the dark lane, to see if any thing was stirring but ourselves. „'Tis a cowld night—and—and—and" —he stammered.

„Why, you cowardly old scoundrel," grumbled M——, „are you frightened already? What's the matter, eh? Hoist up the bag on your shoulders directly, and lead the way down the lane."

„Och, but yer honours—och! by the mother that bore me, but 'tis a murtherous cruel thing, I'm thinking, to wake the poor cratur from her last sleep." He said this so querulously, that I began to entertain serious apprehensions, after all, of his defection; so I insisted on his taking a little more brandy, by way of bringing him up to par. It was of no use, however. His reluctance increased every moment—and it even dispirited us. I verily believe the turning of a straw would have decided us all on jumping into the coach again, and returning home without accomplishing our errand. Too many of the students, however, were apprized of our expedition, for us to think of terminating it so ridiculously. As it were by mutual consent, we stood and paused a few moments, about half way down the lane. M—— whistled with infinite spirit and distinctness; E—— remarked to me that he „always thought a churchyard at midnight was the gloomiest object imaginable;" and I talked about business—„soon be over"—„shallow grave," etc, etc.

„Confound it—what if those two brothers of hers should be there?" said M—— abruptly, making a dead stop, and folding his arms on his breast.

„Powerful fellows both of them!" muttered E——. We resumed our march—when Tip, our advanced guard—a title he earned by anticipating our steps about three inches—suddenly stood still, let down the bag from his shoulders, elevated both hands in a listening attitude, and exclaimed, „Whisht!—whisht! By my soul, what was that?" We all paused in silence, looking palely at one another—but could hear nothing except the drowsy flutter of a bat wheeling away from us a little over-head.

„Fait—an' wasn't it somebody spaking on the far side o' the hedge, I heard?" whispered Tip.

„Pho—stuff, you idiot!" I exclaimed, losing my temper. „Come, M—— and E——, it's high time we had done with all this cowardly nonsense; and if we mean really to do anything, we must make haste. 'Tis past twelve—day breaks about four—and it is coming on wet you see." Several large drops of rain, pattering heavily among the leaves and branches, corroborated my words, by announcing a coming shower, and the air was sultry enough to warrant the expectation of a thunder-storm. We therefore buttoned up our great-coats to the chin, and hurried on to the churchyard wall, which ran across the bottom of the lane. This wall we had to climb over to get into the churchyard, and it was not a very high one. Here Tip annoyed us again. I told him to lay down his bag, mount the wall, and look over into the yard, to see whether all was clear before us; and, as far as the light would enable him, to look about for a new-made grave. Very reluctantly he complied, and contrived to scramble to the top of the wall. He had hardly time, however, to peer over into the churchyard, when a fluttering streak of lightning flashed over us, followed, in a second or two, by a loud burst of thunder! Tip fell in an instant to the ground, like a cockchaffer shaken from an elm-tree, and lay crossing himself, and muttering Paternosters. We could scarcely help laughing at the manner in which he tumbled down, simultaneously with the flash of lightning. „Now, look ye gintlemen," said he, still squatting on the ground, „do you mane to give the poor cratur Christian burial, when ye've done wid her? An' will ye put her back again as ye found her? 'Case, if you won't, blood an' ouns"——

„Hark ye now, Tip," said I, sternly, taking out one of a brace of empty pistols I had put into my great-coat pocket, and presenting it to his head, „we have hired you on this business, for the want of a better, you wretched fellow! and if you give us any more of your nonsense, by ——, I'll send a bullet through your brain! Do you hear me, Tip?"

(To be concluded in our next.)

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klasing.

1838. N.ro 52.

The British Museum.

A CHOICE SELECTION FROM THE WORKS
OF THE
MOST CELEBRATED ENGLISH AUTHORS
BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN.
THE EDITORS: O. L. B. WOLFF AND C. SCHÜTZ, A. A. M. M.

The Tuggs's at Ramsgate.

By Boz.

(Concluded from our last.)

The talented Tippin having condescendingly acknowledged the clapping of hands, and shouts of „bravo!“ which greeted her appearance, proceeded to sing the popular cavatina of „Bid me discourse,“ accompanied on the piano by Mr. Tippin; after which Mr. Tippin sang a comic song, accompanied on the piano by Mrs. Tippin, the applause consequent upon which was only to be exceeded by the enthusiastic approbation bestowed upon an air with variations on the guitar, by Miss Tippin, accompanied on the chin by Mr. Tippin.

Thus passed the evening: and thus passed the days and evenings of the Tuggs's, and the Waters's, for six weeks afterwards. Sands in the morning — donkeys at noon: pier in the afternoon — library at night; and the same people every where.

On that very night six weeks, the moon was shining brightly over the calm sea, which dashed against the feet of the tall gaunt cliffs with just enough noise to lull the old fish to sleep, without disturbing the young ones, when two figures were discernible — or would have been, if any body had looked for them — seated on one of the wooden benches which are stationed near the verge of the western cliff. The moon had climbed higher into the heavens, by two hours' journeying, since those figures first sat down, and yet they had moved not. The crowd of loungers had thinned and dispersed, the noise of itinerant musicians had died away; light after light had appeared in the windows of the different houses in the distance, blockade-man after blockade-man had passed the spot, wending his way towards his solitary post, and yet those figures had remained stationary. Some portions of the two forms were in deep shadow, but the light of the moon fell strongly on a puce-coloured boot and a glazed stock. Mr. Cymon Tuggs, and Mrs. Cap'tain Waters, were seated on that bench. They spoke not, but were silently gazing on the sea.

„Walter will return to-morrow,“ said Mrs. Captain Waters, mournfully breaking silence.

Mr. Cymon Tuggs sighed like a gust of wind through a forest of gooseberry-bushes, as he replied — „Alas! he will.“

„Oh, Cymon!“ resumed Belinda, „the chaste delight, the calm happiness, of this one week of Platonic love, is too much for me.“

Cymon was about to suggest that it was too little for him, but he stopped himself, and murmured unintelligibly.

„And to think that even this glimpse of happiness, innocent as it is,“ exclaimed Belinda, „is now to be lost for ever!“

„Oh, do not say for ever! Belinda,“ exclaimed the excitable Cymon, as two strongly-defined tears chased each other down his pale face — it was so long that there was plenty of room for a chase — „Do not say for ever!“

„I must,“ replied Belinda.

„Why?“ urged Cymon,“ oh why? Such Platonic acquaintance as ours is so harmless, that even your husband can never object to it.“

„My husband!“ exclaimed Belinda. „You little know him. Jealous and revengeful; ferocious in his revenge — a maniac in his jealousy! Would you be assassinated before my eyes?“ Mr. Cymon Tuggs, in a voice broken by emotion, expressed his disinclination to undergo the process of assassination before the eyes of any body.

„Then leave me,“ said Mrs. Captain Waters. „Leave me, this night, for ever. It is late; let us return.“

Mr. Cymon Tuggs sadly offered the lady his arm, and escorted her to her lodgings. He paused at the door — he felt a Platonic pressure of his hand. „Good night,“ he said, hesitating.

„Good night,“ sobbed the lady. Mr. Cymon Tuggs paused again.

„Won't you walk in, sir?“ said the servant. Mr. Tuggs hesitated. Oh, that hesitation! He did walk in.

„Good night,“ said Mr. Cymon Tuggs again, when he reached the drawing-room.

„Good night!“ replied Belinda; „and if, at any period of my life, I — Hush!“ The lady paused, and stared, with a steady gaze of horror, on the ashy countenance of Mr. Cymon Tuggs. There was a double knock at the street-door.

„It is my husband!“ said Belinda, as the captain's voice was heard below.

„And my family!“ added Cymon Tuggs, as the voices of his relatives floated up the staircase.

„The curtain! the curtain!“ gasped Mrs. Captain Waters, pointing to the window, before which some chintz hangings were closely drawn.

„But I have done nothing wrong,“ said the hesitating Cymon.

„The curtain!“ reiterated the lady, frantically; „you will be murdered.“ This last appeal to his feelings was irresistible. The dismayed Cymon concealed himself behind the curtain, with pantomimic suddenness.

Enter the captain, Joseph Tuggs, Mrs. Tuggs, and Charlotta.

„My dear,“ said the captain, „Lieutenant Slaughter.“ Two iron-shod boots and one gruff voice were heard by Mr. Cymon to advance, and acknowledge the honour of the introduction. The sabre of the lieutenant rattled heavily upon the floor, as he seated himself at the table. Mr. Cymon's fears almost overcame his reason.

„The brandy, my dear,“ said the captain. Here was a situation! They were going to make a night of it: and Mr. Cymon Tuggs was pent up behind the curtain, and afraid to breathe.

„Slaughter,“ said the captain, „a cigar?“

Now Mr. Cymon Tuggs never could smoke without feeling it indispensably necessary to retire immediately, and never could smell smoke without a strong disposition to cough. The cigars were introduced; the captain was a professed smoker, so was the lieutenant, so was Joseph Tuggs. The apartment was small, the door was closed, the smoke powerful: it hung in heavy wreaths over the room, and at length found its way behind the curtain. Cymon Tuggs held his nose, then his mouth, then his breath. It was all of no use — out came the cough.

„Bless my soul!“ said the captain, „I beg your pardon, Miss Tuggs. You dislike smoking.“

„Oh no; I don't indeed, said Charlotta.

„It makes you cough.“

„Oh dear, no.“

„You coughed just now.“

„Me, Captain Waters! Lor! how can you say so?“

„Somebody coughed,“ said the captain.

„I certainly thought so,“ said Slaughter. No; every body denied it.

„Fancy,“ said the captain.

„Must be,“ echoed Slaughter.

Cigars resumed, more smoke, another cough — smothered, but violent.

„Damned odd!“ said the captain, staring about him.

„Sing'lar!“ ejaculated the unconscious Mr. Joseph Tuggs.

Lieutenant Slaughter looked first at one person mysteriously, then at another; then laid down his cigar; then approached the window on tiptoe, and pointed, with his right thumb over his shoulder, in the direction of the curtain.

„Slaughter!“ ejaculated the captain, rising from table, „what do you mean?“

The lieutenant in reply, drew back the curtain, and discovered Mr. Cymon Tuggs behind it; pallid with apprehension, and blue with wanting to cough.

„Ah!“ exclaimed the captain furiously, „What do I see? Slaughter, your sabre!“

„Cymon!“ screamed the Tuggs's.

„Mercy,“ said Belinda.

„Platonic,“ gasped Cymon.

„Your sabre!“ roared the captain, „Slaughter — unhand me — the villain's life!“

„Murder!“ screamed the Tuggs's.

„Hold him fast, sir!“ faintly articulated Cymon.

„Water!“ exclaimed Joseph Tuggs — and Mr. Cymon Tuggs, and all the ladies forthwith fainted away, and formed a tableau.

Most willingly would we conceal the disastrous termination of the six week's acquaintance. A troublesome form, and an arbitrary custom, however, prescribe that a story should have a conclusion, in addition to a commencement; and we have therefore no alternative. Lieutenant Slaughter brought a message — the captain brought an action. Mr. Joseph Tuggs interposed — the lieutenant negotiated. When Mr. Cymon Tuggs recovered from the nervous disorder into which misplaced affection, and exciting circumstances had plunged him, he found that his family had lost their pleasant acquaintance; that his father was minus fifteen hundred pounds; and the captain plus the precise sum. The money was paid to hush the matter up, but it got abroad notwithstanding; and there are not wanting those who affirm that three designing impostors never found more easy dupes, than did Captain Waters, Mrs. Waters, and Lieutenant Slaughter, in the Tuggs's at Ramsgate.

Grave Doings.

(Concluded from our last.)

„Och, aisy, aisy wid ye! don't murther me! Bad luck to me, that I ever cam wid ye! Och, and if ivir I live to die, won't I see and bury my ould body out o' the racks of all the docthers in the world? If I don't, divil burn me!“ We all laughed aloud at Tip's truly Hibernian expostulation.

„Come, sir, mount! over with you!“ said we, helping to push him upwards. „Now, drop this bag on the other side,“ we continued, giving him the sack that contained our implements. We all three of us then followed, and alighted safely in the churchyard. It poured with rain; and, to enhance the dreariness and horrors of the time and place, flashes of lightning followed in quick succession, shedding a transient awful glare over the scene, revealing the white tombstones, the ivy-grown venerable church, and our own figures, a shivering group, come on an unhallowed errand! I perfectly well recollect the lively feelings of apprehension— „the compunctious visitings of remorse“ — which the circumstances called forth in my own breast, and which, I had no doubt, were shared by my companions.

As no time, however, was to be lost, I left the group, for an instant, under the wall, to search out the grave. The accurate instructions I had received enabled me to pitch on the spot with little difficulty; and I returned to my companions, who immediately followed me to the scene of operations. We had no umbrellas, and our great coats were saturated with wet; but the brandy we had recently taken did us good service, by exhilarating our spirits, and especially those of Tip. He untied the sack in a twinkling, and shook out the hoes and spades, &c.; and, taking one of the latter himself, he commenced digging with such energy, that we had hardly prepared ourselves for work, before he had cleared away nearly the whole of the mound. The rain soon abated, and the lightning ceased for a considerable interval, though thunder was heard occasionally grumbling sullenly in the distance, as if expressing anger at our unholy doings—at least, I felt it so. The pitchy darkness continued, so that we could scarcely see one another's figures. We worked on in silence, as fast as our spades could be got into the ground; taking it in turns, two by two, as the grave would not admit of more. On—on—on we worked, till we had hollowed out about three feet of earth. Tip then hastily joined together a long iron screw, or borer, which he thrust into the ground, for the purpose of ascertaining the depth at which the coffin yet lay from us. To our vexation, we found a distance of three feet remained to be got through. "Sure, and by the soul of St. Patrick, but we'll not be done by the morning!" said Tip, as he threw down the instrument, and resumed his spade. We were all discouraged. Oh, how earnestly I wished myself at home, in my snug little bed in the Borough! How I cursed the Quixotism that had led me into such an undertaking! I had no time, however, for reflection, as it was my turn to relieve one of the diggers; so into the grave I jumped, and worked away as lustily as before. While I was thus engaged, a sudden noise, close to our ears, so startled me, that I protest I thought I should have dropped down dead in the grave I was robbing. I and my fellow digger let fall our spades, and all four stood still for a second or two, in an ecstasy of fearful apprehension. We could not see more than a few inches around us, but heard the grass trodden by approaching feet! They proved to be those of an Ass, that was turned at night into the churchyard, and had gone on eating his way towards us; and, while we were standing in mute expectation of what was to come next, opened on us with an astounding hee-haw! hee-haw! hee-haw! Even after we had discovered the ludicrous nature of the interruption, we were too agitated to laugh. The brute was actually close upon us, and had given tongue from under poor Tip's elbow, having approached him from behind, as he stood leaning on his spade. Tip started suddenly backward against the animal's head, and fell down. Away sprung the jackass, as much confounded as Tip, kicking and scampering like a mad creature among the tombstones, and hee-hawing incessantly, as if a hundred devils had got into it for the purpose of discomfiting us. I felt so much fury, and fear lest the noise should lead to our discovery, I could have killed the brute if it had been within my reach, while Tip stammered, in an affrighted whisper—"Och, the baste: Och, the baste! The big black divel of a baste! The murtherous thundering"—— and a great many epithets of the same sort. We gradually recovered from the agitation which this provoking interruption had occasioned; and Tip, under the promise of two bottles of whisky as soon as we arrived safe at home with our prize, renewed his exertions, and dug with such energy, that we soon cleared away the remainder of the superincumbent earth, and stood upon the bare lid of the coffin. The grapplers, with ropes attached to them, were then fixed in the sides and extremities, and we were in the act of raising the coffin, when the sound of a human voice, accompanied with footsteps, fell on our startled ears. We heard both distinctly, and crouched down close over the brink of the grave, awaiting in breathless suspense a corroboration of our fear. After a pause of two or three minutes, however, finding that the sounds were not renewed, we began to breathe freer, persuaded that our ears must have deceived us. Once more we resumed our work, succeeded in hoisting up the coffin—not without a slip, however, which nearly precipitated it down again to the bottom, with all four of us upon it—and depositing it on the grave side. Before proceeding to use our screws, or wrenchers, we once more looked and listened, and listened and looked; but neither seeing nor hearing any thing, we set to work, prised off the lid in a twinkling and a transient glimpse of moonlight disclosed to us the shrouded female — all white and damp. I removed the face-cloth, and unpinned the cap, while M—— loosed the sleeves from the wrists. Thus were we engaged, when E——, who had hold of the feet, ready to lift them out, suddenly let them go—gasped—" Oh, my God! there they are;" and placed his hand on my arm. He shook like an aspen leaf. I looked towards the quarter whither his eyes were directed, and, sure enough, saw the figure of a man—if not two—moving stealthily towards us. „Well, we're discovered, that's clear,“ I whispered as calmly as I could. „We shall be murdered!“ groaned E——. „Lend me one of the pistols you have with you,“ said M——, resolutely; „By ——, I'll have a shot for my life, however!“ As for poor Tip, who had heard every syllable of this startling colloquy, and himself seen the approaching figures, he looked at me in silence, the image of black horror! I could have laughed even then, to see his staring black eyes—his little cocked-ruby-tinted nose—his chattering teeth. „Hush—hush!“ said I, cocking my pistol, while M—— did the same; for none but myself knew that they were unloaded. To add to our consternation, the malignant moon withdrew the small scantling of light she had been doling out to us, and sunk beneath a vast cloud, „black as Erebus,“ but not before we had caught a glimpse of two more figures moving towards us in an opposite direction. „Surrounded!“ two of us muttered in the same breath. We all rose to our feet, and stood together, not knowing what to do—unable in the darkness to see one another distinctly. Presently we heard a voice say, in a subdued tone, „Where are they? where? Here I saw them! Oh, there they are! Hollo—hallo!“

That was enough—the signal of our flight. Without an instant's pause, or uttering another syllable, off we sprung, like small-shot from a gun's mouth, all of us in different directions, we knew not whither. I heard the report of a gun—mercy on me! and pelted away, scarcely knowing what I was about, dodging among the graves—now coming full-butt against a plaguy tombstone, then tumbling on the slippery grass—while some one followed close at my heels panting and puffing, but whether friend or foe, I knew not. At length I stumbled against a large tombstone; and finding it open at the two ends, crept under it, resolved there to abide the issue. At the moment of my ensconcing myself, the sound of the person's footsteps who had followed me suddenly ceased. I heard a splashing sound, then a kicking and scrambling, a faint stifled cry of, „Ugh—oh—ugh!“ and all was still. Doubtless it must be one of my companions, who had been wounded. What could I do, however? I did not know in what direction he lay—the night was pitch-dark—and if I crept from my hiding-place, for all I knew, I might be shot myself. I shall never forget that hour—no, never! There was I, squatting like a toad on the wet grass and weeds, not daring to do more than breathe! Here was a predicament! I could not conjecture how the affair would terminate. Was I to lie where I was till daylight, that then I might step into the arms of my captors? What was become of my companions?—While turning these thoughts in my mind, and wondering that all was so quiet, my ear caught the sound of the splashing of water, apparently at but a yard or two's distance, mingled with the sounds of a half-smothered human voice—" Ugh! ugh! Och, murther! murther! murther!"—another splash— „and isn't it dead, and drowned, and kilt I am"——

Whew! Tip, in trouble, thought I, not daring to speak. Yes—it was poor Tip, I afterwards found—who had followed at my heels, scampering after me as fast as fright could drive him, till his career was unexpectedly ended by his tumbling—souse—head over heels, into a newly opened grave in his path, with more than a foot of water in it. There the poor fellow remained, after recovering from the first shock of his fall, not daring to utter a word for some time, lest he should be discovered—straddling over the water with his toes and elbows stuck into the loose soil on each side, to support him. This was his interesting position, as he subsequently informed me, at the time of uttering the sound which first attracted my attention. Though not aware of his situation at the time, I was almost choked with laughter as he went on with his soliloquy, somewhat in this strain:—

„Och, Tip, ye ould divel! Don't it serve ye right, ye fool? Ye villanous ould coffin robber! Won't ye burn for this hereafter, ye sinner? Ullaloo! When ye are did yourself, may ye be trated like that poor crater — and yourself alive to see it! Och, hubbaboo! hubbaboo! Isn't it sure that I'll be drowned, an' then it's kilt I'll be!" — A loud splash, and a pause for a few moments, as if he were readjusting his footing — „Och! an' I'm catching my dith of cowld! Fait, an' it's a divel a drop o' the two bottles o' whisky I'll iver see — Och, och, och!" — another splash — „och, an' isn't this uncomfortable! Murther and ouns! — if ever I come out of this — shan't I be dead before I do?"

„Tip — Tip — Tip!" I whispered, in a low tone. There was a dead silence. „Tip, Tip, where are you? What's the matter, eh?" — No answer; but he muttered in a low tone to himself — " Where am I! by my soul! Isn't it dead, and kilt, and drowned, and murthered I am — that's all!"

„Tip — Tip — Tip!— I repeated, a little louder.

„Tip, indeed! Fait, ye may call, bad luck to ye — whoever ye are — but it's divel a word I'll be after spaking to ye."

„Tip, you simpleton! It's I — Mr ——."

In an instant there was a sound of jumping and splashing, as if surprise had made him slip from his standing again, and he called out, „Whoo! whoo! an' is't you, sweet Mr——! What is the matther wid ye? Are ye kilt? Where are they all? Have they taken ye away, every mother's son of you?" he asked eagerly, in a breath.

„Why, what are you doing, Tip? Where are you?"

— Fait, an' it's being washed I am, in the feet, and in the queerest fix your honour ever saw!" A noise of scuffling, not many yards off, silenced us both in an instant. Presently I distinguished the voice of E——, calling out— „Help, M——!" (my name) — „Where are you?" The noise increased, and seemed nearer than before. I crept from my lurking place, and aided at Tip's resurrection, when both of us hurried towards the spot whence the sound came. By the faint moonlight, I could just see the outlines of two figures violently struggling and grappling together. Before I could come up to them, both fell down, locked in each other's arms, rolling over each other, grasping one another's collars, gasping and panting as if in mortal struggle. The moon suddenly emerged, and who do you think, reader, was E——'s antagonist? Why, the person whose appearance had so discomfited and affrighted us all — our COACHMAN. That worthy individual, alarmed at our protracted stay, had, contrary to our injunctions left his coach to come and search after us. He it was whom we had seen stealing towards us; his steps — his voice had alarmed us, for he could not see us distinctly enough to discover whether we were his fare or not. He was on the point of whispering my name it seems when we must all have understood one another — when, lo, we all started off in the manner which has been described; and he himself, not knowing that he was the reason of it, had taken to his heels, and fled for his life! He supposed we had fallen into a sort of ambuscade. He happened to hide himself behind the tombstone next but one to that which sheltered E——. Finding all quiet, he and E——, as if by mutual consent, were groping from their hiding places, when they unexpectedly fell foul of one another each too affrighted to speak — and hence the scuffle.

After this satisfactory denouement, we all repaired to the grave's mouth, and found the corpse and coffin precisely as we had left them. We were not many moments in taking out the body, stripping it, and thrusting it into the sack we had brought. We then tied the top of the sack, carefully deposited the shroud, etc. in the coffin, re-screwed down the lid — fearful — impious mockery! — and consigned it once more to its resting place — Tip scattering a handful of earth on the lid, and exclaiming reverently — „An' may the Lord forgive us for what we have done to ye!“ The coachman and I then took the body between us to the coach, leaving M——, and E——, and Tip to fill up the grave.

Our troubles were not yet ended, however. Truly it seemed as though Providence were throwing every obstacle in our way. Nothing went right! On reaching the spot where we had left the coach, behold it lay several yards farther in the lane, tilted into the ditch — for the horses, being hungry, and left to themselves, in their anxiety to graze on the verdant bank of the hedge, had contrived to overturn the vehicle in the ditch — and one of the horses was kicking vigorously when we came up—his whole body off the ground, and resting on that of his companion. We had considerable difficulty in righting the coach, as the horses were inclined to be obstreperous. We succeeded, however — deposited our unholy spoil within, turned the horses' heads towards the high road, and then, after enjoining John to keep his place on the box, I went to see how my companions were getting on. They had nearly completed their task, and told me that „shovelling in, was surprisingly easier than shovelling out!“ We took great pains to leave every thing as neat, and as nearly resembling what we found it, as possible, in order that our visit might not be suspected. We then carried away each our own tools, and hurried as fast as possible to our coach, for the dim twilight had already stolen a march upon us, devoutly thankful that, after so many interruptions, we had succeeded in effecting our object.

It was broad daylight before we reached town and a wretched coach company we looked — all wearied and dirty — Tip especially, who, nevertheless, snored in the corner as comfortably as if he had been warm in his bed. I heartily resolved, with him, on leaving the coach, that it should be „the divel's own dear self only that shoud timpt me out agin body-snatching!“

Human Life.

And say, how soon, where blithe as innocent,
The boy at sun-rise whistled as he went,
An aged pilgrim on his staff shall lean,
Tracing in vain the footsteps o'er the green:
The man himself how alter'd! — not the same —
Now journeying home with nothing but the name;
Way-worn and spent, another, and the same!
No eye observes the growth or the decay,
To day we look as we did yesterday;
Yet while she loveliest smiles, her locks grow grey!
And in her glass could she but see her face
She'll see so soon amid another race;
How would she shriek! — Returning from afar,
After some year's of travel — some of war,
Within his gates Ulysses stood unknown,
Before a wife, a father, and a son.

And such is Human Life, the general theme.
Ah what at best, what but a longer dream?
Though with such wild romantic wandering fraught,
Such forms in fancy's richest colouring wrought
That like the visions of a love-sick brain,
Who would not sleep and dream them o'er again?
Our pathway leads but to a precipice,
And all must follow — fearful as it is,
From the first step; 'tis known: but — no delay!
On — 'tis decreed — we tremble and obey.
A thousand ills beset us as we go,
„Still could I shun the fatal gulph“ — ah! no,
'Tis all in vain — the inexorable law!
Nearer and nearer to the brink we draw.
Verdure springs up, and fruits and flowers invite;
And groves and fountains — all things that delight.
„Oh I would stop and linger if I might.“
We fly; no resting for the foot we find;
All dark before, all desolate behind!
At length the brink appears — but one step more
We faint — on, on! we falter — and 'tis o'er!
How great the mystery! Let others sing
The circling year, the promise of the spring,
The summer's glory and the rich repose
Of autumn, and the winter's silvery snows.

Man through the changing scene let me pursue,
Himself how wond'rous in his changes too!
Not Man the sullen savage in his den,
But man called forth in fellowship with men
Schooled and trained up to wisdom from his birth;
God's noblest work — His image upon earth!
And now behold him the hill ascending,
Memory and Hope, like evening stars, attending;
Sustained, excited, till his course is run,
By deeds of virtue done or to be done.
When on his couch he sinks at length to rest:
Those by his counsel saved, his power redressed,
Those by the world shunned ever as unblest,
At whom the rich man's dog growls from the gate,
But whom he sought out, sitting desolate,
Come and stand round the widow with her child,
As when she first forgot her tears and smiled!
They, who watch by him, see not; but he sees,
Sees and exults — were ever dreams like these?
They, who watch by him, hear not; but he hears,
And Earth appears, and Heaven itself appears.
'Tis past, That hand we grasped, alas, in vain!
Nor shall we look upon his face again!
But to his closing eyes, for all were there,
Nothing was wanting; and through many a year,
We shall remember with a fond delight
The words so precious which we heard to night;
His parting, though awhile our sorrow flows,
Like setting suns or music at the close!
Then was the drama ended. Not till then,
So full of chance and change the lives of men,
Could we pronounce him happy. Then secure
From pain, from grief, and all, that we endure
He slept in peace — say, rather soared to Heaven,
Upborne from earth by Him, to whom 'tis given
In his right hand to hold the golden key
That opes the portals of eternity.
When by a good man's grave I muse alone,
Methinks an angel sits upon the stone;
Like those of old, on that thrice-hallowed night,
Who sate and watched in raiment heavenly bright:
And, with a voice inspiring joy, not fear,
Say, pointing upwards, that he is not here,
That he is risen!
But the day is spent;
And stars are kindling in the firmament,
To us how silent — though like ours, perchance,
Busy and full of life and circumstance,
Where some the paths of wealth and power pursue,
Of pleasure some, of happiness a few;
And as the sun goes round — a sun not ours,
While from her lap another Nature showers
Gifts of her own, some from the crowd retire,
Think on themselves, within, without inquire
A distance dwell on all that passes there
All that their world reveals of good and fair;
And as they wander, picturing things, like me,
Not as they are, but as they ought to be,
Trace out their journey through their little day,
And fondly dream a little hour away. —

Rogers.

The River.

Thou art the Poet of the Woods, fair River,
A lover of the beautiful! — and still
Wand'rest by wildest scenes, while night-stars quiver,
The only voice that haunts the desert hill; —
Thou art the Poet of the Woods, whose lay
Charms the dim forest on thy sylvan way.

Thou art the artist of the vale, bright River,
That paint'st the glowing hues of earth and sky
On thine own pure and placid breast for ever;
Two worlds of beauty on thy waters lie!
Thou'rt Nature's boldest Painter — broad and free —
And human genius ne'er surpasseth thee!

Thou art the Minstrel of the Fields, sweet River,
Whose music lingers like an angel's tongue —
A voice that sings the glory of the Giver!
Creation's first, sublimest, birth of song!
Still let my soul thy liquid music hear,
Oh, sweet Musician — voice for ever dear!

Swain.

Bielefeld, Druck und Verlag von Velhagen & Klaſing.

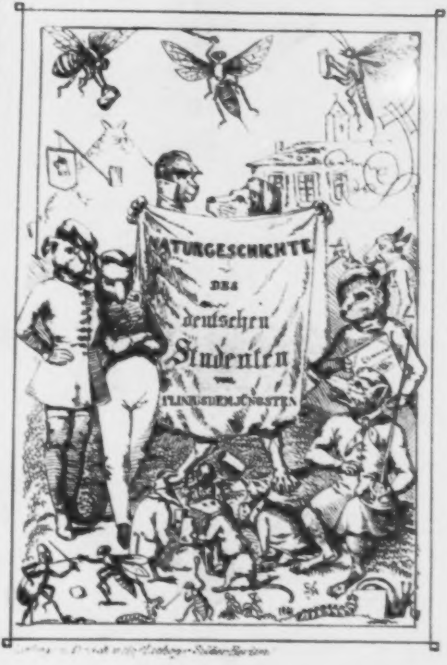
Univ. Bibl.
München

Naturgeſchichte

des

deutſchen Studenten.

Univ. Bibl.
München



NATURGESCHICHTE
DES
deutschen
Studenten
PLINIUS DEM JÜNGSTEN

[illegible]

Naturgeſchichte

des

Deutſchen Studenten.

Von

Plinius dem Jüngſten.

Osc. Ludw. Bern. Wolff.

Mit Federzeichnungen

von

Johann Gottfried Apelles.

Motto. Laßt mir die jungen Leute nur,
Und ergötzt Euch an ihren Gaben!
Es will doch Großmama Natur
Manchmal einen närriſchen Einfall haben.
Goethe.

Leipzig,
Verlag von J. J. Weber.
1842.

AD
BIBL. UNIV.
MONAC.

Universitäts-
München
Bibliothek

Allen,

die in deutſchen Landen

auf Univerſitäten

ſtudirt haben, ſtudiren und ſtudiren werden, freundlichſt gewidmet

vom Verfaſſer.

Zur Verſtändigung.

Der Verfaſſer hält es für ſeine Pflicht, auf das Ausdrücklichſte zu erklären, daß ihm bei der Abfaſſung dieſes Büchleins weder Perſonen noch Localitäten vorſchwebten und daß er ſich von allen „Anſpielungen“ mit großer Strenge fern gehalten. Er proteſtirt daher entſchieden gegen jede derartige Auslegung und erklärt denjenigen, der ſich eine ſolche erlaubt, und ihm beſtimmte Abſichten unterſchiebt, für heimtückiſch oder bornirt.

Der talentvolle Zeichner der Illuſtrationen wandelte nach des geiſtreichen Grandville's Vorbilde Menſchen in Thiere um, jedoch nur nach dem Sinne, den die Studenten dieſen Thierbezeichnungen beilegen; der Fuchs bedeutet daher Nichts als den Neuling, der Ochſe den unermüdlich arbeitenden, der Hahn den ſich auszeichnenden Studioſus u. ſ. w. — Jede andere im gewöhnlichen Leben vielleicht geltende Deutung weiſt der Künſtler demgemäß eben ſo entſchieden zurück. —

Der Verfaſſer.

Inhaltsverzeichniß.

Zur Verſtändigung.

Seite
Einleitung 1

Erſtes Kapitel.

Begriff des Wortes Student. — Was heißt und woran erkennt man einen deutſchen Studenten? Wodurch zeichnet er ſich vor allen übrigen Studenten der Erde aus? — 22

Zweites Kapitel.

Unterſuchungen über die Sprache der deutſchen Studenten. — Excurſus über ihre Tracht und gewiſſe Gewohnheiten und Gebräuche derſelben, welche immer mehr zu verſchwinden drohen. — Tell's Monolog 47

Drittes Kapitel.

Von den Univerſitäten im Allgemeinen und Beſonderen 75

Viertes Kapitel.

Die Lebensalter des deutſchen Studenten 89

Des vierten Kapitels

erſte Unterabtheilung.

Der Studenten-Embryo oder das ſogenannte Maulthier 93

Seite

Des vierten Kapitels

zweite Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Kindesalter oder der Fuchs . . . 106

Des vierten Kapitels

dritte Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Knabenalter oder der Brandfuchs 124

Des vierten Kapitels

vierte Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Jünglingsalter oder der junge Burſch 136

Des vierten Kapitels

fünfte Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Mannesalter oder der alte Burſch 153

Des vierten Kapitels

ſechſte Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Greiſenalter oder das bemooſte Haupt. 163

Fünftes Kapitel.

Vom Staatsweſen der Studenten 170

Sechſtes und letztes Kapitel.

Die Doctorpromotion 188

Naturgeſchichte
des
deutſchen Studenten.

Einleitung.

Die Naturphiloſophen meinen, die Idee Gottes müſſe ſich in der Schöpfung erfüllen; bis dahin ſchreite dieſe fort, dann aber ſei es mit derſelben vorbei. S. erklären ſie das Entſtehen, ſelbſt die equivoken Generationen, bis zum Verſchwinden und gänzlichen Aufhören derſelben, entweder in ſich ſelbſt oder durch äußere Urſachen. Ganz Unrecht mögen ſie nicht haben; ein Philoſoph hat eigentlich immer Recht, ſeine Kollegen dulden nur nicht, daß die Menſchen es glauben, weil die Philoſophie allein bloß wiſſen darf was ſie nicht wiſſen kann. Aber die Weltgeſchichte lehrt es. Wie das Megatherium ausgeſehen, davon wiſſen wir wenig, und doch iſt's dageweſen, hat ſich gebären laſſen, ſich begattet und iſt geſtorben, bis endlich das letzte Männchen kein Weibchen mehr fand oder umgekehrt und die Gattung von der Erde verſchwand. Den grünen durchſichtigen Chalcedon, den die Alten ſo gern als Schmuck benutzten und gewöhnlich Victorien oder Niken hinein ſchnitten, wiſſen wir nicht mehr zu finden und ſchneiden daher unſere Siegesgöttinnen nicht hinein, ſondern überhaupt nur mit unſeren Göttern auf. England hat keine Wölfe mehr; in Amerika ſchrumpfen die Urſtämme zuſammen, und Leipzig hätte beinahe bald ſeinen letzten Magiſter begraben, wenn nicht glücklicher Weiſe in neueſter Zeit für die Erhaltung auch dieſes Urſtammes der alten Univerſität an der Pleiße wäre Sorge getragen worden. Durch ſolche künſtliche Begattung kommen nun freilich bloß ſchwächliche Kinder auf die Welt, die ſich ſelbſt verzehren und kaum confirmirt am Marasmus dahin ſterben. Jeder Alchymiſt weiß, daß ſich allerdings ein Homunculus erzeugen oder richtiger zuſammenſetzen läßt; bleibt er aber nicht in dem Glaſe, in dem er gemiſcht wurde, ſo iſt's über Nacht aus mit ihm. Vielleicht iſt die Univerſität Leipzig ein ſolches Glas, in dem die Homunculi, das heißt, die Magiſter doch gedeihen, trotz dem Zeitgeiſt, der im Doctor der Philoſophie nur einen Henkel ſehen will, bei welchem man irgend einen Krug, Menſch genannt, in der Geſellſchaft anfaſſen kann und im Magiſter gar nur eine Abart, einen Pedanten, der viel Lateiniſch und etwas weniger Griechiſch gelernt hat, von dem er nie recht ſatt wird, und mit aller Gelehrſamkeit doch ſein Leben nur dadurch kümmerlich zu friſten vermag, daß er fremden Kindern das

A B C lehrt oder für die Buchhändler in fremden Büchern Druckfehler corrigirt.

Es iſt möglich, daß dieſe wenigen Zeilen irgend einen gelehrten Thebaner veranlaſſen, eine Abhandlung zu ſchreiben, in welcher er beweiſt, daß Nichts ende, alſo Nichts ausſterbe, ſondern Alles nur ſich verwandle, es daher kein neues Leben, ſondern nur neue Formen des einen und untheilbaren aber tauſendfach geſtaltet erſcheinenden Lebens gebe als Ausdruck der ſich ſelbſt reproducirenden Gottheit; daß alſo noch Megatherien auf der, Plasmen in der Erde, eben ſo gut zu finden ſeien, wie Wölfe in England, nur in anderer Geſtalt, und daher jener Polizeidiener, dem ſein Chef auftrug, eine Frau Meier vor dem Oſterthor ausfindig zu machen und welcher wiederkam und berichtete, er habe ſie gefunden, ſie heiße aber nicht Meier, ſondern Müller, wohne nicht vor dem Oſter-, ſondern vor dem Weſterthor, ſei auch keine Wittwe, ſondern ein Kanonier — nicht allein vollkommen Recht gehabt, ſondern ein tiefdenkender Philoſoph geweſen ſei. Dieſem trefflichen, gründlich forſchenden Manne wünſche ich im Voraus Heil und Segen; ich bin feſt überzeugt, er wird durch ſeine ſcharfſinnige Entwickelung Deutſchland frei machen von dem geiſtigen Drucke, der bisher ſo eiſern auf ihm laſtete und alle Geiſteskräfte unſeres armen Vaterlandes lähmte, und Deutſchland iſt eines der ſchönſten Länder, welche bis

Sonne begrüßt in ihrem ewigen Laufe — (man leſe nur die erſte Seite von ſeiner Geſchichte bei Luden, um ſich davon zu überzeugen) und wohl werth frei zu ſein — Deutſchland nämlich, — Luden und der Leſer können hier weiter nicht in Betracht kommen. — Zur Freiheit kann es aber nur durch Philoſophie gelangen, denn die Philoſophie iſt eben die Form, in welcher die deutſche Freiheit zur lebendigen Erſcheinung gelangt. — Ohne meinen Irrthum wird aber mein gelehrter thebaniſcher Freund — ich ſehe ſchon, wie er ſeine Achſeln mitleidig zuckt, indem er auf mich herabblickt, wie er die Naſe rümpft, wie er lächelt über mich, lauter Zeichen innigen Wohlwollens, die mich berechtigen, ihn für meinen wahren Freund zu halten — alſo ohne meinen Irrthum wird er nicht die Veranlaſſung finden, ſeine völkerbefreiende Abhandlung zu ſchreiben, ſein feſſelnſprengendes Syſtem zu entwickeln. — Ich bin der Apfel, der dieſem künftigen Newton auf die Naſe fällt, um das neue Geſetz der Bewegung zu finden. — Ich Glücklicher! — Kann ich nun Beſſeres thun, als irren?

Ich fahre alſo fort zu irren, zum Wohle Deutſchlands. Hier bin ich recht in meinem Element. Seit geraumer Zeit nämlich iſt die Furcht in mir rege geworden — nein, keine Furcht — ſo darf ich es nicht nennen, — die Anſchauung iſt in das Bewußtſein getreten und hat ſich zur klaren Vorſtellung entwickelt, daß die alten deutſchen Studenten, jene Gattung, aus der Wallenſtein und Günther, Fauſt — ich meine den Nekromanten — und der Göttinger Hainbund und noch gar viele merkwürdige Menſchen, von denen übrigens die Geſchichte ſchweigt, hervorgingen, immer mehr und mehr von der Erde verſchwinde. O akademiſche Jugend! Auch Patroklus mußte ſterben und war mehr als Du! — Das war er nun eigentlich nicht; er war nur des Achilles Freund und Du biſt der Achilles ſelbſt. Die ganze Geſchichte des Achilles iſt eigentlich nichts Anderes als eine Allegorie, in welcher ſich die Geſchichte eines deutſchen Studioſi birgt. Peleus, der Pedantismus, erzeugt ihn mit Thetis, der ſchönen, freien, geiſtigen Kraft. Sie taucht ihn in den Styx, die unergründliche Fluth der Luſt am Forſchen und Wiſſen. — Skyros iſt das Gymnaſium, er lebt dort ſehr unſchuldig und lernt τυπτω und mensa; da kommt das alte Haus, der Vandalen oder Teutonenſenior Odyſſeus, verkleidet wie ein Kandidat, der noch nachhelfen ſoll; dieſer läßt ihn das Schwert, den Schläger, ſehen; die Luſt zum Renommiren erwacht. Achill zieht vor Troja, das heißt auf die Univerſität; unermüdlich iſt er im Kampfe. Endlich, da er der Deidamia, d. h. dem Amt oder der Praxis ſich vermählen will und mit ihr zum Altare, nämlich in das Examen geht, trifft ihn der Pfeil an der einzigen verwundbaren Stelle, an der Hauptlücke heißt das im Wiſſen ſeines Brodſtudiums und er ſtirbt in voller Blüthe, — er fällt nämlich durch — aber nicht unberühmt zieht er zum Hades hinab, denn noch lange werden die Hellenen — id est die Saxonia, Vandalia, Germania, Arminia, Rhenania etcetera, ſein Lob verkünden und die Sage ſeiner ruhmvollen Thaten fortleben von Geſchlecht zu Geſchlecht, bis der letzte Pedell den letzten Studioſus vor den letzten Rector citirt wegen ſchlechten Beſuchs der Brodwiſſenſchafts-Vorleſungen.

So war es, aber ſo wird es bald nicht mehr ſein; ein Student, der im Examen durchfällt, wird binnen Kurzem zu den Naturwundern, zu den Meerweibern, zu den ſchwarzen Schwänen zu rechnen ſein. Arme Univerſitäten! — Wo hört man noch von einem guten, tollen, herzlich dummen aber ſehr luſtigen Spaße erzählen, der ſich ohne Wehen Euerem Schooße entwand? — Der Ernſt des Lebens hat ſeinen bleiernen Scepter auch über die akademiſche Jugend geſtreckt. — Wie unſere Jungfrauen bei jetzigen ſchlechten Zeiten — ſchöne Redensart — nicht mehr lieben oder vielmehr gar nicht lieben, ſondern allein heirathen, das heißt möglichſt bald anſtändig verſorgt — noch ſchönere Redensart — ſein wollen, ſo zieht auch kein Student mehr zur Univerſität, um zu ſtudiren, ſondern um möglichſt bald Phyſikus, Actuarius, Paſtor oder Profeſſor zu werden, das heißt, mit Schiller zu reden, nicht Prieſter, ſondern

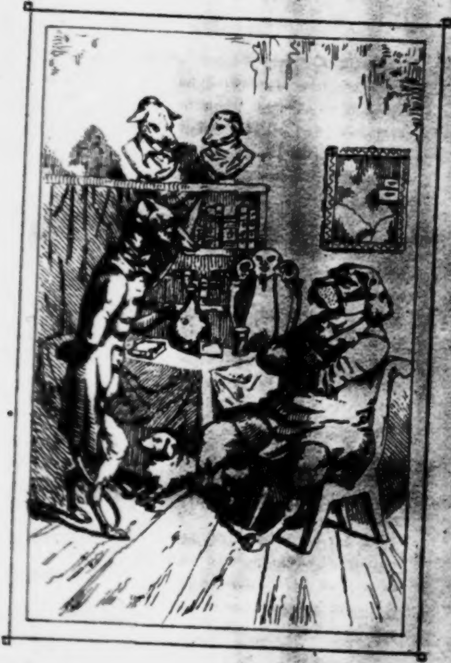
Kuhhirt oder noch beſſer mit Ariſtophanes Bockmelker — denn weiter iſt die pure Brodwiſſenſchaft nichts, als Bockmelkerei. Dabei muß die Univerſität aufhören ihrem Namen treu zu bleiben und eine Universitas literarum zu ſein, eine freie Stätte allgemeiner Forſchung, univerſellen Geiſtes, reiner Wiſſenſchaft. — Freilich ſehen das die Bockmelker gern und gewiſſe Bockmelker ſogar außerordentlich gern — —

Still, es wird an meine Thür geklopft. — Herein! — Ach — der würdige Chef des Collegiums, in dem ich Unwürdiger als Supernumerarſubſtitutenaſſiſtent arbeite, ein vortrefflicher Mann; kurz und dick, etwas leberfarbenen Teints, mit Perrücke und Schnurrbart; den Schnurrbart — wer trägt jetzt nicht einen Schnurrbart — hat er ſich angeblich wachſen laſſen, um den unbärtigen oder milchbärtigen Auditoren Reſpect einzuflößen, eigentlich aber um eines durchaus praktiſchen Zweckes willen: er wiſcht nämlich die Federn darin aus. Dadurch bleibt ihm die ſaure Feuchtigkeit ſtets in den Mundwinkeln ſitzen, verzieht ſie ihm homöopathiſch zu einem ewigen ſüßlichen Lächeln und giebt ihm die ſichere Beruhigung, daß er ſich nie den Mund verbrennen könne, wobei er obendrein ſymboliſch der ganzen Welt andeutet, daß er Haare auf den Zähnen habe. Trotz Allem iſt er aber doch ein ganz ſcharmanter Mann, ein Mann in ſeinen beſten Jahren, ſein Alter nämlich eben ſo zweifelhaft wie die Farbe ſeines Rockes und ſeine eigentliche Geſinnung. Er fürchtet mich zu ſtören und fragt mich artig, was mich denn ſo eifrig beſchäftige. — Wohlgemuth reiche ich ihm das beſchriebene Blatt. Er lieſt, macht ein officielles Geſicht, fühlt ob ſein Schnurrbart noch feucht ſei und es lagert ſich nun über ſein ganzes Antlitz — wie eine große Narbe, die ſchreiende rothe Zeugin heißen Kampfes — eine Falte, gleich dem Striche, den er unwillkürlich krampfhaft über meine armen ſämmtlichen Zeilen mit ſpitzer aber ergiebiger Feder zieht. Erſchreckt ſehe ich ihn an — er lächelt wieder — er hat ſich ſelbſt genug gethan und gelebt für ſeine Zeit. Nun entſpinnt ſich folgendes Geſpräch zwiſchen uns:

Er. Beſter! Sie wollen über Univerſitäten ſchreiben? Das iſt ſehr bedenklich, faſt, ſo zu ſagen, gefährlich. —

Ich. Ueber Univerſitäten? — Gott bewahre mich! — Eine Naturgeſchichte der deutſchen Studenten hat ja nichts mit Univerſitäten zu thun, nur mit der Univerſität.

Er. Sie entgehen mir nicht, Theuerſter! Unmaaßgeblich möchte ich Ihnen rathen, überhaupt gar nicht zu ſchreiben, oder, wenn Sie, vielleicht von inneren Krämpfen geplagt, das Schreiben nicht laſſen können, doch wenigſtens nichts dem Drucke zu übergeben. Sie



Univ. Bibl.
München

erſparen ſich dadurch manche Unannehmlichkeit. Schreiben Sie alſo unzielſetzlich nicht.

Ich. Das iſt eben mein Unglück, daß ich juſt unzielſetzlich ſchreiben muß.

Er. Ich ſollte meinen, wenn Sie über Univerſitäten ſchreiben, ſchreiben Sie gerade ſehr zielſetzlich.

Ich. Das heißt, Sie meinen, wenn ich über Univerſitäten ſchriebe, ſo wäre ich, mit Fichte zu reden, das Ich, das ſich ſelbſt ſetzt, als Ziel nämlich, welches alle Regierungen im Auge haben, und nach dem jeder Univerſitätsprofeſſor, der ängſtlich über der Zahl ſeiner Zuhörer brütet und daher alle Oeffentlichkeit fürchtet wie die Peſt, ſeine ſtumpfen Pfeile heimlich, oder öffentlich in den akademiſchen Literaturzeitungen, was jetzt daſſelbe iſt, nämlich heimlich, abſchießt. — Ich werde aber ſo klug ſein, mich nicht zu nennen.

Er. Man wird Sie aber errathen. Sie können ſich gar nicht verbergen. Ihr Styl iſt zu kenntlich. So wie mir ein Concept von Ihnen gebracht wird, erkenne ich Sie gleich.

Ich. So werde ich mir einen anderen Namen geben, z. B. Heinrich Heine.

Er. Was iſt das für ein unglücklicher Einfall? Sie wiſſen, das Anathema über die Autorenpentarchie iſt noch nicht aufgehoben, trotz dem daß ſich mehr als ein Mund zum krankhaften Greinen darüber verzogen und nun durch die loyale Fiſtel ſingt.

Ich. Gut, ſo will ich mich Friedrich Zollverein nennen.

Er. Ein ſolcher Name wird eben ſo wenig geduldet werden können, die Ironie deſſelben gleicht einer Congreviſchen Rakete; äußerlich nur eine Papp-Hülſe, aber wenn ſie platzt, ſtrömt griechiſches unauslöſchliches Feuer heraus. — Nur gewiſſe Leute erlauben ſich dergleichen.

Ich. Gewiſſe Leute — wen meinen Ew. Hochwohlgeboren damit?

Er (nach kurzer Pauſe einen zerſchmetternden Blick auf mich werfend). Leute wie Sie, unnütze, unberufene Schriftſteller, die die väterlichen Abſichten der Regierungen abſichtlich verkennen, die nachſichtige Behandlung, die ihnen zu Theil wird, rückſichtslos misbrauchen. Leute, die — — —

Ich. Theuerſter Gönner, ereifern Sie ſich nicht. Wie iſt es möglich, daß Sie mich ſo verkennen? Es iſt ja Niemand ſo dankbar bereit, guten offiziellen Rath oder offiziell guten Rath anzunehmen, wie ich. Wirklich, Sie thun mir ſchweres Unrecht. Sagen Sie nur, was ſoll, was kann ich thun?

Er. Nun denn. Sie wollen über Studenten ſchreiben; Sie können nicht über Studenten ſchreiben ohne über Univerſitäten zu ſchreiben. Das iſt doppelt polizeiwidrig. Einmal weil die Univerſitäten leider der Heerd der Demagogie waren, dann weil in letzterer Zeit die loyalen Univerſitäten mit ihren Corporationseigenſchaften und kleinen Altersſchwächen ſchon auf die rückſichtsloſeſte Weiſe in einem Oppoſitionsjournal, zum Aerger und Verdruſſe aller Wohlgeſinnten, beſprochen worden ſind. Hat man nicht dort auf die kränkendſte Weiſe Halle den Pietismus, Leipzig den Pedantismus, Jena den Nepotismus, Kiel den Marasmus, Tübingen das Schwabenthum, Göttingen den philoſophiſchen Nihilismus und ſo weiter ohne Weiteres vorgeworfen und den heimlichen Krebsſchaden jeder dieſer armen Hochſchulen dem Spott des ungelehrten Pöbels preisgegeben? Hat man nicht die armen Profeſſoren, von denen man ſagte, daß ſie deshalb öffentliche heißen, weil ihnen alle Oeffentlichkeit ein Gräuel, ordentliche, weil ſie nichts Außerordentliches und außerordentliche, weil ſie nichts Ordentliches leiſten, an den Pranger geſtellt vor dem geſammten Deutſchland, namentlich vor der ſtudirenden Jugend und ſo das letzte Bischen Pietät ruchlos zerſtört, das ſich bisher noch, ich möchte faſt ſagen traditionell bei dieſer erhalten hatte?

Ich. Das iſt allerdings wahr; aber was geht das mich an? Damit habe ich nichts zu thun.

Er. Nicht? Sie irren. — Wenn Sie eine Naturgeſchichte des Löwen ſchreiben wollen, ſo müſſen Sie ſeine Höhle ſchildern, des Adlers, ſo müſſen Sie ſeinen Horſt beſchreiben, der Nachtigall, ſo müſſen Sie ihr Neſt darſtellen. Höhle, Horſt, Neſt aber der deutſchen Studenten ſind die Univerſitäten.

Ich. Die Univerſitäten nicht, nur die Univerſität. —

Er. Nein, die Univerſitäten. Wie die verſchiedenen Schwalben verſchieden den Winter im Schlaf der Erſtarrung zubringen, ſo leben auch die Studenten verſchieden auf den verſchiedenen deutſchen Univerſitäten.

Ich. Ein geiſtreicher Gedanke! — Demgemäß könnte man alſo ſagen: der deutſche Student horſtet in Heidelberg, Jena, Freiburg, Gießen, Marburg, Kiel; niſtet in Halle, Bonn, Breslau, Tübingen, Erlangen, Leipzig; lebt in ſeinem Bau zu Berlin und Göttingen, in ſeiner Höhle in München. In welchem Sumpfe dieſe Wanderſchwalbe den erſtarrenden Winterſchlaf verträumt, möchte dagegen ſchwerer zu beſtimmen ſein, die Beſtimmung wenigſtens heftigen Widerſpruch finden. — Aber ſeien Sie ruhig, werthgeſchätzteſter Gönner! auf ſolche Einzelnheiten denke ich mich gar nicht einzulaſſen.

Er. Sie ſollten lieber das ganze Buch gar nicht ſchreiben.

Ich. Sie haben ja die Gründe, die mich dazu bewegen, bereits geleſen.

Er. Sie meinen, das Verſchwinden des echten Studententhums. Das iſt aber eine ganz irrige, hypochondriſche Anſicht. Was nennen Sie echtes Studententhum? worin beſteht es eigentlich nach Ihrer Meinung?

Ich. Soll ich Ihnen das jetzt ſchon ſagen? Sie werden ja als mein hochgeehrter Chef der Erſte ſein, der es in meinem Buche lieſt, das ich Ihnen pflichtſchuldigſt überreichen muß, um von Ihnen die Erlaubniß zu erhalten, es herauszugeben, da nach Paragraph 7777 der Dikaſterial-Ordnung kein Subalterner etwas ohne Erlaubniß ſeiner Oberen drucken laſſen darf.

Er. Bekannten loyalen Beamten pflege ich die Erlaubniß zu ertheilen, ohne ihre Schriften zu leſen; ich habe ſchon ſo entſetzlich viel mit mir unbekannten Dingen zu thun, daß es mir Niemand verargen kann, wenn ich mir die Arbeit etwas leichter mache.

Ich. Das iſt ſehr wahr. So will ich denn aus wahrhafter Neigung zu Ihnen mir bei dem erſten Kapitel, in welchem ich zu entwickeln gedenke, welchen Begriff ich den Worten deutſcher Student beilege, ganz beſondere Mühe geben.

Er. Wie? — Sie wollen trotz meinem Abrathen doch das Buch ſchreiben? Wo iſt denn nur die Nothwendigkeit es zu thun? Schreiben Sie doch lieber irgend etwas Anderes; es giebt ja ſo viele nützliche nie genug zu beſprechende Gegenſtände wie z. B. über den Nutzen des Runkelrübenzuckers, den ſchädlichen Einfluß der Hegelſchen Philoſophie, die Wichtigkeit der neuen Tuchbereitung, die Herabſetzung des Briefportos, lauter Dinge, durch welche ſich ein gemeinnütziger Schriftſteller einen berühmten Namen erwerben kann.

Ich. Kann es etwas Wichtigeres geben als die Beſchränkung der akademiſchen Freiheit, die daraus ſich entwickelnde Abnahme des freien geiſtigen Forſchens auf unſeren Univerſitäten und das Sinken des echten deutſchen Studententhums, dies Verwelken eines Keims, aus dem ſich einſt ſo herrliche Blüthen entwickelten?

Er. Sie ſehen da Dinge, die kein anderer vernünftiger Menſch ſieht. Wann wären denn die Univerſitäten, wann das ganze freie wiſſenſchaftliche Streben auf denſelben geſunken? Sind ſie nicht jetzt blühender und beſuchter als je? Zeichnen ſich nicht die Studenten durch Beſcheidenheit, Fleiß, Sittlichkeit höchſt vortheilhaft aus? Wie ſelten fällt gegenwärtig Einer durch's Examen! Wie unendlich mehr wird von ihnen gefordert an poſitivem Wiſſen als früher! Zeigen Sie mir jetzt einen Kameraliſten, der nicht genau die ganze römiſche Rechtsgeſchichte ſeit Erbauung Roms bis zum Romulus Auguſtulus an den Fingern herzuzählen im Stande iſt; einen Mediciner, der nicht alle Syſteme der Metaphyſik von Ariſtoteles bis auf Hegel kennt, einen Juriſten der nicht den Sündenfall und die Entſtehung des Rechtes aus demſelben eben ſo gründlich zu deduciren weiß, wie der beſte Theolog; einen Theologen, der nicht das kleinſte Kräutlein nach Linné oder Juſſieu genau zu beſtimmen vermag, und einen Philologen, der nicht eben ſo geſchickt in der Phyſik und Chemie iſt, wie man es nur von einem Oerſtedt, Berzelius, Döbereiner, Liebig u. ſ. w. verlangen kann. Das können Sie doch wahrhaft nicht Sinken der Univerſitäten, Abnahme des freien wiſſenſchaftlichen Forſchens nennen?

Ich. Doch — denn —

Er. Sie ſind unverbeſſerlich. — Nein, nie waren unſere Univerſitäten ſo heilbringende, ſegensreiche, für den Staat ſo nützliche Anſtalten, wie gerade jetzt. Seit die Studenten von den letzten demagogiſchen Träumen erwacht ſind — —

Ich. Hat ſich eine gewiſſe Abſpannung und Nüchternheit eingeſtellt, die —

Er. Sie wollen doch nicht den verderblichen, revolutionären Tendenzen das Wort reden, mein Herr?

Ich. Gott bewahre mich! Ich haſſe die Ueberſpanntheit, alles ſich Ueberheben und Ueberſchätzen, alle Anmaaßung wie die Peſt und ſomit auch jenes Treiben, das nach allen Seiten hin unberechenbaren Schaden geſtiftet, und das nie hätte aufkommen können, wenn der ernſte und erhabene Geiſt freier und gründlicher wiſſenſchaftlicher Forſchung und die friſche fromme Luſt an demſelben nicht von unſeren Univerſitäten immer mehr und mehr verſchwunden wäre.

Er. Und dem meinen Sie mit Ihrem Buche wieder aufzuhelfen?

Ich. Das fällt mir gar nicht ein. — Könnte ich es aber, gewiß; denn einen größeren Dienſt vermöchte ich nicht meinem Vaterlande zu leiſten. — Dazu gehören indeſſen andere Kräfte und ein glücklicheres Geſchick.

Er. Wenn Sie nun aber ſelbſt Ihre Unzulänglichkeit einſehen, weshalb und wozu ſchreiben Sie denn ein ſolches Buch?

Ich. Bloß um die Leute zu ärgern.

Er. Laſſen Sie die Poſſen zu Hauſe, mein Wertheſter; ich rede jetzt ſehr ernſt mit Ihnen. Beantworten ſie meine Frage genügender.

Ich. Nun denn ich hoffe, das wird ſich im Laufe des Buches ſelbſt zeigen. Sie wiſſen, nach den beſten Theorien iſt der Zweck eines jeden Kunſtwerkes das Kunſtwerk ſelbſt. Der Humor treibt mich dazu.

Er. Ich haſſe die Humoriſtiker. Leben Sie wohl! Ueber die Erlaubniß zum Druck werde ich erſt Verhaltungsregeln einziehen.—

Er geht zürnend ab, wie falber Blitz zuckt die Streichfalte unaufhörlich über ſein Antlitz dahin; die Haare ſeines Schnurrbartes ſträuben ſich empor wie die Stacheln eines Igels, ſeine Augen — ich habe vergeſſen zu berichten, daß er ſtark ſchielt, was daher kommt, daß er beſtändig mit dem einen Auge nach oben, d. h. nach dem Miniſter blickt, während er mit dem andern die Eingeweide ſeiner Untergebenen zu durchdringen ſucht, um Herzen und Nieren zu prüfen, — alſo ſeine Augen werfen vernichtende Blicke auf mich, von denen der eine aber die in meinem Zimmer befindliche Büſte des Thomaſius, der andere einen an der Wand aufgehängten alten, mit verhängnißvollen, doch längſt verblichenen Farben geſchmückten Schläger trifft. Er geht, nachdem er mir in der Thür mit einer Stentorſtimme zum Abſchied zugerufen: Sie ſind noch ſehr jung! und läßt mich allein

> In meines Nichts durchbohrendem Gefühl,

allen Stürmen, d. h. allen Betrachtungen, die ſich in mir drängen, Preis gegeben. Aber ich bleibe feſt, ich weiche und wanke nicht, und ſchreibe mein Buch trotz allen Artikeln und Paragraphen der Dikaſterial-Ordnung. Es heißt in einem alten, längſt vergeſſenen, deutſchen Trauerſpiel:

> Du kannſt, Prinzeſſin, nicht ein ſchuldlos Herz verdammen,
> Weil es Gefühle hat, die deinen nicht entflammen,

Weil es die Zeit beklagt, wo ſelber jung es war
Und Schmerzen nicht gekannt noch Folter und Gefahr.
Du wirſt es nimmermehr in der Erinn'rung ſtören,
Vergang'ne Tage hier von Neuem zu beſchwören,
Und ernſt zu fragen rings, mit aufgehob'ner Hand,
Ob Aehnliches noch weilt im weiten Vaterland.
Wie Marius ſtand auf den Trümmern von Karthago,
So ſteh' ich hier vor dir, durchlauchtige Virago!
O ſchließ mit deinem Scepter mir grauſam nicht den Mund,
Nein, laß mich, was ich fühle, der Menſchheit geben kund u. ſ. w.

Statt Prinzeſſin ſetze ich Chef, und ich wette, dieſe captatio benevolentiae rührt meinen hohen Vorgeſetzten ſo, daß er mein Buch paſſiren läßt, gerade wie die Polizei einen armen Narren laufen läßt, der ſich im Gedränge mauſig gemacht, aus dem einfachen Grunde, weil ſie nicht recht weiß, was ſie mit ihm anfangen ſoll und weil ſchon Salomo geſagt, daß man einen Narren im Mörſer ſtoßen könne und die Narrheit doch nicht von ihm laſſe.

Nicht ohne tiefe, gründliche Studien, geneigter Leſer, gehe ich an dies Werk; ich habe Alles geleſen, was ſeit Guttenbergs unſterblicher Erfindung über meinen Gegenſtand und deſſen Naturgeſchichte, geſchrieben worden iſt, von Happelii akademiſchem Roman, worinnen das Studentenleben vorgebildet wird in einer ſchönen Liebesgeſchichte, (Ulm, 1690), oder dem verliebten und galanten

Studenten (Lübeck, 1731) an, bis zu dem Studentenleben in tugend- und laſterhaften Abſchilderungen (Nürnberg, 1764), Laukhard's Annalen der Univerſität Schilda (Leipzig, 1798), Schiff's Pumpauf und Pumperich (Zerbſt, 1826), und dem deutſchen Studenten (1834) herunter; aber es will mich, um mit meinem Chef zu reden, unmaßgeblich bedünken, als ob Keiner von dieſen ausgezeichneten und ruhmwürdigen Autoren ſeinen hohen Gegenſtand genügend erſchöpft und ergründet hätte, weder der vielbeleſene Happel, noch der vielbetrunkene Laukhard oder der vielgewanderte Verfaſſer des deutſchen Studenten, noch der vielerfahrene Schiff. Sie haben ſämmtlich den Studenten nur von einer Seite, der Nachtſeite, betrachtet und die Tagſeite an ihm wohl deshalb überſehen, weil gewöhnliche Augen nicht die Sonne ſchauen können ohne zu blinzeln, jeder Schriftſteller aber gern mit ſeinem Publikum liebäugelt, und hier um ſo mehr, wo er darauf rechnen kann, daß ſein Held ſelbſt ſein beſtes und aufmerkſamſtes Publikum iſt. An dieſem Liebäugeln wird er natürlich gehindert, wenn das zu ſtarke Licht, das ihn beſtrahlt, ihn die Augen zu ſchließen zwingt. Das brauche ich nun nicht zu befürchten; ich habe mich in dieſen Strahlen gebadet, und ich darf behaupten, daß dieſe meine Schilderung der Platte eines Daguerrotyps zu vergleichen ſei, denn ich bin darauf ausgegangen, meinen Gegenſtand dem hellſten Sonnenlichte auszuſetzen, damit mir eben auch nicht die kleinſte Schattenparthie an ihm entgehe. Du wirſt nicht von mir verlangen, geneigter Leſer, daß ich Dir ſage, wo und wann ich ſtudirt; ich habe eben gar nicht ſtudirt, ſondern mich nur Studirens halber auf den berühmteſten Univerſitäten Deutſchlands aufgehalten, und bin vor lauter Eifer, ein flotter Student zu ſein, gar nicht zum Studiren gekommen. Ich bin auch weder examinirt noch durch's Examen gefallen, denn ich habe mich gar nicht zum Examen geſtellt, ſondern mich damit begnügt, mich abweſend mit dem Doctorhute ſchmücken zu laſſen, meiner beſonderen Verdienſte wegen, über die ich aus Beſcheidenheit ſelber die gelehrte Facultät im Ungewiſſen erhielt, die mich mit dem Diplome beglückt. Wie früher in Frankreich jedes Findelkind für adelig galt, damit einem von adeligen Eltern erzeugten Findelkinde kein Unrecht geſchähe, ſo wird auch auf vielen deutſchen Univerſitäten jeder Doctorand als ein Findelkind der Wiſſenſchaft in Gottes Namen zum Doctor creirt, um einem wirklichen gelehrten Doctoranden, von deſſen Gelehrſamkeit man aber, da der Mann im Auslande iſt, nur weiß, daß er ſie hätte acquiriren können, kein Unrecht zu thun. Du ſiehſt nun, werthgeſchätzter Leſer, daß mich alle dieſe Eigenſchaften vor tauſend

Andern befähigten, die Hand an das Werk zu legen und das wunderbare Buch, das ich Dir jetzt überreiche, zu verfaſſen; Du haſt, wie ich glauben darf, die Gründe, die mich dazu bewogen, geprüft und probehaltig befunden. Wir hegen gleiche Erwartung von einander, Du, daß mein Buch ein treffliches Werk, ich, daß Du ein trefflicher Leſer ſeieſt. Mögen die gütigen Götter geben, daß wir uns Beide nicht täuſchten; iſt es aber doch der Fall, ſo waſche ich meine Hände in Unſchuld, denn Du kannſt und mußt eigentlich jetzt ſchon wiſſen, was Du an mir haſt. —

Erſtes Kapitel.

Begriff des Wortes Student. — Was heißt und woran erkennt man einen deutſchen Studenten? Wodurch zeichnet er ſich vor allen übrigen Studenten der Erde aus? —

Student heißt eigentlich im Allgemeinen jeder, der ſich bemüht, im Beſonderen aber jeder, der ſich bemüht für einen Menſchen zu gelten, der die Schule hinter ſich und die Wiſſenſchaft vor ſich hat. Ueber dieſe letztere ſind nun freilich die Meinungen verſchieden und wechſeln mit den Zeiten und den Verhältniſſen. So z. B. verſteht ein deutſcher Student im erſten Semeſter unter Wiſſenſchaft meiſt die Phyſiologie, in ſo fern ſie ſich mit der Lehre vom Wachsthum der Haare über der Oberlippe und auf dem Kinne beſchäftigt, oder die Statiſtik, welche, wenn ſie genau ſein will, auch die Zahl der Vergnügungsörter und deren verſchiedene Eigenſchaften und Beſchaffenheit an dem Orte, wo er ſeinem Studium obliegt und in deſſen nächſter Umgebung, auf das Pünktlichſte angeben muß; ferner jenen Theil der Zoologie, der von den Füchſen und Brandfüchſen zu handeln pflegt. Zur Kenntniß der Bären und anderer Raubthiere gelangt er gewöhnlich erſt ſpäter; doch findet man auch, obwohl ſelten, daß ein ſehr fleißiger Student ſich bereits in den erſten Monaten ſeiner akademiſchen Laufbahn eine gründliche Kenntniß dieſes Theils der Naturgeſchichte erwirbt. Iſt er noch ſehr jung, ſo begnügt er ſich, hinſichtlich der erſt erwähnten Forſchungen, nicht immer mit der Phyſiologie allein, ſondern beſchäftigt ſich auch, wenn dieſe ihm nicht ausreichend ſcheint, mit der Chemie, denn er ſieht nur zu bald ein, daß es in den gewöhnlichen Lebensverhältniſſen mit der Natur und ihrer Kunde allein nicht gethan iſt, ſondern daß die Kunſt ihr zu Zeiten förderlich unter die Arme greifen muß, um ihre Entwickelung oder Geſtaltung zu beſchleunigen. Im zweiten Semeſter wendet er ſich ſchon ernſteren Dingen zu, und verſteht unter Wiſſenſchaft theils jenen Abſchnitt in der Jurisprudenz, der von den Injurien handelt; theils die diverſen Kapitel der Chirurgie, in welchen die Lehre von den Wunden und deren Heilung vorgetragen wird, ohne jedoch das Studium der oben erwähnten Disciplinen, namentlich der Statiſtik, die er dann bereits auf die angrenzenden Orte auszudehnen pflegt, darüber zu vernachläſſigen. Im dritten Semeſter ſind ſeine Studien, oder richtiger, iſt die Wiſſenſchaft, der er ſich hingiebt, ſchon objectiver und umfaſſender; vom Naturrecht oder der Lehre vom Menſchen im Zuſtand der Wildheit, geht er gewöhnlich mit großem Intereſſe zum Studium des Contrat social, des jus belli et pacis und, falls er ſich unter ſeinen Genoſſen einiges Anſehens erfreut, auch der Geſetzgebung über. Während dieſer erſten drei Halbjahre hat er ſich zugleich emſig des Sprachſtudiums befliſſen und vielleicht den auf ſeiner Univerſität herrſchenden Dialect durch manche kühne Wortbildung bereichert. Dieſelben Studien treibt er zum Theil auch noch während des vierten Semeſters angelegentlich, doch ſteigen mitunter leiſe Zweifel in ihm auf, als ſei die bisher gepflogene Wiſſenſchaft nicht ganz die rechte, und als habe er doch eigentlich die Philoſophie, und in dieſer namentlich die Metaphyſik, unter welcher er nur die Lehre von den künftigen Dingen zu verſtehen pflegt, zu ſehr vernachläſſigt. — Er beſchließt nun, im fünften Semeſter dies Verſäumniß eifrig nachzuholen und beginnt mit dem Anfange aller Philoſophie, mit der Logik und der Erkenntnißtheorie; doch gelangt er häufig nicht zur gänzlichen Durchdringung derſelben, weil die Praxis ihn zu oft noch davon abzieht und große Lücken in ſeinen Heften veranlaßt. Endlich im ſechſten Semeſter fängt er an einzuſehen, daß die Wiſſenſchaft derjenigen Facultät, bei der er inſcribirt wurde, die allein wahre ſei, und iſt emſig bemüht, ſich ſoviel von derſelben anzueignen, als es ihm binnen ſechs kurzer, von Ferien unterbrochenen Monaten nur irgend möglich iſt. Er will jetzt von allen jenen früheren ſo heiß geliebten Studien nichts mehr wiſſen, aber — nun iſt er auch kein Student mehr, ſondern durch ſeinen Irrthum zu den wiederkäuenden Thieren, welche Menſchen und Studenten Ochſen zu nennen pflegen, hinabgeſunken. Wohl ihm, wenn dieſer Zuſtand nur ein vorübergehender iſt und ſich aus der Verpuppung, in welche er ſich gewiſſermaßen gewaltſam einſpann, ein glänzender Schmetterling entwickelt, den ſeine bunten Flügel nun als Kandidat, Rechtspraktikant, Doctor der Arzneigelehrtheit, oder Privatdocent, frei durch die ganze Welt, worunter, wie immer bei den Sterblichen, nur ſeine Welt zu verſtehen iſt, tragen können. —

Dies iſt im Allgemeinen ſo ziemlich der Begriff, den ein großer Theil der Studenten, wenigſtens in den erſten Semeſtern, von Dem hat, was man mit einer generellen Bezeichnung Wiſſenſchaft zu nennen pflegt. Eine gewiſſe Philoſophie findet ſich bei Allen vor; ſie ſind nämlich feſte Anhänger des Abſoluten, doch muß daſſelbe allein aus ihnen als Urprincip ſich entwickeln, nicht aber antagoniſtiſch, als außer ihnen ſeiend, ihnen entgegengeſtellt werden. Daß ſich Mancher von ihnen ſeine Anſicht anders geſtalte, wird Niemand, der je eine Univerſität beſucht, in Abrede ſtellen wollen. Der Eine verbindet mit jenem oben angeführten Theil der Statiſtik noch diejenigen Kapitel aus der Chemie, welche im Allgemeinen vom Gährungsproceß überhaupt und im Beſonderen von der Gährung der verſchiedenen Arten des Trauben- oder Gerſtenſaftes, oder gar von der Rectification der einzelnen Spiritusarten handeln und bringt es in deren gründlicher Erforſchung ſehr weit, oft ſo weit, daß man gar nicht fehl greift, wenn man ihn nicht mehr auf Deutſch Student, ſondern nur lateiniſch studiosus nennt. Ein Anderer, der ein Freund der auf Univerſitäten leider viel zu gering geachteten Philologie iſt, wendet ſich dieſer gelegentlich auch zu und ſucht praktiſch die Wahrheiten, die er in der ars amatoria und den amores des Ovid oder in ähnlichen verwandten alten Klaſſikern findet, in Anwendung zu bringen. Ein Dritter treibt vorzugsweiſe gern Mathematik und beſchäftigt ſich beſonders mit den Gleichungen und Wahrſcheinlichkeitsrechnungen, welche ſich am Intereſſanteſten im ſogenannten Buch der Könige ſtudiren laſſen. Dieſe Studien zeichnen den Studenten als ſolchen aber nicht eigentlich aus, es kann ſie ein Jeder an jedem Orte treiben und der Aufenthalt auf der Univerſität iſt keine nothwendige Bedingung dabei, während jene früher genannten Studien nur allein auf der Hochſchule gedeihen und von Niemandem ſonſt, als vom wirklichen, immatriculirten Studenten getrieben werden können, namentlich der Theil der Naturgeſchichte, welcher von den Füchſen, Brandfüchſen, Bären, Finken, Ochſen und anderen zahmen und wilden Thieren handelt.

Nachdem wir ſo den Begriff der Wörter Student und Wiſſenſchaft im Allgemeinen und Beſonderen entwickelt haben, gehen wir zu dem ſpeciellen Theile dieſes unſeres erſten Kapitels über, der ſich mit der Frage zu beſchäftigen hat: Was heißt ein deutſcher Student, und woran erkennt man ihn? Die erſte Hälfte dieſer Frage iſt nicht ganz leicht genügend zu beantworten, da hinſichtlich ihrer eine zu große Meinungsverſchiedenheit Statt findet und die Gelehrten über manche Punkte derſelben durchaus uneinig ſind. Im Allgemeinen könnte man freilich ſagen: Ein deutſcher Student iſt ein Jüngling, dem auf irgend einem Gymnaſium oder durch Privatlehrer ſoviel Griechiſch, Lateiniſch und Mathematik beigebracht wurde, daß er in dem ſogenannten Maturitätsexamen nicht durchfiel und in Folge deſſen von dem Rector oder Prorector der Univerſität gegen Erlegung einer gewiſſen Summe und Gebung eines Handſchlags, daß er in keine verbotene Verbindung treten, auch den akademiſchen Geſetzen gehorſam ſein und wenigſtens halbjährlich das Honorar für ein Brodcollegium pränumerando entrichten, daſſelbe auch, wenn ihn keine anderweitigen Beſchäftigungen daran hindern, möglichſt fleißig beſuchen wolle, immatriculirt worden iſt. — Eine ſolche Definition wäre aber eine oberflächliche und keineswegs der Wichtigkeit und Würde des Gegenſtandes angemeſſene. Suchen wir daher tiefer einzudringen. Ehe wir unſere eigene Anſicht hier zu entwickeln und feſtzuſtellen uns bemühen, ſei es uns geſtattet, die verſchiedenen Meinungen, welche darüber herrſchen, genau zu prüfen. Geſetzt alſo, wir fragten einen Vater, welcher einen oder mehrere Söhne auf der Univerſität hat: Beſter Herr Juſtizrath, Medicinalrath, Paſtor, Schuldirector, Commerzienrath, Landrath, Baudirector u. ſ. w., was nennen Sie eigentlich einen deutſchen Studenten? ſo würde er uns unmaßgeblich antworten: „Ein deutſcher Student iſt ein junger Mann, der ſeinen Aeltern große Sorge macht. Unter anderen ſchlimmen Qualitäten, die ihm par excellence eigen ſind, habe ich vorzüglich folgende zu bemerken: 1) Er kleidet ſich ſelten wie ein anderer vernünftiger Menſch, ſondern gefällt ſich meiſt darin, zu kurze Röcke und zu lange Stiefeln, oder in Ermangelung derſelben, zu weite Hoſen zu tragen. 2) Er rechnet ſich meiſt reich und zählt ſich arm, das heißt, er hat von dem ihm mitgegebenen oder beſtimmten Gelde immer dann Nichts mehr, wenn er es gerade am Nothwendigſten braucht. 3) Er iſt ein abgeſagter Feind aller Rangordnung, und man bringt ihm nur ſchwer den Unterſchied der Stände und den gehörigen Reſpect vor vornehmen und in der bürgerlichen Geſellſchaft hochſtehenden Perſonen bei. 4) Er iſt weit klüger als ſein Vater, und das um ſo mehr, je weiter die Zeit, wo dieſer den Studien oblag, von der entfernt iſt, in welcher er die Univerſität beſucht. 5) Der Muth äußert ſich bei ihm zur unrechten Zeit; vor einer blanken Klinge, einem ſpitzigen Degen, einem derben Prügel oder einer geladenen Piſtole hat er nie die geringſte Furcht, vor dem Examen jedoch ſtets die größte. 6) Er iſt ſehr geneigt, ſich zu verlieben, ja ſogar ſich zu verloben, obwohl eine Studentenbraut einem Wechſel zu vergleichen, der am jüngſten Tage erſt zur Verfallzeit kommt und ſelbſt dann noch proteſtirt werden kann, wodurch ſeinen und anderen Aeltern oft nicht geringe Verdrießlichkeiten bereitet werden. Endlich 7) er kann nie zur rechten Zeit fertig werden, und wenn man meint, er habe nun mit ſeinem Triennium auch das ganze Studium hinter ſich, ſo will er gemeiniglich erſt recht anfangen zu ſtudiren und ruht nicht eher, bis man ſeinem Herzen einen Stoß giebt, in den durch ihn ſehr erleichterten Geldbeutel greift und ihm noch ein halbes oder ganzes Jahr, in Erwartung einer glänzenden Cenſur (eine Hoffnung, die ſich aber unter hundert Malen neunundneunzig Mal nicht erfüllt), auf der Univerſität zu verweilen geſtattet.“ — So redet in dieſem Falle ein ſorgſamer Vater und erfahrener Staatsbürger, und es iſt nicht zu läugnen, daß die böſe Galgenzahl dieſer ſcharfen Diſtinctionen ſo ziemlich im Stande ſei, einen nicht ganz undeutlichen Begriff von dem inneren, eigenthümlichen Weſen eines deutſchen Studenten beizubringen. — Fahren wir nun, zu noch gründlicherer Erforſchung, zu fragen fort; wenden wir uns einmal um des Gegenſatzes willen an eine junge Dame und hören wir ihre Antwort. Sie lautet unzweifelhaft ſo: „Ein deutſcher Student iſt ein liebenswürdiger, ritterlich geſinnter, meiſt eigenthümlich gekleideter junger Mann, der ſich durch ſeine Bildung auszeichnet, unermüdlich gern tanzt, weshalb man ihn als eine Zierde der Bälle und Soiréen betrachten kann, voll Höflichkeit gegen die Damen, immer bereit, ihre Wünſche zu erfüllen und ſchwärmeriſcher Verehrung zart empfindender weiblicher Seelen nicht abgeneigt, ſie gern durch poetiſche Huldigungen oder andere feine Aufmerkſamkeiten feiernd, kurz, ein Muſter der Vollkommenheit, zwei geringe Fehler abgerechnet, von denen in ſeiner Blüthenzeit faſt keiner frei bleibt, die ſich aber ſpäter allmälig geben. Er kann nämlich 1) keinen Lieutenant leiden aus Idioſynkraſie, wie mein Vater ſagt und bekommt 2) eben ſo leicht etwas in den Kopf wie in das Herz, was ihn mitunter unangenehm macht. Viele ältere Perſonen wollen behaupten, wenn er ſich in ſeiner Entwickelungsperiode befinde, ſo ſei ihm häuſig eine Magd im Putz willkommener als ein adeliges Fräulein oder eine Profeſſorentochter. Dies Letztere ſoll jedoch aus einem wunderlichen Aberglauben, daß er ſich in unſerer Geſellſchaft geniren müſſe, entſpringen. Bemerkenswerth iſt außerdem noch an ihm ſeine Treue; während ein Officier dieſe gute Eigenſchaft ſchon zu verlieren pflegt, wenn er die Garniſon wechſelt, bewahrt ein Student ſie ſtandhaft noch auf den anderen Univerſitäten, die er beſucht, ja er nimmt ſie oft ſogar noch in das wirkliche Leben hinüber, bis endlich die Proſa des Alltags, gewiß wider ſeinen Willen, dieſe letzten Trümmer einer ſchönen Feenwelt in ihm zerſtört." — Das iſt doch wahrlich eine ſehr hübſche Definition, die ganz anders klingt als die obige. Unparteilich iſt ſie gewiß auch, denn — ich will es meinem Leſer nur verrathen — die holde Antwortende hat weder einen Profeſſor zum Vater noch einen Bruder auf der Univerſität, ſondern pflegt nur dann und wann, beſonders im Winter, auf einige Monate ihren Onkel, den Univerſitätsrichter, zu beſuchen, der doch gewiß die Herzen und Nieren zu prüfen und die Böcke von den Schafen zu trennen weiß. Uebrigens trifft ſie, was ich wohl zu bemerken bitte, in ihrer Anſicht von der Empfänglichkeit eines Studenten-Herzens mit dem oben erwähnten citirten Papa überein; ein Umſtand, der ſehr für die Gründlichkeit und Gediegenheit ihres Urtheils ſpricht. Ich kann mich aber unmöglich damit begnügen und finde es nothwendig, noch mehr Zeugen zu vernehmen, ehe ich die Acten für ſpruchreif halten darf. Da nun die junge Dame einen Officier gewiſſermaßen als einen gebornen Gegner der Studenten aufgeführt hat, ſo ſcheint es mir gar nicht übel, auch die Meinung eines Solchen zu vernehmen. — Wertheſter Herr Lieutenant, was iſt ein deutſcher Student? — „Auf Ehre, mein Beſter, das iſt eine Frage de quelque importance; wenn Sie aber meine Opinion hören wollen, ſo werde ich ſie Ihnen nicht vorenthalten. Ein deutſcher Student iſt ein junger meiſt ſehr arroganter Mann, der ſich das Recht, einen Schnurrbart zu tragen und mit einem Militär zu rangiren, auf wunderliche Weiſe angemaaßt, dabei aber eine große Averſion gegen Epaulettes hat, ſich einbildet, Alles beſſer zu wiſſen und zu können als alle anderen Leute, und weil er den ganzen Tag auf dem Fechtboden liegt, anſtatt die Vorleſungen zu beſuchen, bei jeder Gelegenheit mit einer Forderung da iſt, ſich ganz wacker ſchlägt oder ſchießt, das kann man ihm nicht abſprechen, aber im Duell meiſt mehr Glück als Verſtand und keineswegs das rechte savoir faire hat, auch ſich in ſeiner Geſellſchaft und beſonders bei Damen gar nicht zu benehmen weiß, auf Seele nicht! Auch tanzt er ſehr ſchlecht.“ — So urtheilt der Herr Secondlieutenant, nachdem er vor zwei Jahren das Cadettenhaus verlaſſen und in einer

Univerſitätsſtadt in Garniſon geſtanden. — Im Punkt der Furchtloſigkeit vor Degen, Säbel und Piſtolen trifft er auch mit dem Papa zuſammen, während ſeine Anſicht der der jungen Dame durchaus entgegengeſetzt ſcheint. — Die Sache wird alſo immer verwickelter und wir müſſen noch mehr Zeugen abhören. — Fragen wir nun einmal einen Univerſitätsprofeſſor und zwar einen öffentlichen, ordentlichen, der im Senat ſitzt und wenn er Decan iſt, Doctoren creirt, der muß es doch am Beſten wiſſen. — Seine Entgegnung auf unſere Frage lautet: „Distinguendum est unter Studenten und Studenten. Es giebt mehrere Arten von Studenten und es ſcheint mir nöthig, zu leichterer Ueberſicht, folgendes Schema zu entwerfen, nämlich:

A) der Student im Allgemeinen. Dieſer zerfällt in:

A A) den fleißigen Studenten,

A B) den faulen Studenten.

A A) Der fleißige Student wird wiederum eingetheilt in:

A A a) den fleißigen ruhigen Studenten,

A A b) den fleißigen aber unruhigen Studenten.

A A a) der fleißige ruhige Student kann ſein:

A A a α) ein Student der Theologie.

A A a β) ein Student der Philoſophie,
A A a γ) ein Student der Jurisprudenz,
A A a δ) ein Student der Medicin.

Hier ſind wieder folgende Unterabtheilungen feſtzuſtellen, nämlich:

A A a β) ein Student der Philoſophie kann ſein:

A A a β א) ein Student der Philoſophie im Allgemeinen, oder:
A A a β ב) ein Student der Philologie, oder auch — —"

Beſter Herr Profeſſor, bitte, bemühen Sie ſich nicht weiter; wenn wir ſo fortfahren zu diſtinguiren, ſo müſſen wir nothwendig dem geneigten Leſer alle gute Laune extinguiren, und er wirft das Buch weg, ohne dahinter zu kommen, was eigentlich ein deutſcher Student ſei. Das könnte aber ganzen Generationen unberechnenbaren Schaden bringen. Denken Sie nur, es ſäße Jemand im Cultminiſterium, der nicht ſtudirt hätte, ſondern ſeine wiſſenſchaftliche Bildung im Cadetteninſtitute oder auf einer Ritterakademie erhalten, und ſollte Sr. Majeſtät oder Sereniſſimo einen Vortrag halten über die Landesuniverſität. Der gute und vortreffliche Mann ſucht ſeinen Gegenſtand möglichſt zu penetriren und zu approfundiren, aber Ihre haarſcharfen Diſtinctionen machen ihn eben durch ihre Genauigkeit verwirrt;

es will ihm durchaus nicht in den Kopf, daß es ſo viele Gattungen, Arten, Abarten, Unterarten, Unterabarten und Unarten von Studenten geben könne, er wirft daher verdrießlich alle zuſammen, nimmt nur eine allgemeine Klaſſe an — und was iſt die natürliche Folge? Es kommen Reſcripte auf Reſcripte an den illuſtren Senat über Verbindungen, Duelle, Collegienbeſuch u. ſ. w. der Studioſen, die entweder durchaus nicht in das Werk zu ſetzen ſind, oder eine noch zwei Mal ſo große Confuſion hervorbringen, als eben dadurch vermieden werden ſoll. Nie aber verlieren Menſchen und Studioſen mehr den Reſpect vor den Geſetzen, als wenn ſie wiſſen, daß es Geſetze giebt, die allein deswegen da ſind, um nicht in Kraft zu treten; ungefähr ſo, wie jener Jude umgekehrt meinte, die falſchen Eide ſeien nur dazu da, um geſchworen zu werden; denn würden ſie nicht geſchworen, ſo gäbe es ja keine falſchen Eide, und es könne von ihnen nie und nirgends die Rede ſein. Daß Sie, wertheſter Herr  Rath (ich laſſe nämlich Platz für das Ihnen gebührende Medicinal-, Juſtiz-, Hof- oder Geheime — weil mir bekannt iſt, daß Sie, wie alle Ihre Herren Collegen, ſehr auf ihren Titel halten, ich Sie nicht gern verletzen möchte, und doch wohl weiß, daß es jetzt auf den meiſten Univerſitäten keinen ſimpeln, ordentlichen, öffentlichen Profeſſor mehr giebt, ſondern nur Räthe mit Vorſchlagſylben); alſo, daß Sie, wertheſter Herr  Rath, auf dem Katheder ſo ſcharf diſtinguiren, finde ich ſehr richtig, es wäre ſonſt nicht möglich, die Zeit gehörig einzutheilen, und mit dem Schluß Ihrer Vorleſungen genau zu dem vorgeſchriebenen Termin, vor welchem durchaus die Ferien nach den neueſten Verordnungen nicht beginnen ſollen, zu gelangen. Für die vorzutragende Disciplin, und noch mehr für den Fleiß der Studenten, die ſonſt davon ziehen, ehe ſie Alles gelernt haben, und die Wiſſenſchaft wie einen Spargel betrachten, von dem ſie den Kopf eſſen und das Uebrige als ungenießbar liegen laſſen — (als ob es in Ihrer Wiſſenſchaft überhaupt etwas Ungenießbares gäbe) — iſt Ihre Methode gewiß höchſt erſprießlich; uns wäre aber wirklich ſchlecht damit gedient; wir würden mit dem erſten Kapitel mehrere hundert Seiten füllen, und den Reſt auf wenigen Blättern abthun müſſen; denn wie Ihnen das Miniſterialreſcript, das Ihnen vorſchreibt, wann Sie mit der Wiſſenſchaft zu Ende ſein ſollen, ſteht mir der Verleger drohend entgegen, der ſeinen Papierbedarf für dieſes Buch ſchon beſtellt hat, und ſchwerlich bei Ihrer Art und Weiſe ausreichen würde. Erlauben Sie mir alſo, von der Noth getrieben, unſere Unterhaltung abzubrechen, und da die Theorie mich im Stiche zu laſſen ſcheint, mich der Praxis zuzuwenden. Ich ſehe nämlich eben den Pedell mit dem Umlaufskaſten ſich ihrem Hauſe nahen, und geſtatte mir ihn aufzuhalten und ihm dieſelbe Frage zu thun, die ich vor gerade fünf und zwanzig Minuten — denn ſo lange hat bei Ihrer bedächtigen und abgemeſſenen Redeweiſe unſere Unterhaltung gedauert — die Ehre hatte Ihnen vorzulegen. Der gute Mann war, wenn ich nicht irre, lange bei Ihnen Kutſcher, Bedienter und Famulus in einer Perſon, Sie ſind gut mit ihm, er iſt gut mit Ihnen gefahren, oder richtiger, er hat Sie gut gefahren, weshalb Sie in der Ueberzeugung, die Univerſität werde auch gut mit ihm fahren, ihm dies einträgliche Aemtchen verſchafft haben, dem er um ſo würdiger vorſteht, als er mehrere Jahre in den Dienſten eines deutſchen Fürſten in Uniform ſteckte, ehe er das Glück hatte, ſich in Ihre Dienſte und in Ihre Livree zu ſtecken, und reſpective in beiden zu ſtrecken. Er ſieht, daß ich aus Ihrem Hauſe komme, über die Studentenjahre hinaus bin, vermuthet wahrſcheinlich in mir einen neuberufenen Profeſſor, der ſeine eigene Univerſitätszeit längſt vergeſſen, und antwortet mir daher ſehr höflich und in wohlgeſetzter Rede: „Ein deutſcher Student, mein Herrrrr, — iſt ein eigenthümlicher Menſch; bei Tage ſehr höflich und artig, aber bei Nacht hat er, beſonders in Kaffeehäuſern, Bierkellern u. ſ. w., die unangenehme Eigenſchaft, daß er das Kerzenlicht, oder brennende Lampendochte, ja ſelbſt die Gasbeleuchtung nicht gut vertragen kann, ſobald ſeine hohe Obrigkeit“ — damit meint der gute Mann nämlich ſich — „in das Zimmer tritt. Durch irgend ein gewaltſames Mittel läßt er im Nu die tiefſte Dunkelheit entſtehen und, das wiſſen Sie wohl, wo kein Licht iſt, da iſt auch keine Ordnung; und wo keine Ordnung iſt, gilt auch kein Geſetz. Von den übrigen Folgen dieſes ungeſetzlichen Zuſtandes erlauben Sie mir zu ſchweigen. Ueberhaupt wirkt die Nacht höchſt ſonderbar auf ihn; es iſt mir ſchon widerfahren, daß mehr als ein Studioſus mir bei Tage, als ſeinem beſten Freunde, die Hand ſchüttelte, und in der Dunkelheit mich als ſeinen ärgſten Feind todtſchlagen wollte; dieſer abnorme Zuſtand wirkt im Allgemeinen ſehr anſteckend, je mehr ihrer beiſammen ſind, deſto leichter theilt er ſich Allen mit, und deſto heftiger äußert er ſich. — Uebrigens beſitzt der Student außerordentliche Klugheit und Gewandtheit, und weiß Alles Verbotene — ich habe vergeſſen Ihnen zu ſagen, daß er, was am Strengſten unterſagt iſt, z. B. Duelle, Fenſtereinwerfen, Singen auf den Straßen, das Tragen gewiſſer Bänder und Streifen, gerade am Liebſten thut — auf die liſtigſte Weiſe vor mir zu verbergen, nur macht er es häufig zu liſtig, und eben dadurch komme ich dahinter, was ihn denn natürlich nicht wenig ärgert. Sonſt hat er viele gute Eigenſchaften; er iſt tapfer, redlich, treu und voll Selbſtaufopferung in der Freundſchaft, freigiebig, luſtig, kurz eine liebenswürdige Natur — ja, Herrrrr — das iſt er, und wäre ich nicht Pedell, ſo möchte ich, weiß Gott! Student ſein. — Ich empfehle mich Ihnen zu Gnaden.“ —

Nun das klang wahrlich nicht übel, und iſt um ſo mehr zu glauben, als der Pedell ein Mann iſt, der ſtets bei ſeinem Amtseide über die Studenten ausſagen muß, und daher gewiß in dieſem Punkte nie eine Unwahrheit vorbringt, wenigſtens ſubjectiv ſich ſtets von der Richtigkeit ſeines Zeugniſſes überzeugt hält. Daß er mitunter, in der für ihn ſo gefährlichen Dunkelheit, den Einen für den Anderen anſieht und dem Senate als ſtrafbar anzeigt, kann ihm nicht zur Laſt gelegt werden; denn Irren iſt menſchlich. Auch denkt er hierin wie jener päbſtliche Legat, der bei der Eroberung einer franzöſiſchen Stadt, in der Waldenſer und Katholiken wohnten, gefragt wurde, woran man die Rechtgläubigen von den Ketzern unterſcheiden könne, und zur Antwort gab: „Schlagt ſie nur Alle, ohne Ausnahme, todt, der liebe Gott wird die Seinigen ſchon herausfinden.“ Wenn er gleich zwanzig anzeigt, von denen vielleicht funfzehn unſchuldig ſind, ſo weiß er, daß der illuſtre Senat in väterlicher Milde ſich damit begnügt, Einen oder höchſtens zwei von den Unruhſtiftern zu relegiren oder zu conſiliiren, die Uebrigen aber leer ausgehen oder höchſtens auf das Carcer kommen, was für einen rechtſchaffenen Studenten ein Amuſement iſt, denn ein Student, der noch nicht auf dem Carcer ſaß, gleicht einem Seefahrer, der die Linie noch nicht paſſirte. Auch tröſtet er ſich damit, daß jeder Studioſus gewiß ſchon ein Mal die Strafe, die er jetzt unſchuldig leidet, wirklich verdient habe, und ſieht daher in ſolchem Irrthum nur den Finger der gerechten, allwaltenden, ſicher ſchreitenden Gottheit, der rächenden Nemeſis, die ſtets dem glücklichen Menſchen ſein Glück beneidet.

Ich dächte, wir hätten jetzt ſchon der Zeugen genug vernommen, doch halt — dort naht noch ein ſehr wichtiger und glaubwürdiger Mann für unſeren Zweck — ein junger Privatdocent, der eben aus ſeiner dritten Vorleſung kommt, und genau ſo viele Zuhörer zählt, als er bis jetzt Vorleſungen gehalten hat. Mit freundlichſtem Lächeln, angenehmen Geſten und wohlklingender, obwohl etwas eintöniger Stimme — er hat nämlich die Verlegenheit, öffentlich zu reden, noch nicht ganz überwunden — erwiedert er uns auf unſere Frage: „Die deutſchen Studenten ſind die Blüthe der deutſchen Jugend, die wahre ἀκμὴ ἀνθοῦσα des Iſokrates, oder des großen Redners ἡλικία, juventus apta bello gerendo, wie ſie das namentlich in den großen Jahren des Befreiungskrieges bewieſen haben; in ihnen allein hat ſich noch jener altritterliche Geiſt erhalten, der einſt im Mittelalter ſo herrliche Früchte trug. Sie ſind die Morgenröthe deutſcher Zukunft, und die Sonne geiſtiger

Univ. Bibl.
München

Allmacht wird aus ihnen immer herrlicher ſich entwickeln, je mehr ſie erſt zum Abſoluten durchgedrungen ſind. Sie dahin zu führen iſt das Ziel, dem ich entgegenſtrebe, der Zweck, um deſſen willen ich mich hier, wo bisher die Wiſſenſchaft nur auf eine oberflächliche unphiloſophiſche Weiſe gelehrt wurde, habilitirte. Das Abſolute aber iſt“ — — „„Bitte, beſter Herr Doctor, ich wünſche ja nur zu wiſſen, was die deutſchen Studenten, und nicht was Sie, oder das Abſolute ſind.““ — „Stören Sie mich doch nicht, mein Herr!“ entgegnet der junge Gelehrte, gereizt die Brauen zuckend und das lockige Haupt ſchüttelnd, wie der Herrſcher im Donnergewölk, Zeus. Dann fährt er fort: „Ich kann ja das Eine, was ſie wünſchen, nicht entwickeln, ohne die nöthigen Prämiſſen vorangeſtellt zu haben; alſo: Die Entelechie der Wiſſenſchaft“ — O weh! höflich ziehe ich den Hut und entferne mich — er rennt mir nach und beginnt noch ein Mal: „Die Entelechie der Wiſſenſchaft“ — — Nun mache ich, daß ich um die Ecke und ihm aus den Augen komme — aber ſeine Stimme ſchießt um die Ecke herum, und ſeine letzten Worte „unphiloſophiſcher Menſch!“ treffen meinen breiten Rücken, prallen von ihm ab, und verhallen ſterbend. —

Ich dächte aber doch, ich dürfte die Acten nun ſchließen, und aus dem Zeugenverhör Folgendes entwickeln:

Die deutſchen Studenten ſind ein freies, friſches, muthiges Völkchen voll Thatenluſt und Eifer, mitunter zu thatenluſtig und zu eifrig, wie es die rechte Jugend immer iſt; leicht vergötternd, und eben ſo leicht verdammend, raſch handelnd, ſelten prüfend, und wenn es zum Prüfen Zeit und Geduld hat und einmal dazu kommt, gern auf die Spitze ſtellend; mit dem Urtheil friſch weg vorn hinaus, viel wiſſend und wenig wiſſend zu gleicher Zeit, raſch über das Schwierigſte der Wiſſenſchaft mit der Entſcheidung her, kurz der echte deutſche Charakter in ſeiner ganzen Liebenswürdigkeit und Ungezogenheit zur ſelben Zeit; ein brauſender, rheiniſcher Moſt, der ſich mit den Jahren zum edelſten Weine klärt und allen ſchlechten Stoff hinausgährt, im Alltäglichen und Ordinären aber auch leicht umſchlägt, noch ehe er zum eigentlichen Gähren kommt, und dann als ſubalterner Beamter ein philiſterhafter Eſſig wird, oder als halbreifer Schriftſteller bald ſchaal abſteht, und ſich trübe zeigt und ungenießbar, wenn das Bißchen jugendliche Kraft fort iſt; den ſtellt dann keine Schöne wieder her. Viele ruiniren ſich ſchon auf der Univerſität ſelbſt; das muß aber ſein, denn da ihr Beruf eigentlich iſt, ſich gegenſeitig zu bilden und zu erziehen für das ganze kommende thatenreiche Leben, ſo ſind ſolche Beiſpiele die beſte Praxis, aus der ſich eine gute Theorie ableiten läßt, und eine höhere Ordnung der Dinge hat das, wie Alles, überaus weiſe eingerichtet. Früher waren ſie trotz äußerer anſcheinender größerer Rohheit im Marke noch edler und feſter; die letzten Jahre haben ihnen im Ganzen ſehr geſchadet; durch den politiſchen Schwindel und die demagogiſchen Unterſuchungen hat der Geiſt der Intrigue ſich vielfach unter ſie geſchlichen, ob auch nur, wie ſie in ihrer Unſchuld und Unwiſſenheit meinen, zur Abwehr. Solches geſchieht immer, wenn der Stärkere ſich über den Schwächeren hermacht und dieſer ſich zu decken und ſichern und ihm zu entgehen ſucht; der Letztere muß dann die Liſt als Tarnkappe gebrauchen, und gewöhnt ſich leider gar leicht daran, ſich ihrer auch bei anderen Gelegenheiten zu bedienen. Auch ſind ſie nicht ſo friſch und frei mehr, ſeitdem die Regierungen in Folge jener Erſcheinungen ſich aufmerkſamer um ſie bekümmern, und dieſen nicht mehr daran liegt, Männer der Wiſſenſchaft, ſondern nützliche und gehorſame Diener des Staates aus ihnen zu erziehen. Wer lernen will, lernt immer gut, wer lernen muß, ſelten. Zum Lernen müſſen braucht man eigentlich keine Univerſitäten, Schulen thun es auch und beſſer, d. h. für das ſogenannte allgemeine Beſte. Seit dem Studenten die Collegia, auch die allgemein bildenden vorgeſchrieben worden, belegt er ſie, früher beſuchte er ſie und mit Luſt und Eifer. Wie oft vernimmt man jetzt nicht aus Studentenmunde: — „Ach, wer wird dies oder Jenes hören, man braucht's ja nicht im Examen." — Hol der Teufel — ich ſage — hol der Teufel die Examina, ſie ruiniren die Wiſſenſchaft; zuvor aber ſoll er die Profeſſorenzeugniſſe über gehörte Zwangscollegia und Fleiß oder Unfleiß im Beſuch derſelben holen, denn die ſind gar ein „bis hieher und nicht weiter" für den echten, freien, wiſſenſchaftlichen Geiſt. Vorher waren unſere Univerſitäten Wäldern vergleichbar, mit hohen, ſchattigen, laub- und fruchtreichen Gängen, in denen gar ſeltene Blumen blühten; jetzt ſind ſie künſtlich ausgezirkelte Gärten mit Treibhäuſern und Miſtbeeten, in denen ſogar Pilze gezogen werden, um ihnen dadurch von vorn herein das Gift zu nehmen und ſie eßbar zu machen. Geht das ſo fort, ſo haben wir in wenigen Decennien nichts mehr, als die Gerippe unſerer alten deutſchen hochehrwürdigen Univerſitäten, und nur die Schatten unſerer früheren Studenten noch. — Das iſt ja leider der Grund, warum ich dieſe Naturgeſchichte ſchreibe — Aber ſtill, wie die geiſterhafte Majeſtät des alten Dänemark in Hamlet, ſteigt die Geſtalt meines geliebten Freundes, des Chefs, vor mir auf und ruft mir zu: „Still! Verbrennen Sie ſich nicht den Mund! Schweigen Sie! — Sie wiſſen nicht was geſchehen kann." Dann fährt er mit den eigenen königlichen Worten, das heißt den eigenen Worten des ſeligen oder richtiger nicht ſeligen Königs in Hamlet fort:

„Wär' mir es nicht verboten,
Des Kerkers tief Geheimniß zu enthüllen,
So könnt' ich etwas Dir erzählen, das
In ſeinem leicht'ſten Wort die Seele Dir
Aufjagt, Dein junges Blut erſtarren macht,
Die Augen, Sternen gleich, aus ihren Sphären
Dir treibt und Deine dicht verſchlungnen Locken
Zertrennt, daß jedes Haar ſich bergan ſträubt,
Des zorn'gen Stachelſchweines Kielen gleich.“

Gehorſamer Diener! Ich ſchweige ſchon und wende mich ſtill und bewegt, wie das Meer, der letzten Unterſuchung und mit ihr dem Schluſſe dieſes Kapitels zu, nämlich der Frage: Wodurch unterſcheidet ſich der deutſche Student von allen übrigen Studenten Europa's? Die Antwort liegt eigentlich ſchon in den obigen Ausſagen, um aber deutſcher Gründlichkeit zu genügen, will ich ſie zu beantworten ſuchen und zwar auf negative Weiſe; ich werde nämlich Alles anführen, was die Studenten anderer Nationen haben, und was mein Held nicht hat, und daraus, wie ich hoffe, ein ſehr günſtiges Reſultat ziehen. Der deutſche Student hat keine Griſette, mit der er während ſeiner Studienjahre in wilder Ehe lebt, wie der franzöſiſche und namentlich wie der Pariſer Studioſus: er unterſcheidet ſich alſo von dieſem durch ſeine Sittlichkeit; er hat keinen Schulzwang und keine vorgeſchriebene Kleidung, wie der engliſche; er unterſcheidet ſich alſo von dieſem durch ſeine Freiheit; er muß nicht ſich in den Vorleſungen examiniren laſſen, gleich einem Schulknaben, und iſt nicht genöthigt beſtimmte Vorleſungen bei einem beſtimmten Profeſſor zu hören, wie der italieniſche Studirende; er nimmt keinen Manuducteur an, der ihm, für ein beſtimmtes Honorar, genau ſo viel und nicht mehr mechaniſch eintrichtert, als er für eine beſtimmte Cenſur, nach der ſich eben das Honorar richtet, im Examen braucht, wie der däniſche; keine Verbindlichkeit treibt ihn, ſich einer beſtimmten Landsmannſchaft anzuſchließen, wie den ſchwediſchen Studenten; er kann ſich frei ſeinen näheren Umgang und ſeine beſtimmte Geſellſchaft wählen, deren Gebräuchen er ſich aus eigener Wahl unterwirft; er läuft nicht Gefahr, unter die Soldaten geſteckt zu werden, wenn er gegen die Geſetze ſündigt, wie der ruſſiſche Student — kurz — ich könnte freilich noch viele Vergleichungen dieſer Art anführen, aber das Geſagte wird ſchon hinreichen, um ihn zur Einſicht deſſen zu bringen, was ich mit dem guten Wörtlein kurz andeuten und einleiten will — kurz, er iſt trotz manchem Leid noch immer von allen Studenten auf Erden der freieſte und der glücklichſte, und wer es nicht allein mit ihm, ſondern mit ganz Deutſchland gut meint, der wird in den Wunſch aus voller Seele einſtimmen: „Möge Gott ihm noch lange ſein Glück und ſeine Freiheit erhalten!"

Zweites Kapitel.

Unterſuchungen über die Sprache der deutſchen Studenten. — Excurſus über ihre Tracht und gewiſſe Gewohnheiten und Gebräuche derſelben, welche immer mehr zu verſchwinden drohen. — Tell's Monolog.

Ein weiſer Mann hat einmal geſagt: Rede, daß ich Dich ſehe. Das war ein ſehr geſcheidtes Wort; denn die Sprache iſt die Kleidung des Geiſtes und es findet durch ſie eine Art von Kleiderordnung noch mehr und entſcheidender Statt, als im gewöhnlichen Leben. Wer ſich etwas in der Welt umgeſehen hat, und einige Erfahrung geſammelt, der wird beſtimmte Stände und Arten unter den Menſchen an gewiſſen Redemoden eben ſo leicht erkennen können, wie den Frankfurter an ſeinem als, den Oeſterreicher an ſeinem halter, den Sachſen an ſeinem ich dächte gar, den Thüringer an ſeinem eben, den Hamburger an ſeinem ja wohl, mein Jung' u. ſ. w. u. ſ. w. Beſtimmte Richtungen bilden beſtimmte Eigenthümlichkeiten aus, die in der Sprache ebenfalls ſtark zur Erſcheinung kommen. Wenn ich auf der Straße gehe, und es geht Jemand im Oberrocke und dunklen Beinkleidern mit rother Litze vor mir auf, ſo weiß ich gleich, daß das ein —ſcher Offizier in Civilanzuge iſt; brauche denſelben aber nicht einmal mit meinen leiblichen Augen zu ſehen und nur die Wörter: „auf Ehre oder auf Seele“, gelegentlich ſolcher Gegenſtände, bei denen Ehre und Seele etwas ganz Ueberflüſſiges ſind, von ihm zu hören, ſo weiß ich es auch und noch viel ſicherer, als wenn ich ihn geſehen hätte. Nun wird man mir zugeben, ſobald man das vorige Kapitel nur mit der gehörigen Aufmerkſamkeit geleſen, daß die eigenthümlichſte Menſchenrace auf Erden die der deutſchen Studenten iſt, und es daher ganz natürlich, ja ganz nothwendig finden, daß ich vor allen Dingen einige Unterſuchungen über ihre Sprache anſtelle, ehe ich zu anderen, ſie betreffenden, wichtigen Punkten übergehe; denn: — Rede, daß ich Dich ſehe. Wie die Sprache aller Völker, die noch im Naturzuſtande leben, iſt auch die ihrige ſehr bildlich, aber dieſe bildlichen Ausdrücke ſind — und das iſt ein eigenthümlicher Charakterzug des ſtudentikoſen Idioms — nicht den rohen Naturerſcheinungen, ſondern den Erſcheinungen des civiliſirten Lebens auf ſeiner höchſten Culturſtufe entlehnt, ſelbſt da, wo man hiſtoriſch ihren Urſprung nachweiſen kann. Folgende Beiſpiele werden hinreichen, das Geſagte zu beſtätigen, um ſo mehr, als ich mich bemühen werde, ſie allen Lebensverhältniſſen des deutſchen Studenten zu entlehnen.

Beginnen wir mit den Lebensſtufen des Studenten. Wenn ein Schüler noch auf der hohen Schule ſich befindet, und mit Ungeduld jenen Moment erwartet, wo ihm der dem Rector oder Prorector gegebene Handſchlag die Freiheit gewährt, einen Schnurrbart zu tragen, mit einer langen Pfeife mit bunten Troddeln über die Straße zu gehen, Wirthshäuſer zu beſuchen und ſpäter als um zehn Uhr zu Hauſe zu kommen, ſo pflegt er bis zu jenem ſeligen Momente einen heftigen Bildungsdrang zu verſpüren, der ihn antreibt, bei günſtigen Gelegenheiten ſich zu wirklichen Studenten zu geſellen, die er ſich um ſo mehr zum Muſter nimmt, falls ihm ein gütiges Geſchick verſtattet, unter ihnen vor anderen Leuten als ihrer einer zu gelten. Mit majeſtätiſcher Milde läßt der Student ihn gewähren, ja er behandelt ihn, im hohen Gefühl des Bewußtſeins ſeiner Würde, ungefähr ſo, wie ein großer ſtämmiger, von allen ſonſt biſſigen Jagd- und Hühnerhunden gefürchteter Newfoundländer einen kleinen Bologneſer zu behandeln pflegt, von dem er ſich ſogar zu Zeiten in das Behäng oder die Ruthe beißen läßt, ohne ſeinen Unwillen anders, als höchſtens durch ein gelindes, gutmüthiges Knurren zu erkennen zu geben, an welchem denn der kleine Kläffer auch gleich erkennt und weiß woran er iſt. Aber trotz ſeiner Milde und Herablaſſung, nennt er ihn — der Student nämlich den Gymnaſiaſten, nicht der Newfoundländer den Bologneſer (vielleicht hat auch dieſer in ſeiner Sprache denſelben Ausdruck, das kann uns hier jedoch weiter nicht kümmern), alſo er nennt ihn ein Pennal. Welch ein bildlicher und bezeichnender Ausdruck! — Er verſteht nämlich darunter ein hohles Futteral, in das der Lehrer ſeine Federn und Alles, was aus denſelben fließt, hineinſtopft, bis es Nichts derartiges mehr zu faſſen vermag. Dann entläßt ihn das Schulcollegium als reif für die Univerſität; aber damit iſt er noch nicht gleich Student. Es vergehen noch einige Wochen von ſeiner Entlaſſung an bis zu ſeiner Immatriculation, während welcher Zeit er ſich bemüht, ſeinen früheren, traurig auf dem Gymnaſium, wie die Juden in der babyloniſchen Gefangenſchaft, zurückbleibenden Mitſchülern zu zeigen, was ein freier Menſch ſei. So ganz will ihm das aber nicht gelingen, er hat noch nicht den rechten Muth, er kann ſich noch nicht an die Wirklichkeit gewöhnen: denn, mit dem Dichter zu reden:

> Denn aus Gemeinem iſt der Menſch gemacht,
> Und die Gewohnheit nennt er ſeine Amme;

und dieſe Gewohnheit, heimlich den Lehrern zu trotzen, aber öffentlich vor ihnen zu zittern, hinter ihrem Rücken über ſie zu ſpotten und ihnen in das Geſicht die tiefſte reverentia puerilis zu fingiren, hat zu tiefe Wurzeln geſchlagen, als daß er dieſelbe mit einem Ruck gleich ausreißen könnte; auch hat ihn der Schuldirector noch zu ſehr in der Gewalt mit dem Abgangszeugniſſe, das er ihm nicht eher ausliefert, als bis er wirklich die Stadt verläßt. So ſchwebt er denn zwiſchen der Schule, die hinter ihm liegt, und der Univerſität, von der er jetzt allnächtlich träumt, mitten inne, weder leidend noch handelnd, wie die Abgeſchiedenen bei Dante:

Che visser senza infamia e senza lodo, die ohne Schmach und ohne Lob lebten, zwiſchen Himmel und Hölle. Einen ſolchen Jüngling nun nennt der Student ein Maulthier, ein Weſen zwiſchen Eſel und Roß. Die Vortrefflichkeit dieſes Ausdruckes liegt auf der Hand, und braucht dem denkenden Leſer nicht weiter entwickelt zu werden, dem nicht denkenden aber helfe Gott, ich kann es nicht. Endlich aber iſt die glückliche Stunde erſchienen, und der zwiſchen Himmel und Erde wankende verzauberte Geiſt iſt erlöſt worden; er hat dem Prorector ſeinen Handſchlag gegeben, und ward, wie die Sclaven der alten Römer, durch dieſe manumissio ein freier Menſch. Jetzt ſucht er die alten Bekannten auf, deren Gunſt ihn als demüthigen Schüler ſo hoch beglückte; aber ſtolz ſehen dieſe jetzt auf ihn herab, und nennen den Neuling einen Fuchs. Ein oberflächlicher Menſch wird nun vorlaut fragen, welche Aehnlichkeit denn ein nagelneuer Studioſus mit dem Raubthier, Fuchs genannt, habe, und dieſe nicht begreifen können; ein philoſophiſcher Kopf aber, beſonders ein ſolcher, deſſen Lieblingsſtudium die Metaphyſik iſt, den tiefen Sinn, der in dieſer Benennung liegt, ſogleich mit Staunen und Bewunderung erkennen. Wie der Fuchs zu gleicher Zeit etwas von der Natur des Hundes und etwas von der Natur des Wolfes an ſich hat, ſo hat der Neuling etwas vom Schüler und etwas vom Studenten. Wie ferner der Fuchs ſich nicht tollkühn in Gefahr wagt, ſondern um den Hühnerhof herumſchleicht, ehe er einen Einbruch verſucht, und bei dem erſten Lärm ſich augenblicklich in ſeinen Bau zurückzieht, ſo auch der neue Student; denn die Ermahnungen ſeines guten Papa, die Angſt, mit der Mama ihn entließ, die guten Vorſätze, die er ſich ſelbſt bildete, und die Furcht vor den Pedellen, ſo wie der tiefe Reſpect vor Rector, Univerſitätsrichter und Senat, wirken noch zu lebendig in ihm, um ſich ſo ohne Weiteres den anderen wilden Thieren zuzugeſellen, die zur Nachtzeit heulend die Straßen durchziehn und den armen harmloſen Wanderer aus dem Volke der Philiſter überfallen. Allmälig wächſt ihm jedoch der Muth, beſonders gegen Ende des Semeſters, und mit dem neuen Semeſter hat er auch ſchon einen ganz anderen Menſchen angezogen. Wohlgefällig ſieht der alte Student auf ihn hinab und adelt ihn, er wird zum Freiherrn unter den Füchſen erhoben, das heißt ein Brandfuchs. Dieſes Thier hat bekanntlich ſchon weit mehr vom Wolfe als vom Hunde an ſich — eben ſo wie der Student im zweiten Semeſter weit mehr vom Studenten, als vom Gymnaſiaſten, den er allmälig ganz abſtreift, — und Simſon bediente ſich ſeiner, des Brandfuchſes nämlich, nicht der Studenten — obwohl einige gelehrte Exegeten meinen, es ſeien nicht wirkliche Brandfüchſe, ſondern die Befliſſenen der Theologie auf der Univerſität zu Bethlehem geweſen — um das Getreide der Philiſter noch vor der Ernte zu zerſtören. — So läßt ſich noch heutigen Tages der akademiſche Brandfuchs vom Simſon, der in der Studentenſprache Senior heißt und auch oft von einer Dalilah geſchoren wird — gebrauchen, um dem Philiſter die Ernte zu ruiniren. Auch in dieſer bildlichen Benennung liegt alſo, wie in allen ſtudentikoſen Wörtern und Redensarten, ein tiefer Sinn. Im dritten Semeſter wird er endlich wirklicher Student und bezeichnet ſich ſelbſt mit der Benennung Burſch, gewöhnlich des Epitheton „flott" hinzufügend. Einſeitige Bücherwürmer behaupten, dieſes Appellativum ſei hiſtoriſchen Urſprunges, und komme von einem der mittleren Latinität entlehnten Worte bursa her, welches ſoviel wie Stipendienfonds bedeute, mithin ſei ein bursarius, ein Burſch, einer, der von Stipendien ſtudire. Dieſe Erklärung iſt ganz falſch, was ſchon dadurch bewieſen wird, daß gerade diejenigen die flotteſten Burſchen ſind, die kein Stipendium haben, weil die Angſt, daſſelbe zu verlieren, ihnen nicht hinderlich in den Weg treten kann. Burſch kommt allerdings von bursa, ein Geldbeutel, her, aber a potiori fit denominatio; weil des Studenten Geldbeutel immer mehr Raum als Geld umfaßt, ja die meiſte Zeit leer iſt, wie es ſchon im Anticlaudiano c. 7. heißt: nec bursam satiat nummis, ſo heißt der Burſch ein Burſch, weil er ſtets einen zu großen oder gar einen leeren Geldbeutel hat; ein Umſtand, durch den man ſchon zu Käſtner's Zeiten, den phyſikaliſchen Satz: daß es keinen leeren Raum gäbe, umzuſtoßen bemüht war. Er ſelbſt nennt ſich flott wie ein Schiff, das die Ladung, hier: das überflüſſige Geld ausgeworfen hat, und das nun nichts hindert, ſich luſtig von der Fluth forttreiben zu laſſen. So geht es denn zwei Semeſter fort, bis aus dem Burſchen ein bemooſtes Haupt wird. Ueber dieſe Benennung und ihre Ableitung ſind die Gelehrten ebenfalls im Irrthum; ſie glauben, dieſelbe komme von Moos, der zweiten Ordnung der vier und zwanzigſten Pflanzenklaſſe des Linnéiſchen Syſtems, cryptogamici musci, her; das iſt aber ganz falſch; Moos heißt überall, wo luſtige deutſche Brüder in ihrer Sprache reden, Geld. Im fünften und ſechſten Semeſter nämlich naht ſich der Studioſus dem Examen oder der Promotion, kurz dem Abgange von der Univerſität; damit dieſer in Ehren geſchehen könne, muß Papa ein Uebriges thun, und das nöthige Geld ſchicken, um die Schulden zu bezahlen, die Promotionskoſten zu beſtreiten u. ſ. w. Jetzt hat der Studioſus, durch Erfahrungen gewitzigt, endlich wieder Geld, das er wohl zu verwenden weiß; ehrfurchtsvoll blicken ſeine Commilitonen zu ihm hinauf und nennen ihn in der Freude ihres Herzens, mit tiefem Reſpect, ein würdiges bemooſtes Haupt.

So haben wir den Studenten auf ſeinem Lebenswege in ſeinen eigenſten Verhältniſſen begleitet und geſehen, wie er ſchon hier ſich innerhalb der Grenzen des Deutſchen eine neue Sprache geſchaffen hat, über deren Worte, Bilder und Geiſtesreichthum wir erſtaunen müſſen. Fahren wir nun in dieſen Unterſuchungen fort und überzeugen wir uns, daß ſich unſere Verwunderung ſteigern muß, je tiefer wir dringen, faſt bis zum Unglaublichen. Ein Student iſt weit mehr als ein deutſcher Poet, denn nach Schiller dichtet und denkt die Sprache für dieſen, der Studioſus denkt und dichtet aber für die Sprache. Wie ſinnreich weiß er die Erſcheinungen ſeines Lebens zu bezeichnen! Ueberall ſchöpft er aus dem Urquell der Poeſie, doch iſt er mehr als ein bloßer Naturdichter; denn auch die ſtrenge Wiſſenſchaft zieht er in den Kreis ſeiner kühnen Wortbildung hinein.

Betrachten wir ihn in den Verhältniſſen zu ſeinen Genoſſen: ein Commilitone hat ihn mit Worten verletzt; er nennt das nicht beleidigt, denn beleidigen kann ihn das nicht, wie überhaupt Nichts, er ſteht erhaben und glorreich über Allem da; aber bezeichnen muß er es doch, und ſo entlehnt er der Maeeutik einen terminus technicus, und ſagt: Jener habe ihn touchirt, d. h. bildlich: unterſucht, wie weit ſich das Gefühl der Studentenehre, deren Keim er empfängt, ſo wie er die Univerſität bezieht, in ihm bereits entwickelt habe; er dagegen läßt ihn conſtituiren, d. h. ihm eine Conſtitution geben, bei welcher die Stände den Monarchen zwingen, entweder Frieden zu ſchließen oder Krieg zu erklären, ohne daß durch diplomatiſche Verhandlungen die Sache in die Länge gezogen und hinter ſeinem Rücken eine Quadrupelallianz geſchloſſen werden kann. Der Gegner wählt das Letztere und nun wird gepaukt, ein höchſt bezeichnender Ausdruck, und weit beſſer, als das ausländiſche duellirt — denn Beide ſehen ſich im Zorne, wie weiland Don Quijote die Rieſen für Windmühlen — für jenes ſtarktönende Inſtrument an, deſſen Stelle in der Harmonie der Sphären der Donner vertritt, und hauen und ſtoßen ſo lange auf einander los, bis das eine oder das andere Fell ein Loch bekommt und nicht mehr wagt, in dieſem Theil der Concertmuſik des Studentenlebens mitzutönen, ehe nicht ſein Fell wieder hergeſtellt iſt. — Ein ſolches Loch nun heißt — aber hier eben ſo wie bei dem Worte, das über den, der ſich nicht paukt, die Reichsacht ausſpricht — declinirt das Bildliche zu ſehr nach den niederen Regionen des Lebens, und wiewohl man zu ſagen pflegt: literae non erubescunt — ſo kann ich mich doch nicht überwinden, aus Achtung für die vielen ſchönen Augen, welche dieſe Naturgeſchichte gewiß mit großem Eifer ſtudiren werden, jene beiden Worte in die Feder zu nehmen.

Das darf uns nicht ſtören. — Dieſe Sprache iſt ſo reich an Schönheiten, daß wir noch einen herrlichen Kranz daraus winden können, ohne zu Blumen wie Bilſenkraut und anderen ähnlichen, draſtiſch oder narkotiſch wirkenden, die vorzugsweiſe auf dem Miſte wachſen, unſere Zuflucht nehmen zu müſſen. Gehen wir zu den Verhältniſſen des Studenten nach außen über, und ſehen wir, was ſich hier findet. Leider iſt auch in ſeinem Leben nur zu oft das Geld der nervus rerum gerendarum, und gerade dann am Meiſten, wenn er es am Wenigſten achtet, obwohl er recht gut weiß, daß es Jeder ſo ſorgſam hütet, wie der Drache den Schatz der Nibelungen. Er muß es aber haben, denn trotz dem, daß er gar ſchlecht zu rechnen verſteht, iſt ihm doch die Regel der Subtraction: 6 von 0 kann ich nicht, borge ich Eins, wohl in der Erinnerung geblieben. Er borgt aber nicht, nein — nur ein Rechenknecht borgt, er pumpt, das heißt: mühſam läßt er ſo lange den Schwengel ſeiner Beredſamkeit auf und abgehen, bis es ihm gelingt, Moneten aus dem tiefſten Brunnenſchacht herauf zu holen. Wenn jedoch kein Brunnen mehr fließen will, kein Pumpen mehr hilft, ſo verkauft er nicht, das was ihm überflüſſig ſcheint, er verkeilt es; denn jeder Keil, den er ſo einſchlägt, dient für's Erſte dazu, ihn oben zu erhalten. Hilft ihm aber ein Freund in der Noth und pumpt ihm, ſo wird er ſich bei nächſter Gelegenheit gewiß löffeln und ihn ſetzen, das heißt: ihn durch allerlei mit Löffeln oder anderen Inſtrumenten zu vertilgende Stoffe dermaaßen an irgend einen Lieblingsplatz bannen, daß auch der mobilſte Student, auf eine Weile wenigſtens, gern zum geſetzten Manne wird, und ſelbſt ſeine Gläubiger, die er mit gelehrter Benennung Manichäer nennt, weil ſie noch unſinniger, als Manichäus ſelbſt, glauben, es ſei von einem flotten Burſchen Geld zu erhalten, werden ihn nicht vertreiben können; nur der von Göthe ſelbſt im weſtöſtlichen Divan gefeierte phyſiſche Katzenjammer, den die Perſer Bidamag Buden nennen, vermag es allein, namentlich dann, wenn ſich mit ihm die Reue, κατ᾽ ἐξοχὴν der moraliſche (scilicet, Katzenjammer) genannt, einſtellt.

Dem höchſten Culturzuſtande endlich ſind diejenigen Worte in der Sprache des Studenten entlehnt, welche ſein Verhältniß zum ſchönen Geſchlechte ausdrücken.

Selbſt im Wort Beſen, das mancher holden Leſerin unangenehm auffallen mag, und mit dem er im Allgemeinen die ganze beſſere Hälfte der Menſchheit bezeichnet, liegt ein gar tiefer Sinn. Wo wären ohne das weibliche Geſchlecht die Städtegründerin, Ordnung, und die Freundin deutſcher Gelehrſamkeit, Reinlichkeit, auf Erden geblieben? Nur durch zarter Frauen Hand ſind ſie uns erhalten worden. Das weiß der Student ſehr wohl, und darum iſt dieſe pars pro toto in ſeinem Munde eine durchaus ehrende Benennung, ungefähr wie ein großer Pinſel für einen großen Maler; denn ein vollkommenes Weib kann er ſich nicht ohne Bürſte und Beſen, mit denen es hinter dem Manne her dem Bücherſtaub und der Tabacksaſche auf Tod und Leben zu Leibe geht, denken. Was er von ſolcher Hand zu erwarten habe, weiß er lange ſchon aus dem Fauſt, wo der Prototyp aller Studioſen auf dem Spaziergange höchſt bedeutungsvoll ſagt:

Die Hand, die Samſtags ihren Beſen führt,
Wird Sonntags Dich am Beſten carreſſiren.

Jene zarteren Hände aber, die das nur heimlich thun, in der irrigen Meinung, es ſchicke ſich nicht, nennt er ſtrafend Florbeſen, weil ſie das Attribut ihrer Weltherrſchaft zu verhüllen ſtreben. Gern macht er ihnen den Hof, oder richtiger er pouſſirt ſie, das heißt:

durch ſeinen geiſtreichen Umgang bringt er ſie vorwärts in der feinen Bildung.

Schon aus dem Wenigen, das ich hier vom Raum beſchränkt gegeben, wird man ſich überzeugt haben, welchen außerordentlichen Reichthum an ſymboliſchen Hyperbolen die Sprache der Studenten beſitze; es liegt ſo viel Poetiſches, Treues, Rührendes darin. Kann etwas mehr zum Herzen reden, als wenn der dankbare Studioſus einen alten Flausrock, der mit ihm Freud' und Leid getragen, oder richtiger, den er in Freud' und Leid getragen, einen alten Gottfried nennt? Ruht nicht wirklich der Friede Gottes auf ſolchem alten, ehrlichen treuen, bis auf den letzten Faden abgenutzten Kleidungsſtücke, das nicht um der Welt willen angezogen ward, wie ein vornehmer ſchwalbenſchwänziger Frack, ſondern um ſeiner ſelbſt willen? Iſt etwas Poetiſcheres in der weiten Gotteswelt zu finden, als der Name Philiſter, mit welchem der Student alle Menſchen benennt, ſich ſelbſt und ſeine Profeſſoren ausgenommen? Man glaube ja nicht, daß dieſer Name von balistarius, ein Armbruſtſchütze, abgeleitet ſei; denn was ging ein Solcher den Studioſus an, wenn gleich die Franzoſen belitre daraus machten, und damit einen Lumpenkerl bezeichnen. Nein, der Urſprung dieſes bedeutenden Wortes, das ſeine Geltung behalten wird, ſo lange es Univerſitäten giebt, iſt ein ganz anderer, und hat ſeine Quelle in der Bibel. Als ſich 1693 zu Jena, im goldenen Engel, Studenten mit Gnoten (vulgo Handwerksburſchen) zankten und ſtritten, da kam es zu Thätlichkeiten, und ein Studioſus wurde erſchlagen. Am folgenden Sonntage erwähnte der hochehrwürdige Paſtor Götz daſelbſt dieſes traurige Ereigniß auf der Kanzel, und brach vor tiefem Schmerz dabei in die Worte aus: „Philiſter, über Dir Simſon!“ (der geneigte Leſer weiß bereits, daß Simſon und Senior gleichbedeutend ſind.) Seit dieſer Zeit heißt Jeder Nichtſtudent Philiſter; aber einen tieferen welthiſtoriſchen und philoſophiſchen Gehalt erhielt das Wort erſt ſpäter. Der Student drückt damit einmal die Idee der Gleichheit, in welcher Alles vor ihm erſcheint, aus und hat das lange vorher gethan, ehe Fraternité und Égalité die Looſung der blutigſten Thaten in Frankreich wurden. — Jeder Student iſt dem anderen gleich, und jeder Philiſter gilt dem Studenten gleich. In ſeinen Augen iſt ein Kaiſer oder ein König eben ſo gut ein Philiſter, wie ſein Haus- oder ſein Speiſewirth. Was nun das Philoſophiſche betrifft, ſo iſt der Philiſter das dem Ich, dem Studenten, entgegengeſetzte Nicht-Ich der Fichteſchen Wiſſenſchaftslehre. Ob es nun wohl eine Sprache auf Erden giebt, die mehrere größere Gedanken in einem und demſelben Worte birgt? So endlich — ich muß mich faſt wider Willen von dieſem intereſſanten und belehnenden Gegenſtande losreißen — das Wort Kneipe für Wirthshaus, Schenke im Allgemeinen, dann beſonders für das Wirthshaus, das der Studioſus vorzugsweiſe zu beſuchen pflegt. Die Ableitung liegt vor Augen, denn wer wird nicht Alles durch ſolche Art gekneipt? Der Student ſelbſt, wenn er dem Wirth oder Kneipier Schreibſtunde oder Rechnenſtunde giebt, und ihn Buchſtaben und Zahlen mit Kreide an die Tafel malen läßt, um ſich erſt gehörig zu üben, ehe er mit Dinte in ſein Buch ſchreibt, was er gelernt; der Vater des Studenten, der oft nicht allein des Sohnes Kneipen, ſondern auch deſſen Bauchkneipen von dem ſchlechten Bier und Wein, das der ſpitzbübiſche Wirth dieſem gereicht, doppelt bezahlen muß; der Profeſſor, wenn Studioſus die Collegiengelder verkneipt, und ſich nachher Stundung bis zum jüngſten Gericht ausbittet, ein Gericht, welches bekanntlich vom Univerſitätsrichter nicht gehalten wird; die verſchiedenen Philiſter, deren Hoffnungen und Erwartungen in der Kneipe ebenfalls wie Seifenblaſen platzten. — Ach! und wie manchem ehemaligen Studenten kneipt die Erinnerung an Kneipe und Kneipier, in ſpäten Jahren noch, das Herz und den Geldbeutel zuſammen, und preßt ihm zu gleicher Zeit Thränen und Thaler aus!

Ja die Sprache der Studenten iſt eine Macht. Sie, und ſie allein iſt das geiſtige Band, das alle Hochſchulen Deutſchlands, von Kiel bis Freiburg, von Bonn bis Königsberg, verbindet; ſie iſt der ſegenbringende Zollverein des Studentenlebens, der da eine Einheit ſchafft, wo ſelbſt ein Talleyrand ſie für unmöglich halten würde.

Nächſt der Sprache, war früher die Tracht ebenfalls ein gemeinſames Band, aber die Alles verwiſchende Zeit hat immer mehr und mehr die Eigenthümlichkeit derſelben zerſtört, Adam iſt faſt ganz herunter gekommen, und Unſer Einer geworden. Daran ſind allein die leidigen Reſidenzen Schuld, in denen Univerſitäten entſtanden, was ich in einem anderen Kapitel, neben anderen Nachtheilen derſelben, faventibus Diis ausführlich zu entwickeln gedenke. Wo hätte denn noch vor fünf und zwanzig Jahren, ſelbſt der obſcurſte Student, einen ſchwarzen Filz mit ſteifem runden Rande, vulgo Hut genannt, getragen, oder einen Spargelſtecher, Frack genannt, angezogen, oder gar eine Cravatte umgethan? Nehmen wir unſere Gelehrſamkeit zu Hülfe, gehen wir die Tracht der Studenten ſeit Jahrhunderten durch, ſehen wir, wie ſie immer eigenthümlich war, und wir werden leider finden, daß die letzten Decennien begonnen haben, ihre charaktervolle Originalität zu Grabe zu tragen, und daß ſie bald gänzlich hienieden verſchwinden wird, gleich den Stätten der Mächtigen auf Erden, von denen auch nicht eine Spur mehr dem einſamen Wanderer auf der Haide erzählt, daß ſie einſt da geweſen.

Das Eigenthümliche in der Tracht der Studenten hat nämlich ſtets darin gelegen, daß dieſer genau ein Mißverhältniß, zwiſchen dem Ober- und Untertheil ſeines Körpers, oder umgekehrt, dadurch ausdrückte, womit er nämlich ſymboliſch andeutete, daß immer nur die eine Hälfte von ihm ſich dem Zwange, ſei es nun der Schule oder des Lebens, unterwerfe, während die andere ſich in voller Freiheit bewege. Die beſten Quellen für die früheſte Kenntniß dieſer Tracht ſind die alten Stammbücher, in welchen Studioſus nicht allein ſeinen Leibſpruch niederzulegen, ſondern auch ſein Familienwappen — und wer hatte damals keines? — und ſich ſelbſt in den verſchiedenſten Situationen liebte abconterfeien zu laſſen. Der Verfaſſer dieſes unſterblichen Werkes hat eifrig aus dieſen Quellen geſchöpft, und durchgehends ſeine Behauptung und Wahrnehmung beſtätigt gefunden. Das älteſte Conterfei dieſer Art, das ihm vorgekommen, iſt vom Jahre 1572; hier fand er Studioſus auf folgende Weiſe coſtumirt. Auf dem Kopfe trug er ein ſchwarzſammetnes Baret, mit einer rothen Feder; Stutz und Knebelbart zierten ſein Antlitz, ſo wie ſeinen Hals eine gefältelte Spitzenkrauſe. Seinen Oberkörper ſchmückte ein ganz eng anliegendes rothes Wamms, mit eben ſo engen, aber durch Puffen verzierten Aermeln; dann kamen ein Paar ungeheuere rothe Pluderhoſen mit unzähligen Falten, die über dem Knie wieder ganz eng zuſammenſchnürten und Bein und Fuß bedeckten, bis zu dem ſchwarzen Lederſchuh. Ueber der rechten Schulter hing ein purpurrother Mantel, und an der linken Hüfte ein langer Stoßdegen mit einem Korbgriffe. So erſcheint nämlich ein Herr von Dieskau, der in Leipzig zu jener Zeit dem Studium der Rechte oblag. Das Prachtſtück an dieſem Anzuge waren die Pluderhoſen, die aus lauter aneinandergenähten Falten beſtanden, und oft über 100 Ellen Tuches erforderten; ſo daß eines Studioſi ganzer Wechſel in Beinkleidern aufging, und dieſe Tracht in Wittenberg nicht allein verboten, ſondern auch von den Kanzeln dagegen gepredigt wurde. — Später ward ſie (eine urſprünglich ſpaniſche) von der franzöſiſchen verdrängt, und Studioſus ſuchte ſeinen Ruhm darin: ungeheuere Allongenperrücken zu tragen, während ſein übriger Leichnam ſehr knapp und zierlich gekleidet war, wenn er nicht, um der Bequemlichkeit willen, die Gaſſen im fliegenden Schlafrocke durchzog, den blanken Schläger, den er auf den Steinen zu wetzen pflegte, unter dem Arm. So berichtet uns die liebenswürdige und galante Salinde, die das Treiben zu Jena, am Schluſſe des ſiebenzehnten Jahrhunderts, ſchildert. Dann verſchwand dieſer Anzug gänzlich, und machte dem himmelhohen Stürmer oder ledernen Helm mit Federbuſch, dem Koller, das oft Farbe und Schnitt einer Phantaſie-Uniform erhielt, den engen hirſchledernen Beinkleidern und den ungeheueren Kanonenſtiefeln Platz. Dieſer Prachtanzug erhielt ſich, ſelbſt der franzöſiſchen Revolution, die alle Moden umwälzte, zum Trotz, bis in unſer Jahrhundert hinein, obwohl im Gegenſatz zu demſelben die weiten Beinkleider und die Mützen aufkamen. Endlich brach der Befreiungskrieg, und mit ihm eine Wendung aller Dinge, natürlich auch der Tracht, an. Deutſchheit war die Looſung, und wie konnte ſie beſſer ausgedrückt werden, als durch den alten deutſchen Rock, der eigentlich keinesweges deutſch, ſondern urſprünglich eine polniſche Litevka iſt; aber Studioſus wußte ihm den echten Stempel der Deutſchheit, oder den Stempel echter Deutſchheit dadurch aufzudrücken, daß er alle Schnuren und Troddeln, die ihn bei ſeiner Geburt ſchmückten, wegthat, und über den kurzen Kragen eine halbe Elle gebleichter Leinwand hinaushing, eine freie Fortſetzung des Hemdes. Dazu kamen das ſchwarze Sammetbaret mit Eicheln, die grauen etwas ſchmutzig ausſehenden weiten Tuchhoſen, die gänzliche Abweſenheit einer Weſte; ſo daß man jedem wahren Muſenſohne, wenn auch nicht bis in das Herz, doch bis auf das Herz, ja ſogar mitunter bis auf den Magen ſehen konnte; und ſtatt des gewaltigen Knotenſtockes, der ſchon lange an die Stelle des für feierliche Gelegenheiten aufgeſparten Schlägers getreten war, der glatt polirte, aber nicht minder gewichtige Ziegenhainer. Die Gegner der Deutſchheit, die ſich damals auf Univerſitäten fanden, ſuchten Jene durch Eleganz zu beſchämen, und trugen reich mit Gold geſtickte farbige Mützen, hohe Cravatten, ſchöne mit vielen Litzen, Troddeln und Sammet garnirte polniſche Röcke, blaue Huſarenweſten mit Silber verbrämt, enge Tuchbeinkleider mit ſilbernen und goldenen Streifen geſchmückt, oder außerordentlich weite Mameluckenhoſen von Sammet. Allmälig ſind aber alle dieſe Auszeichnungen verſchwunden von der Oberfläche der Erde; Studioſus geht wie jeder andere Jüngling hienieden; die mehrfarbigen Mützen haben meiſt aufgehört, die kurzen kaum bis über die Hüften reichenden Röcke haben ein mittleres Maaß, eine Art von Tag- und Nachtgleiche erreicht, ja ſie ſind ſogar in der neueſten Zeit zu engländiſcher Länge hin und wieder angewachſen; die Beinkleider zieren keine ſilbernen und goldenen Treſſen mehr; Collet und Stürmer ruhen bei den Todten, und nur hier und da, aber höchſt ſelten taucht noch ein altdeutſcher Jüngling auf, in der ganzen Majeſtät ſeiner Einfachheit, wie eine Schwalbe, die ſich vom Winter überraſchen ließ, und — das iſt das Schrecklichſte, — die verſtümmelte Unform eines Fracks ziert dagegen häufig den Studenten, nicht bloß auf Bällen, wo er de rigueur iſt — ich bediene mich abſichtlich dieſes fremdländiſchen Ausdruckes, da ich von dieſem eunuchiſchen Eindringling rede, ſondern auch — proh dolor! — ſelbſt in den Hörſälen, und überhaupt im Leben des gemeinen Alltags — ja ſogar — was noch ſchrecklicher iſt — ſelbſt auf Kommerſchen!

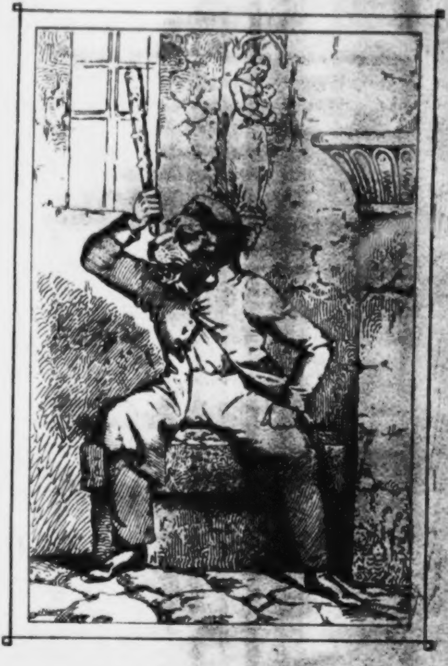
Die Wehmuth zwingt mich einen Augenblick die Feder niederzulegen, und meinen Thränen freien Lauf zu gönnen. — So konnteſt Du Dich nivelliren laſſen, akademiſche Jugend, Du Stolz des Vaterlandes, ſo einen Theil Deiner Eigenthümlichkeit aufgeben? Wo ſeid Ihr hin, Ihr ſeligen Tage, als es unmöglich war, einen Studenten auf zehn Meilen weit nicht augenblicklich zu erkennen und in einer Entfernung von fünf deutſchen Meilen nicht ſogleich zu ſehen, welcher Univerſität er angehörte?!

Darum, Commilitonen! haltet feſt, ich beſchwöre Euch, an Euerer Sprache. Sie allein iſt noch Euer Palladium; wenn Ihr ſie auch aufgebt, ſo habt Ihr nichts mehr, das Euch hervorhebt vor dem Plebs, und Euch als geweihte Prieſter der Wiſſenſchaft zeigt. Wenn Ihr ſie aufgebt, ſo iſt der Wein des Lebens verdunſtet, und nur noch die ſchaale Hefe im Becher übrig. — Wenn Ihr ſie aufgebt, ſo iſt das Salz der Erde dumm geworden, und wenn das Salz dumm geworden, womit ſoll man ſalzen? Der Tag des Schniepels und der Glacéhandſchuhe iſt leider ſchon weit vorgerückt und ſeine Sonne ſteht bereits im Zenith. Aber nie möge der Tag erſcheinen, wo Ihr, ſtatt Proſit, bon jour ſagt, euern Hauswirth einen Bürger, und nicht einen Philiſter nennt, ſtatt Spritztouren, einen Ausflug nach einer benachbarten Stadt macht, und lieber arbeitet als ochſt; denn dann habt Ihr aufgehört das Salz der Erde zu ſein. Dann unterſcheidet Ihr Euch durch Nichts mehr von dem Ladenſchwengel, dem Forſtlöwen und dem Miſtiker, dann — doch meine Feder weigert ſich das Bild auszumalen und ich verſtumme.

So viele Eurer Gebräuche und Sitten ſind bereits verſchwunden und in die Nacht gänzlicher Vergeſſenheit verſunken. Seit Jahrhunderten wird kein Fuchs mehr deponirt, ſeit Jahren nicht mehr feierlich zum Brandfuchs gebrannt, und ihm von drei alten Häuſern Brief und Siegel darüber ausgeſtellt. Wo ſieht man Euch dem edlen Kartenſpiel Pereat, mit den intereſſanten Bezeichnungen: Knüppel, Galgen und Rad, zur Belehrung der Füchſe und Stärkung der Bemooſten, obliegen? — Ach! ja wohl, facilis descensus Averni. Alles iſt dahin, iſt dort hinabgezogen, von wo kein Wiederkehren ſein kann. Kaum, daß Ihr bei den Kommerſchen noch das Alte beibehalten, und wäre das Trinken nicht eine Handlung, die man nie feierlich genug zu begehen vermag, ſo würde in unſeren revolutionären Tagen ſchwerlich noch der ehrwürdige Landesvater die Mützen mit ehrenvollen Narben ſchmücken, noch pro poena getrunken und ein allgemeines Hospitium angeordnet werden. —

Darum noch ein Mal, haltet feſt an Eurer Sprache! Es will mir ſcheinen, deutſche Studenten, als liebtet Ihr ſie nicht genug. Die Blüthe deutſchen Geiſtes, die Poeſie, trägt zu wenig Spuren davon. Wann bringt Ihr Eure reichen Bilder, Euere kräftigen Reden, wie nur ſie und ſie allein dieſelben zu geben vermag, in Euern Liedern an? Hier iſt ein Mittel, durch das Ihr derſelben die ſicherſte Unſterblichkeit verleihen könnt. Fehlt Euch die Uebung, ſo nehmt die Gedichte großer Meiſter und übertragt ſie in Eure Weiſe und Euer Idiom. Wie herrlich ſich das mache, davon hier ein Beiſpiel. Ein Pedell hatte vor langen Jahren einen Burſchen, durch falſche Angabe, ſchmählich gekränkt; dieſer lauerte ihm Abends an einer Straßenecke auf, um ihn durchzuprügeln, und wandte nun, die Erwartung täuſchend zu beſchwichtigen, den unſterblichen Monolog des Schillerſchen Tell folgendermaaßen auf ſeinen Zuſtand an:

Durch dieſe finſtre Gaſſe muß er kommen,
Es führt kein and'rer Weg zur Kneipe, — hier
Holz' ich ihn durch, — die Suite macht ſich gut.
Der alte Brunnen dort verbirgt mich ihm.
Von dort herab faßt ihn mein Ziegenhainer;
Die Schnurren nahen vor Manſchetten nicht.



Univ. Bibl.
München

Ja, zeig' mich nur dem Amte, Pudel! an,
Holz mußt Du faſſen, jetzt auf Cerevis! —

Ich lebte ganz obſkur — der Ziegenhainer
Ward auf die Knoten nur allein geſchwenkt, —
Ich wußte Nichts vom Carcer und Conſil.
Du haſt in der Pomade mich geſtört,
In bitter gährend Drachengift haſt Du
Die Milch jedweden Bierſtoffs mir verwandelt;
An's Ungeheure haſt Du mich gewöhnt. —
Wer ſicher weiß, er werde bald geſchickt,
Dem iſt der Pudel Jeglicher nur Wurſt.

Die armen Füchſe, die unſchuldigen,
Das biedere Hauscamiſol muß ich
Vor Dir beſchützen. — Als Du mich gefaßt,
Mit blankem Schläger in der Hand, den ich
Als Unparteiiſcher nur aufgehoben,
Weil der Paukanten Einer fort ihn warf:
Als Du mit grauſam teufeliſcher Luſt
Mich vor das Amt citirt und vor den Profax,
Und Nichts begreifen wollteſt, Du Kameel!
Damals gelobt' ich mir auf Ehrenwort,
Das Gott nur und der Senior gehört:
Ich tränke keinem Burſchen mehr Eins vor,
Und tränke keinem Burſchen mehr Eins nach,
Und machte keinen Fürſt von Thoren mit,
Bis ich das dicke Fell Dir durchgeholzt,
Daß Du kein Glied mehr regſt. — Was ich gelobt
In jenes Augenblickes Höllenquaalen,
Das iſt ein heil'ger Pump. — Ich will ihn zahlen!

Du biſt der Pudel Jüngſter, doch es hätte
Der Oberpudel ſelbſt ſich nicht erlaubt,
Was Du — Abfaſſen ſollſt Du Paukereien,

Allein den Unparteiiſchen zu petzen,
Als der Paukanten Einen, heißt Dich Niemand. —
Kein Andrer wagte ſo ſich zu erfrechen.
Es lebt ein Gott zu ſtrafen und zu rächen!

Komm Du hervor, Du Bringer bitt'rer Schmerzen,
Mein Ziegenhainer, jetzt mein höchſter Schatz!
Du ſollſt nun einen Rücken treffen, der
Bisher den Burſchen unerreichbar war.
Du aber wirſt ihn faſſen. — Und auch Du Dreifarb'ge Pfeifenlitze, die Du ſonſt,
Wenn es bei Kneipereien was geſetzt,
Den Ziegenhainer bandeſt an die Hand,
Verlaß mich nicht im fürchterlichen Ernſt!
Nur jetzt noch halte feſt, Du treue Schnur,
Die ſonſt die Pfeife, dann das Holz geſchmückt.
Hätt' ich jetzt Pech, und riſſeſt Du entzwei,
So wär' es morgen auch mit mir vorbei.

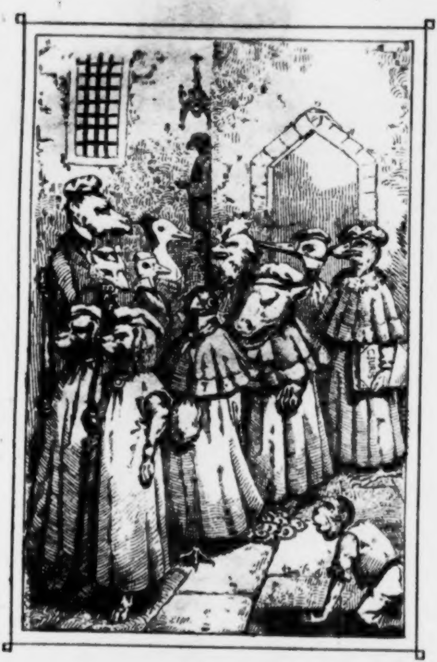
Auf dieſen Brunnenſtein will ich mich ſetzen,
Den Beſen für die Eimer aufgerichtet,
Denn dieſe ſchwatzen hier allein. — Sonſt zieht
Ein Jeder raſch vorüber; Keiner kohlt
Zum Zeitvertreib mit Anderen. Hier geht
Der ochſende Profeſſor — der Philiſter,
Der einen Riß hat — der vorſicht'ge Schnurre,
Der Doctorand, ſo wie der kraſſe Fuchs,
Der Finke und noch ſonſt ſo manch Kameel,
Das ferne her kommt von der Menſchen Ländern,
Denn jede Straße führt hier auf den Markt.
Sie Alle ſchieben in die Kneipe ſich. —
Doch der hier durſtig lauert, das bin Ich.

Sonſt, wenn das alte Haus kam, kraſſe Füchſe!
Das war ein Jubel in der ganzen Kneipe;

Denn nimmer trat es ein, ſo trank es Euch
Gleich Eines vor, und ſchlug nachher Euch ein.
War's eine hohe Quart, war's eine Terz,
Die es Euch lehrt, war's ein Rappierjung' ſelbſt,
Euch an der Waffen Klirren zu gewöhnen:
Kurz, etwas lerntet immer Ihr von ihm,
Auch paukt es den Comment Euch oftmals ein —
Jetzt kommt es nicht; am Brunnen ſitzt es jetzt,
Des Pudels Rücken iſt's, auf den es lauert.
Und doch — an Euch nur denkt es, lieben Füchſe,
Auch jetzt — Euch vor'm Conſilium zu bewahren,
Zu ſchützen vor dem bittern Relegat,
Sobald Euch abgefaßt der Pudel hat.
Ich laure auf ein edles Wild — Läßt ſich's
Der Jäger nicht verdrießen, Tage lang,
Mit dem Schießprügel unterm Arm, zu ſtreifen
Durch Wald und Feld, in harten Winters Strenge,
Um einem Haſen auf den Pelz zu brennen;
Hier gilt es einen köſtlicheren Preis,
Des Pudels, der mich ſchmählich will verderben —
Des Pudels Rücken gilt es blau zu färben.
So lang' ich Burſche bin, hab' ich den Hieber
Gehandhabt, mich geübt auf der Menſur,
Und meinen Gegner oftmal ausgeſchmiert.
Heut aber zieh' ich keinen Paukwichs an.
In einen alten Flauſch hüll' ich mich ein,
Den Ziegenhainer will allein ich faſſen,
Ja, Pudel, möge Gott Dir gnädig ſein!
Denn heute gilt's, auf immer Dich zu ſchaffen,
Wenn Du umherſchleichſt in den engen Gaſſen. —

Nicht wahr, das iſt echte Poeſie — die innigſte Verſchmelzung von Natur und Kunſt. — Schiller's Monolog iſt ein Meiſterſtück — aber dieſer Monolog noch ſchöner, oder ich müßte nicht wiſſen, was ein echtes Burſchenherz erfreuen, begeiſtern und zu kühnen Thaten entflammen kann. Dieſes herrliche Werk wurde damals in unzähligen Abſchriften verbreitet, alle Füchſe konnten es auswendig, und mein Landsmann hatte ſich ſeine Unſterblichkeit zwiefach geſichert, denn er prügelte den Pedellen auch wirklich durch, und es kam nicht heraus:

Wer dieſe heldenkühne That vollbracht. —



CJURS

Drittes Kapitel.

Von den Univerſitäten im Allgemeinen und Beſondern.

Eine Univerſität iſt eine Anſtalt, welche einen Rector oder Prorector hat, der halbjährlich oder jährlich wechſelt, und vier oder fünf Facultäten beſitzt, die Doctoren creiren können, und zwar umſonſt, was ſie ſelten thun, und meiſt nur bei feierlichen Gelegenheiten, oder für Geld, was ſie häufig und bei jeder Gelegenheit thun. Der Rector oder Prorector hat einen hohen Rang, aber wenig Macht, er gleicht einem abgeſetzten — nein, der Ausdruck iſt zu illoyal, — ſagen wir lieber einem Könige, der vom Throne geſtiegen iſt — man erzeigt ihm die alten Ehren, aber man läßt ihn höchſtens nur ſeinen Hofſtaat regieren. Doch repräſentirt er, der Rector oder Prorector nämlich, die höchſte Macht, und die Studenten werfen ihm die Fenſter ein, wenn ſie mit dem Geſetz unzufrieden ſind. Die eingeworfenen Fenſter braucht er aber nicht auf ſeine Koſten wieder machen zu laſſen, ſondern das geſchieht aus öffentlichen Caſſen, meiſt aus der Caſſe für die Ehrenausgaben, wenn eine ſolche beſonders vorhanden iſt. Er tritt ſein Amt mit einer Rede an, was eigentlich nur ein Verſuch iſt, um die Studenten an ſeine Stimme zu gewöhnen. Außerdem hat er noch manche Functionen, wie z. B. in den Senatsverſammlungen, und bei Schmäuſen, den Vorſitz zu führen, und hier den erſten Toaſt auf das Wohl des Landesherrn auszubringen. Von ſeinen übrigen Pflichten und Geſchäften wird ſpäter wohl noch die Rede ſein. Eine beſondere Eigenſchaft an ihm iſt, daß, wenn er auf dem Felde der Ehre fällt, oder vom Kampfplatz abtreten muß, nicht ſein Hintermann, ſondern ſein Vordermann für ihn eintritt, der Exrector oder Exprorector nämlich, bis ein neuer Rector ernannt iſt. — Früher wurde er nur von ſeinen Collegen gewählt, damals war die Wiſſenſchaft noch unabhängig; jetzt iſt ſie ein Vaſall der Krone geworden, und er muß ſich von der Regierung belehnen oder beſtätigen laſſen.

Außerdem hat eine Univerſität noch eine Anzahl ordentlicher und außerordentlicher Profeſſoren, Privatdocenten, andere Lehrer und allerlei Juſtizperſonen, unter denen die Pedelle die angeſehenſten ſind, d. h. diejenigen, welche die Studenten am häufigſten zu ſehen bekommen. Ueber der ganzen Univerſität ſchwebt, als Gottheit in unſeren Tagen, die Polizei; ſie iſt die Nothwendigkeit, der ſelbſt der Herrſcher im Donnergewölk, Zeus, der Prorector oder Rector, ſich, trotz ſeiner Magnificenz, eben ſo gut unterwerfen muß, wie der Geringſten Einer dieſer akademiſchen Welt. Der Zweck einer Univerſität endlich iſt, die Totalität des geſammten menſchlichen und übermenſchlichen Wiſſens, die scientia rerum humanarum et divinarum im weiteſten Sinne des Wortes, in ihrem Schooße zu bergen, und dafür zu ſorgen, daß die auf ihr immatrikulirten Studenten Alles lernen können, nicht allein was man weiß, ſondern auch was man nicht weiß. Die Profeſſoren auf deutſchen Univerſitäten wiſſen aber Alles, das ausgenommen, was ſie nicht wiſſen, und das wiſſen die Studenten, brauchen es daher nicht zu lernen. Empfindſame Reiſende und andere Naturforſcher behaupten, es gäbe nirgends mehr heimliche kleine Intriguen und Kabalen, und heimlichen und öffentlichen Neid und Haß, als auf den deutſchen Univerſitäten, weil jeder einzelne Docent nicht allein glaube, Alles, ſondern Alles auch am Beſten zu wiſſen, und es daher für Pflicht halte, ſeine Collegen, die ohne ihn beſtändig irren würden, durch die ſanfteſten und gelindeſten Mittel von ſeiner Superiorität zu überzeugen. Das iſt aber ſchändliche Verleumdung, in der Hölle iſt weit mehr Haß und Neid. Böſe Zeugen ſagen nun freilich, die Hölle ſei die Geſammtakademie der ganzen Menſchheit; ſolches iſt indeſſen bloß ein ſchlechter Witz. Ich habe noch nie erfahren, daß Jemand, der ſich zum Staatsexamen gemeldet, Teſtimonia producirt hätte über Vorleſungen, ſo er bei dem Satan oder anderen kakodämoniſchen Notabilitäten gehört, gleichviel, ob es Brodcollegia oder andere waren; ſelbſt nicht einmal die Juriſten, die es doch am Beſten brauchen könnten, was freilich wohl daher rührt, daß in den neueſten Zeiten ſo viel Chriſtenthum in die Jurisprudenz, beſonders in das römiſche Recht, gedrungen iſt, weshalb natürlich der Teufel nichts mehr damit zu thun haben will; vorzüglich ſeitdem gewiſſe Rechtslehrer das Recht aus dem Sündenfall deduciren, und die römiſchen Inſtitutionen mit der moſaiſchen Schöpfung beginnen. An den Sündenfall denkt aber der Teufel nicht gern, weil ihm damals nichts weiter gelang, als die Eva zu verführen, und das kann jetzt — ſoweit iſt die Welt doch ſeit 6000 Jahren vorgeſchritten — jeder dumme Teufel bei jeder Eva, ja es iſt ſogar eine merkwürdige phyſiologiſche Erſcheinung, daß es ihm deſto leichter gelingt, je dümmer er und je geſcheidter ſie iſt. Die Urſache mag tiefer und in dem Ausgleichungsprincip zu ſuchen ſein, das durch die ganze Natur geht; das gehört aber nicht hierher.

Im Ganzen herrſchen noch viele Controverſen über den Begriff Univerſität vor, was von der Vielſeitigkeit der Univerſitäten ſowohl, wie daher rühren mag, daß viele Menſchen immer nur eine Seite derſelben ſehen. So z. B. halten manche Staatsmänner die Univerſitäten nur für den Staats-Wiſſenſchafts-Speicher, aus dem die Lehrlinge auf den Staatscomptoirs halbjährlich im Voraus holen müſſen, was der Staat nothwendig conſumirt, wie unter Anderem das erforderliche Oel, um die Räder der Maſchine zu ſchmieren, damit ſie es nachher bei der Hand haben, wenn ſie Commis geworden ſind. Aus demſelben Grunde ſind jene Lenker und Regierer denn auch dafür, den Profeſſoren ſchlechte Beſoldungen zu geben; denn ſie meinen, eines Theils, wer in und von der Wiſſenſchaft lebt, der braucht weiter Nichts um zu leben, anderen Theils aber, daß ein Profeſſor leicht übermüthig wird, und daß man die Bäume zeitig und fortwährend beſchneiden müſſe, damit ſie nicht in den Himmel wachſen. Das ſind nun Staatsmaximen, über welche einem beſcheidenen Bürger kein Urtheil zuſteht, da er leicht dafür auf die Finger geklopft werden kann. Viele andere Leute, namentlich von dem hohen Adel, glauben: eine Univerſität ſei eine Pepiniere aller möglichen Ungezogenheiten, Unarten, Untugenden und Unanſtändigkeiten, ganz beſonders aber revolutionärer Geſinnungen, und beklagen es ſehr, daß die Ritterakademieen nicht genügen, um ihre hochwohlgebornen Söhne für den höheren Staatsdienſt vorzubereiten. Frauen, ferner, welche erwachſene Söhne beſitzen, ſind der Anſicht: eine Univerſität ſei eine Anſtalt, in der das Söhnlein zu einer Verſorgung allerdings fähig gemacht, aber auch zugleich methodiſch zerhauen oder zerſtochen werde, durch die man jedoch hindurch müſſe, wie die Jungfrau durch die Brautnacht, um zu allen Rechten und Befugniſſen eines ehelichen Weibes zu gelangen. Viele Studirende endlich bilden ſich ein, eine Univerſität ſei ein Luſtort, um drei oder mehr Jahre das Leben recht tüchtig zu genießen; für das Uebrige möge dann erſt der Papa, und nachher der liebe Gott ſorgen. Die Profeſſoren endlich betrachten die Univerſität als das Centrum aller Intelligenz, und ihre Vorträge als die Radien, die von dieſem Centrum aus die ganze Welt erleuchten und erhellen, außerhalb deſſen aber keine wahre Intelligenz mehr zu finden ſei.

An allen dieſen Anſichten haftet nun, wie an allen ſublunariſchen Anſichten, mehr oder weniger Falſches, und mehr oder weniger Wahres, und kein vernünftiger Menſch wird ſich daher darüber wundern, daß die Regierungen in neueſter Zeit die Univerſitäten unter ihren beſonderen Schutz und in beſondere Affection genommen, zumal da es ihnen ſchien, als ob dieſelben, die ſie als moraliſche Perſonen beſtehen ließen, ihnen gegenüber ſich zu oft als immoraliſche Perſonen benähmen. Dies hat nun auch wieder viele Zweifel angeregt, und die wichtige Frage, ob und in wie fern die Univerſitäten vom

Staate und deſſen beſonderen Zwecken abhängig ſein ſollten und müßten, und wie ihre ganzen Einrichtungen, von den Pedellen an bis zu den Collegien hinunter, zu beſtimmen ſei, iſt noch immer nicht ganz genügend beantwortet worden, weder praktiſch noch theoretiſch. Ein geiſtreicher Mann, deſſen Name ſchon anzeigt, daß er im Dunkeln tappt, behauptete ſogar, man müſſe die Lehrmethode reformiren, und aus dem wiſſenſchaftlichen Monologe des Docenten einen behaglichen Dialog machen; nur ſo könne man den Profeſſoren auf die Finger paſſen und das Verderben auf den deutſchen Univerſitäten, das allein von den Docenten ausgehe, die ſämmtlich nichtsnutzige, geiſtloſe, eigennützige, pflichtvergeſſene Geſellen ſind, ausrotten. Das Unrichtigſte bei der ganzen Sache war, daß ſich verdiente Männer und Lehrer der Wiſſenſchaft herabließen, den guten, geiſtreichen, vielnutzigen, uneigennützigen und pflichtgetreuen Mann bekehren und eines Beſſeren belehren zu wollen, als ob irgend ein Menſch auf Erden vermöchte einen Mohren weiß zu waſchen. Solche Leute muß man ſich ſelbſt im Fett ihrer Selbſtgefälligkeit, Selbſtbewunderung und Selbſtüberſchätzung ruhig ſchmoren laſſen, ſie erſticken am Ende vor lauter Vergnügen über die Vortrefflichkeit ihres lieben Selbſt, darin und verlöſchen wie ein nicht ausgeputztes, ſondern ausgeblaſenes Licht, dunſtend. Taugt eine Univerſität nichts, ſo liegt das an der illiberalen und geiſtloſen Behandlung, die der Staat, dem ſie angehört, ihr zu Theil werden läßt: iſt aber freie, reine Wiſſenſchaftlichkeit das höchſte Princip, nach dem ſie geleitet und verwaltet wird, ſo muß, bei der allgemeinen Regſamkeit und Tüchtigkeit, der einzelne Lehrer mit fort und vorwärts, oder er bleibt wie ein verächtlicher Maraudeur hinter dem ſiegreich vorwärts ſchreitenden Heer, ein verlorener und vergeſſener Mann, zurück. Fragt einmal, wann Heidelberg, Göttingen, Jena u. ſ. w. in ihrer ſchönſten Blüthe ſtanden? Stets nur dann, als die höchſte und reinſte Intelligenz die Zügel in der Hand hielt.

Die ganze Frage über die Univerſitäten und ihr Zurückbleiben hinter oder ihr Fortſchreiten mit der Zeit hat, wie das in Deutſchland nie anders ſein wird, theils zu Extravaganzen, theils zu Kleinigkeitskrämereien geführt, und am Ende iſt's doch überall bei dem Alten geblieben, wenigſtens bis jetzt. Daß eine Univerſität nicht in unſeren Tagen völlig unabhängig vom Staat beſtehen könne, wie Einige verlangt haben, verſteht ſich von ſelbſt, denn kein Staat kann und wird einen Staat im Staate dulden wollen und können, und wie die Intelligenz nur Dienerin des Staates, zum Wohl des Ganzen wie der Einzelnen ſein kann, ſo auch die Univerſität. Darum braucht man ihr aber nicht ihre Eigenthümlichkeit, ihre innere geiſtige Freiheit zu rauben, denn eben dieſe, wo ſie ſich rein und um ihrer ſelbſt willen ausbildet, und die echte Wiſſenſchaftlichkeit zur Grundlage hat, verträgt ſich gar wohl mit jeder vernünftigen Regierungsform. Dem Staate muß vor Allem daran liegen, eine tüchtige, reichbegabte Jugend zu tüchtigen, klaren, willensfeſten Männern herangebildet zu ſehen. —

Wo aber ſind die beſten Studenten in jeder Hinſicht zu finden? Da, wo ſie die meiſte Achtung und Verehrung für ihre Lehrer haben, und zwar nicht bloß um des Wiſſens, ſondern um der redlichen, treuen, wahren Geſinnung willen. Ein einziger von ſeinen Zuhörern wahrhaft geliebter Profeſſor vermag mehr über dieſelben, als alle Geſetze, Verbote und Examenbeängſtigungen. Dieſe Liebe erwirbt er ſich dauernd allein durch die Tüchtigkeit ſeines Wiſſens und ſeiner Geſinnung. Zulauf kann ein Docent durch allerlei Mittel wohl eine Zeitlang haben, aber es hält nicht vor. Die Jugend hat bewußtlos einen zu glücklichen Inſtinkt, und fühlt alles Falſche und Gemachte gar bald durch; dann aber urtheilt ſie härter und ſtrenger, als die weiland geheimen Juſtizräthe: Minos, Aeakus und Rhadamanth ſelbſt.

Eine Frage ſei hier noch berührt, weil ſie den geliebten Hauptgegenſtand dieſes Buches beſonders betrifft, die nämlich: ob kleine oder große Städte für Univerſitäten paſſender und den Studenten zuträglicher ſeien?

Wir wollen uns nur mit dem letzten Theile derſelben beſchäftigen, und die Beantwortung des erſteren ſo gelehrten Nußknackern, wie den Herren Dieſterweg und Achert, zur Uebung für ihre trefflichen, ſich gern in die Waden der armen Profeſſoren verbeißenden Zähne, überlaſſen. Unſere Vorfahren verlegten die Univerſitäten lieber in kleine Städte; die neueſte Zeit hat ſogar, als Gegenſatz, Reſidenzen vorgezogen. Kleine und große Städte haben, wie alle Dinge in der Welt, ihre guten und ihre böſen Seiten, es kommt nun darauf an, was das Ueberwiegende iſt. In kleinen Städten herrſcht der Student allerdings, und Alles richtet ſich mehr oder weniger nach ihm; ſein Uebermuth hat alſo die Arme freier. Aber die Geſammtmaſſe iſt zuſammengerückter und kann ſich, was auf Univerſitäten von höchſter Wichtigkeit bleibt, ſelbſt beaufſichtigen und ihre innere Sittenpolizei über den Einzelnen weit ſicherer ausüben. Der Student muß daher in kleinen Städten weit mehr Student bleiben, und das iſt gut, denn das iſt ſein Beruf. In großen Städten dagegen ſteht Alles, was zu einer Univerſität gehört, ſich geſellſchaftlich weit ferner: andere Intereſſen ziehen diejenigen, welche mit, in und durch einander zu leben beſtimmt ſind, von einander ab; der Student kann ſich nicht fühlen und geräth dadurch in ein Misverhältniß zu ſeinen nächſten Umgebungen: die Zerſtreuungen, die ſich ihm darbieten, ſind vielſeitiger und gefährlicher; zwiſchen ihm und ſeinen Lehrern iſt eine große, oft durch Sitte und Etiquette unüberſteiglich gewordene Kluft; der Einzelne verliert ſich alſo weit leichter, und verdirbt natürlich auch weit leichter. Dagegen bieten größere Städte den zunächſt auf das Praktiſche gerichteten Wiſſenſchaften weit reichere und zugänglichere Mittel dar; das gewöhnlich theuerere Leben, als in kleinen Städten, wird dadurch wieder ausgeglichen, und zwar auf eine weit vortheilhaftere Weiſe, denn Dinge, die von großer Wichtigkeit für die allgemeine Bildung des Geiſtes und des Herzens ſind, finden ſich in kleinen Städten entweder gar nicht, oder ſpärlich, ärmlich und mittelmäßig, und der Studirende wird durch deren Genuß und Anſchauung nicht emporgehoben, was immer ſehr ſchlimm iſt.

Kurz, meine Meinung iſt: Hätte ich einen Sohn auf die Univerſität zu ſchicken, ſo ließ' ich ihn ſeine Studien auf einer kleinen Univerſität beginnen, um ſittlich feſt, und auf einer großen enden, um wiſſenſchaftlich feſt zu werden, ſo weit nämlich einem Studioſus das die Götter überhaupt vergönnen, denn die eigentliche Normaluniverſität eines jeden Studirenden iſt und bleibt das wirkliche Leben ſelbſt.

Was ſoll ich nun noch von den Univerſitäten im Beſonderen ſagen? Die Zeiten, wo man mit dem ſchönen Verſe:

Wer von Leipzig kommt ohne Weib,
Von Halle mit geſundem Leib,
Und von Jena ungeſchlagen,
Der hat von großem Glück zu ſagen.

das Wichtigſte im Einzelnen zuſammen faſſen konnte, ſind dahin; denn wir haben der Univerſitäten mehr im deutſchen Lande, und jede hält ſich für die bedeutendſte. Gedächtnißverſe ſind aber ein gut Ding, namentlich für Väter und Vormünder, die Söhne oder Mündel auf die Univerſität ſenden ſollen, und in der Eile gern die guten und ſchlimmen Eigenſchaften der deutſchen Hochſchulen, um ſich bei der Wahl mit größerer Sittlichkeit zu benehmen, recapituliren möchten. Für dieſe folge denn hier ein, von einem lieben Freunde uns mitgetheiltes, Goldenes Univerſitäten A. B. C.

Berlin ganz oben an jetzt ſteht,
Und zwar nicht bloß im Alphabet,
Doch hat es für den rechten Kenner
Berühmte Namen mehr als Männer.
Ein ſchlechter Reim zwar iſt auf Bonn
Im Allgemeinen dort der Ton,
Und doch möcht' er noch beſſer ſein,
Als dieſer, der nicht immer fein,
Obwohl gar Vieles gut gewählt,
Und es an Tüchtigem nicht fehlt.
Breslau iſt feſten Wiſſens Burg;
Erlangen hilft ſich eben durch;
In Freiburg herrſcht ein freier Geiſt.

Wie Wort und That das wohl beweiſt. —
Es reimt ſich keineswegs auf Gießen,
Daß es ſich pflege abzuſchließen,
Auf Göttingen paßt es weit mehr,
Wer's ehrlich meint, beklagt das ſehr.
Greifswalde iſt ein kleiner Ort,
Und geht, ſo gut es kann, mit fort.
In Halle zankt man widerlich,
Studioſus iſt oft — reime Dich,
Doch birgt es reiche Wiſſenſchaft,
Trotz vielverſuchter Geiſtes-Haft.
Zu Heidelberg ein großes Faß,
Für die Studenten auch viel Spaß;
Und wer der Rechte ſich befliſſen,
Erwirbt dort leicht das rechte Wiſſen.
An Sittlichkeit iſt Jena reich,
Doch dem, was einſt es war, nicht gleich.
Zu Kiel herrſcht gar ein guter Sinn,
Nur liegt's zu ſehr im Winkel drin.
Von Königsberg ein Gleiches gilt,
Wenn auch ein heller Born dort quillt.
In Leipzig iſt zu viel Latein,
Und zu viel Sächſiſch oben drein;
Und wie die Stadt raſch vorwärts geht,
So nicht die Univerſität.
Von Marburg weiß man Wenig nur;
In München herrſcht zu viel Dreſſur.
Roſtock gehört zu Meckelnburg;
Durch Tübingen geht Schwaben durch.
Würzburg baut einen guten Wein,
Und disputirt nicht auf Latein.
Kurz, überall ſo Luſt wie Weh'
Im Univerſitäten A. B. C.

Wer mehr zu wiſſen wünſcht, bemühe ſich einen Commentar zu dieſen tiefſinnigen Verſen zu erhalten. Der Verfaſſer iſt aber kein Profeſſor, und wenn er auch gern bereit wäre, privatiſſime darüber Vorleſungen zu halten, ſo zweifelt er doch, daß ihm irgend wo die venia docendi dazu ertheilt werden möchte, denn — —

Leicht aufzuritzen iſt das Reich der Geiſter,
Sie liegen lauernd unter dünner Decke,
Und leiſe hörend, ſtürmen ſie herauf.

Viertes Kapitel.

Die Lebensalter des deutſchen Studenten.

All the world 's a stage
And all the men and women merely players:
They have their exits and their entrances:
And one man in his time plays many parts
His acts being seven ages. —
Shakspeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

Die Welt iſt eine Univerſität,
Und alle Menſchen ſind nichts als Studenten,
Vom lieben Herrgott immatrikulirt,
Conſilirt, relegirt, examinirt.
Der Einzelne treibt manche Wiſſenſchaft,
Und ſeine Studienzeit ſind ſechs Semeſter,
Mit unter auch wohl ſieben, wenn ſich's macht.
Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Viele geiſtreiche Künſtler haben ſich bemüht, dieſe berühmte Stelle im Shakſpeare zu verſinnlichen, und es iſt ihnen mehr oder minder gelungen. Eigentlich ſcheint die Aufgabe nicht allzuſchwer, denn der große Dichter hat ſeinen Gegenſtand mit Worten ſo meiſterhaft gezeichnet, daß man bei nur einigermaaßen erträglicher Phantaſie jedes einzelne Bild, wie es die folgenden Verſe enthalten, gleich vor ſich ſieht, und es daher leicht durch Stift, Pinſel oder Meißel zu reproduciren, oder, um mich mit neueſtem Ausdruck kunſtgerecht zu zeigen, die fließende Idee zur feſten Erſtarrung zu bringen vermag. Wie man aber Alles in der Welt in ein anderes Licht ſtellen, oder, durch verſchiedene farbige wie unfarbige Gläſer betrachtet, anders ſehen kann, als es wirklich iſt, ſo auch natürlich die Lebensalter eines deutſchen Studenten. Bleibt derſelbe im normalen Zuſtande, ſo wird er, gleich jedem anderen erdgeborenen Weſen, die verſchiedenen Perioden ſeines Daſeins in naturgemäßer Entwickelung und Löſung durchſchreiten. Thut er das nicht, ſo müſſen natürlich Störungen und Stockungen entſtehen, die ihn entweder zu lange in der Kindheit verweilen laſſen oder zu früh alt machen. Dies hängt oft von Verhältniſſen ab, die nicht von ihm abhängen; ſeit Adam ſind wir eben Alle Epigonen. So z. B. behaupten Erfahrene und Vielgewanderte, daß die Embryonen der Klöſter und Fürſtenſchulen ſich ſelten, nach ihrer Geburt als Studenten, naturgeſetzlich ausbilden, ſondern entweder, mit dem großen Britten zu reden, magere Pantalons in Pantoffeln, das heißt hier: obſkure Duckmäuſer werden, oder gerade in das Gegentheil umſpringen und ſich als kraſſe Renommiſten zeigen. Medium tenuere beati, heißt es; unter den beati darf man aber nie Portani, Afrani u. ſ. w. verſtehen, denn die wiſſen wenig oder Nichts von der gerechten Mitte. Einzelne Ausnahmen können hier nicht gelten, ſie beſtätigen nur die Regel, wie die Juriſten zu ſagen pflegen. Ueberhaupt, meine ich, haben unſere Gymnaſien, wie ſie da ſind, mehr oder weniger den Fehler, daß ſie das Gedächtniß und den Wortverſtand leider zu ſehr, Geiſt und Herz aber zu wenig ausbilden. . Die meiſten Schüler kommen geiſtig unreif, und poſitiv wiſſenſchaftlich überreif auf die Univerſität, und daraus entſpringt denn der Uebelſtand, daß ſie als Studenten ſtets zu wenig und ſtets zu viel wiſſen, und erſt nach den mannigfachſten Verluſten an Zeit, Arbeit, Geld u. ſ. w. dahin kommen, das Rechte, nämlich das, was ihnen wahrhaft Noth thut, als Menſchen wie als Gelehrte zu lernen, ja mitunter horribile dictu die Univerſität wieder verlaſſen, und nicht einmal eine dunkle Ahnung deſſen, was wirklich das Rechte ſei, mitnehmen. Wer ſich davon überzeugen will, gehe auf das flache Land oder in die kleinen Städte, wo das Leben einer Mühle gleicht, in der Jeder als drehendes Pferd beſchäftigt iſt, er wird überall eine Menge von Richtern, Advokaten, Dorfpfarrern, Landärzten u. ſ. w. antreffen, die ſo aller höheren, wahren Bildung baar ſind, daß er nie glauben würde, ſie hätten ſtudirt, wüßte er nicht, daß der Weg durch die Univerſität allein in die verſchiedenen Ställe führte, in welchen ſie ſich für die ganze Lebenszeit auf Stallfütterung befinden. Wären dieſe armen Leute nicht unreif, aber dreſſirt, von ihren Gymnaſien auf die Univerſität gekommen, hätten ihre Lehrer nur einen ſchwachen Funken des Göttlichen in ihre Seelen zu werſen vermocht, der nun während ihrer akademiſchen Zeit reiche Nahrung gefunden, ſo würde es beſſer mit ihnen ſtehn und ſie gleich wahren Männern der Wiſſenſchaft das Leben würdig genießen und veredeln, während ſie jetzt nur den Geiſt — wenn man anders hier überhaupt vom Geiſte reden darf — brauchen, um das Thier zu mäſten. Unſer großes Unglück iſt in Deutſchland, daß wir die Lehrerſtellen an den Gymnaſien nicht mit tüchtigen Pädagogen, ſondern mit gelehrten Philologen beſetzen. Die ſchöne Benennung Schulfuchs rührt bekanntlich von Juſtus Ludwig Brismann her, der in der zweiten Hälfte des 16. Jahrhunderts erſt als Rector zu Naumburg, dann als Profeſſor der griechiſchen Sprache zu Jena fungirte, und dem die Studenten wegen ſeiner Pedanterei und ſeines mit Fuchspelz gefütterten Mantels jenen Spottnamen gaben. Man muß geſtehn, daß die Nachfolger dieſes würdigen Mannes bis auf die neueſten Zeiten mit echter Pietät unabläſſig bemüht waren, ſich die Bezeichnung als ein heilig Erbtheil zu bewahren. — Der daraus entſpringende Fluch wird noch ſchwer auf mancher kommenden Generation laſten. Arme, deutſche Schuljugend! Ich weiß den Fall, daß ein grundgelehrter Director eines Gymnaſiums, ein feiner Grammatiker, ſeinen Primanern verbot, gute deutſche Bücher zu leſen und neuere Sprachen zu erlernen — denn — ſo lauteten ſeine trefflichen Gründe — was es Gutes giebt in neueren Sprachen, das iſt Alles überſetzt; die Klaſſiker aber kann Niemand überſetzen. Eben ſo empfahl er bei der Lectüre des Tacitus vorſichtig zu ſein; den Salluſt proſcribirte er aber ganz und gar um ſeines Latein willen; nur im Cicero, wiederholte er aber unermüdlich, ſei das wahre Heil zu finden. — Hinc illae lachrymae!

Gehen wir indeſſen zu Intereſſanterem über, und ſehen wir den echten deutſchen Studenten in ſeinen verſchiedenen Lebensaltern ſich entwickeln, ſein und vergehn.

Des vierten Kapitels

erſte Unterabtheilung.

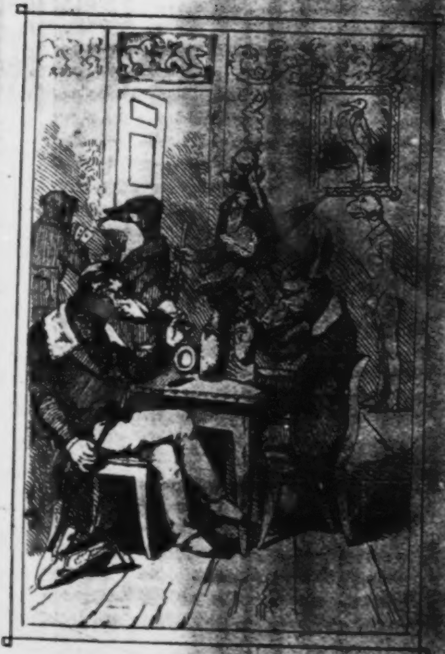
Der Studenten-Embryo oder das ſogenannte Maulthier.

> Either they must be dieted like mules
> And have their provender ty'd to their mouths
> Or piteous they will look, like drowned mice.
> Shakspeare, I. Henry VI, A. I. Sc. II.
>
> Entweder muß man ſie in Tracht und Weſen
> Schen wie Studenten gehen laſſen, oder
> Sie ſehen aus nach Nichts; nicht Fiſch, nicht Fleiſch.
> Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Die Bedeutung des Namens Maulthier ward ſchon von uns mit deutſcher Gründlichkeit im zweiten Kapit dieſes Buches erklärt, wir können alſo ohne Weiteres, indem wir den Leſer darauf zurück verweiſen, zu der Darſtellung unſeres Gegenſtandes übergehn, welcher, wie das Ei der indiſchen Mythe, eine ganze Welt in ſich birgt. Denken wir uns, um ihn in ſeiner vollen Schönheit zu begreifen, einen holden Jüngling, dem der erſte Flaum an Kinn und Oberlippe eben anzufliegen beginnt, und dem, wenn er ſich zu mauſig macht, Papa und Oheim, Beide ergraute und erſtarrte Altgeſellen der Themis, erzählen: Leute, die noch im erſten Proceß, dem mit den Gänſen nämlich, lägen, dürften ſo eigentlich nicht mitſprechen. Das verdrießt ihn ſehr: in ſeines Nichts durchbohrendem Gefühl ſchleicht er ſich auf ſein Zimmer, das er noch mit einem oder mehreren jüngern Brüdern theilt, ſieht ſich vorſichtig um, ob dieſe nicht in der Nähe, und ſtellt ſich nun vor den Spiegel, um ſeines künftigen Bartes erſte Umriſſe zu ſtudiren. Ach, ſie entſprechen ſeiner Erwartung nicht: einzeln ſproſſen ſpärliche Härchen hervor, mit größeren Lücken, als er ſelbſt in den Dictaten des Religionsunterrichtes ſeiner Prima hat, — bekanntlich dem Lehrgegenſtande, der am Schlechteſten auf den Gymnaſien tractirt wird, weil entweder der philologiſche Director zur Hebung ſeines Anſehens ihn ſelbſt vorträgt, oder er jungen Theologen anvertraut wird, die ihn als ein Mittel betrachten, ihre ganze ſtupende dogmatiſche Gelehrſamkeit.

ſammt allen daran wie Schwänzchen hängenden Controverſen, mit Glanz an den Mann zu bringen. — Schmerzerfüllt blickt der Jüngling Kinn und Lippe an, ſie ſind zu glatt, kaum daß ſie die künftige Größe ahnen laſſen. Heimlich greift er zur Kohle, oder wenn es ſeine ſchwache Caſſe erlaubte — gar zur Stangenpomade, und verwirklicht ſeine kühnen Träume auf ſeinem Antlitz, ſich weidend am Vorgefühl der einſtigen Herrlichkeit. Noch heimlicher ſtopft er dazu eine alte Pfeife des Papa mit getrockneten geſchnittenen Blättern des Kirſchbaums oder der Centifolie, die er ſich verſtohlen bereitete, ein geiſtreiches Surrogat; ſetzt ſie in Brand, drückt ſich ſeine Mütze ſchief auf das Haupt, ergreift den Ziegenhainer, den er ſich von den Geſchenken der Tanten, Großmütter und ſo weiter kaufte, und ſchreitet nun renommiſtiſch auf und ab, ſtets parallel mit dem Spiegel ſich haltend, und mit halber Stimme, damit man es nicht höre, ſingend: „Der Burſch von echtem Schrot und Korn“; denn ein ſolcher träumt er ſich zu ſein, in ſeines Daſeins ſchönſten Momenten. Aber ach! „da ſchlägt die Stunde;“ er muß in das Gymnaſium eilen, um eine Naſe für das letzte ſchlecht gearbeitete lateiniſche Exercitium in tiefſter Demuth zu empfangen, und ſeine goldenen Träume ſind zerronnen. Umſonſt declamirt er halb wehmüthig, halb zornig mit Schiller: „Auch ich war in Arkadien geboren“ — es hilft Alles Nichts, er muß fort. Selbſt daß ihm von ſeinem künſtlichen Tabaksſurrogat etwas wunderlich zu Muthe iſt, ſchützt ihn nicht: er muß fort. Matthiſſon oder Tiedge — er weiß in ſeinem Jammer nicht mehr ganz genau, wer von Beiden — flüſtert ihm zu: „So vergehn des Lebens Herrlichkeiten, ſo verſinkt das Traumbild eitler Macht“ — und das macht ihn nur noch wehmüthiger, wozu denn freilich die aufſteigende Uebelkeit vom verſtohlenen Rauchen das Ihrige beiträgt. Der Director tritt ein und kanzelt ihn herunter, er hat zu einem verbo sentiendi einen Conjunctiv geſetzt, ja er hat proh dolor! sequi den Dativ regieren laſſen; das ſind unerhörte Verbrechen, die den verehrten Schulmonarchen ſogar auf die Vermuthung bringen, er habe ein ſchlechtes Herz. Da wird er bleicher und bleicher, und kaum hat er das Document ſeiner moraliſchen Schlechtigkeit, nämlich ſeiner fehlerhaften Latinität, aus den Händen des ſtrengen Cenſors zurückempfangen, ſo wankt er auch ſchon ſtill, das Schnupftuch vor ſein Antlitz haltend, aus der Klaſſe. Erſt nach geraumer Zeit kehrt er wieder und ſetzt ſich ſchweigend, zwar etwas gefaßter, aber doch noch ſehr bleich auf ſeinen Platz. Triumphirend blickt ihn der Director an, denn einen ſolchen Beweis von der eindringlichen Wirkung ſeiner Beredſamkeit hat er lange nicht gehabt. Er ruft ihn auf zum Ueberſetzen des neuen Kapitels im Plato oder Cicero; mit einer geborgten Präparation hilft ſich unſer unermüdlich fleißige Zögling der Muſen ſo gut durch, wie es nur immer geht, und der erfreute Lehrer ſagt ihm mit ſeltenem pädagogiſchen Scharfſinn jetzt manches Lobende über ſein reines, unverdorbenes Gefühl, auf welches die guten Ermahnungen von vorhin einen ſo tiefen und nachhaltigen Eindruck gemacht haben, und verſpricht ihm, wenn er ſo fortfahre, eine gute Cenſur im Abiturientenexamen, dem unſer Jüngling mit ſehnſüchtiger Angſt entgegenſieht.

Endlich iſt auch dieſer große Zeitpunkt gekommen, und unſer hoffnungsvolle Gymnaſiaſt hat eine leidliche Cenſur erhalten. Daß ihm nicht Nummer Eins zu Theil geworden, daran ſind allein die Intriguen des Conrectors, der in Prima Hebräiſch und Franzöſiſch lehrt, nach ſeiner Ausſage Schuld, weil er bei demſelben keinen Privatunterricht genommen. Wenige Tage nachher findet die ewig denkwürdige Begebenheit der Abſchiedsrede Statt. Er hat ſich für dieſelbe, oder vielmehr ſein Polyhiſtor von Director hat ihm für dieſelbe einen Gegenſtand gewählt, an den ſich die gelehrteſten Männer nicht ohne jahrelange Studien wagen würden, wie z. B. über den Einfluß des Hugo Grotius auf die wiſſenſchaftliche Begründung des Völkerrechtes in lateiniſcher, oder über die Aehnlichkeit Schiller's und Göthe's in deutſcher, oder gar in wie fern die franzöſiſchen Philoſophen die Revolution vorbereitet haben in franzöſiſcher, wenn nicht ſelbſt über die Politik des Ariſtoteles in griechiſcher Sprache. Er aber macht ſich friſch und keck an das Werk und ſtellt die kühnſten Urtheile, fremde wie eigene, mit wahrer Todesverachtung zuſammen, und trägt dann an dem feierlichen Tage ſeine treffliche Rede, mit dem falſcheſten Pathos und der unrichtigſten Betonung, die nur gedacht werden können, zum größten Entzücken ſeiner Verwandten und zur höchſten Zufriedenheit des geſammten Lehrercollegiums vor. So hat er denn Alles geleiſtet, was von ihm als Beweis der höchſten Reife für die Univerſität gefordert werden kann, und der Kranz des Siegers, das heißt: das Abiturientenzeugniß harrt ſeiner. Jetzt iſt er ein freier Menſch, unter Larven die einzige fühlende Bruſt. In ſeiner Vaterſtadt mag das Rauchen auf der Gaſſe erlaubt ſein oder nicht, er geht am nächſten Tage mit einer brennenden Cigarre in das Kaffeehaus und ſpielt öffentlich einige Parthien Billard, wobei er jedoch den Glimmſtengel ausgehen läßt, und die er ſämmtlich verliert. Einen dort anweſenden fremden Studenten redet er nun ſogleich mit den kühnen Worten an: „Sie ſind Student?“ Dieſer blickt ihn befremdet an, da beeilt er ſich hinzuzuſetzen: „Auch ich denke bald Einer zu werden.“ — Der fremde Studioſus, der ſich zufällig feſtgekneipt hat, iſt ſehr erfreut dieſe nützliche Bekanntſchaft zu machen und knüpft, voll großartiger Herablaſſung



Univ. Bibl.
München

ein Geſpräch mit ihm an. Entzückt über deſſen Benehmen, beeilt er ſich ihn zu tractiren, um ihm zu beweiſen, wie würdig er ſeines Umganges ſei. Zwar kann er noch nicht über ſo viel Geld gebieten, als nöthig iſt, um den gigantiſchen Durſt ſeines neuen Freundes zu löſchen, aber ſein Vater iſt ein angeſehener Mann in der Stadt, der Cafetier kennt ihn als deſſen Sohn und creditirt daher ſchon, was er, noch ehe er zur Univerſität abgeht, mit den von Onkeln und Tanten zu erhaltenden Geldgeſchenken, oder wenn dieſe nicht hinreichen, von dem erſten Vierteljahr ſeines künftigen Wechſels zu decken hofft, um nicht hinterher mit Papa in unangenehme Verdrießlichkeiten zu gerathen. Sein neuer Pylades, dem der Wein oder Punſch vortrefflich ſchmeckt, bietet ihm ſogar Smollis an und dies hebt ihn auf die höchſte Staffel des Glückes. Doch

Mit des Geſchickes Mächten
Iſt kein ew'ger Bund zu flechten,
Und das Unglück ſchreitet ſchnell.

Dies Mal erſcheint es in der Geſtalt eines Collaborators an dem Gymnaſium, den ein tückiſcher Zufall auch herbeigeführt, um bei einer beſcheidenen Taſſe Kaffee die Zeitungen zu leſen. Dieſer zeigt es dem Director an, denn die Schulgeſetze verbieten ſtreng allen Schülern, ſelbſt den eben abgegangenen, den Beſuch von öffentlichen Häuſern jeder Art; und der junge Collaborator, der eifrig über den Geſetzen wacht, um ſeine rege Theilnahme an dem Wohl der berühmten Anſtalt, der er als Lehrer ſeit ſechs Monaten anzugehören die Ehre hat, zu zeigen, iſt nicht wenig entrüſtet geweſen über die Quantität von Punſch und Wein, welche Oreſt ſo ohne alle Scheu mit ſeinem Pylades conſumirte. Am folgenden Tage wird derſelbe nochmals vor den Schulmonarchen citirt, und nur die demüthige, ihn innerlich furchtbar ſchmerzende und ärgernde Unterwürfigkeit, mit der er den bitteren und harten Sermon deſſelben entgegennimmt, in welchem (nach ſeiner Meinung) ſo gar keine Spur von Achtung der Menſchenwürde zu finden iſt, rettet ihn vor noch Schlimmerem. Er verſichert bei Allem, was heilig iſt, ſich zu beſſern, und bittet den geſtrengen Herrſcher, um die Breſche, die er durch den Kaffeehausbeſuch in deſſen Gunſt ſchoß, leidlich wieder auszufüllen, ſchlau um Rath, welche philologiſchen Vorleſungen er auf der Univerſität noch frequentiren ſolle, denn obwohl von ſeinem Vater zum Juriſten beſtimmt, theile er doch keineswegs den allgemeinen Aberglauben, daß man ein guter Kenner der Rechte zu werden im Stande ſei, ohne auch zugleich ein ausgezeichneter Philolog zu ſein. Entzückt geht der eifrige Grammatiker in die Falle, und nennt ihm ſo viele unerläßlich nothwendige Collegia, daß er nicht damit fertig würde, ſie alle zu hören, und wenn er ſo lange ſtudirte, wie der ewige Jude in der Welt umherirren muß. Zärtlich nehmen Beide Abſchied von einander; unſer Held iſt überaus froh, ſo mit blauem Auge davon gekommen zu ſein, hält aber den Entſchluß feſt, ſich zu rächen. Damit wartet er jedoch vorſichtig bis zur Nacht vor ſeiner Abreiſe. Papa hat ihm verſtattet, am Abende vorher ſeinen genaueren Freunden noch einen Abſchiedsſchmaus zu geben, dem er ſelbſt beiwohnt, und wo er ſich gefällt, der ſtaunenden Jugend ſeine Heldenthaten, als alter Senior der —aner —onen, —aten oder —alen zu erzählen; dieſe bekommen von nun an einen ungeheuern Reſpect vor ihm, und ſein Herr Sohn erhält dadurch einen großen Segen als Mitgift auf die Univerſität mit, nämlich in allen künftigen Fatalitäten den ſtillen aber wirkſamen Troſt „— dein Alter hat's zu ſeiner Zeit nicht beſſer gemacht und iſt doch Geheimerath geworden, alſo kann's dir auch nicht fehlen." — Nachdem man ſo um Mitternacht, wo nur die wachen, die nicht ſchlafen können, aber die ſchlafen, die wachen ſollen, nicht mehr bei dem erſten Glas iſt, und mit Uhland „gern denkt an dies und das, was rauſchet und was brauſet", ſchleicht er ſich leiſe fort, eilt zur Hausthür hinaus, die Taſche voll Kieſeln und wirft dem Director, der in tiefem Schlummer von einer eigenen, neu aufgefundenen altlateiniſchen Redensart und dem hinterliſtigen Collaborator, der von einem holdſeligen Lächeln des Ephorus, in dem Gehaltszulage liegt, träumt, jenem zwei, dieſem eine Fenſterſcheibe, in ſtürzender Haſt und ſteter Angſt geſehen zu werden, ein. Dann kehrt er behutſam nach Hauſe zurück, wo Niemand ſeine Abweſenheit bemerkt hat, kann aber in der Freude ſeines Herzens, daß Alles ſo gut abgelaufen, das Geheimniß nicht bewahren, und vertraut es, nachdem er ihm mit größter Feierlichkeit das Ehrenwort abgenommen, einem alten Schulkameraden, der noch ein halbes Jahr unter dem eiſernen Scepter des Directors ſchmachten muß, an. Da glücklicher Weiſe einige Primaner kurz vorher mehrere Tage im Carcer zubringen mußten, wegen einer unerheblichen Sache, ſo trifft am folgenden Tage der Verdacht und die daraus entſpringende Unterſuchung dieſe, und da es ſich ergiebt, daß ſie um jene Zeit nicht zu Hauſe waren, ſo müſſen ſie dafür büßen, während der eigentliche Thäter am folgenden Morgen triumphirend den Poſtwagen beſteigt, und mit heimlichem Entzücken an ſeinen bei dieſer großen That bewieſenen Heroismus denkt.

Die ganze Familie hat ihn bis zur Poſt begleitet und ſich mit Ausnahme Papa's, der ihm noch einige goldene Regeln durch das Fenſter hinein wirft, als er ſchon im Eilwagen ſitzt, unter heißen Thränen und Küſſen von ihm getrennt; der künftige Studioſus hielt ſich aber ſtandhaft, und wenn auch der Schmerz der Trennung wie ein Wolkenſchatten einen Augenblick über ſeine

Seele zog, ſo verſcheuchte doch die in goldener Perſpective ihm entgegenſtrahlende Univerſität augenblicklich alle Trauer wieder. — Endlich bläſt der Poſtillion, die Peitſchen knallen, die Pferde ziehen an, donnernd rollt der Wagen über das Steinpflaſter hin und zur Stadt hinaus. Unſer Held, der einzig wachende, ſieht ſich nach ſeinen Reiſegefährten um, es ſind lauter Fremde, ältere Perſonen, kein einziges bekanntes Geſicht; ſie ſchnarchten ſchon als er einſtieg, und haben daher Papa's letzte inhaltsſchwere Ermahnungen gewiß nicht vernommen. Das freut ihn ſehr, und er beſchließt nun den flotten Burſchen zu ſpielen, und dadurch, daß er ſich für ein altes bemooſtes Haus ausgiebt, den Reiſegenoſſen weidlich zu imponiren. Dies gelingt ihm denn auch einige Stationen hindurch ganz gut, er erzählt von wüthenden Duellen, bei welchen den Zuhörern, unter denen ſich eine ſentimentale unvermählte Dame von zweifelhaftem Alter befindet, die Haare zu Berge ſteigen, und lügt wie gedruckt. Auf der vierten Station öffnet ſich aber der Wagenſchlag, und es ſteigen einige wirkliche alte bemooſte Häuſer, die mit ihm nach derſelben Univerſität ziehn, ein. Jetzt fällt er aus Angſt und Reſpect in ein tiefes Stillſchweigen und erwiedert auf die theilnehmende Frage der Dame, warum er ſo ſtill geworden, er habe furchtbares Zahnweh. Die wahren Studenten kümmern ſich nicht eben um ihn, da ſie ihn nicht kennen, und da die Dame am nächſten Orte, als dem Ziel ihrer Reiſe, ausſteigt, und er nun allein mit den drei Studioſen, denn die übrigen Paſſagiere haben ſchon früher den Wagen verlaſſen, ſich befindet, ſo iſt er wenigſtens vor einer Beſchämung ſicher. Sein Zahnweh ſchwindet nun eben ſo plötzlich wieder; er macht Bekanntſchaft mit ſeinen künftigen Commilitonen und ſucht ihre Freundſchaft zu gewinnen, was ihm auch gelingt, denn dieſe gehören einer beſtimmten Farbe an und bemühen ſich eifrig ihn für dieſelbe zu werben. Papa hat ihm zwar auf das Strengſte verboten, ſich zu Solchen zu geſellen, aber wer kann dem Drange widerſtehen ſo inniger Freundſchaft; wenigſtens will er als Renonce mit ihnen kneipen, bis der geſtrenge Vater Weiteres geſtattet. Zur Bekräftigung tractirt er ſie auf der letzten Station, was ſie ſich wohlwollend gefallen laſſen, und mit halbem Rauſche und ganzer Seligkeit fährt er ſingend mit ihnen in die Univerſitätsſtadt ein.

Hier angekommen ſucht er ſogleich einen Landsmann und früheren Schulkameraden auf, der ihm ein Logis beſorgt hat. Dies bezieht er alsbald, packt ſehr ordentlich ſeine Kleider aus, ſtellt ſeine mitgebrachten Bücher auf und begiebt ſich nun auf die Straße, mit der himmliſchen Empfindung, nun ein wirklich freier Menſch zu ſein. Sein erſter Gang iſt, ſich eine Pfeife zu kaufen, ſo ſchön und burſchenhaft wie er dieſelbe nur immer finden kann. Zwar prellt ihn der Schalk von Drechsler, der ſeinen Mann kennt, unverſchämt, er aber glaubt, für ein Spottgeld in den Beſitz dieſes unſchätzbaren Kleinodes gekommen zu ſein. Die Pfeife wird augenblicklich geſtopft und angebrannt, als höchſte Zier. — Sein zweiter Gang iſt nun zu einem Mützenhändler, um ſich eine mehrfarbige Mütze zu erſtehn, falls dieſe auf jener Univerſität nicht ſtreng verpönt iſt. Auch dies geſchieht, und nun iſt nach ſeiner Meinung, da er bei dem in der Nähe wohnenden Buchbinder auch eine Mappe erſtanden hat, der Student fertig. — Es fehlt nur noch die Immatrikulation. Dieſe erfolgt am nächſten Morgen, vorausgeſetzt, daß ſeine Papiere in Richtigkeit ſind; denn um Studioſus zu werden, bedarf man jetzt mehr Documente, als nöthig ſein möchten eine Erbſchaft aus den Colonien in Holland flott zu machen, oder durch die ganze Welt zu reiſen; — und nun iſt aus Morgen und Abend ein Tag, das heißt: aus dem Maulthier endlich ein Student geworden.

Ich will damit nicht ſagen, daß alle Maulthiere dieſem auf das Haar gleichen; denn wie es bekanntlich die verſchiedenſten Arten von Eingeweidewürmern bei den Menſchen giebt, vom Trychocephalus dispar an bis zum Echinococcus visceralis, oder gar bis zu den Spermatozoen hinab, ſo giebt es auch die verſchiedenſten Arten von Maulthieren, vom gelehrten Wunder-

Kinde an bis zum halbwüchſigen Schüler, der aus Secunda abging, um Naturwiſſenſchaften zu ſtudiren, hinauf. Alle aber haben einen gewiſſen Familienzug, den ſie nicht verläugnen können, und dieſen Familienzug verdanken ſie meiſt unſeren trefflichen Gymnaſien, was mir Niemand läugnen kann.

Des vierten Kapitels

zweite Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Kindesalter oder der Fuchs.

> At first, the infant
> Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms.
> Shakespeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

> Zuerſt der Fuchs,
> Quakend und ſpeiend unter alten Burſchen.
> Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Etwas Erhabeneres als das alte tiefſinnige Bundeslied: „Was kommt da von der Höh'" kann es wohl nicht geben. Ich habe Greiſe, wenn ſie es ſingen hörten, Thränen der innigſten Rührung vergießen ſehen. Und wen verherrlicht ſie, die wunderbare Mythe, die es in ſeinen harmoniſchen Verſen birgt? Den Fuchs; keinen anderen als den kraſſen Fuchs, dieſen Uranfang alles regelrechten Wiſſens und Denkens auf deutſcher Erde; denn ein Menſch, der nicht auf einer deutſchen Univerſität Logik gehört hat, darf es in Deutſchland gar nicht wagen, ſich und anderen Leuten einbilden zu wollen, er wiſſe zu denken und denke zu wiſſen. Ein alter Profeſſor in Greifswalde pflegte ſeine Vorträge über die Logik mit den Worten zu eröffnen: „Mit meiner Logik, meine Herren, kommen Sie durch die ganze Welt." Das war eine wahre Gewißheit und gewiſſe Wahrheit, wie ſie der verſtorbene Philoſoph K. L. Reinhold ſo ſehr liebte; aber nicht bloß mit des guten Greifswalder Profeſſor Logik kommt man durch die ganze Welt, ſondern mit jeder, von der Kieſewetter'ſchen an bis zur Hegel'ſchen oder Tieftrunk'ſchen hinauf oder hinunter. Ich habe Leute gekannt, die damit nach Java und Surinam, nach Pondichery und Tranquebar, nach Wardoehuus und Novazembla gekommen ſind, und ſie unverſehrt, gerade ſo wie ſie dieſelbe von dem Profeſſor empfingen, einige Lücken abgerechnet, die aber damals ſchon hinein kamen, wieder mitgebracht haben, denn ſie verſicherten mir, es ſei ihnen durchaus unmöglich geweſen, auch nur den mindeſten Gebrauch davon zu machen. Damit ſoll der Logik indeſſen keineswegs zu nahe getreten werden, im Gegentheil, wie wir ſchon früher den flotten Studenten mit einem Schiffe verglichen, ſo haben wir die Logik als den ihm durchaus nothwendigen Ballaſt zu betrachten, durch welche allein er die rechte Tiefe auf der Fluth des Wiſſens zu halten vermag. Hätte er dieſen Ballaſt nicht geladen, er würde bei dem erſten Windſtoße unrettbar umſchlagen. Die Logik iſt daher auch das eigentliche Fuchscollegium. Ehe aber der Fuchs dazu kommt, dieſe wichtigſte aller Wiſſenſchaften zu ſtudiren, oder wenigſtens zu hören, bedarf es noch vieler Vorbereitungen. Gehen wir daher, um ſolche genau kennen zu lernen, zu unſerem im vorigen Kapitel verlaſſenen Helden zurück und ſehen wir, wie er ſich benimmt, nachdem er einen durchaus neuen Menſchen angezogen hat. Er iſt natürlich wenigſtens einige Tage vor Anfang der Collegien in der Univerſitätsſtadt eingetroffen, um ſich erſt behaglich einrichten und als ein ganz ſorgenfreier Menſch den Wiſſenſchaften obliegen zu können. Er lebt jetzt in der eigentlichen Periode der Romantik. Im Rauſche der höchſten Empfindungen, im vollſten Genuß aller Natur-Erſcheinungen, im Weben der ſchönſten Träume ahnt und fühlt er in und hinter Allem einen tieferen Sinn, und Manches, das er nicht begreift, tritt ihm dämoniſch entgegen; doch huldigt er in der Freude ſeines Herzens unerſchütterlich dem Eudämonismus, und dieſe Welt iſt und bleibt ihm gewiß die beſte. Wie begabte Fiſcher auf der Oſtſee in geweihten Stunden über Vineta noch die Glocken dieſer verſunkenen Herrlichkeit tönen hören, ſo hört er auch in Allen wunderbare Klänge, und ſein

Herz lebt während der erſten Tage beſtändig Abenteuer, wenn auch die Wirklichkeit ganz hausbacken vor ihm vorüber zieht. Ich habe einen Fuchs gekannt, der nach Heidelberg kam, als ich dort mit meiner Diſſertation ſchwanger ging, wie Zeus mit der Pallas; er war mein Landsmann und hatte zu mir, als einem ſehr alten Hauſe, eben ſo viel Zutrauen, als er vor dem Träger meiner von Landesvätern wie ein Sieb durchbohrten, Mütze Reſpect hatte. Auf einem einſamen Spaziergange nach der Hirſchgaſſe, dieſem Thal der ſüßen Erinnerungen, erzählte er mir mit verſchämten jungfräulichen Mienen, als etwas ganz Außerordentliches: Er wäre nun ſchon volle drei Tage in Heidelberg und noch ſei ihm gar nichts Ungewöhnliches begegnet; wie das nur käme? Tiefgerührt blieb ich ſtehen, blickte ihm in die unſchuldigen blauen Augen, ſegnete den weichen Flaum ſeines keimenden Bartes, drückte ihm wehmüthig die weiche Hand und ſeufzte, reuig wie Eva, als ihr Adam den Arm bot, um ſie aus dem Paradieſe zu führen und ihr Leibaffe ihr die Schleppe von Feigenblättern nachtrug: „So Ihr nicht werdet wie die Kindlein, ſo werdet Ihr nie in das Himmelreich kommen!“ — Mein Fuchs trat darauf am Abend den Rückweg allein an, denn mich feſſelten noch pſychologiſche Studien bei einem Mannemer Kind, das in Heidelberg zum Beſuche war und für die Krone des Hofballes galt. Dicht vor der Stadt rannte er mit einem im Mondſchein philoſophirenden Schwarzweißgrünen zuſammen, und die Folge war eine Herausforderung. Jetzt war das Ungeheuerſte am Abend des dritten Tages in ſein Leben getreten; der furchtbarſte Dämonismus der Romantik. Am anderen Morgen kam er zu mir, als kaum Eos mit den Roſenfingern ihre Runde angetreten, um den werdenden Tag zu verkündigen. Meine kurze Antwort auf ſeine lange Rede war: „Fuchs, Du mußt Dich pauken!“ Worte, die ihm in das Ohr ſchmetterten, wie die Poſaunen des Engels am jüngſten Tage. Dann adreſſirte ich ihn an einen erfahrenen Freund, um das Weitere zu beſorgen. Es fehlte meinem Fuchs keineswegs an Muth, ja innerlich brannte ſeine Seele ſogar nach rühmlichem Kampf, aber das Ungeheure des Außerordentlichen hatte ihn doch mächtig ergriffen. Er ging einher wie ein Träumender; wohl konnte er mit Shakſpeare's Julius Cäſar ausrufen:

> Between the acting of a dreadful thing
> And the first motion, all the interim is > Like a phantasma or a hideous dream;
> The genius and the mortal instruments
> Are then in council and the state of man
> Like to a little kingdom, suffers then
> The nature of an insurrection.
>
> Julius Caesar, A. 2. Sc. 1.

(Deutſch. Zwiſchen dem Begehen eines furchtbaren Dinges und dem erſten Antrieb dazu, iſt die ganze Zwiſchenzeit einem Phantasma oder ſcheußlichen Träumen gleich. Der Genius und die ſterblichen Werkzeuge ſind dann verbündet, und der Zuſtand des Menſchen, einem kleinen Königreiche gleich, leidet dann das Weſen einer Empörung.)

Dies fiel dem tiefen Menſchenkenner Krings auf, dem Phoebus unter allen Pedellen; er ſpürte nach und brachte die Paukerei heraus. Mein Fuchs mußte dem unvergeßlichen Thibaut, der damals Rector war, das Ehrenwort geben, ſich nicht mit dem Schwarzweißgrünen zu ſchlagen, und ſo hatte er, ehe die Woche zu Ende, noch Außerordentlicheres erlebt, als ſeine kühnſten Träume je ihm prophezeit. Als ich ihn einige Jahre nachher im Vaterlande wieder ſah, lachten wir nicht wenig über ſeinen damaligen romantiſchen Schwindel, von dem er übrigens ſehr bald, und zwar in Heidelberg ſelbſt ſchon, geheilt wurde.

Es geht nicht Allen ſo gut. Mancher bleibt im Schwindel und duſſelt ſeine ganze Univerſitätszeit hindurch ſo fort, bis ihn die ſterile Proſa des Examen weckt. O, Ihr langen wallenden Locken und Du herabfließender, ſtatt einer ſteifen Cravatte dienender Bart, wie oft ſchon habe ich Euch fallen ſehn, noch ehe das letzte Lied verklungen und der letzte Ton verhallt war! Du freier jugendlicher Buſen, der Du wie die arme Pretioſa allen Stürmen Preis gegeben wareſt, wie ſchnell verſchwändeſt Du hinter der zierlich gefältelten Bruſtgardine, vulgo Vorhemdchen genannt, das dem echten Studenten ſtets ein Greuel iſt! Und Ihr, Ihr anderen ſtolzen Attribute eines alten Muſenſohnes, Du farbiges quer über die Bruſt wie ein Orden getragenes Band, an dem ſtatt der Uhr gar oft ein Schlüſſel hing, wenn dieſe ſich mit der altteſtamentlichen Urſprache beſchäftigte; Du ſtattliche Pfeife mit dem reichgeſchmückten Wappen und dem zierlich geſchriebenen Namen des Gebers, Ihr klirrenden Sporen, mit denen ſo oft in die Hörſäle geritten wurde auf Schuſters Rappen, und endlich all' Ihr anderen Dinge, die Ihr einem echten Burſchen unentbehrlicher ſcheint als das liebe Brod, und wichtiger als dem Pabſt ſeine Tiare, oder einem Könige ſein Scepter, wie bald ſchon modert Ihr in einem Winkel oder verkrümelt Euch in einer Tiſchſchublade zwiſchen chemiſchen Schwefelhölzchen, Bindfaden und anderen nützlichen Utenſilien einer gelehrten Junggeſellenwirthſchaft, und wie manche wehmüthige Zähre fällt auf Euch, wenn Euch in ſpäteren Jahren der Zufall, dieſer Sohn der Götter, wieder Euerem ehemaligen Beſitzer in die Hände oder vor die Augen führt!

Doch — hinweg von dieſer Stätte der Trauer zu freundlicheren Bildern! Wir haben bereits erfahren, daß mit unſerem Maulthier die erſte Metempſychoſe begonnen und ein Fuchs aus ihm geworden iſt, ja, daß er ſich ſchon eine ſtattliche Pfeife, eine mehrfarbige Mütze und eine Mappe gekauft, oder, um mich des trefflichen Studentenausdruckes zu bedienen, angequält hat. Nun finden wir ihn in den nächſten Tagen bereits eifrig mit wichtigen Studien beſchäftigt, bei denen er weiſe die graue Theorie mit der grünen Praxis verbindet; er lernt nämlich rauchen und fechten; und wenn er auch beide erhabene Wiſſenſchaften ſchon auf der Schule getrieben, ſo kommt er jetzt doch erſt dahinter, daß es dort nur ein leidiger Dilettantismus war, und daß er es allein auf der Univerſität zur Meiſterſchaft bringen könne. Ein altes Haus hat ſich großmüthig ſeiner angenommen, und begonnen, ihn einzuſchlagen oder einzuſtoßen; dieſes iſt ihm jetzt der magnus Apollo, um ſo mehr, als es ihm verſprochen, ihn zu der Würde ſeines Normalfuchſes zu erheben, wenn er ſich gut mache, d. h. mit der Klinge wie mit dem Geldbeutel gleich willig bei der Hand ſei. Topographiſche Studien werden unter der Leitung deſſelben nun auch getrieben, in denen unſer Neophyt ſehr bald ein Erkleckliches profitirt, ſo daß er ſpäter eintreffenden Mitfüchſen ſchon als Wegweiſer dienen kann. Hält er ſich gar zu geſchloſſenen Geſellſchaften ſeiner Commilitonen, ſo ſtreben die Vorſteher oder Stimmführer derſelben danach, ihn methodiſch zu erziehen, um ein würdiges Mitglied an ihm heran zu bilden; er wird zu den Kämpfen für das Vaterland mitgenommen, um als ein ehrenwerther Knappe oder Edelknabe ſeines Ritters, zwar nicht Helm und Lanze, denn die ſind lange aus der Mode, aber Schläger und Paukwichs, die ewig in der Mode bleiben werden, heranzuſchleppen und ſich an das Klirren der Waffen zu gewöhnen. Binnen Kurzem iſt er ein Eingeweihter, und redet mit einer Geläufigkeit von der Menſur, dem An — (keuſche Muſe, erſchrick nicht! ich ſchreibe das garſtige Wort nicht aus —), Stürzen und Nachſtürzen, Conſtituiren und Depreciren und anderen wichtigen Dingen, als habe er ſchon ſechs Semeſter hinter ſich. — So iſt endlich die Zeit herangekommen, wo die Collegia beginnen; er ſelbſt befindet ſich ganz wohl, nur ſein Wechſel iſt etwas ſchwach geworden, und die fatalen Honorare, die dem unerbittlichen Quäſtor voraus bezahlt werden müſſen, drohen ein gar großes Loch hinein zu reißen, wenn ſie nicht gar den ganzen übrig gebliebenen Reſt verſchlingen, wie einſt den Jonas der Wallfiſch. In der Angſt ſeines Herzens fragt er ſeinen Mentor um Rath. Zwar hat Papa ſich den Lectionscatalog ſchon vorher kommen laſſen und ihm die Vorleſungen, die er im erſten Semeſter hören ſoll, vorgeſchrieben oder durch einen kundigen Mann vorſchreiben laſſen; glücklicher Weiſe werden aber ſehr viele Collegia nicht geleſen, die im Cataloge verzeichnet ſtehen, was denn ſpäter eine vortreffliche Ausflucht darbietet, wenn Papa ſich danach erkundigt oder gar die Zeugniſſe der reſpectiven und reſpectabeln Docenten zu ſehen verlangt. Der Mentor weiß nun gewandt Rath; erſtlich ſendet er ihn in die Collegia, die am Wenigſten koſten, oder wenn unvermeidliche dabei ſind, wie z. B. Inſtitutionen, Oſteologie und dergleichen überflüſſige und unwichtige Disciplinen, die aber einmal gehört werden müſſen, zu dem Docenten, dem er und ſeine Freunde am Meiſten zugethan ſind, und dem er ſich vorgenommen hat, ein möglichſt volles Auditorium zu verſchaffen, weil der Mann, wenn auch gerade keine große Gelehrſamkeit, doch allerlei andere gute Eigenſchaften, wie z. B. liebenswürdige Töchter beſitzt, oder vielleicht noch vor Kurzem ſelbſt ein flotter —aner —one oder —ale war, oder willig ſtundet und was dergleichen Gründe mehr ſind; dies heißt mit dem Kunſtausdruck: keilen. Der Fuchs geht nun hinein, nachdem er eine vorläufige Bekanntſchaft mit dem Famulus gemacht hat; der Profeſſor erſcheint und wird von ihm mit ehrfurchtsvoller Bewunderung angeſtaunt. Dieſer beginnt zu dociren — unſerem Fuchs iſt der akademiſche Studiengang noch eine terra incognita; er paßt auf gleich einem Heftelmacher, wie die Wiener ſagen, aber ach, ihm entgeht ſo Manches.

Zwar weiß er Viel, doch möcht' er Alles wiſſen.

indeſſen der Profeſſor dictirt, und unſer Zögling der Muſen folgt nun des Mephiſtopheles > des Schreibens Euch wohl befleißt,

> Als dictirt' Euch der heilige Geiſt:

auf ein Jota; denn ein ſauberes Heft, das iſt doch ein großes Plaiſir, und

> Was man Schwarz auf Weiß beſitzt,
> Kann man getroſt nach Hauſe tragen.

Da ſchreibt er denn und ſchreibt und ſchreibt, daß dem armen Teufel die Finger ſteif werden, und obendrein plagt noch manchen Profeſſor der Satan, die ganze Stunde hindurch zu dictiren, ohne auch nur ein einziges freies Wort an ſeine armen Zuhörer zu richten, die er für lauter Schreibmaſchinen in ſeiner Verblendung anſieht. Zwar hat dieſe Unſitte, Gott ſei Dank, im Allgemeinen auf unſeren Univerſitäten ſehr abgenommen, doch aber giebt es noch manchen gelehrten Federfuchſer auf deutſchen Kathedern, der da meint, nur in ſeiner Weiſe, die Wiſſenſchaft zu behandeln, ſei allein das wahre Heil zu finden, und welcher daher ein, ſeinen Dictaten vollſtändig bis auf das geringſte Komma nachgeſchriebenes Heft für das non plus ultra aller menſchlichen Beſtrebungen hält, das dem Studenten nicht allein durch das Examen hilft, ſondern auch für deſſen ganzes Leben ausreicht. Von den Fortſchritten, die die Wiſſenſchaft gemacht hat und unaufhörlich macht, iſt freilich Nichts darin zu finden; ſo ſtand ſie, als der gelehrte Mann das Heft ausarbeitete, zu welchem er denn von Zeit zu Zeit Nachträge machte, bis er ordentlicher, öffentlicher Profeſſor wurde. Damals hatte ſie ihre Blüthe erreicht, ſie noch höher zu heben, iſt unmöglich. Was ſeitdem für dieſelbe geſchah, exiſtirt für ihn nicht, denn es iſt Unſinn, Afterweisheit, unſichere Speculation und er denkt viel zu ſehr mit Goethe:

Ein Kerl, der ſpeculirt,
Iſt wie ein Thier auf dürrer Halde,
Von einem böſen Geiſt herumgeführt.

Wie er es daher vor ſo vielen Jahren niederſchrieb, ſo trägt er es von Semeſter zu Semeſter mit ſtrengſter Gewiſſenhaftigkeit vor, ja er unterläßt ſogar nie, eben ſo regelmäßig dieſelben Späße in jedem Halbjahre zu wiederholen, die er damals mit ſo großer Mühe erfunden oder zuſammengetragen, woher es ſich denn mitunter wohl ereignet, daß ſich ein muthwilliger Zuhörer ein früher ſchon geſchriebenes Heft verſchafft, in welchem die Witze an den Rand notirt ſind, und ſobald eine ſolche Stelle naht, ſchadenfroh ſeinen Commilitonen zuflüſtert: „Paßt auf, nun macht er einen Witz!“ Dies wagt freilich der Fuchs noch nicht zu thun, im Gegentheil, er ſchreibt Alles, was aus dem Orakelmunde des Profeſſors ertönt, mit gewiſſenhafteſter Pietät nieder, wenigſtens in der erſten Hälfte des Semeſters; nachher iſt er ſchon mehr zum akademiſchen Leben erwacht, und ſchläft dem zu Folge deſto leichter bei derartigen Vorträgen, beſonders wenn ſie im Sommer gehalten werden, wodurch denn ſein Anfangs ſo ſchön angelegtes Heft, namentlich gegen den Schluß, immer mehr und mehr Lücken erhält, zumal ſobald noch einige ſogenannte Schwänze hineinkommen, welche Studioſus ſich allerdings vornimmt, in den Ferien nachzureiten, wozu er aber ſelten gelangt.

Unter ſolchen Beſchäftigungen iſt denn endlich der große und wichtige Tag des Fuchscommerſches gekommen, an dem eigentlich der junge Studioſus ſeine erſte Weihe und deſſen Mütze ihr erſtes Loch, Landesvater genannt, erhält. Voll ſchwärmeriſcher Gefühle geht der Jüngling hin; die langen mit Getränk und Gläſern beſetzten Tiſche, an denen die Präſides mit blanken Schlägern ſitzen, tragen Anfangs nicht wenig dazu bei, ihn in dieſer Stimmung zu erhalten, ſogar das leere, mit friſchem Stroh ausgelegte Lazareth, in das er zufällig einen Blick wirft, ſtößt ihm ahnungsvolles Grauen ein. Andächtig ſingt er die beſtimmten Geſänge mit; voll des ſtrengſten Gehorſames folgt er dem Rufe der Präſides ad loca! wenn dieſe Worte kaum noch geſprochen ſind; ſelbſt während des Colloquium's wagt er es kaum, ſich von ſeinem Platze zu erheben, und wenn nun endlich der blanke Stahl die Runde macht, der Präſes ihm zuſingt:

Nimm den Schläger in die Linke,
Bohr' ihn durch den Hut und trinke
Auf des Vaterlandes Wohl!

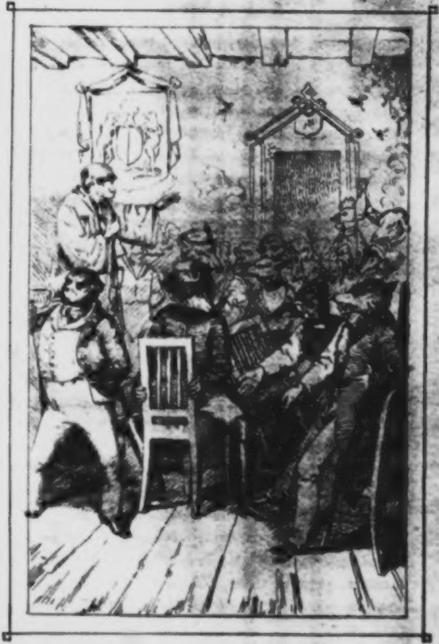
und er nun, indem er ſeine Kopfbedeckung aufſpießt, antworten muß:

Ich durchbohr' den Hut und ſchwöre,
Halten will ich ſtets auf Ehre,
Stets ein braver Burſche ſein!

da pocht ihm das Herz ſo hörbar, daß er kaum im Stande iſt, dieſe berühmten Worte mit gehörigem Ausdruck vorzutragen; auch erſchrickt er nicht wenig über die freche Weiſe ſeines Nachbars, der, ein ſehr altes Haus und bereits etwas angeriſſen, während ſeines Singens vor ſich hinbrummt, nach derſelben Melodie:

Herrſcher über die Philiſter,
Komm, vernicht' die Pumpregiſter,
Daß ich von hier reiſen kann!

Dieſe Parodie ſcheint ihm eine Entweihung; mit verhaltenem Ingrimm ſchielt er nach dieſem Kirchenſchänder und hätte große Luſt, ihm Eins aufzubrummen, wenn Jener nur nicht eine ſo verteufelt gute Klinge ſchlüge. Obendrein wird eine ſimple Paukerei mit Hut und Binde, zum Wenigſten, wenn ſie heraus kommt, durch vierzehn Tage Carcer beſtraft, da läßt er es denn lieber bleiben, denn Papa ſteht noch immer drohend im Hintergrunde. Es hat ihn aber ſo verwirrt gemacht, daß er bei dem bald darauf folgenden Hoſpitium Nichts vorzubringen weiß, er, der als Secundaner ſchon das ganze Tübinger Commersbuch, ſammt dem patriotiſchen Anhange deſſelben, im Kopfe hatte, und als Primaner bereits ſeinen ſtaunenden Schweſtern die intereſſante Saufmeſſe vorzutragen pflegte. Der berühmte Geſang „Zieh, Schimmel, zieh!“ der bekanntlich ſchon älter iſt als der dreißigjährige Krieg, wo er nach der Leipziger Fatalität auf Tilly angewendet wurde, erſchallt nun aus mehr denn hundert Kehlen ihm zur Schande, was ihn nicht wenig ärgert. Allmälig ſtimmt ihn jedoch das Trinken heiterer; er hat ſich zwar vorgenommen, höchſt mäßig zu bleiben, und eben ſo nüchtern wieder zu Hauſe zu gehen, als er gekommen iſt; aber der Menſch denkt und Gott lenkt. Herrſcht auf der Univerſität, auf der er ſtudirt, kein Duz-Comment, ſo giebt ihm das herrliche Smollistrinken, das ihm, beſonders wenn er etwas Gutes vor ſich ſtehen hat, von gar vielen alten Häuſern angeboten wird, und das er nicht minder fleißig und eifrig ſeinen Mitfüchſen anbietet, ſehr bald einen Stoß, aus dem durch Vor- und Nachtrinken ſchnell ein Hieb wird. Er iſt nun wie mitten in der Schlacht: rechts und links fallen die Mitkämpfer, Todte und Verwundete werden in das Lazareth geſchafft, aus



Univ. Bibl.
München

dem in einzelnen Pauſen ſonderbare Laute in den Saal herüber dringen:

> Diverse lingue, orribili favelle,
> Parole di dolore, accenti d'ira,
> Voci alte e fioche, e suon di man con elle,

wie ſchon Dante ſingt, und der geiſtreiche Philaleth trefflich überſetzt:

> Gemiſch von Sprachen, grauenvolle Reden,
> Des Schmerzes Worte und des Zornes Laute,
> Und Stimmen tief und rauh, mit Händeklopfen.

Aber noch immer hält unſer Freund ſich tapfer. Das ärgert denn einen alten Burſchen nicht wenig; dieſer ſetzt ſich verrätheriſch zu ihm und trinkt ihm auf den Pelz; Ehren halber muß er Beſcheid thun; ja er wird ſogar üppig, er will es mit dieſem aufnehmen und ſtürzt Glas auf Glas hinunter; ſchon wird ihm die Zunge ſchwer, ſchon fängt er an doppelt zu ſehen, aber muthig trotzt er den Gefahren; endlich mitten im Wort ſinkt er hin, rüſtige Hände packen ihn und ſchaffen ihn in das Lazareth, wo ſie ihn neben ſeinen minder ruhmvoll gefallenen Brüdern auf weiches Stroh betten. Hier bringt er mehrere Stunden jämmerlich zu; endlich kommt ein barmherziger Samariter, ſein Landsmann oder Freund, mit der Laterne und ſucht ihn auf der Wahlſtatt unter den Todten. Mühſam richtet er ihn auf, bringt ihn zu ſich und ſchleppt ihn nach ſeiner Wohnung, wo er ihn mit Stiefeln und Sporen in das Bett practicirt und ſeinen Rauſch ausſchlafen läßt. Am anderen Morgen erwacht er ſpät mit furchtbarem Kopfweh, aber zugleich mit dem beſeligenden Bewußtſein, eine der höchſten Weihen des Burſchenthums am geſtrigen Tage empfangen zu haben. Trotz ſeines Katzenjammers, der jedoch ein einfach phyſiſcher bleibt und dies Mal noch nicht den fatalen moraliſchen Nachgeſchmack hat, ergreift er triumphirend ſeine Mütze, die neben dem Stiche des Landesvaters auch noch einige Flecken von den geſtrigen Getränken davon trug, und ſetzt ſie auf ſein ſchmerzendes Haupt; dann nimmt er die Mappe und geht in das zweite Collegium. Das erſte hat er natürlich verſchlafen und auch dieſes verträumt er halb; denn was der Profeſſor vorträgt, bleibt ihm unverſtändlich, da ihm die ſeltſamſten Geſtalten noch vor der Seele herumſchwirren, wenigſtens erſcheinen ihm Cajus und Sempronius ſtets als die beiden Präſides an ſeinem Tiſche, von denen der Eine die Exceptio des Smollis macht und der Andere mit Fiduzit duplicirt.

So hat unſer Fuchs nun die wichtigſten Momente ſeines erſten Semeſters durchlebt, denn zu einer Paukerei pflegt es nur ſelten während deſſelben zu kommen. Diverſe Sätze. Privatcommerſche und Spritztouren, ſowie einige Nachtwachen bei Kranken oder Verwundeten, die er als heilige Pflicht betrachtet, unterbrechen allein

Bibl.
München

das erdrückende Gleichmaaß der Tage, und der Schluß der Collegien kommt endlich heran. Er ſchnürt ſein Ränzel und beginnt eine Reiſe mit einigen Commilitonen, entweder nach dem Harz, dem Thüringer Walde, der ſächſiſchen Schweiz oder gar nach Tyrol, oder auch er zieht mit einem in der Nähe wohnenden Commilitonen, deſſen Herz er gewonnen hat, nach deſſen Vaterhauſe, von den Eltern herzlich aufgenommen als ein Freund des Sohnes, und von deſſen Schweſtern noch zuvorkommender als ein Freund des Bruders, aus dem — wenn die holden Mädchen es auch nicht zu denken wagen, ſo liegt es ihnen doch als dunkele Anſchauung im Bewußtſein — mit der Zeit vielleicht ein Schwager werden kann. Nach der eigenen Heimath will er noch nicht: — er hat einen wichtigen Grund dazu, und widerſteht ſogar ſtandhaft dieſes Mal den Bitten ſeiner zärtlichen Mama: — ſein Bart iſt nämlich noch nicht ausgebildet genug, um den dortigen Philiſtern zu imponiren. — Nur noch ein Semeſter mehr, und er reiht ſich würdig den Erſten des Jahrhunderts an; dann aber wird er gewiß das liebe Vaterhaus mit ſeiner theueren Gegenwart beglücken. Mittlerweile müſſen ſie ſich daheim mit ſeinen Briefen tröſten, die die Gelehrſamkeit ſeiner Profeſſoren, wie die Wichtigkeit des Studententhums mit gleicher Beſtimmtheit des Urtheils ſchildern, und zur ſelben Zeit ein gar ſeltſam Zeugniß von ſeiner Unreife und Ueberreife, die ſich in ihm auf wunderbare Weiſe miſchen und durchdringen, den geliebten Eltern und Geſchwiſtern ablegen.

Des vierten Kapitels
dritte Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Knabenalter oder der Brandfuchs.

And then the whining schoolboy, with his satchel
And shining morning face, creeping like snail
Unwillingly to school.
Shakspeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

Und dann der Brandfuchs, ſtets mit dem Rappier,
Mit ſtrahlendem Geſicht; in die Collegien
Nur langſam kriechend einer Schnecke gleich.
Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Nach dem Lectionscataloge iſt der Anfang der Vorleſungen auf den 10. Mai oder den 21. October beſtimmt worden, aber man ſchreibt in der Univerſitätsſtadt, die mit offenen Armen ihre liebſten Bewohner erwartet, bereits ſchon den 15. Mai oder den 26. October, und noch ſind die ſtudirenden Zugvögel nicht von ihren Wanderungen heimgekehrt. Einzeln nur läßt ſich hier und da ein Studioſus, gleich einer Schildwache, die man vergeſſen hat, abzulöſen, auf der Gaſſe ſehen und ſchleicht ſo müd' einher wie Adam nach dem Falle, mit Blumauer zu reden, denn nur drei böſe Dinge konnten ihn nöthigen, die ſchöne Ferienzeit in den dumpfen Mauern zu verbringen, entweder die Furcht vor dem Examen, oder der Mangel an Geld, oder endlich der ſchrecklichſte der Schrecken — Stadtarreſt. Sonſt iſt Alles in der Univerſitätsſtadt, vorausgeſetzt, daß dieſe eine kleine und ihre Studentenwelt der Mittelpunkt iſt, um den ſie ſich dreht, auf den Empfang der Studioſen vorbereitet und harrt mit geſpannter Erwartung der Dinge, die da kommen ſollen, d. h. der neuen Studenten; denn an dieſen liegt Allen am Meiſten. Das ſchwarze Bret iſt von oben bis unten wie mit friſcher Wäſche behangen, nämlich mit friſchen Ankündigungen der Vorleſungen, von denen leider manche ungeboren bleibt; die Philiſter haben die Stuben ſcheuern laſſen und nicht die Bruſt, ſondern die Betten gelüftet, um Miethsleute anzulocken; die Pfeifenhändler hängen die ſchönſten Syſteme mit den herrlichſten Pfeifenköpfen vor die Fenſter; in den Buchbinderläden liegen neue Mappen, in den Buchläden die ſauber gebundenen Compendien mit glänzend roth und goldenen Titeln aus; die Famuli laufen mit großer Emſigkeit von den Docenten zum Quäſtor und vom Quäſtor zu den Docenten; die Frauen und Jungfrauen geben wieder genau Acht auf den Schlag der Stundenglocken, um nicht in eine aus einem Collegium in das andere ziehende Schaar hinein zu gerathen: kurz, es herrſcht überall eine rege Spannung, aber die Erwartung wird noch nicht befriedigt. Einige über die Maaßen pflichtgetreue Profeſſoren haben ſogar ſchon verſucht, ihre Collegien zu beginnen, mußten aber dem Rath des getreuen Famulus folgen und noch einige Tage ausſetzen, denn es fehlte am Beſten, an Zuhörern nämlich, und ſelbſt die unverlierbaren, die z. B. im vorigen Semeſter die Inſtitutionen hörten und alſo ſicher im nächſten Halbjahre die Pandecten beſuchen müſſen, ſind ſogar noch nicht da. Endlich tauchen hier und da einige fremde Geſichter auf; ſie werden freudig begrüßt, wie die erſten Schwalben, die den Sommer verkünden, aber ſie ſind nur ſpärlich geſäet, und ſelbſt die Mitglieder der Immatrikulationscommiſſion, die ihr Werk begonnen haben, machen bedenkliche Geſichter, vom Rector an bis zum Pedellen hinab und prophezeien nicht viel Gutes. Die Juriſten geſtehen ſich nun allmälig in der Stille den Unterſchied zwiſchen Geſetz und Obſervanz, und wie die letztere eigentlich im lebendigen Verkehr weit mächtiger, als das erſtere. Das Geſetz ſagt: die Collegien ſollen an dieſem oder jenem Tage begonnen werden, die Obſervanz läßt ſie erſt acht oder ſogar vierzehn Tage nachher anfangen, und nach ihr, nicht aber nach jenem richten ſich die Studenten, ja ſogar die Füchſe, die doch vor dem gedruckten Popanz, wie Tieck das Geſetz nannte, den meiſten Reſpect haben. Plötzlich aber bricht der Damm, von allen Seiten ſtrömen die Studenten herbei, namentlich am Sonnabend und Sonntage vor dem wirklichen Anfange. Mit einem Mal iſt die Stadt wie durch Zauberſchlag wieder gefüllt, und man kann mit Schiller ausrufen:

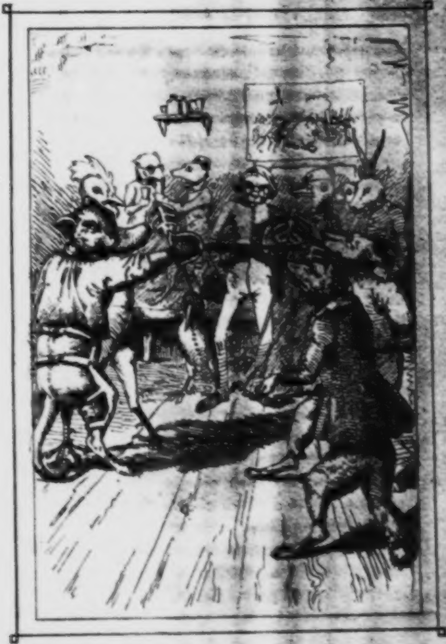
Wer zählt die Völker, nennt die Namen,
Die gaſtlich hier zuſammen kamen?
Von Hamburg, von der Oſtſee Strand,
Aus Baiern und aus Sachſenland,
Von Albions entlegner Küſte,
Sogar aus Ungarn kamen ſie,
Zu horchen von dem Schaugerüſte
Der Profeſſoren-Theorie.

Unter ihnen iſt denn auch unſer innig geliebter Fuchs gar oft der Letzten Einer, trotz dem, daß er ein neues Quartier gemiethet hat, weil er im alten mit dem Hauspump oder dem Hausſchlüſſel genirt war. Sieben Mal hat ihn ſchon vergeblich ein alter Schulkamerad, jetzt ein Fuchs, wie er es war, aufgeſucht; immer noch hielt ihn die Fremde fern. Endlich iſt denn auch er eingerückt, ſeinem aller Dinge noch unkundigen Landesgenoſſen ein wahrer Odyſſeus, ein vielerfahrener, vielgewanderter Mann, der der Menſchen Städte und Sitten geſehen. Mit beſcheidenem Selbſtbewußtſein empfängt er den Freund und ſucht ihn in die Myſterien des Studententhums einzuweihen, mit unabläſſigem Fleiß; nur Eins verbirgt er ſorgfältig vor ihm, weil er noch nicht ganz genau weiß, wie er mit ihm daran iſt, und gerade dies Eine beſchäftigt ihn ſelbſt doch am Meiſten. Er iſt nämlich auf der Reiſe, wo er ſich vor allen Dingen forſch zu machen ſuchte, und redlich bemüht war, den X—er Studenten herauszubeißen, d. h. der Univerſität, auf der er ſtudirte, nach ſeinen und ſeiner Commilitonen Begriffen Ehre zu machen, mit einem Y—er oder Z—er Studenten, der ſich üppig machte, zuſammengerathen, und ſie haben contrahirt. Da Jener auch künftig in X. weiter ſtudiren wird, ſo haben ſie beſchloſſen, es hier auszufechten. Unſer Held hat gefordert und erwartet nun die Beſtimmung von Ort und Stunde nach dem Comment, dieſem uralt heiligen Geſetz, das der Student noch ſtrenger beobachtet, als der frömmſte Sohn Iſraels weiland die zehn Gebote, welche Gott dem Moſes gab. Einige Tage ſind vergangen und noch iſt keine Nachricht geworden, obwohl er ſeinen Feind ſchon auf einer Kneipe getroffen. Er durfte kein Wort mit ihm wechſeln, ſondern mußte ſogar das Recht des Erſtgekommenen anerkennen, und jenen Ort wieder verlaſſen, denn ſo beſiehlt es eben der Comment, in welchem die Weisheit von Jahrhunderten und ganzen Generationen ſich wie die Weisheit der Hindus im Wiſchnu verkörpert hat; aber heiligen Zornes voll, ſendet er ihm ſogleich ſeinen Sekundanten, als Herold, um ihn zu treten, d. h. an ſeine Pflicht zu mahnen. Jener hat indeſſen das Seinige bereits gethan, wie es einem braven Burſchen geziemt, und ſich an irgend einen Hohen im Rath gewandt, um ihm das Nöthige zu ermitteln und zu beſorgen. Dies iſt gänzlich zu ſeiner Zufriedenheit geſchehen, und er kann mit vornehmer Herablaſſung jetzt dem Ministre plénipotentiaire ſeines Gegners Ort und Stunde beſtimmen. Sie treffen ſich nun zur feſtgeſetzten Zeit am genannten Orte, je nach den Verhältniſſen der Univerſität und der Wachſamkeit der Pedelle entweder auf einer geräumigen Studentenſtube, welche der eigentliche Bewohner kluger Weiſe um dieſelbe Stunde verlaſſen hat, oder im Freien an einer ſicheren, die umliegende Gegend beherrſchenden Stelle, oder auch einige Meilen weit von der Stadt in einer Dorfkneipe, deren Kneipier ein zuverläſſiger, verſchwiegener Mann iſt, weil er einen erklecklichen Profit von ſeiner Verſchwiegenheit hat. Der Paukapparat und der Paukdoctor ſind ſchon da, die Sekundanten kommen mit den Paukanten; der Unpartheiiſche und einige Zuſchauer ſtellen ſich gleich darauf ein. — Die beiden Gegner meſſen ſich mit den Blicken, aber ihre Lippen wechſeln kein Wort. Die Toilette wird jetzt gemacht, wenn möglich in verſchiedenen Räumen; geht das nicht, doch in den entgegengeſetzten Winkeln des Locals. Rock, Weſte, Halstuch, Mütze und Tragbänder werden abgelegt und ſtatt deren, — es iſt nur eine einfache Paukerei — der Kopf mit einem breiträndrigen Filz, der Hals mit einer hohen Cravatte, die Armgelenke mit ſeidenen Tüchern, Hand und Unterarm mit dem undurchdringlichen Stulp, der Leib mit einer breiten mit farbigen Streifen ſchön geſchmückten wattirten Binde, und die anderen Extremitäten bis über das Knie hinab ebenfalls mit einer dicken Binde gedeckt. Das iſt der Paukwichs. Man ſollte faſt glauben, es ſei noch unmöglicher, als bei weiland Achilles oder dem ſeligen hörnenen Siegfried, eine verwundbare Stelle zu finden, aber die Fechtkunſt hat ſolche Fortſchritte gemacht, daß das nur ein Hirngeſpinnſt iſt. Die Sekundanten haben mittlerweile ſchon die Menſur genommen, d. h. die Entfernung, in welcher die beiden Gegner zu Anfange jedes Ganges ſtehen müſſen, abgemeſſen und mit Kreideſtrichen bezeichnet. Jetzt nehmen ſie ſelber ein Rappier zur Hand, nachdem ſie ſich ebenfalls vor Hieben, welche die Duellanten treffen ſollen und ſie treffen könnten, ſo gut wie möglich verwahrten. Sie laden nun die Kämpfenden ein, ſich einander gegenüber zu ſtellen, geben ihnen die auf den Griffen mit hellen Farben wie die Binden geſchmückten Schläger in die Hand, und die inhaltsſchweren Worte: „Legt Euch aus! — Bindet die Klingen! Gebunden iſt — Haut aus!“ — erſchallen. — Der Beleidigte hat den erſten



Univ. Bibl.
München

Hieb. — Er berührt die Klinge des Gegners und nun geht es los, wie Bürger ſingt:

Wie Wetter erhebt ſich der grimmigſte Kampf.
Das Stampfen der Kämpfer zermalmet zu Dampf
Den Sand und die Schollen der Erde.
(oder auch: Den hölzernen Boden der Stube.)
Sie hauen und hauen mit Tigerwuth,
Bis Schweiß und Blut
Die Panzer und Helme (rectius den Stulp und die Binde) bethauen.

Endlich hat ein Hieb geſeſſen, d. h. er iſt nicht parirt worden und die Klinge hat den Körper des Gegners berührt. War es der Beleidiger, der getroffen worden, ſo tritt der Sekundant des Beleidigten hinzu und unterſucht dieſen; hat es gar eine Wunde gegeben, ſo betrachtet er ſie genau, ob Blut aus ihr fließt, ſie die gehörige Länge hat und ſo weit klafft, daß man den Rücken der Klinge hineinlegen kann. In dieſem Falle iſt es ein An— (Muſe! erröthe nicht, es kommt zu oft vor) und der Touchirte hat Satisfaction. Hat der Letztere dagegen die Wunde erhalten, ſo findet keine Unterſuchung Statt; es hängt von ihm ab, ob er Satisfaction nehmen oder weiter gehen will, vorausgeſetzt, daß er es kann. Vor dem ſechſten Gange wird nicht gern Satisfaction genommen, ſondern, bei etwaigem Hinderniß, die Fortſetzung bis nach der Heilung der erhaltenen Wunde hinausgeſchoben. Nach zwölf Gängen jedoch muß, wenn Nichts herausgekommen iſt, commentmäßig Satisfaction genommen werden, denn die Beleidigung iſt nach Burſchenbrauch und Recht geſühnt. — Unſer Held hat nun zwar allerdings von ſeinem geübteren Gegner einige Wunden erhalten, er iſt aber zu tapfer und daher nicht beſonnen und kaltblütig genug, um den rechten Moment abzupaſſen und ihm eins auszuwiſchen; es liegt ihm indeſſen daran, da er noch Jungfer iſt, d. h. früher noch keine Paukerei gehabt hat, ſich ſeines hohen Berufes als deutſcher Burſch würdig zu zeigen, und er nimmt alſo trotzig, aber heldenmüthig keine Satisfaction bis zum vollendeten zwölften Gange. Er hat ſich gut gepaukt, und die Füchſe haben jetzt großen Reſpect vor ihm; die Schläger werden weggelegt, die beiden Feinde treten auf einander zu und reichen ſich feierlich die Hand zum Zeichen der Verſöhnung, und Alles endet nun in Lieb' und Luſt, meiſt mit einem Satze, den die beiden Paukanten, einzeln oder zuſammen, ihren Sekundanten, dem Unpartheiiſchen und dem wackeren Paukdoctor, der nicht umſonſt Heftpflaſter geſchmiert und ſein Verbindezeug ausgepackt haben ſoll, loslaſſen.

Ein moroſer Hypochondriſt, der nichts von Jugendluſt an Thatkraft weiß, wird hier ausrufen: Quantum est in rebus inane! aber wie iſt der Mann auf dem Holzwege! Gerade in einer ſolchen Paukerei liegt ein unendlich tiefer Sinn, ein großes Geheimniß verborgen, nämlich die ganze Politik der Studenten, durch welche ſie ihre Republik regieren und vor innerem Schaden behüten. So ſeltſam dem Uneingeweihten auch die einzelnen Formen und Formeln erſcheinen, ſo ſehr weiß der Eingeweihte ihre hohe Bedeutung anzuerkennen und zu ſchätzen. — Die Moraliſten mögen ſagen was ſie wollen, ſchafft man, d. h. der Studioſus, erſt einmal das Duell ab, ſo iſt auch mit einem Schlage das ganze ſchöne Leben zerſtört auf Univerſitäten. Nur die Steigerungen, in denen ſich der jugendliche Uebermuth und die Eitelkeit gefallen, namentlich dann, wenn Keiner dem Anderen nachſtehen will, die Piſtolenſkandäle, die Paukereien auf krumme Säbel, ohne Stulp und Binde, auf Pariſiens und wie alle dieſe Erfindungen des Satan heißen mögen, ſind verderblich, denn ſie ſind demoraliſirend, eben ſo wie der Holzcomment, der bei dem ritterlichen Sinn unſerer akademiſchen Jugend Gottlob nur ſelten auftaucht, eine Ausgeburt innerer Bürgerkriege und nie lange währt. Das gewöhnliche Studentenduell iſt dagegen nur eine Form, um einem Zwiſte auf ritterliche Weiſe ein Ende zu machen und dauernde Verſöhnung herbei zu führen; um deſto edler, wenn unter den Studirenden ſelbſt ein Ehrengericht beſteht, ohne deſſen Zuſtimmung es dann überhaupt gar nicht Statt finden kann.

Nicht immer freilich läuft es ſo glücklich ab, wie das oben geſchilderte; namentlich nicht da, wo der Stoßcomment vorherrſcht, der ſich jedoch nur noch auf wenigen Univerſitäten findet und hoffentlich binnen wenigen Jahren ganz verſchwunden ſein wird. Eine Hiebwunde iſt unter zehn Mal neun Mal nicht gefährlich; eine Stoßwunde beſonders in der Bruſt kann ein ganzes ſieches Leben und einen frühzeitigen Tod herbeiführen und damit iſt der Spaß denn doch etwas zu theuer bezahlt.

Aber kehren wir zu unſerem Helden zurück. Er hat ſich, wie wir geſehen, gut geſchlagen, iſt dadurch angeſehen bei ſeinen Genoſſen, und die Luſt, dergleichen öfter zu verſuchen, bleibt nicht aus. Herkules ſteht nun am Scheidewege und läuft Gefahr, unter die Drachen zu gehen, d. h. ein Renommiſt zu werden. Den Bäumen iſt aber bekanntlich die Axt an die Wurzel gelegt, daß ſie nicht in den Himmel wachſen. Er zieht ſich vielleicht noch einige Mal glücklich aus der Affaire; endlich kommt aber doch ſein Meiſter und zeichnet ihn bei irgend einer Gelegenheit ſo, daß er, lange daran laborirend, Zeit hat zur Erkenntniß, in ſich kehrt und allmälig einen anderen Menſchen anzieht, der zwar einer blanken Klinge eben nicht aus dem Wege geht, ſondern jederzeit, wann und wo es ſein muß, ſeinen Mann ſteht, aber auch nicht eben übermüthig Händel ſucht, ausgenommen da, wo das Vaterland ruft, d. h. nicht das Vaterland, denn er ſchlägt ſich oft für Thüringen und iſt ein Rheinländer von Geburt, ſondern die patria, dieſe Mutter der Uneinigkeit nach außen.

Im Uebrigen führt unſer Brandfuchs während des Semeſters ein luſtiges Leben. Zu den vortrefflichen Vor- und Grundſätzen, die er ſich als Maulthier und Fuchs in die Seele ſchrieb, hat er unglücklicher Weiſe keine gute Dinte genommen, und die Schrift iſt ſo gebleicht, daß ſie ihm kaum noch leſerlich erſcheint. Zum Auffriſchen fehlt es ihm aber für's Erſte an Zeit; er hat ſo viel zu thun mit Kneipereien, Spritztouren, Paukereien und dergleichen wichtigen Dingen, daß er nicht allein höchſt ſelten in die Collegia, ſondern noch viel ſeltener zur Beſinnung kommt. So vergeht ihm ſein zweites akademiſches Halbjahr, er weiß ſelbſt nicht wie. Nur diverſe angebundene heulende Bären und ſein jetzt in höchſter Blüthe ſtehender Schnurrbart und Wallenſteiner wecken ihn aus ſeinem Schlafe und erinnern ihn, daß er ſich vorgenommen habe, am Schluſſe deſſelben in die theure Heimath zu ziehn, wo ſeine Gegenwart höchſt nothwendig iſt, einmal um ſich in vollſtem Glanze der ſtaunenden Philiſterſchaar zu zeigen, dann aber um eine mögliche Erhöhung ſeines Wechſels oder wenigſtens irgend eine Extragratification zu erlangen, damit aus jenen Raubthieren nicht alte Bären werden, während er nur noch ein junger Burſch iſt. Ach, auf der Heimreiſe verſteht er jetzt erſt die berühmte Stelle aus dem Horaz, die ihm ſein Director nie recht begreiflich machen konnte:

> Post equitem sedet atra cura!

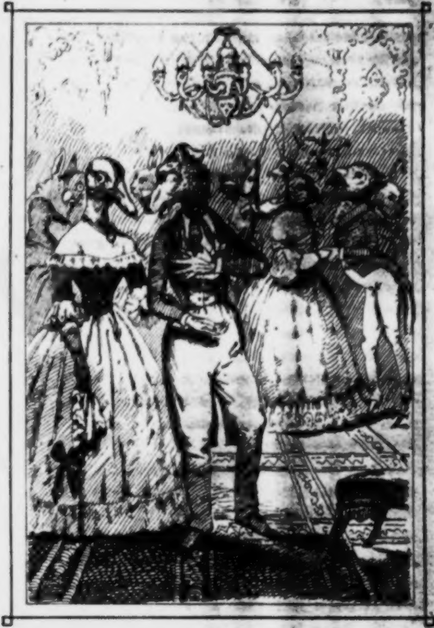
Des vierten Kapitels
vierte Unterabtheilung.
Der Student im Jünglingsalter oder der junge Burſch.

> And then the lover
> Sighing like furnace, with a woeful ballad
> Made to his mistress' eyebrow.
> Shakespeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

> Und dann der junge Burſch,
> Nächtlich ſingend auf den Straßen, Ständchen
> Vor ſeiner Holden Thüre bringend.
> Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Die Collegien beginnen zum dritten Mal, ſeit unſer Held die Univerſität bezogen hat; er iſt dies Mal ſogar etwas früher wieder da, denn um die Wahrheit zu geſtehen, ſo ſehr er ſich auch freute, die Seinen in der Heimath wieder zu begrüßen, ſo hat es ihm doch auf die Länge nicht ſo ganz da gefallen, weil man ihn eigentlich nicht ſo recht für voll anſehen wollte; er ſpielte im elterlichen Hauſe nur eine Ripiengeige, keineswegs aber die erſte wie auf der Univerſität vor den Philiſtern. Deshalb ſchützte er auch zuletzt gewaltigen Pflichteifer vor und war ängſtlich beſorgt, wenn er länger bliebe nicht wieder zur rechten Zeit einzutreffen, ſondern den höchſt wichtigen Anfang höchſt wichtiger Collegia verſäumen zu müſſen. Im Uebrigen beſtand er ganz wohl; zwar ſuchte Papa ihm hinſichtlich ſeines Wiſſens entweder ſelbſt auf den Zahn zu fühlen, oder wenn er das nicht vermochte, durch irgend einen gelehrten Hausfreund auf den Zahn fühlen zu laſſen, da es ihm aber nicht an Suade und keckem Urtheil fehlte und Jener eben nicht tief im Geſpräch auf die Sache einging, ſo lief das Examen noch ganz leidlich ab und das Urtheil fiel tröſtlich aus, ungefähr: Er ſcheine ganz hübſch ſtudirt zu haben und es könne wohl etwas aus ihm werden, und dergleichen. Bei einem anderen Examen, das Mama nicht mit ihm, ſondern mit ſeiner Wäſche angeſtellt hat, iſt es ihm freilich nicht ſo gut gegangen. Sie hat nämlich dieſelbe in etwas deſolatem Zuſtande gefunden; viele Hemden ſind arg zerriſſen, mehrere nicht Kaſtorſtrümpfe, ſondern Strumpfkaſtore betrauerten melancholiſch das Schickſal ihrer Polluxe, das mit dem der wirklichen Dioskuren die größte Aehnlichkeit hatte, der Eine blieb nämlich auf der Oberwelt, während der Bruder in die Unterwelt gefahren; andere declamirten mit den Gebrüdern Fatalis: „Schrecklich iſt's, wenn Ferſen oder Zehen ſo hinaus in's kalte Leben ſehen", und endlich — die weißen, ſauberen Cravatten, von den Schweſtern mit emſigem Fleiße geſäumt, gezeichnet, ja ſogar geſtickt, waren ganz verſchwunden. Zwar behauptete unſer Held, er habe ſie als überflüſſig in der Univerſitätsſtadt zurückgelaſſen und ſie ſeien noch alle vorhanden, was auch reine Wahrheit war, denn er hatte ſie in bedrängten Zeiten verkeilt und ſie waren noch alle bei dem Doctoranden, der ſie für ein Billiges von ihm erhandelt, wirklich vorhanden; aber das mütterliche Herz konnte ſich nicht dabei beruhigen und klagte ſehr über die Verderbtheit der männlichen Jugend. Denn der Gedanke vorzüglich, daß ſolche Cravatten vom feinſten Kammertuch, auf das Feinſte geſäumt und eine wahre Zierde des Menſchengeſchlechtes, überflüſſig ſein ſollten, quälte ſie ſehr. Wie tief mußte ihr Sohn geſunken ſein! Auch gab ſie ſich nur einigermaaßen zufrieden, als er, um ſie zu verſöhnen, am nächſten Sonntage ſie mit einem neuen weißen, von den ſorgſamen Schweſtern beſorgten Halstuche in die Kirche begleitete und dann mit ihr einige Viſiten machte bei verſchiedenen Tanten und Couſinen, wo er ſich denn auch ganz hübſch benahm, nur daß ihm mitunter irgend ein burſchikoſer Ausdruck entwiſchte, worüber die ſämmtlichen Damen nicht wenig erſchraken und zuſammenfuhren, mit Ausnahme eines hübſchen Couſinchens, das ſich darüber zu Tode lachen wollte. Auf ſolche Weiſe ging denn auch dieſer Kelch glücklich vorüber; aber alle dieſe Ereigniſſe dienten nur dazu, die Sehnſucht nach der geliebten Univerſitätsſtadt, wo ihm ſolche Dinge gar nicht widerfahren konnten, zu ſteigern. So haben wir ihn denn vor der Zeit Abſchied nehmen und den Brüſten der geliebten alma mater wieder zueilen ſehen, unter dem oben angeführten Vorwande. Neu ausſtaffirt kommt er hier an und begrüßt die wohlbekannten Häuſer, ja ſogar die Carcer, mit lauter Zufriedenheit.

Aber nicht dies allein war es, was ihn wieder hinzog. Er hatte ein wichtiges Pfand zurückgelaſſen, — ſein Herz. — Schon am Schluſſe des vorigen Semeſters auf einem Balle, oder bei irgend einer, von einem Profeſſor veranſtalteten Luſtparthie, hatte er ein junges Mädchen kennen lernen, einen wahren Engel. Vor Tiſche ſchon war es ihm gelungen, einige Extratouren mit ihr zu tanzen, obgleich Mama es nicht gern ſah, daß ſie Extratouren tanzte; auch bemerkte er, daß ſie nach der letzten, die ſie ihm bewilligt, einem Meckelnburger und einem Oſtfrieſen es abgeſchlagen, weil ſie keine mehr tanzen dürfe, und das verlieh ihr nicht geringen Werth in ſeinen Augen. Bei Tiſche hatte er gar das Glück, neben ihr zu ſitzen und ſich vortrefflich mit ihr über Schiller und Goethe zu unterhalten. Heine's Gedichte kannte ſie noch nicht und war ſehr dankbar, als er ihr anbot, ihr deſſen Buch der Lieder zu ſchicken. Er wagte nun, ſie zum Cotillon zu engagiren. Sie ſagte es ihm zu, wenn Papa und Mama ſo lange da blieben und erſuchte ihn ſogar, Mama darum anzugehen. Dieſe ließ ſich denn auch erweichen. Bei dem Cotillon ſetzte das etwas zerſtreute Paar das Tiſchgeſpräch mit großem Intereſſe fort und irrte ſich dadurch mitunter in den Touren, doch ermangelte ſie nicht, ihm ihre liebſten Freundinnen zuzuführen und er ſuchte ihr dafür, wenn die Touren es ſo mit ſich brachten, die beliebteſten Tänzer, jedoch natürlich nur unter ſeinen Freunden und von ſeiner Couleur, aus. Als der Cotillon zu Ende und er ſie zur Mama zurückbrachte, wagte er ihr leiſe die Hand zu drücken und es kam ihm vor, als erwiedere ſie es mit noch leiſerer, zitternder Hand. Er blickte ihr in die holden Augen — doch ſie ſchlug verſchämt die Blicke nieder. Bald darauf brach ſie mit Papa und Mama auf; er aber ſtand an der Thür und verbeugte ſich tief; ſie dankte erröthend. Bedurfte es mehr, um ihn mit Seligkeit zu überſchütten? Sein Herz war ſo voll — o nur eine Seele auf dieſem weiten Erdenrunde, der er ſein Glück mittheilen könnte! — Schon wollte er allein hinaus in Gottes freie Natur und dem Sternenhimmel ſein Entzücken zujauchzen; da fand er ſie, dieſe Seele. — Sie ſteckte in einem phlegmatiſchen Holſteiner, aus Weſſelingsbuhren, der ſein Nachbar in den Pandecten war. Dieſer wollte noch nicht zu Bett gehen, weil er zu viel Punſch getrunken, wovon er gewöhnlich nicht ſchlafen könne und war daher bereit, mit ihm eine



Univ. Bibl.
München

Stunde auf der Promenade auf- und abzugehn. — Er theilte ihm nun alle Herrlichkeiten dieſes Abends mit und ſprach während des ganzen nächtlichen Spazierganges unerſchöpflich allein; Jener hörte geduldig zu und ſagte nur zuletzt: „Ja, das muß eine ſehr nette Deern ſein; aber nun ſchlaf wohl, ſonſt verſchlaf' ich doch morgen das Collegium, denn mein verfluchter Stiefelwuchs kommt nie zur rechten Zeit.“ — Seit dieſer Zeit hielt unſer Held den guten Martens aus Weſſelingsbuhren, Dämmerkönig genannt, für ſeinen treueſten und uneigennützigſten Freund, dem er das heiligſte Geheimniß ſeines Lebens anvertrauen konnte.

Bereits am nächſten Tage fing nun unſer damalige Brandfuchs an, gerade diejenigen Collegia am Fleißigſten zu beſuchen, zu denen der Weg ihn bei ihrem Fenſter vorüber führte. Aber leider ſaß ſie nicht am Fenſter, denn Mama litt es nicht, weil es ſich für junge Mädchen in einer Univerſitätsſtadt nicht ſchicke. Das machte ihn ſehr betrübt und er ſann vergebens auf Mittel und Wege, ſie zu ſehen. Da gewahrte er eines Sonntags Morgens von ſeinem Fenſter aus, daß ſie in die Kirche ging und von nun an gab es keinen frömmeren Chriſten als ihn. Bald nachher erfuhr er durch einen ähnlichen Zufall, daß ſie alle Nachmittage mit ihrer Mama, der der Doctor Motion verordnet, im Philoſophengange — (welche Univerſitätsſtadt hat übrigens keinen Philoſophengang?) — luſtwandele, und von dieſem Augenblick griff ihn der Nachmittagsſchlaf im Naturrechte, das von 2 — 3 geleſen wurde, ſo an, daß er ſich nothwendig von 3 — 4 Uhr eine ſtarke Bewegung im Philoſophengange machen mußte, um für das höchſt wichtige Kirchenrecht, das er von 4 — 5 Uhr hörte, und das im nächſten Sommer vielleicht nicht geleſen wurde, wieder friſch und munter zu ſein, wozu denn ihr reizender Anblick nicht wenig beitrug.

Wie ſtudirt er jetzt den Schiller, den er nun erſt ganz in ſeiner Größe begreift. Alle ſeine Muſeſtunden wendet er daran. Früher hätte er ſich ſogar einmal beinahe von einem Frankfurter, der in Berlin bei Hotho Aeſthetik und in Halle bei Hinrichs die Vorleſungen über den Fauſt gehört, verführen laſſen, Goethe Schiller'n vorzuziehen, weil Schiller zu ſehr in ſeiner Subjectivität ſtecken geblieben, Goethe aber allein zur reinen, vollkommenen abſoluten Objectivität vorgedrungen. jetzt läßt er ſich aber eine ſolche Sünde nicht mehr zu Schulden kommen. Schiller iſt der Dichter der Freiheit und der reinen Liebe; Goethe nur ein Ariſtokrat und ein ſinnlicher Kerl; die Frauen bei Schiller ſind Ideale des Himmels, Goethe's Philine, Gretchen, Marie nur gefallene irdiſche Weiber, frivole Geſchöpfe. Thekla bleibt ſein Ideal und ihr gleicht die Geliebte ſeiner Seele ſo auf ein Haar, als hätte ſie Schiller geſeſſen, da er ſeinen Wallenſtein ſchrieb. Wo er geht und ſteht, fallen ihm die herrlichen Worte ein, ja es iſt ihm ſogar widerfahren, daß er ſie zuſammen mit der Lehre von der Dos aestimata in ſein Pandectenheft ſchrieb, was ſich denn folgendermaaßen etwas wunderlich ausnahm:

> Die künſtliche Uebertragung wird vermuthet — der Zug des Herzens iſt des Schickſals Stimme — wenn die Brautgabe — Ich bin die Seine — unter Beſtimmung ihres Werthes — Sein Geſchenk allein — auf den Mann — Iſt dieſes neue Leben — übertragen iſt — das ich lebe — dos venditionis gratia aestimata — Er hat ein Recht an ſein Geſchöpf — doch kann die Taxe auch zu dem Ende feſtgeſetzt werden — Was war ich — um der Frau bei der Rückforderung — Eh' ſeine ſchöne Liebe mich befreite — den Beweis des verlorenen Werthes zu erleichtern. — Ich will auch von mir ſelbſt nicht kleiner denken — Für die letzte Art der Taxe — als der Geliebte — ſtreitet aber nicht — der kann nicht gering ſein — die Vermuthung. — der das Unſchätzbare beſitzt.

L. 5. 10. 21. C. de jure dot.
Ich fühle
die Kraft — Glück, loco citato S. 30 — 33
— mit meinem Glücke mir verliehn.
Anderer Meinung ſind Leyser Sp. 311. m. 10.
Ernſt liegt das Leben vor der ernſten Seele!
Müller ad Leyser. Obs. 551, allein wider die Geſetze und —
— Daß ich mir ſelbſt gehöre, weiß ich nun; — allgemeinen Interpretationsregeln.

— Den feſten Willen hab' ich kennen lernen —
Coccejí J. C. L. 19. T. 3. 9 u. 8.
— den unbezwinglichen in meiner Bruſt —
S. auch überhaupt über die dos aestimata
— Und an das Höchſte kann ich Alles ſetzen. —
Tiegerſtröm, Dotalr. 1. B. S. 138 — 150.

Anderer ähnlicher Zerſtreuungen nicht zu gedenken. Leider aber hat kein günſtiger Gott ihn wieder mit der Holden zuſammengeführt, und das Semeſter ſich ſeinem Ende genaht, ohne daß es ihm möglich geworden, ſie einen tieferen Blick in ſein Herz thun zu laſſen, als ſie, ohne ſein Wiſſen, freilich ſchon gethan, denn in einer Univerſitätsſtadt ſind die jungen Mädchen noch viel ſcharfſichtiger als anderswo. — Woher das kommt, weiß ich nicht genau, glaube aber, weil der Alte-Jungfern-Stand dort etwas zu Entſetzliches an ſich hat. — Unſer Jüngling hat nun abreiſen müſſen, aber ſie iſt ſein Taggedanke, iſt ſein Traum, und da ihr Geburtstag (den er durch einen ſtudirenden Vetter von ihr erfahren) an demſelben Tage war, wo er ſich aufmachte, um in die Heimath zu ziehen — er hielt das übrigens für ein ſehr günſtiges Omen — ſo hat er nicht unterlaſſen können, ihr anonym einen blühenden Roſenſtock mit einem ſehr ſchönen Gedichte zuſtellen zu laſſen. Mit dem Poem will ich jedoch dem geneigten Leſer um ſo weniger beſchwerlich fallen, als er es drei Wochen ſpäter der Redaction des in X. geleſenſten belletriſtiſchen Journals, die es ſogleich abdrucken ließ, einſendete, ſammt einigen anderen beſcheidenen Maaßlieben (bellis perennis, auch Gänſeblümchen genannt) ſeines Liebesfrühlings. Die Holde iſt natürlich ſehr mit dem Roſenſtocke — das Gedicht hat ſie ſogleich geſchickt auf die Seite zu bringen gewußt — geneckt worden, aber die heimliche Freude, die es ihr machte, war doch größer, als der Verdruß, den ſie über die Neckereien empfand. Sie hat auch gleich den Verfaſſer errathen, und höchſt gewandt herausgebracht, daß er an demſelben Tage ſeine Ferienreiſe angetreten. Dadurch gewinnt nun ſeine zarte Aufmerkſamkeit noch weit mehr in ihren Augen; heimlich, vor dem zu Bette Gehen, zwiſchen dem letzten Haarwickel und dem Ausziehen des erſten Strumpfes, lieſt ſie es jeden Abend wieder, trotz dem, daß ſie es am zweiten ſchon auswendig konnte, und ſchläft dann unter den ſüßeſten Träumen ein. — Er aber, der Liebende, macht im Poſtwagen unaufhörlich Gedichte auf ſie und beſingt ſie noch mehr en détail, als weiland Petrarca ſeine Laura, und das will doch viel heißen. Als,er endlich in der geliebten Vaterſtadt angelangt, iſt ſeine Brieftaſche ſo voll Verſe, daß er ſämmtliche belletriſtiſche Journale Deutſchlands auf ein Jahr mit dieſer in Deutſchland ſo überaus ſeltenen Waare verſehen könnte. Er bringt nun alle Morgenſtunden damit zu, ſie zu feilen und ſauber in das Reine zu ſchreiben, ſo daß Papa, der da glaubt, er repetire ſo gewiſſenhaft Inſtitutionen und Pandecten, und ſuche ſich den Unterſchied zwiſchen dolus und culpa wie zwiſchen der actio exercitoria, der actio quod jussu und der actio de in rem verso auf das Genaueſte und nach den feinſten Diſtinctionen einzuprägen, überaus zufrieden mit ihm iſt und Mama des Abends vor dem zu Bett Gehen, während ihr Gatte die Uhr vor ſeinem Bett aufzieht und ſie die Nachthaube aufſtülpt, zu dieſem ſagt: „Siehſt Du nun, Vater, wie ungerecht Du gegen den Fritz geweſen biſt: er iſt ſo fleißig, daß mir ordentlich bange wird, er ſchadet ſeiner Geſundheit durch das viele Sitzen." Papa giebt es zu, beruhigt ſie jedoch im Punkt der Geſundheit, und Beide beten dann den Abendſegen und ſchlafen ruhig ein. Nicht ſo die Schweſtern, die wiſſen die Wahrheit, denn der Bruder hat ihnen begeiſtert die Geliebte geſchildert und die Gedichte vorgeleſen. Sie unterhalten ſich noch lange, ehe ſie einſchlafen, erſt von Fritzens Liebchen, dann von der Liebe überhaupt, die eine höchſt merkwürdige Sache iſt, über welche ſich junge Mädchen gar zu gern mit einander unterhalten, und wenn ſie auch noch ſo fromm und tugendhaft ſind, wahre kleine Heilige, car, ſagt ſchon der frivole Parny:

Car une sainte, hélas! est toujours femme.

und darüber vergeſſen ſie am Ende ganz und gar den Abendſegen und ſchlafen ſo ein, ohne an den lieben Gott zu denken. Nun, jungen unſchuldigen Mädchen mag das ſchon paſſiren, an deren Lager ſtehen doch, wie es in dem plattdeutſchen Volksreim heißt, drei Engel zu Häupten und drei Engel zu Füßen, und der liebe Gott rechnet es ihnen gewiß nicht an, daß ſie ihn vergeſſen haben, im Gegentheil, wie ich mir den lieben Gott denke, hat er ſie deswegen nur deſto lieber, weil alles Natürliche ihm gewiß Freude macht.

Endlich iſt denn unſer Freund als junger Burſch mit Papa's Lobe und Ermahnungen, mit Mama's Segen und heimlich zugeſteckten Mutterpfennigen und mit der Schweſtern heißeſten Segenswünſchen und neuen Cravatten wieder in der Univerſitätsſtadt angekommen. Sein erſter Weg war zu einer Fenſterparade und das Ziel ihre Wohnung. — O Glück! da begegnet ſie ihm auf der Straße. — Vor freudiger Verwirrung und Haſt kann er ihr kaum die devoteſte aller Verbeugungen machen und ſie — erröthet vor ſüßem Schreck bis in die Fingerſpitzen, ſo daß ſie jetzt mit vollem Rechte der roſenfingerigen Eos des alten Homer verglichen werden kann. Ich will es nur geſtehen, ſie hat ſich echt weiberhaft unterdeſſen genau nach ihm und nach Papa und Mama

und dem Stand der Onkels und Tanten

bei einem ſeiner Landsleute erkundigt und lauter erfreuliche Dinge von ihm gehört. Eigentlich hat ſie das nicht um ihres eigenen Selbſt willen gethan, denn ſie ginge mit ihm durch die ganze Welt, ſondern um Papa's willen, der es früher oder ſpäter doch erfahren muß, und dem ſie dann gleich von Allem Rechenſchaft geben kann. — Ich habe vergeſſen zu erzählen, daß der liebende Roland — Fritz wollte ich ſagen — jetzt geſchickt einen Fuchs in ſein Logis hinein practicirt — der Fuchs iſt ganz erſtaunt und gerührt über ſeine Großmuth und vergißt ihm das nie — und unter dem Vorwande, daß er beſſer da ochſen könne, deſſen weit ſchlechteres Zimmer bezogen hat, das natürlich in der Nachbarſchaft von der Wohnung ſeiner Auserwählten iſt. Sehr bald erfährt er nun, daß ſie Montags und Donnerstags um eilf Uhr Vormittags in die Zeichnenſtunde oder die Singakademie geht, und ſonderbarer Zufall, er verſpätet ſich immer um dieſe Zeit und begegnet ihr jedes Mal, ſo daß er ſtets dann erſt in das Collegium kommt, wenn der Profeſſor ſchon angefangen hat, und ſeinem Hefte in dieſen Stunden daher immer der Kopf fehlt. Einer ſeiner Freunde, ein witziger Mediciner, der die Sache wittert, meint ſogar, er leide an einem Quartanfieber, das ihm jedes Mal zwei Köpfe raube, ſeinen eigenen und den der Vorleſung. Da derſelbe den Spaß ſelbſtgefällig mehrere Mal wiederholt, ſo ſetzt unſer Liebender ſogar einen dummen Jungen darauf und ſie würden ſich gepaukt haben, wenn das Ehrengericht nicht anders entſchieden hätte. Uebrigens iſt der ſonſt ſo flotte junge Burſche jetzt außerordentlich fleißig und ſchwänzt kein Colleg; denn er denkt ernſtlich ſchon an das Heirathen, vor dem das Examen ſich nothwendig als verſchloſſene Himmelspforte zeigt. Nur die Bälle beſucht er fleißig, und auf einem derſelben gelingt es ihm endlich, ihr in dem günſtigen Cotillon, zwiſchen der Tour mit den Stühlen und der Galopptour, ſeines Herzens heiligſtes Geheimniß zu offenbaren und zitternd ſein Lebens- oder Todesurtheil von ihren Lippen zu erwarten. Sie wagt Nichts zu antworten, ſo ſehr er auch fleht und dringt — eben ſoll ſich ihren Lippen ein ſchüchternes Wort entwinden — o Schmerz, da kommt ein Bremenſer und holt ſie zum Walzen. — Endlich, nachdem der Grauſame nicht ein Mal, wie es üblich iſt, ſondern zwei Mal mit ihr rund getanzt hat, bringt er ſie wieder. — Der zitternde Liebende wiederholt ſeine dringende Bitte um Gegenliebe — da müſſen ſie abwalzen, denn die Tour und mit ihr der Cotillon iſt zu Ende. Ihm bleibt Nichts übrig, als ſie zu ihrem Sitze zurückzuführen; zu ſprechen vermag er nicht mehr — aber er drückt ihr die Hand und ſieht ihr ſo flehend in die Augen, daß ſie aus purem Mitleid nicht anders kann, ſie muß ſie ihm wieder drücken. — Alle neun Muſen! wer beſchreibt ſeine Seligkeit? Er drückt ſie ihr noch ein Mal — ſie drückt ſie ihm noch ein Mal wieder — er drückt ſie ihr zum dritten Mal, ſie erwiedert es zum dritten Mal; die Götter blicken lächelnd hernieder, und der zarte Bund der Herzen iſt für die Ewigkeit geſchloſſen.

Am nächſten Morgen erhält ſie, natürlich von unbekannter Hand, ein ſehr ſchönes Bouquet und ein ſehr überſchwengliches Gedicht. Mama, die Argusaugen hat, ſtellt ſie darüber zu Rede. Als eine wohlerzogene Tochter bekennt ſie Alles. Gottlob! Mama iſt eine vernünftige Frau; ſie hat ſich ſelber unter ähnlichen Auſpicien mit Papa verlobt, als Papa in J. ſtudirte, und ihre Schweſter, die an einem Phyſicus in Meckelnburg verheirathet iſt, hat es eben ſo gemacht. Sie ſieht alſo nichts Unpaſſendes darin, da der junge Mann von guter Familie iſt, beſchließt aber, Papa ſolle vor der Hand noch Nichts erfahren, da er ein heftiger Feind von Studentenverlobungen ſei (vielleicht aus heimlicher Reue, wer kann das wiſſen?); dagegen will ſie aber den jungen Mann genau prüfen, die erfahrene und umſichtige Frau. Unſer Held wird nun zu der nächſten Abendgeſellſchaft eingeladen, da er glücklicher Weiſe bei Papa ein Collegium gehört hat, oder ſich ſonſt irgend ein guter Vorwand — Mamas, die heirathsfähige Töchter haben, ſind außerordentlich erfinderiſch in dergleichen; es muß im Blut liegen — darbietet. — Sie läßt ſich natürlich Nichts merken, das ginge gegen ihre Würde; der junge Mann muß den erſten Schritt thun und ſich ihr — figürlich wenigſtens — zu Füßen werfen, aber das Töchterlein, deſſen Tiſchnachbar er durch eine ſeltſame Verkettung der Umſtände wieder iſt, flüſtert ihm zu: „Ich durfte der theuern Mutter Nichts verſchweigen, und ſie iſt ſo gut, ſie zürnt uns nicht.“

Kurz, voilà, comme ici bas, les choses s'enfilent, ſagen die Franzoſen; es dauert nicht lange, ſo iſt Alles in Richtigkeit. Papa iſt auch dem jungen Manne nicht abgeneigt, will aber von Verlobung Nichts wiſſen, als bis er das Examen hinter ſich hat. Es bleibt alſo für's Erſte ein Geheimniß, das Niemand weiß, Niemand auf Gottes weiter Erde, — die ganze Stadt und die halbe Univerſität ausgenommen. Die boshaften Franzoſen pflegen das le secret de Polichinelle zu nennen.

Aber welch ein glückliches Semeſter für den jungen Burſchen! es verfließt ihm unter lauter Seligkeit. Auch nimmt er ſich muſterhaft zuſammen, und als es vorbei iſt, hat er ſich nur drei Mal gepaukt, zwei Mal ſekundirt und ein Mal berauſcht — eigentlich nur etwas beſpitzt — nie aber einen ſolchen moraliſchen Katzenjammer gehabt, als nach dieſem Räuſchchen. — Dabei ward faſt kein Collegium von ihm verſäumt. — O Ihr, die Ihr wißt, was es heißt ein junger Burſche ſein! Euch frage ich: Iſt das nicht ungeheuer für einen jungen Burſchen?

Aber ach, mit dem Schluſſe des Semeſters naht nun auch die ſchwere Stunde der Trennung. Sein Papa will durchaus, daß er jetzt eine andere Univerſität beſuche, und er muß gehorchen. Er bleibt bis zum letzten Augenblicke. Sie hat ihm eine Brieftaſche geſtickt — einen eleganten Tabaksbeutel hat er ſchon früher von ihr bekommen — er ihr einen Ring geſchenkt. — Nach dem heißeſten Gelübde ewiger Treue, reißen ſie ſich endlich von einander los. Die Poſt geht erſt ſpät am Abend; der Wagen muß vor ihrem Hauſe vorbei; heimlich die Thränen trocknend, ſteht ſie am Fenſter — da erſchallt das Poſthorn — der gefühlloſe Poſtillion bläſt munter: „Friſch auf zum fröhlichen Jagen!“ oder „Lott' iſt todt, Lott' iſt todt, Jule liegt im Sterben!“ — wie kann der Menſch ſo roh ſein! — ach dieſe Töne,

Wie zerreißen ſie ihr Ohr!
Jeder ruft ihr ſeine Stimme,
Zaubert ihr ſein Bild hervor.

Da raſſelt der Wagen vorüber; das Fenſter in demſelben wird niedergelaſſen, ſie öffnet das ihrige; aus beiden grüßt ein weißes Tuch. — Nun biegt die Poſtkutſche um die Ecke, bald verhallt ihr Rollen auf dem Pflaſter — fort iſt der Geliebte und ſie, die Geliebte nämlich,

— nicht die Poſtkutſche, die fährt ruhig weiter mit ihrer ſüßen Laſt — blickt wie Thekla

Hinaus in die dunkle Nacht,
Das Auge vom Weinen getrübet! —

Des vierten Kapitels

fünfte Unterabtheilung.

Der Student im Mannesalter oder der alte Burſch.

Then a soldier
Full of strange oaths, and bearded like the pard,
Jealous in honour, sudden and quick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation
Even in the cannon's mouth.
Shakspeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

Der alte Burſch,
Stark im Comment, und bärtig wie ein Wilder,
Voll point d'honneur, raſch zum Duell bereit,
Wenn es die Ehre ſeiner Farbe gilt,
Die er verficht, trotz Carcer und Conſil,
Ja ſelbſt vor dem Senat.
Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Zum vierten Mal beginnen die Vorleſungen ſeit Erſchaffung der Welt, das heißt ſeit der Immatrikulation unſeres Helden. Er iſt jetzt, wie wir wiſſen, auf einer anderen Univerſität, aber ein erfahrener Mann, der ſich in der Welt umgeſehen. Deshalb beſchließt er, ſich die Dinge erſt ruhig zu betrachten, ehe er ſich mit ihnen befaßt. Eigentlich will er auf der neuen Univerſität nur ſtudiren und weiter Nichts, das Verſäumte einholen und ſich um gar nichts Anderes bekümmern, als um ſeine Brotwiſſenſchaft. Er belegt daher viele Collegia und repetirt außerordentlich fleißig, iſt den ganzen Tag zu Hauſe und in der Nacht begrüßt oft ſeine Lampe den anbrechenden Morgen. Es iſt ganz erſtaunlich, wie eifrig er es treibt, ja er ſelbſt wundert ſich darüber, denn ſolches Sitzfleiſch hat er ſich ſelbſt nicht zugetraut.

Es wird ihm auch mitunter ganz wehmüthig dabei zu Muthe, ſo gewiſſermaaßen flau, aber er will ein Mann ſein und hält noch eine ganze Woche aus. Jetzt hat er's nun ſchon einen vollen Monat ſo getrieben, da iſt's denn doch nicht mehr wie recht und billig, daß er ſich ein Mal ein Vergnügen, eine kleine Zerſtreuung gewähre; doch hat er faſt gar keine Bekanntſchaft angeknüpft, ſeinen Hausburſchen ausgenommen, weil ſich das nicht füglich vermeiden ließ, und dieſer von Anfang an ſehr gefällig gegen ihn war. Eben ſo kennt er nur einige alte Häuſer noch von der erſten Univerſität her; dieſe haben noch mehr Gott im Herzen und das Examen vor Augen, als er, und da ſie nicht von demſelben Fach ſind, ſo fehlen ihnen gegenſeitig die Berührungspunkte und ſie ſehen ſich daher nur äußerſt ſelten. Kurz, er lebt wie ein Einſiedler und weiß nicht recht, wie er es anfangen ſoll, um einmal nach alter Weiſe recht fidel zu kneipen. Da trifft es ſich, daß irgend ein berühmtes Vogelſchießen oder ſonſt ein ländliches Feſt oder ein Jahrmarkt auf einen der nächſten Tage fällt und daß er zufällig ſeinen Hausburſchen ſich rüſten ſieht, um die reichen Freuden, die es darbietet, zu genießen. Dieſer ladet ihn ein, ihn zu begleiten, und unſer Held läßt ſich das nicht zwei Mal ſagen. Sie ziehen hinaus und finden draußen noch andere luſtige Commilitonen, mit denen er ſchnell bekannt wird, da ſich mit ihnen gut leben läßt. Der Hausburſche gehört nämlich zu den Pommeranzenfarbigcitrongelbweißen, die er dort antrifft und welche unſeren Freund ſehr zuvorkommend behandeln. Das ſieht ein Coquelicothimmelblauroſenrother, den es heftig wurmt, daß die ihm verhaßte andere eben bezeichnete Couleur ſchon wieder einen gekeilt hat, der eigentlich zu ſeiner Couleur ſich halten müßte, weil ſeine Couleur ihren Stammſitz in Meckelnburg hat und Jener ein Lauenburger iſt, alſo ein Grenznachbar oder weil Jener in X. Renonce war bei den Saftgrünſcharlachrothſilbernen und die Saftgrünſcharlachrothſilbernen in X. im Cartel ſtehen mit den Coquelicothimmelblauroſenrothen in Y. Einem Nicht-auf-deutſchen-Univerſitäten-ſtudirt-habenden werden dieſe Bezeichnungen räthſelhaft erſcheinen, der Eingeweihte aber ſie dagegen wohl verſtehen. Da es zu gefährliche Geheimniſſe ſind, ſo wird es Niemand dem Verfaſſer verargen; wenn er ſich, um nicht mit wißbegierigen bekannten Leuten in unangenehme Colliſionen zu gerathen, aller weiteren Erklärungen enthält. Jener alſo bindet bei irgend einer natürlich vom Zaun gebrochenen Gelegenheit mit unſerem Freunde an, und unſer Freund, der nur zu wohl weiß, was ſich ziemt, brummt ihm ſogleich Einen auf, oder fordert ihn gar, wenn Jener ſich in Avantage geſetzt, je nachdem der Comment es geſtattet, auf einen Gang krumme Säbel, vielleicht, je nachdem die Univerſität iſt, auf vier und zwanzig Gänge Pariſiens, wenn nicht gar auf Piſtolen, ſechs Schritt Barriere. Die Begebenheit macht natürlich nicht geringe Senſation in der Studentenwelt; unſer alte Burſche wendet ſich nun zu den Pommeranzenfarbigcitrongelbweißen, um ihm das Nöthige zu beſorgen, und wählt ſich ſeinen Sekundanten unter ihnen aus. Die Sache wird ſo bald als möglich ausgemacht, er kämpft wie ein Löwe, aber mit großartiger Ruhe, und der Coquelicothimmelblauroſenrothe trägt eine arge Schlappe davon. Des Ruhmes Kränze ſchmücken nun, wenn gleich unſichtbar, unſeres Freundes ſieggewohnte Stirn; Füchſe und Brandfüchſe haben einen teufelmäßigen Reſpect vor ihm, und die alten Häuſer ſuchen ſeine Bekanntſchaft. Bald ſehen ſie, daß er in jeder Hinſicht einer der honorigſten Kerle iſt, die je auf einer Menſur ſtanden; ſie laſſen ihm alſo keine Ruhe, bis er ſich ihnen eng anſchließt, und da die alte

Thatenluſt in ihm erwacht, ſo iſt das auch bald geſchehen. Nun trifft es ſich obendrein, daß über irgend einen Chargirten ein Unglück gekommen iſt, ſo eine Verbannung, wie ſie der gefühlloſe Senat unter dem Namen von Conſilium oder Relegation auszuſprechen pflegt (für die letztere wird ſogar ein eigenes Patent ausgeſtellt); einſtimmig wird er an deſſen Stelle gewählt. Geſchmeichelt und dankbar nimmt er es an; es iſt jetzt gerade eine bedenkliche Zeit für die Pommeranzenfarbigroſenrothweißen, denn die Coquelicothimmelblauroſenrothen haben ſich mit den Ponceaulillagoldenen zuſammen gethan, um ſie nicht aufkommen zu laſſen, und obendrein hat der Senat einen Zahn auf ſie, weil ſie die eigentlichen Stimmführer geweſen ſein ſollen bei einem nächtlichen Fenſterbier, mit dem der abgegangene Rector wider ſeinen Willen zu nächtlich-ſpäter Stunde tractirt wurde. Jetzt gilt es hier alſo, wie einſt Octavio Piccolomini, ein eben ſo feiner diplomatiſcher Fuchs als tapferer Krieger zu ſein und das iſt es, was unſeren neuen Würdenträger ganz beſonders reizt. Durch ſchlaue Verhandlungen, eingedenk der alten Maxime: Divide et impera, weiß er Uneinigkeit unter die Coquelicothimmelblauroſenrothen und die Ponceaulillagoldenen zu werfen, und die Broncefarbenſilbergraugrasgrünen dahin zu bringen, ſich paſſiv zu verhalten. Dadurch iſt ſchon ein Großes gewonnen, denn ſeine Couleur hat es jetzt nur mit jener feindlichen Couleur allein zu thun. Nach den üblichen Präliminarien wird nun der Krieg erklärt, es kommt zum Kampf; heiß und blutig geht es zu; mit Schiller kann man ausrufen:

Ein Schlachten war's und keine Schlacht zu nennen.

Selbſt kämpfend oder als Sekundant hat unſer Held Außerordentliches geleiſtet. Seine Farbe trägt den Sieg davon; es kommt zum Waffenſtillſtand, zu Friedensunterhandlungen. Endlich wird der ewige Frieden geſchloſſen, der, wie alle ewigen Frieden, wirklich ewig, bis zum nächſten Kriege nämlich, währt. Aber, wehe, der Senat hat davon Kunde erhalten, ſolche Bürgerkriege drohen der ganzen akademiſchen Republik Untergang; er kann ſie unmöglich dulden. Da er aber doch nicht wohl eine ganze Völkerſchaft ausrotten darf, ſo hält man ſich an die Häuptlinge. Unſer Held iſt reich an Liſt und entwickelt vor dem Inquirenten diplomatiſche Talente, die einem Talleyrand, und eine Beredſamkeit, die einem Pitt, Fox, Manuel und Foy keine Schande gemacht haben würden. — Aber es hilft ihm Nichts, gerade dadurch trifft ihn das Schickſal am Erſten. Er wird exilirt, und muß Gott danken, daß es noch in der glimpflichſten Form geſchieht. Vor Sonnenuntergang muß er Stadt und Weichbild der Univerſität verlaſſen haben. —

Wehe! was iſt aus ſeinen guten Vorſätzen, aus ſeinem Fleiß geworden? Das Schickſal, das unerbittliche, hat ihn ereilt. — Und was würden erſt Papa und Mama ſagen, wenn ſie es erführen. Glücklicher Weiſe iſt die Ferienzeit nahe, er kann ſich alſo bei einem alten Univerſitätsfreunde in der Nähe, der ſchon Philiſter iſt, ſo lange aufhalten, und dann zu rechter Zeit zu Hauſe oder auf irgend einer anderen Univerſität eintreffen, ohne daß die Lieben daheim etwas davon merken.

Zwar brummen noch häßliche Bären, aber ſeine dankbare Couleur tritt vor den Riß und die enthuſiaſtiſch für ihn ſchwärmenden Füchſe leiſten Bürgſchaft. Am Nachmittage muß er fort. Da kommen, als die bange Abſchiedsſtunde ſchlägt, vor der Kneipe, wo er zum letzten Mal mit den Seinen ſpeiſte, die verſchiedenſten Arten von Wagen gerollet. Zuerſt eine ſtattliche offene Chaiſe mit vier oder gar ſechs Extrapoſtpferden davor und zwei blaſenden Poſtillions, dann noch alle anderen Sorten von Fuhrwerken, von der zwölfſitzigen Blamage an bis zur einſpännigen Droſchke herab; zwiſchen dieſen tummeln ſich kühne Reiter im ſchönſten Burſchenwichs auf herrlichen — nein, das kann man eben nicht ſagen — lieber ohne alle Epitheta — alſo auf Philiſtergäulen. Die dankbare Couleur giebt nämlich dem theuern Freunde ein glänzendes Comitat, d. h. ſie begleitet ihn bis zur nächſten Station mit dieſer Pracht. Wie er dann weiter kommt, ob im beſcheidenen Einſpänner oder gar auf Apoſtelroſſen, das Ränzchen auf dem Rücken, das überläßt ſie ganz ſeinem Geſchmack. Er ſteigt in die Prachtkaroſſe; zu ihm ſetzen ſich die Würdenträger, ſonſt Niemand; die Uebrigen, denen ſich noch viele flotte Burſchen anderer Farben zugeſellt haben, theilen ſich in die anderen Wagen, je nachdem die Finanzen es erlauben, und daher etwas ungleich, ſo daß in einem engen Einſpänner vielleicht fünf oder ſechs und in einer breiten Chaiſe dagegen zwei Studioſen ſitzen. Die Poſtillione blaſen, die Pferde ziehen an, und wie Bürger ſingt:

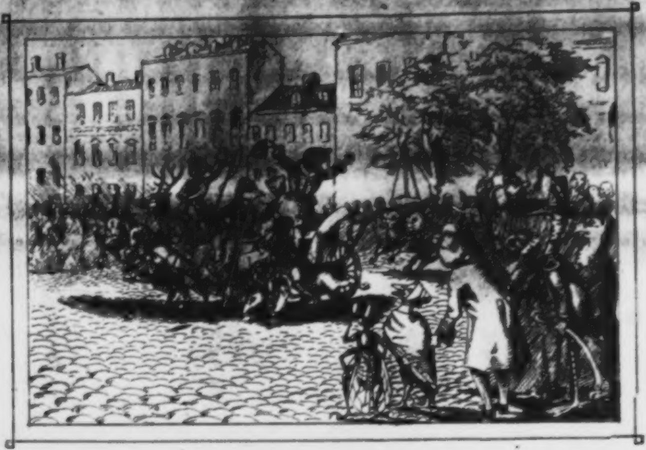
Hurre, hurre, hopp, hopp, hopp.
Geht's fort in raſendem Galopp,
Daß Roß und Reiter ſchnoben
Und Kies und Funken ſtoben.

Erſt wird durch die Hauptſtraßen der Stadt oder um die Promenade gefahren, ehe es zum Thore hinaus geht. Aus allen Wagen erſchallt nun das Weihelied, das den trefflichen Guſtav Schwab zum Verfaſſer haben ſoll:

Bemooſter Burſche zieh' ich aus!

Bei dem Carcer vorbei fahrend, wird der Vers:

Auch Du mit Deinem Giebeldach,
Ade!
Schauſt mir umſonſt, o Carcer! nach;
Ade!
Für ſchlechte Herberg Tag und Nacht
Sei Dir ein Pereat gebracht!
Ade! Ade! Ade!



Univ. Bibl.
München

ganz beſonders feierlich geſungen. Betrübt ſchauen einige Haupthähne, die um derſelben Sache willen ein Quartier dort beziehen mußten, auf die bunte Escorte hinab. Nun geht es zum Thor hinaus nach der nächſten Station, hier wird denn noch weidlich commerſirt; ob aber Eris nicht einige Aepfel hinein wirft, die mehr als einen trojaniſchen Krieg zur Folge haben, dafür iſt nicht zu ſtehen. Spät am Abend kehrt denn die ganze Cavalcade mit Ausnahme des Exilirten zurück, und wirft gelegentlich irgendwo die Fenſter ein. Man hat auch Beiſpiele, daß der Verbannte am hellen Tage mit blaſenden Poſtillions vor aller Welt aus der Stadt fuhr und ſich am Abend mit der Menge wieder hineinſchlich und noch einige Tage dort blieb, namentlich wenn es an Reiſegeld fehlte. Daß er mit dem, was die glänzende Begleitung koſtete, bis nach Conſtantinopel hätte kommen können, das fällt Niemandem ein und ihm ſelbſt am Wenigſten. Für die ſtillen Freuden hat überhaupt der Student ſelten Geld, für die lauten aber ohne Ausnahme immer, das ſteckt nun einmal im Studentenblut.

So iſt denn unſer Held wieder bei einem Stufenjahr angelangt. Jetzt in der Einſamkeit hat er Gelegenheit, über ſich nachzudenken; denn gar oft muß er auf einem ſtillen Dorfe verweilen, wie ein Schiff, das während der Ebbe auf eine Sandbank gerieth, die Fluth erwarten muß, um wieder flott zu werden. Die Betrachtungen, die er dann anſtellt, ſind zwar moraliſch, aber nicht angenehm. Er geht nun in ſich und gelobt ſich ſelbſt, allen Göttern und Papa und Mama, ſich zu beſſern und ein ſolides Haus zu werden; um ſo mehr als er, wie man ſagt, mit einem blauen Auge davon gekommen iſt, denn es hätte noch viel ſchlimmer, und er durch Senats- und Schickſalsſchluß gezwungen werden können, die Tage bis zum gänzlichen Aufhören der Vorleſungen und ſeiner nothgedrungenen Entfernung von der Univerſität auf dem Carcer zubringen zu müſſen.

Wir wollen aber den geneigten Leſer nicht mit ſeinen Monologen ermüden, da derſelbe mit einiger Phantaſie, wenn nicht gar mit einigem Gedächtniß, ſich ſelbſt in des armen Verbannten Lage hinein träumen kann. Wir ſpringen ſogar über die künſtlichen und natürlichen Ferien, die unſerem Freunde zu Theil wurden, und ihm ſehr lang vorkamen, mit gleichen Füßen hinüber und wie ein geſchickter Trampolinſpringer ſogleich hinein in ſechſte Unterabtheilung.

Des vierten Kapitels

Der Student im Greiſenalter oder das bemooſte Haupt.

I.

And then, the justice
In fair round belly, with good capon lin'd,
With eyes severe and beard of formal cut,
Full of wise saws and modern instances,
And so he plays his part.
Shakespeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

Dann, das bemooſte Haupt
Mit ſtarkem Schnauzbart, den es wohl gepflegt,
Doch ſonſt philiſterhaft, und ohne Farben,
Voll überfließender Gelehrſamkeit;
Denn ſo wird jetzt gedacht.
Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Wir müſſen dieſe Unterabtheilung, um der Gründlichkeit zu genügen, welcher wir uns bei dieſem wichtigen Werke unermüdlich befleißigten, in drei Unterunterabtheilungen wiederum zerfallen laſſen, denn das Leben eines bemooſten Hauptes zerfällt in drei Zeitabſchnitte, die ſich durch ihren Inhalt ſtreng von einander unterſcheiden und abſondern. Wollten wir dieſelben zuſammenfaſſen, ſo würde zweifelsohne der nicht eingeweihte Leſer, für den wir vorzüglich dieſe Naturgeſchichte verfaſſen, leicht in eine Verwirrung der Begriffe gerathen, welche zu entwickeln und aufzuhellen ſchier unmöglich ſein möchte. Dieſem aber kommen wir durch unſere genauen und ſcharfſinnigen Diſtinctionen zuvor und ſind daher im Voraus ſeines Dankes gewiß.

Unſer Freund hat nun das letzte Stufenjahr ſeines akademiſchen Lebens erreicht; er iſt ein altes Haus geworden, ein bemooſtes Haupt. Die Stürme, die ihn umbrauſten, haben einen Schmuck ſeiner Jugend nach dem anderen von ihm geſtreift; nur der ſorgſam gepflegte Schnurrbart und eine ruhmvolle Narbe auf ſeinem Antlitz, die erſtarrte Zeugin ſeiner Weltgeſchichte, wenn nicht gar mehrere, künden noch von dem Glanz vergangener Tage. Wir finden ihn auf der Landesuniverſität wieder, die ihn nicht ohne Kampf aufnahm. Er ſteht allein. Mit verſchränkten Armen, wie einſt Napoleon auf St. Helena, blickt er über das Meer nach dem Lande ſeiner ſchönſten Träume. Wo ſind die Genoſſen ſeiner Jugend? Fern, ach fern im Philiſterium. Rings umher bewegt ſich ein anderes Geſchlecht, das ihm fremd bleiben muß fortan. Die unerbittliche Nemeſis hat ihn erfaßt; drohend zeigt ſie ihm das Examen in bangen Träumen; er wagt wachend nicht einmal mehr irgendwo feſt aufzutreten, er, der ſonſt ſo keck einherſchritt, wenn auch nicht mit klingender Münze, doch mit klingenden Sporen, — denn die Furcht vor dem Durchfallen hat ſich in ſeiner Seele feſtgeniſtet, wie ein Kobold in einem Bauernhauſe. Ach, jetzt geht es ihm erſt recht wie dem Schüler im Fauſt: Zwar weiß er viel, doch möcht' er Alles wiſſen — wenn auch nur ſo lange, wie das leidige Examen dauert. Bis er examinirt worden, geht er exanimirt herum, denn in ſeinem Wiſſen ſind ſo unendliche Lücken. Und was hat er nicht alles zu thun, um dieſe auszufüllen! Erſt müſſen die nicht teſtirten, wenn auch ſchon früher einmal, vielleicht per Schwanz gehörten Collegia gehört, wenigſtens belegt werden; außerdem wird repetirt, daß einem die Haare zu Berge ſtehen, bei Profeſſoren oder jungen Docenten, die ſich eben dadurch ihren Weg bahnen und ihn unermüdlich einpauken, oder mit Commilitonen, die ſelbſt in ähnlichen Nöthen ſind. Von burſchikoſen Dingen will er gar nichts mehr wiſſen; er iſt im vorletzten Semeſter. Dagegen häuft ſich eine unendliche Gelehrſamkeit in ihm auf, die von Tage zu Tage wächſt und der er freien Lauf läßt, wo er nur kann, um ſie eben dadurch bereichert wieder in ihr eigentliches Bett zurück zu leiten. Aller Dilettantismus, mit dem er früher in der Wiſſenſchaft umherfuhr, iſt ihm jetzt ein Gräuel; alle Spekulation aber auch; nur poſitives Wiſſen will er, gutes, geſundes, viereckiges, abgepaßtes, das man dem Cerberus von Examinator gleich in den Rachen ſchieben kann und ihm denſelben vollkommen damit ſtopfen. Wo er nur kann, knüpft er ein wiſſenſchaftliches Geſpräch an; er erſtaunt ſelbſt über die Maſſe der Kenntniſſe, die er binnen ſo kurzer Zeit in ſeinem Hirne aufgeſpeichert, aber ſo viel er auch weiß, es genügt ihm noch immer nicht, denn der Lücken ach! ſind, wie geſagt, ſo viele und die Zeit, ſie auszufüllen, iſt ſo kurz. Allen Freuden des Lebens hat er entſagt; nichts gönnt er ſich, nicht einmal den wohlthätigen Schlaf, dieſen Ernährer der Menſchheit, den Balſam des Lebens; er möchte ihn morden, wie Macbeth und wendet die künſtlichſten Mittel an, ihn zu vertreiben. So wird er immer müder, und immer näher rückt die Zeit. Auch dies Semeſter geht zu Ende, die Ferien kommen; er gönnt ſich keine Zerſtreuung, er bleibt, als habe er Stadtarreſt und ochſt. Eintönig ziehen ſie vorüber, nebelgrau. Eine wichtige Handlung aber beſchloß ſie. Er hat ſich zum Examen gemeldet und arbeitet nun an den Proberelationen, den aufgegebenen Abhandlungen oder der Diſſertation. Alle möglichen Bücher ſchleppt er zuſammen; von Herodes zu Pilatus läuft er, um Winke, Notizen, Nachweiſungen zu erbeuten. Immer glaubt er, nicht genug zu haben. Er wird bleich, hager, mager dabei; ſeine Freunde entſetzen ſich vor ihm, ſeine Braut, wenn er eine erſt oder noch hat, grämt ſich. — Ihm gilt das Alles Nichts. Das Geſpenſt: Examen — dräut unaufhörlich. — Nur eine Revolution oder der Welt Untergang könnten ihn retten. — Um ein Demagoge zu werden, dazu hat er aber doch, nach ſeiner

Meinung, zu viel gelernt, und die Welt hat noch gar keine Luſt, unterzugehen. So bleibt ihm denn Nichts übrig, als unter Angſt und Zagen an die Abfaſſung der nothwendigen ſchriftlichen Arbeiten für das Examen zu gehen.

II.

The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipper'd pantaloon
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side;
His youthful hose well saved a world too wide
For his shrunk shank, and his big manly voice
Turning again towards childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound.

Shakespeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

Das letzte Halbjahr
Zieht aus den Burſchen, den Philiſter an;
Die Brille auf der Naſe, runder Hut,
Statt eines Flausrocks ein moderner Schniepel;
Die burſchikoſe Rede, die ihm ſonſt
So flott vom Munde floß, verwandelt jetzt:
In Complimente ſich, gar wohl gedrechſelt,
Doch nur mit halber Stimme.

Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Die Probearbeiten ſind eingeliefert, die Zeugniſſe geſammelt, die erſte Hälfte des letzten Semeſters iſt dahin. Nur noch einige Wochen, und die verhängnißvolle Stunde iſt da. Er benutzt jetzt jeden Augenblick, um alles Verſäumte einzuholen und ſeine Rechnung — nicht mit dem Himmel, denn dies Conto-courant wird von den Examinatoren ausgefertigt, ſondern mit den Univerſitäts-

Studien und der Univerſitätsſtadt zu ſchließen. Wie vorſichtig iſt er geworden! Er übt ſich nicht bloß auf die Staatsprüfung, ſondern auch auf das Philiſterium ein, damit auch nicht der kleinſte Zipfel der Burſchikoſität zur unrechten Zeit hervorgucke und den pedantiſchen Mitgliedern der Prüfungscommiſſion, in deren Händen ſein Wohl und Wehe liegt, Anſtoß und Aergerniß gebe. Ach, was iſt aus ihm geworden! Er, ſonſt ein Haupthahn, iſt jetzt ein obſkurer Mann, der müd' und matt einherſchleicht wie Adam nach dem Falle; er kann es noch erleben, daß ihn ein kraſſer Fuchs anrempelt, ſo wenig zeigt ſich im Aeußeren ſeine alte Herrlichkeit, oder daß ein Philiſter Beſchlag legt auf ſein unumgänglich nothwendiges Abgangszeugniß, kurz, daß Niemand mehr vor ihm zittert. Ach wie ſchön, ſagt Matthiſſon, in ſeiner tief empfindſamen Elegie:

So vergehn des Lebens Herrlichkeiten,
So entfleucht das Traumbild eitler Macht;
So verſinkt im ſchnellen Lauf der Zeiten,
Was die Erde trägt in öde Nacht.

Ja wohl, ja wohl —

Hoheit, Ehre, Macht und Ruhm ſind eitel —
Eines flotten Burſchen ſtolze Scheitel
Beugt, eh wenig Jahre noch herum,
Trüb und matt das Philiſterium.

Univ. Bibl.
München

III.

Last scene of all
That ends this strange eventful history
Is second childishness and mere oblivion
Sans teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans every thing.
Shakspeare, As you like it, A. II. Sc. 7.

Die letzte Scene,
Die dieſes thatenreiche Schauſpiel endet,
Iſt zweite Maulthierzeit, noch ſchrecklicher;
Ganz ohne Hieber, Schnurrbart, Pfeife, Sporen.
Nach Schlegel und Tieck's Ueberſetzung.

Es iſt vorbei. — Alles auf der Univerſität ſo gut wie möglich geordnet; die Philiſter ſind mit ihren Bären, wenn auch nicht bezahlt, doch beruhigt. Der Schnurrbart ward unter Thränen wegraſirt; von den Freunden iſt Abſchied genommen, die weinende Braut getröſtet. In aller Stille reiſt er ab; kein Comitat wird ihm zu Theil, nur ein einzelner, treuer Bundesbruder aus alten Tagen, der ſich ſelbſt auch ſchon das Meſſer an das Kinn geſetzt hat, weil ihm ebenfalls das Meſſer an der Kehle ſitzt, begleitet ihn zum Poſtwagen oder bis an das nächſte Dorf. — Wehmüthig wird die Pfeife geſtopft, wehmüthig angebrannt. Noch ein Blick auf die Univerſitätsſtadt, noch ein Händedruck, ein Kuß, und fort geht es — in das Philiſterthum. —

Das iſt das Loos des Schönen auf der Erde! —

Fünftes Kapitel.

Vom Staatsweſen der Studenten.

Im Naturzuſtande kann es kein Menſch lange aushalten, wenn er nicht leben will wie das Thier des Waldes und der Vogel in der Luft. Ja ſelbſt dieſe, die unvernünftigen Beſtien, wenden ſich bei etwas höherem Inſtinkt gleich einem geordneten geſellſchaftlichen Zuſtande zu. Kann man eine beſſere abſolute Monarchie finden, als die der Bienen, wo das ganze Volk ſeiner Königin unbedingt folgt und der hohe Adel, die Drohnen, weiter Nichts zu thun hat, als ſich füttern zu laſſen und Kinder zu zeugen, während der gemeine Plebs mühſam den Honig in die Schatzkammern ſchleppt? Giebt es auf Erden vortrefflichere Republiken, als die der Ameiſen, unter denen die Termiten ſogar feſte Schlöſſer bauen, in welchen das ganze Volk einträchtiglich beiſammen wohnt? Können die Colonieen der Biber nicht allen Auswanderern nach Nordamerika als Muſter dienen? — Und nun wundere man ſich noch, daß der deutſche Studioſus nicht wie ein Wilder oder ein Trapper einſam und allein in den Wäldern deutſcher Univerſitäten hauſen mag, ſondern ſogar häufig, ohne zuvor Rouſſeau's Contrat social und Zachariä's vierzig Bücher vom Staate geleſen zu haben, ſich mit ſeinen Genoſſen alsbald verbündet, einen Staat, das Muſter eines Staates, zu gründen, und in geregelter bürgerlich geſellſchaftlicher Ordnung mit einander zu leben.

Es giebt nur zwei Arten von Studentenſtaaten: die Bierſtaaten und die Witzſtaaten; die letzteren ſind eigentlich eine Abart der erſteren; bei den erſteren iſt das Bier der geſetzgebende Körper, bei den letzteren aber wird halb Bier und halb Witz genommen. Ob nun der Witz das Bier oder das Bier den Witz mildert, will ich nicht unterſuchen; meine Kenntniſſe in der Chemie ſind zu unbedeutend, um die Scheidung vorzunehmen, und ich bedürfte vielleicht einer größeren Voltaiſchen Säule dazu, als ſie einſt Humphrey Davies aus den Silbertellern der engliſchen Tories baute. — Betrachten wir lieber die Dinge, wie ſie ſind, ohne uns auf irgend eine Zerſetzung einzulaſſen, die bekanntlich der Witz am Wenigſten verträgt.

Alter König Gambrinus! Du Spiegel aller Monarchen! Welche ſeligen Träume mußt Du gehabt haben, nachdem Du das Bier erfunden! Noah iſt Nichts gegen Dich! Er pflanzte die Rebe und preßte den Saft der Trauben aus, nämlich aus purer Faulheit, damit er beſagten Saft in großen Zügen ſchlucken könnte und nicht nöthig hätte, die Beeren einzeln aufzubeißen, was immer ſtumpfe Zähne macht. Natürlich trank er den ſüßen, ſchäumenden Moſt mit großem Wohlbehagen und das Bißchen, was er übrig ließ, gerieth von ſelbſt in Gährung und als es ausgegohren hatte, war es Wein. Das iſt keine große Kunſt, die Natur walten zu laſſen und nachher bei der dummen Nachwelt als Erfinder zu gelten. Du aber, edler Fürſt, Du mußteſt weiſe Hopfen und Malz combiniren, um nicht durch ein falſches Verhältniß Hopfen und Malz zu verlieren. Du mußteſt das Feuer Dir dienſtbar machen und das Waſſer. Und wenn Du nun Alles weiſe vorbereitet, geprüft, gewogen, abgemeſſen und gemiſcht, konnte doch noch ein tückiſches Schickſal Dein Gebräude umſchlagen machen, ſo daß es Niemand zu genießen vermochte, während Wein immer Wein iſt, und es ſtets viele Menſchen giebt, die auch den ſauerſten Krätzer mit einer wahren Todesverachtung in die Kehle gießen, wenn ſie nur ſelbſtgefällig ſich in die Bruſt werfen und ſich und ihren Nachbarn ſagen können: Ich habe Wein getrunken. Das beruht auf dem Aberglauben, als ſei der Wein etwas Vornehmes; und wer ſich etwas Vornehmem aſſimilire, werde ſelber vornehm. Darum laufen auch ſo viele

Leute dem Adel nach und hängen ſich ihm ſo gern an, Leute, die für ſich und den hohen Adel den Wein zu bezahlen vermögen und nicht arm davon werden, und die es doch kitzelt, zu ihren Genoſſen ſagen zu können: Ich habe Wein getrunken.

Aber kommen wir wieder auf Deine Träume zurück, guter bierſeliger Gambrin! Wenn Dir auf irgend einer dürren Haide, gleichviel, ob im Traum oder in der Wirklichkeit, Hexen einen Spiegel vorhielten, ſo mußt Du weit mehr Fürſten darin geſehen haben, als weiland Macbeth in der dunklen Höhle der Schickſalsſchweſtern erblickte, da ihm die gekrönten Nachkommen Banquo's, von welchen Mehrere doppelte Reichsapfel und dreifache Scepter trugen, gezeigt wurden. — Und was für Fürſten! Ganz Andere als die ſind, die der Tyrann beſchreibt; Fürſten, die nicht ſo unwiſſend waren, wie man ſie ſich gewöhnlich denkt. — Nein, Fürſten, die Medicin oder Theologie, Jurisprudenz oder Philoſophie zu ſtudiren ſich bemühten; Fürſten ohne Fürſtenthum und Geld, ja oft mit großen Staatsſchulden belaſtet, und die doch oft glücklich und noch öfter ſelig waren, und welche die Kronen nicht drückten und Scepter nicht beläſtigten: Fürſten, die eine Fee mit einem Talisman begabt hatte, durch welchen ſie ihr Reich in Frieden, Flor und Freude unwandelbar erhielten. Dieſer Talisman aber war Nichts Anderes, als Deine herrliche

Erfindung, großer Monarch! — das Bier. Es machte zum Fürſten und es erhielt den Fürſten auf ſeinem Thron. Nirgends konnte der berühmte Vers des franzöſiſchen Tragikers:

Le premier qui fut roi fut un soldat heureux.

ſo treffend angewandt werden und parodirt als hier: Le premier qui fut roi fut un buveur heureux. Deutſche Studenten kamen zuſammen, um aus lauter echtem Deutſchthum, wie einſt ihre Väter in Walhalla, Bier, zwar nicht aus den Schädeln ihrer Feinde, doch aber aus großen Krügen oder Birkenmeiern, die wohl noch viel mehr faßten, als ſo ein lumpiger Römerſchädel, zu trinken. Sie wußten aus dem Tacitus, daß ihre Ahnen unſterbliche und unüberwindliche Bierſtoffvertilger geweſen waren, und wetteiferten mit einander, es dieſen gleich zu thun. Bald ſah man, wer das größte Talent hatte, um den meiſten Biergeiſt in ſich aufzunehmen, und wie bei der Jugend immer der Fähigſte auch zugleich der Herrſchende iſt, ſo wurde auch hier der Fähigſte im Biertrinken als princeps, Fürſt, begrüßt. Die Anderen erhielten Aemter, je nach ihren Verdienſten und Leiſtungen, und ſo ward aus innerem Bedürfniß geſellſchaftlicher Ordnung ſchnell ein Staat, und zwar ein ſehr geordneter, daraus. Der beſte Biertrinker nach dem Fürſten ward Kronprinz, dann kamen die Miniſter, der Erzbiſchof, der Kanzler und ſo weiter bis auf den Hofpoeten und Hofzeitungsſchreiber hinab. Obendrein war das Reich kein erbliches, ja nicht einmal auf Lebens-, d. h. auf Studienzeit, verliehen. Der Fürſt konnte vom Thron getrunken werden; auch der Gemeinſte vermochte ſich auf die höchſten Stufen im Staate zu ſchwingen; ein einziger Krug mehr gab die Oberherrſchaft über Alle, und ſo heiß auch gekämpft, ſo viele Lanzen auch gebrochen wurden, es floß dabei kein anderes Blut, als das des theuern Hans Gerſtenkorn, den der treffliche Schotte Burns ſo ſchön beſungen hat.

B

Univ. Bibl.
München

Dieſer Staaten wurden bald mehrere; wo deutſche Univerſitäten exiſtirten, da bildeten ſie ſich ſchnell und bekriegten ſich oder ſchloſſen Bündniſſe mit einander. Der berühmteſte war wohl das Fürſtenthum Lichtenhain bei Jena, deſſen Fürſten Tus XXXVII. der edle Karl Auguſt von Weimar, ſogar in freundlicher Laune, als einen regierenden Fürſten anerkannte. Dieſer Fürſt von Lichtenhain wurde nämlich einmal auf Wilddieberei ertappt und ihm von dem Revierjäger die Büchſe genommen. — „Wie kann er ſich das unterſtehen", fuhr er denſelben an — „weiß er, wer ich bin?" — „Nein!" war die Antwort. — „Ich bin der Fürſt Tus XXXVII. von Lichtenhain", hieß es nun. — Verdutzt gab ihm der Jäger die Büchſe wieder, in der Meinung, irgend einen wirklichen kleinen Fürſten vor ſich zu haben, meldete aber doch die Begebenheit pflichtſchuldigſt höheren Ortes. — Da ſendete der hochſelige Großherzog von Weimar, dem der kecke Streich gefallen hatte, einen Leibhuſaren an jenen Studenten und Fürſten und ließ ihm ſagen: „Eine Empfehlung vom Herrn Großherzog an Seine Liebden, den Fürſten Tus XXXVII. von Lichtenhain. Sereniſſimus hätten beſchloſſen, künftig nur auf ihrem Reviere zu birſchen und bäten, daß der Herr Fürſt auch auf dem Ihnen eigenthümlichen Revier blieben, wenn Sie wieder zu jagen geruhten.“ — In der langen Herrſcherreihe dieſer Fürſten brachte es einer der Monarchen ſogar bis zu dem Quantum von 18 Stübchen Bier an einem und demſelben Hof- und Gallatage, wie die Sage meldet. Aber auch Ihr Fürſtenthümer, gefürſtete Abteien, ja ſelbſt Kaiſerreiche von Ziegenhain, Waſſendorf, und Du herrliche von dem Humoriſten Kobbe geſtiftete Cereviſia von Heidelberg werdet noch in gutem Andenken bei Manchem leben und in der Erinnerung noch oft gefeiert werden!

Das Bier war aber zu ſtark, um in ſolchen Maſſen ohne dauernden Schaden verſchlungen zu werden; es untergrub zu Vielen die Geſundheit, und mancher hoffnungsvolle Fürſt und hoffnungsloſe Miniſter ſank durch ſeine Heldenthaten nach einem kurzen ſiechen Leben in ein frühes Grab. Ich meine das nicht figürlich, ſondern könnte aus meiner eigenen Erfahrung manchen ſeiner Zeit reichbegabten Studenten nennen, der ſich im buchſtäblichſten Sinne des Wortes in Bier zu Tode ſoff. — Da beſchloß man denn den Trank zu verdünnen und ihm doch das Angenehme zu erhalten, aber nicht mit ſchaalem Waſſer, ſondern mit leicht ſprudelndem Witz. Aus den Bierſtaaten wurden Witzſtaaten; man hielt Hoftag mit der größten Feierlichkeit, fremde Geſandten hatten Audienz. Verräther wurden in die Bieracht erklärt; die Hofzeitung ſchilderte die Feierlichkeiten ausführlich, Orden wurden verliehen und Titel verſpendet und was dergleichen wichtige diplomatiſche Verhandlungen mehr waren. Zwar blieb das Bier auch hier noch der Bindepunkt, aber der Bierſtange hielt fortan der Witz die Stange, und das unmäßige Trinken, das in den alten Bierſtaaten bis zum viehiſchen Saufen war geſteigert worden, nahm ein Ende. Allmälig ſind auch die Witzſtaaten nach und nach eingegangen, wie überhaupt Alles auf Erden ein Ende nimmt, und nur einige wenige exiſtiren noch hie und da, aber ohne den alten Glanz und die alte Pracht.

Daß die Studenten noch andere Staaten im Staate gehabt haben, davon weiß ich Nichts, obwohl ich mich lange auf Univerſitäten aufgehalten. Ich glaube, Alles, was man davon redet und noch obendrein mit dem übelriechenden Namen verbotene Verbindungen belegt, war nur ein trüber Traum, der längſt ausgeträumt wurde. Im alten Griechenland mag das geweſen ſein, als die Akademieen noch in ihrer vollen Blüthe ſtanden, und man bei Sokrates Naturrecht und bei Plato Politik hören konnte, wenigſtens deutet ein neuerlichſt von einem gelehrten Baiern auf der Akropolis gefundenes Fragment von einem alten kykliſchen Dichter darauf hin: in Deutſchland fand dergleichen aber gewiß nie oder höchſtens nur vor langen, langen Jahren, zur Zeit des verrufenen Pennalismus, Statt. — Damit man jene und dieſe Verhältniſſe vergleichen könne, laſſe ich beſagtes Bruchſtück in einer wortgetreuen Ueberſetzung folgen: die Lücken durch kühne Conjecturen zu ergänzen, habe ich aber nicht gewagt: der Schatten meines Cenſors lagert ſich drohend über das Papier und — ich ſchweige. Daß da viel Bedeutendes zu ſuppliren ſei, daran zweiſle ich nicht; wer weiß, ob der alte Dichter die Lacunen nicht abſichtlich und vorſichtig ſelbſt gemacht habe, — auch aus Furcht vor ſeinem Cenſor? Einen Scholiaſten dazu, der uns darüber belehren könne, hat man bis jetzt noch nicht entdeckt: es möge alſo dem Scharfſinn der Archäologen, Philologen und Hiſtoriker überlaſſen bleiben, denen ich es hiermit feierlichſt übergebe; mir ſelbſt iſt Vieles darin unverſtändlich geblieben. Alſo lautet es —

Die Mythe von den Somaten und der Helikia.

Fragment aus einem neu entdeckten Kykliker.

Muſe! Tochter des Himmels, erwecke vergangener Zeiten
Angedenken in mir und allen verwandten Gemüthern,
Daß ich würdig des hohen Berufes, zu dem ich die Lyra
Stimmte, ſobald ich den Göttern geziemendes Opfer bereitet,
Nun Unſterbliches ſinge von Tagen der älteſten Vorwelt!
Aus dem Kriege kamen ſie heim und wandten ſich wieder
Zu des Friedens-Geſchäft, des völkerbeglückenden, ſelig
Im Bewußtſein gelungener That und rühmlichen Strebens.
Dieſer kehrte zum nährenden Pflug, ein Andrer zum Webſtuhl,
Jener zu fremdem Geſchäft, dem er ſchon früher ſich weihte,
Als er verließ die Stätte des Friedens und griff zu dem
Schwerte,
Daß er in dichtgeſchaareten Reihen mit Tauſenden ziehend
Helfe den Sieg erringen dem Fürſten, der wackere Bürger.
Alle waren beglückt und harrten ſelig der Tage,
Wo erfüllen ſich würde die Hoffnung', die ſie im Buſen
Voll Vertrauen genährt. — Ach, anders wandt' es das Schickſal!
Jene, die in den Schulen zu Füßen der Lehrer geſeſſen,
Daß ſie der Weisheit Wort aus erfahrenem Munde vernähmen,
Doch als dem Lande gedroht des Feindes ſchimpfliche Willkür,
Der Geſetz und Ordnung Nichts und die Ehre nur wenig
Galt, ſich gleich gerüſtet, die kräftigen Lenden zu gürten

Mit dem Schwert und zu führen den Speer zum Beſten des Herrſchers,
Der dem Tyrannenjoch mit entflammtem Muthe getrotzet,
Waren wiedergekehrt wie Alle; ſie hatten im Tempel,
Wo die lautere Milch der Weisheit Brüſten entquillet,
Sich von Neuem geſellt, ſowohl des Aſklepios Jünger
Wie die Diener der Themis und deine Schüler, Athene!
Auch die zu Prieſtern der Götter beſtimmt, geweihete Knaben. —
So im Segen des Friedens den Künſten des Friedens ſich widmend,
Lebten ſie wieder dem alten Beruf in trefflicher Weiſe,
Wie es Menſchen geziemt, die ſich dem Dienſte der Gottheit
Schon in früher Jugend beſtimmt mit heiligem Eifer.
Nenne mir, Muſe, die Länder, aus denen die Einzelnen kamen,
Alle zwar zum Volk der Hellenen im Ganzen gehörend,
Doch verſchiedenen Namens und aus verſchiedener Gegend,
So vom höchſten Norden von Thrakiens rauhen Gefilden,
Wie aus dem Peloponnes, Spartaner, oder Athener,
Selber von Ithaka, auch des Odyſſeus heimiſchem Eiland;
Auch aus Aetolien waren ſie da, ja ſelbſt aus Mycene.
Selbſt aus ferneſter Zone ſogar, von der nordiſchen Thule,
Kamen ſie willig gereiſt, am Quell des Wiſſens zu ſchöpfen,
Wenn ein begeiſterter Mann mit gewaltigem Wort es geſpendet.
Anfangs lebten ſie ſtill, ſich ſtolz der Zeiten erinnernd,
Wo ſie von Helden geführt nach unſterblichem Ruhme gerungen.
Gleiche geſellten zu Gleichen ſich gern; denn die Sitte des Landes,

Wo die beſorgte Mutter ſie in der Wiege geſchaukelt
Und verwandte Töne ſie in der Jugend begrüßten,
Band ſie feſt zuſammen, die Schaar von Brüdern und Vettern,
Oder Verbrüderten doch, zu den geſelligen Spielen,
Wie ſie die Jugend erfreun, ſei's nun das Führen der Waffen,
Sei es ein fröhlicher Tanz, ein Lied in heiterem Kreiſe
Oder was ſonſt die Menge bedarf, um ſich zu geſtalten.
Jegliche Schaar nun folgt' dem Geſetz, das in älteſten Zeiten
Einſt die Väter erdacht im Rath der weiſeſten Männer,
Und auf die Enkel vererbt von einem Geſchlechte zum andern,
Das, wenn zwei Mal die Sonne, die Allbelebende, ihren
Kreislauf um die Erde gemacht, zu erneuen ſich pflegte.
Aber den Einzelnen erſt und bald auch der größeren Menge
Schien's, als ſei veraltet der Brauch und entfremdet dem Tage.
Selten gilt ein Geſetz noch ganz bei dem dritten Geſchlechte,
Wankelmüthig ſind ja die Menſchen, und keiner der Götter
Hat hienieden ſo viel wie Themis zu ſchlichten und ordnen.
Feindlich traten ſich bald die einzelnen Schaaren entgegen,
Denn das Geſetz und der Brauch und deſſen mögliche Deutung
War ein Apfel der Eris, den mit willigen Händen
Unter die Menge ſie ſchleudert, in Luſt, die tückiſche Göttin.
Viele hingen am Wort, wie es die Väter geſprochen,
Streng daſſelbe bewahrend und jeglicher Aenderung abhold;
Andere wollten, es ſolle der Menſchheit Fortſchritt entſprechen,
Und, was veraltet, hinaus von beſſerem Neuem verdrängt ſein.
Viel der Reden wurden gewechſelt mit heftigem Eifer,
Aber ſie reichten nicht aus, und die Schwerter mußten entſcheiden;

Doch es ſchwankte der Sieg und eilte von einem zum Andern,
Heute dieſen beglückend und Morgen Jenen erhebend,
Daß, wie auch tobte der Kampf, ſich nimmer geſtaltet' Entſcheidung
Und von Neuem des Worts gewaltige Waffe ſie wählten.
Endlich ſprach ein begeiſterter Mann von ewiger Einheit:
Alle hätten ſie ja den Zweck, den hohen, des Wiſſens,
Und das Wiſſen iſt Eins wie die Welt; in tauſend Geſtalten
Immer nur Eins; wozu denn ſich in Schaaren vertheilen?
Eine Schaar allein, verbunden, im Geiſte verknüpfet,
Nur ein Band, das die Schulen im ganzen Land der Hellenen
Feſt umſchlinge, nur ein Geſetz, ein Ziel, eine Farbe!
Vielen war der Gedanke wie aus der Seele genommen.
Wie ein köſtlich Gefäß enthielt er jegliche Tugend,
Welcher der Menſch nachſtrebt, ſich von dem Thier zu entfernen
Und den Göttern zu gleichen, ſo weit es die Erde verſtattet.
Dieſe traten zuſammen zum heiligen Bunde der Schulen,
Und Helikia nannten ſie ſich, entwarfen Geſetze,
Nicht allein für die Schule zu leben und ſich zu bilden,
Nein für das Vaterland und das Wohl der heiligen Hellas,
Die, ſo wähneten ſie, nicht bloß in Tagen des Kampfes,
Sondern im Frieden noch mehr der Hülfe der Jugend bedürfe,
Sie zu befreien vom Leid, das ſchwer noch auf ihr laſte.
Alle riefen ſie auf, ſo viel helleniſche Schulen
Zählten der Jünger, ſich nun zu dem neuen Bund zu geſellen,
Der, wie des Morgens Gluth aus dunkler Nacht ſich entwickelt,
Von der Sonne Strahlen umſäumt, mit goldenem Rande.

Aber die einzelnen Schaaren, die ſich zuſammen gefunden
Und nach den Staaten ſich mit dauerndem Namen bezeichnet,
Sei es Thrakien oder Aitolien oder Mycene,
Traten feindlich ſogleich dem neuen Bunde entgegen;
Nicht für den Staat, für die Schulen allein das Leben geſtaltend,
Streng im Geſetz, doch frei mit dem Schwert und der Ehre gehorſam,
Nur die Erwählteſten ziehend zum Bund und viele der Andern,
Sich im lockern Verband zu längerer Prüfung geſellend.
Nichts vom Staate, von heiligem Bund, vom einigen Hellas
Wollten ſie wiſſen, allein vom freieren Leben der Schüler;
Jenes erſchien ein Hirngeſpinnſt, voll gaukelnder Träume;
Nur an dem Wirklichen hielten ſie feſt mit Waffen und Worten.
Darum erklärten ſie bald, es ſei die Helikia ihnen
Nichtig und wollten ſie nicht mit demſelben Rechte begaben,
Das ſie ſich einander gewährt. So waltete Eris.
Jene forderten nun, als Bund von ihnen betrachtet
Und mit demſelben Rechte begabt und geehret zu werden,
Nach der Vereinten Geſetz. Sie aber verweigerten Alles,
Beide griffen zum Schwert. — Blut floß auf jeglicher Seite,
Heftig wogte der Kampf und nimmer winkte Entſcheidung;
Jahre zogen dahin, nicht ward der Friede geſchloſſen. —
Oftmals zürnten darob die weiſen Lehrer der Schulen
Und es ſandte Manchen ihr Wort in Haft und Verbannung.
Anfangs ſchien's, als ſeien ſie mehr der Helikia günſtig
Als den Somaten, ſo nannten ſich dieſe, von Soma, dem Körper.

Denn ſie wähnten, daß Jene, mit ernſterem ſittlichen Streben
Mehr als die Andern begabt, die Blüthe der Schule befördert.
Siehe, da traf es ſich, daß heftige Gegner der Schulen
Und der inneren Freiheit, ein Erbtheil noch von den Vätern,
Sich im Volke erhoben mit mächtig tadelndem Worte.
Drob ergrimmten im Herzen gar ſehr die Helleniſchen Schüler
Und vor Allen die Jünglinge, ſo zur Helikia hielten.
Sinnend auf Rache ſteigerte ſich das Toben des Zornes
So in ihnen, daß Einer, verblendet, getrübt in der Seele,
Griff zum tödtenden Stahl und jäh den beredteſten Gegner
Sandte mit tückiſchem Stoß hinab zum dunkelen Hades,
Nicht erwägend die furchtbare That. — Zwar büßt' er es ſelber
Mit dem eigenen Blut und fiel, der Nemeſis Opfer,
Der gewaltigen Göttin, die raſtlos wandelt auf Erden. —
Aber noch größeres Leid, als er den Seinen bereitet
Und dem Weib und den Kindern des Feindes, des bitter gehaßten,
Bracht' er dadurch den Genoſſen noch in den ferneſten Zeiten.
Denn die Herrſcher und Führer des Volks, mit gerechtem Entſetzen,
Traten alsbald zuſammen und ſuchten die Wurzel des Uebels
Zu erſpähn und mit kräftiger Hand aus der Erde zu reißen;
Ach, die Helikia ſelbſt traf nun ihr mächtiger Bannſpruch,
Manches ſchon hatte vorher geweckt den lauernden Argwohn:
Sei es der Einzelnen Wort, ſei's eng Verbrüderter Rede
Bei dem Feſt, wo früher ſich ſchon die Schulen verſammelt,
Sei's die ſymboliſche That, die ſolchem Wort ſich geſellet.
Richter ſetzte ſie ein, zu forſchen, wägen und richten.

Und ſie entdeckten gar bald, daß der alten Landes-Ordnung
Umſturz drohte, daß ſich ein Bund im Bunde gebildet, —
Welcher den Fürſten und Führern der Staaten entgegen ſich ſtellte
Und der Empörung Keim mit heimlichem Eifer gepflegt.
Strenges Geſetz und — —

(Lücke im Manuſcript.)

So verſchwand allmälig das freiere Leben der Schulen,
Und ein ängſtlich Geſchlecht ſitzt nun zu den Füßen der Lehrer.
Arme Helleniſche Jugend, Du haſt die geiſtige Freiheit,
Die Athene gewährt, nicht recht zu deuten verſtanden!
Wer ſie im Leben ſuchet, der irrt; im ewigen Wiſſen
Waltet ſie ungeſtört allein — —

(Lücke im Manuſcript.)

So weit der Kykliker; es iſt ſehr zu bedauern, daß uns nur ein Bruchſtück hinterblieben. An deſſen Echtheit wird übrigens Niemand zweifeln, denn daß das Leben auf den Akademieen der alten Hellenen große Aehnlichkeit mit dem Leben und Treiben auf unſeren Univerſitäten gehabt, das muß doch Jeder ſogleich zugeſtehen, der nur etwas in den alten Autoren ſich umgeſchaut hat. Für die Laien will ich indeſſen, ganz in der Kürze, noch einige Beweiſe herſetzen. — Den Fuchscomment z. B. hatte ſchon Pythagoras eingeführt, nur dauerte die Fuchszeit in ſeiner Akademie nicht ein Jahr, ſondern ein ganzes Triennium, cf. Jamblichus de vita Pythagorae c. 17. n. 72; damals ſtudirte man freilich auch länger. Zu Athen wurde der Fuchs ſo gut gehänſelt wie in Marburg oder Roſtock, cf. Gregorii Nazianzeni Oratt. in laudem Basilii M. p. 327, edit. Lips., ferner: Balsamon ad Can. 71. Synodi VI. Trullanae. Daß in Conſtantinopel und in Berytus Aehnliches geſchehen, beweiſt uns ein Edict des Kaiſers Juſtinian, ja ſogar zu Karthago kam es vor, wie der heilige Auguſtin in ſeinen Bekenntniſſen III, 3 uns ſelbſt erzählt. —

Nun muß ich aber die Feder niederlegen, denn die Gelehrſamkeit wird Einem auf die Länge doch zu ſauer. —

Sechſtes und letztes Kapitel.

Die Doctorpromotion.

Wir haben unſeren Helden bis zum letzten Augenblicke des Studentenlebens im vorletzten Kapitel begleitet, aber den wahrhaft glorreichen Schluß deſſelben, der eigentlich allein den Studien ein Ende macht, als Nachtiſch und beſte Schüſſel aufgeſpart. Und wenn ein armer Studioſus auch das ganze Triennium ſich nicht ordentlich ſatt gegeſſen, und noch viel weniger ordentlich ſatt getrunken hat, der Tag der Doctorpromotion macht Alles wieder quitt. — Doctor! das iſt ein großer Gedanke! — Man glaubt gar nicht, was man ſich Alles bei dem Worte Doctor denken kann, was ein Doctor Alles vorzuſtellen vermag. Erſtlich: einen Studirten, den man für voll anſehen muß, das heißt für voll Gelehrſamkeit, wenn er auch kaum halb voll iſt; dann: einen Nichtſtudirten, der es noch weiter gebracht hat als ein Studirter, denn er iſt Doctor geworden ohne ſtudirt zu haben; ferner: einen Menſchen, der wenigſtens ein Mal in ſeinem Leben ſo viel Goldſtücke beiſammen hatte, daß er die Koſten der Promotion damit bezahlen konnte, und nach dem Urtheile des Decans und der übrigen Aſſeſſoren ſeiner Facultät auf eine glänzende Weiſe, d. h. durch glänzende Friedrichsd'or (Louisd'or nimmt man jetzt nur ſehr ungern, ſeitdem ſie im Cours gefallen ſind, wenigſtens läßt man ein bedeutendes Agio darauf vergüten) promovirt hat; weiter: einen Menſchen, der doch einen Henkel hat, bei dem man ihn geſellſchaftlich anfaſſen und einrangiren kann, nämlich den Doctortitel; dann noch: einen Menſchen, dem das Heirathen gar nicht ſchwer werden kann, beſonders in einer Handels- oder Provinzſtadt, weil es dort viele ſcharmante junge Mädchen giebt, die für ihr Leben gern Frau Doctorin hießen, und denen die Frau oder Madame ſchlecht weg ein Gräuel iſt (in einer Univerſitätsſtadt iſt das ſchon etwas Anderes, da ſind die Schönen nicht ſo darauf erpicht, denn ſie wiſſen, wie die Doctoren fabricirt werden, und daß es nicht ſelten Dutzendwaare oder Ausſchuß iſt; da muß wenigſtens vor dem Doctor ein Profeſſor ſein, oder doch möglichſt dahinter ſtecken, d. h. daraus werden können). Außerdem noch: einen Menſchen, der etwas iſt und doch Nichts, denn das Diplom, und wäre ſelbſt ein Examen vorhergegangen, nützt ihm Nichts; im Staate iſt er gar Nichts; wenn er nicht noch die ſogenannte Staatsprüfung beſtanden hat, kann er kein gelehrtes Handwerk ausüben, was er obendrein in vielen Ländern ſogar mit dem Staatsexamen ohne Doctortitel darf, ausgenommen da, wo die armen Univerſitätsprofeſſoren ſchlecht beſoldet ſind und die Regierung ihnen doch ein Verdienſtchen zuwenden will, das ihr ſelbſt Nichts koſtet, ja, bei dem ſie ſogar, wenn auch nur indirect, ein Erkleckliches profitirt; da beſteht denn freilich, wenigſtens für gewiſſe Fächer, der Promotionszwang, der ſich ſogar hin und wieder auf die Univerſität ſelbſt ausdehnt, bei der ein fremder Doctor Nichts gilt, ſondern erſt von ſeiner Facultät, wenn er anders zu ihr gehören will, ſich noſtrificiren (was gleichbedeutend iſt mit myſtificiren oder brandſchatzen) laſſen muß.

Nicht wahr, ſchöne Leſerin, es iſt erſtaunlich, was ein Doctor Alles, Alles, und was Alles ein Doctor ſein kann! — Ich habe bei Weitem den Gegenſtand nicht erſchöpft; ein Doctor kann z. B. auch ein Menſch ſein, der Schnaps ſchenkt, wie ich das auf einer berühmten Univerſität ſelbſt erlebt habe; in Leipzig überließ man das früher den Magiſtern. Wie es jetzt damit iſt, weiß ich nicht; es kann aber noch wohl ſo ſein, denn das Schnapsſchenken wie das Schnapstrinken gehört unter die ſieben freien Künſte, ſo viel iſt gewiß; ob in das Trivium oder in das Quadrivium, wage ich nicht zu entſcheiden und überlaſſe das den Magiſtern ſelbſt. Auf jener Univerſität gehörte es in die Medicin, wohin es auch eigentlich gehört, trotz aller Homöopathie. — Es kann ein Doctor auch ein Bierbrauer ſein, wie ich das ebenfalls in einer großen Handelsſtadt erlebt habe — kurz, ſchöne Leſerin, ich komme immer wieder auf jenen Punkt zurück, es iſt erſtaunlich, was ein Doctor Alles ſein kann, und wenn Sie noch keinen Mann haben, ſo rathe ich Ihnen, keinen Anderen als einen Doctor zu heirathen. Sie befinden ſich gewiß wohl dabei. — Aber ich wette, Sie ſind neugierig geworden, wie man denn ein Doctor wird. Ich eile, Ihre Neugier zu befriedigen, und bereite mich vor, dieſes um ſo ausführlicher zu thun, als ich erſtens dadurch vielleicht eine glückliche Ehe zwiſchen Ihnen und irgend einem Doctor ſtiften kann, was gewiß ein gottgeſegnetes Werk iſt, und zweitens mit der Doctorpromotion, als der Sahne des ganzen Studirens, dieſes mein unſterbliches Buch ſo glänzend und lehrreich wie möglich zu ſchließen gedenke.

Es giebt zwei Arten von Doctoren im Allgemeinen: ſolche, die es anweſend, und ſolche, die es abweſend werden; darunter dürfen ſie jedoch um Gottes Willen nicht geiſtesabweſend verſtehen, denn das würde eine große Verwirrung der Begriffe hervorbringen, da ja auch ein anweſend promovirter Doctor geiſtesabweſend geweſen ſein kann, was wenigſtens nicht ganz unmöglich wäre: das iſt denn Sache der Facultät, die ihn creirt und es vor Gott und Menſchen ſchon verantworten wird. Nein, hier iſt nur von körperlicher An- und Abweſenheit die Rede. Sie können ſich gewiß auch leicht denken, daß ein Abweſender auf eine andere Weiſe zum Doctor gemacht wird als ein Anweſender; aber wie das geſchieht, wird Ihnen ein Räthſel ſein, und ſo will ich Ihnen und der ganzen gebildeten Welt, denn ich weiß, daß die ganze gebildete Welt dies Buch leſen wird, Beides, meiner Pflicht gemäß, ausführlich beſchreiben. — Erlauben Sie aber, daß ich, als ein galanter Autor, Sie, wie es ſich von ſelbſt verſteht, zu der gebildeten Welt rechne, und mir wiederum die gebildete Welt ſelbſt als eine holdſelige Leſerin vorſtelle. Ich ändere daher meine Anrede, und meine Sie zwiefach, wenn ich mich an die gebildete Welt wende. — Sie werden das um ſo mehr, hoffe ich, erlauben, als mein Styl durch das Collectivum und das mit ihm verbundene obligate Du ſogleich einen höheren Schwung, der ihm wohl nöthig ſein mag, erhält.

Gebildete Welt! Haſt Du den Molière geleſen? — Ich möchte faſt daran zweifeln, denn, wenn Du Dich auch mit franzöſiſcher Lectüre beſchäftigſt, ſo haſt Du Dich doch gewiß ſo in den Romanticismus eines Balzac, Victor Hugo, Georges Sand, und wie dieſe Dichter-Heroen des Blutes und Laſters Alle heißen mögen, verſenkt, daß Dir der alte, geſunde Sittenmaler, der trotzdem, daß faſt 200 Jahre dazwiſchen liegen, Dir noch immer einen Spiegel verhält, in welchem Du Dich zu Zeiten mit einer Schellenkappe, Fuchs- und Haſenſchwänzchen und Eſelsöhrchen erblicken magſt, als roh und ungenießbar erſcheint. Vielleicht aber hat man in der Erziehungsanſtalt, in welcher Du Deine Jugend verlebteſt, das eine oder das andere Stück von ihm mit Dir vorgenommen, um Dir einen natürlichen, franzöſiſchen Dialog beizubringen, und Du erinnerſt Dich deſſen noch, wenn auch nur dunkel. — Unter dieſen Stücken nun iſt der berühmteſten eines der Malade imaginaire und dieſem malade imaginaire iſt eine mediciniſche Doctorpromotion als eine Art von Ballet mit Geſang angehängt. Nun ſieh, geliebte gebildete Welt, das iſt eben das Merkwürdige bei der Sache, daß dieſe alte poſſenhafte franzöſiſche Doctorpromotion mit unſeren heutigen deutſchen Doctorpromotionen die frappanteſte Aehnlichkeit hat. Du magſt Dich ſelbſt davon überzeugen. Bei Molière wird die Feierlichkeit dadurch in aller Form eröffnet, daß der Präſes eine Rede hält, in welcher er das ſchönſte mediciniſche Doctorlatein ſpricht, zuerſt die Arzneiwiſſenſchaft als eine herrliche Sache lobt, dann ſeinen verehrten Collegen die rühmliche Erhaltung des Anſehens, in welchem die Heilkunde überall ſteht, an das Herz legt, und zuletzt den Doctoranden mit folgenden Worten lobt, vorſtellt und zu examiniren empfiehlt:

— — Credo, quod trovabitis
Dignam materiam medici
In savanti homine que voici;
Lequel in chosis omnibus
Dono ad interrogandum
Et à fond examinandum
Vostris capacitatibus.

Die Examinatoren gehen nun an das Werk, der Doctorand antwortet auf jede Frage vortrefflich, und zwar meiſt auf alle daſſelbe, und die ganze gelehrte Verſammlung bezeugt dann im Chor ihren Beifall durch den Ausruf:

Bene, bene, bene, bene respondere!
Dignus, dignus est intrare
In nostro docto corpore.

Nachdem er nun das Examen vortrefflich beſtanden, nimmt ihm der Präſes den Eid ab, ſetzt ihm den Doctorhut auf und verleiht ihm feierlichſt

Virtutem et puissanciam
Medicandi,
Purgandi,
Saignandi,
Perçandi,
Taillandi,
Coupandi,
Et occidendi
Impune per totam terram.

Nun hält der Doctor folgende vortreffliche Dankrede in echt ciceronianiſchem Styl:

Grandes Doctores doctrinae,
De la rhubarbe et du séné,
Ce seroit sans douta a moi chosa folla
Inepta et ridicula,
Si j'alloibam m'engageare
Vobis louangeas donare,
Et entreprenoibam adjoutare
Des lumieras au soleillo
Et des etoillas au cielo,
Des ondas a l'oceano
Et des rosas au printano.
Agreate qu' avec uno moto
Pro toto remercimento,
Rendam gratiam corpori tam docto.
Vobis, vobis debeo
Bien plus qu'à naturae et qu'à patri meo.
Natura et pater meus
Hominem me habent factum;
Mais vos me, ce qui est bien plus
Avetis factum medicum.
Honor, favor et gratia
Qui, in hoc corde que voilà
Imprimant ressentimenta
Qui dureront in saecula.

Es erfolgen nun von allen Seiten Gratulationen der Kunſtgenoſſen, und damit iſt die Farce, — wollt' ich ſagen, die Feierlichkeit zu Ende.

Im Allgemeinen, verehrteſte gebildete Welt, treffen die deutſchen Doctorpromotionen, wie ich bereits bemerkt habe, mit dieſer überein, nur iſt der kleine Unterſchied, daß das Examen vorhergeht und an deſſen Stelle bei der Promotion ſelbſt eine Disputation eintritt. Doch Du würdeſt zu viel einbüßen, wenn ich Dir die ganze Herrlichkeit nicht ausführlich beſchriebe, auch möchteſt Du mir bei Deinem außerordentlichen Patriotismus zürnen, wenn ich, der deutſche Mann, Dich, die deutſche gebildete Welt, mit dem Skelette einer franzöſiſchen Feierlichkeit abſpeiſen wollte, wo Du ſelbſt den fleiſchigen und vollblütigen Körper einer deutſchen Solennität aufzuweiſen haſt. Davor ſoll mich auch Gott bewahren! Ich weiß es ja, wie patriotiſch Du biſt, weiß es ja, daß Du das Becker'ſche Rheinlied drei Mal täglich ſingſt, als Morgen-, Mittags- und Abendſegen, Morgens nach der Weiſe eines der drei hundert ſechs und ſechzig Componiſten deſſelben, mit denen Du gewiſſenhaft abwechſelſt, ſo daß jede Compoſition regelmäßig ein Mal im Jahre daran kommt (die beſte immer am erſten, die nächſtbeſte am letzten April, und die allerbeſte am Schalttage); Mittags nach der Melodie des Deſſauer Marſches: „So leben wir, ſo leben wir, ſo leben wir alle Tage bei grüner Peterſilie und Krautſalat;" und Abends endlich, mit einiger Variation, nach der ſchönen kirchlichen Weiſe: „Nun ruhen alle Wälder." Wie könnte ich mir alſo je in den Sinn kommen laſſen, Dir etwas Franzöſiſches einſchwärzen zu wollen? Nicht einmal das heilige Rococo und die geſegnete Renaiſſance: dazu bin ich ein viel zu ſtabiler Menſch. — Nein, ausführlichſt ſchildere ich, was Dein iſt mit allem Rechte, Dein ſeit Jahrhunderten, Dein bleiben ſoll in Ewigkeit und wovon Dir nie ein Menſch ein Jota rauben darf. Ausführlichſt, gebildete deutſche Welt — Hoch- und Wohlgeboren — nein, das darf ich doch wohl nicht ſagen, denn eine Freiin biſt Du einmal nicht, — alſo ... Geborene, denke Dir ſelbſt das Uebrige hinzu, dann thue ich Dir gewiß kein Unrecht — erfolgt hier die Darſtellung einer Feierlichkeit, welche dem geſammten deutſchen Vaterlande ſo großen Glanz verleiht.

Studioſus iſt alſo endlich durch unabläſſigen, unermüdlichen, unerſchöpflichen, unverdroſſenen und ungeheuern Fleiß ſo weit gekommen, daß er nun Nichts mehr lernen kann, ſondern ſich fähig fühlt, ſelbſt den Lehrern, was, wie Jeder weiß, gleichbedeutend iſt mit Doctoren, beigezählt zu werden. Dieſe Palme bleibt ihm noch zu erringen, aber ſie iſt die ſchwerſte von allen. Muthig ſtrebt er jedoch dem Ziele zu. Lange geht er mit ſich und ſeinen Freunden zu Rathe, welchen Gegenſtand er in der Diſſertation, die auf vielen Univerſitäten nothwendig vorher eingereicht werden muß, behandeln ſolle. Jener ſchlägt dieſes vor, dieſer Jenes; ihm aber ſcheint weder dieſes noch Jenes würdig ſeines tiefen

Wiſſens und ſeines haarſpaltenden Scharfſinnes. Er wendet ſich nun an einen ſeiner Profeſſoren, welcher, da er ſchon oft Decan der Facultät geweſen, eine gewiſſe Praxis im Auswählen von derartigen Stoffen hat. Der treffliche Mann weiß ihm ſogleich mehrere vorzulegen, ſeien es nun merkwürdige Unterſuchungen oder wichtige Controverſen. Gewöhnlich hat derſelbe ſothane Punkte in ſeinen unvergleichlichen Vorleſungen ſelbſt auf das Ausführlichſte behandelt oder denkt es noch zu thun, und iſt daher im Stande, dem Doctoranden den dahin gehörigen wiſſenſchaftlichen Apparat auf das Genaueſte nachzuweiſen, und ihm obendrein noch einige nützliche Fingerzeige zu geben, bei welchem Ende er das Ding am Beſten anpacken könne. Schwer beladen zieht nun der junge Mann zu Hauſe und wühlt in den Quellen, wie die alten Römer zu ſagen pflegten, mit täglicher und nächtlicher Hand. Seine Commilitonen haben einen ungeheuern Reſpect vor ihm; überall, wo er ſich blicken läßt, heißt es nun von ihm: er ſchreibt an ſeiner Diſſertation, und die Füchſe wagen nur in ehrfurchtsvoller Entfernung zu ihm aufzublicken. Jetzt empfindet er zum erſten Male ganz das Glück des mostrari digito et dicier: Hic est, und geht mit ſtiller, obwohl etwas mühſeliger Seligkeit in der Welt herum, ſchwanger mit Gedanken, die die ganze Fachgelehrſamkeit umſtürzen oder unglaublich bereichern müſſen. Es trifft ſich freilich auch wohl, daß irgend ein Studioſus nicht ſo großen Werth auf die Diſſertation legt, ſondern ſie nur als ein nothwendiges Uebel betrachtet und daher ſich nirgends Rathes erholt bei den Erfahrenen, ſondern das erſte beſte Lehrbuch hernimmt und das erſte beſte Kapitel daraus Lateiniſch paraphraſirt, noch einige ſogenannte Literatur hinzufügt, ſein curriculum vitae und ein Paar Theſen hintendran hängt, und nun ſein opusculum in Gottes Namen bei der Facultät einreicht, die es gewöhnlich eben ſo gefällig annimmt. Im Ganzen iſt dieſe Art ſo übel nicht, denn was kann ein armer Studioſus denn durch eine Diſſertation mehr beweiſen, als daß er fleißig Collegia gehört, treuherzig in verba magistri ſchwört und ein erträgliches Latein zu ſchreiben verſteht? Streng genommen iſt eine ſolche Diſſertation doch nur ein phyſiologiſches Experiment, um die Kürze des Darms, und die raſche geiſtige Verdauung des hoffnungsvollen Doctoranden zu ermitteln.

Wir wollen aber doch zur Ehre der ſtudirenden Menſchheit und unſeres Helden insbeſondere annehmen, er habe es ſich unendlich ſauer werden laſſen und nach ſchlafloſen Nächten und durchwachten Tagen endlich ſein außerordentliches Werk elaborirt, das er nun omni qua par est reverentia der hochverehrlichen Facultät zur Prüfung vorlegt. Sämmtliche Mitglieder haben darauf mit unſeren Freunden, den Molière'ſchen Aerzten, nachdem ſie davon Kenntniß genommen, einſtimmig ausgerufen: Dignus est intrare in nostro docto corpore. Es wird ihm nun der wichtige Tag des Rigoroſums beſtimmt. Vorher hat er aber noch eine heilige Pflicht, die heiligſte von allen, zu erfüllen; er muß nämlich das Honorar für das Examen in blanken, vollwichtigen Goldſtücken in die geweihten Hände des Decans niederlegen; eher wird er nicht examinirt. Er könnte nämlich, wenn er übel beſtünde, vor Schreck, Angſt, Entſetzen oder Wuth in eine doppelte Bewegung gerathen, das heißt: erſt durchfallen und dann durchgehen, wo dann ſeine Herren Examinatoren für ihre große Mühe und ihren ſauern Schweiß das leere Nachſehen hätten. Man glaubt aber gar nicht, welch' ein horror vacui bei den promovirenden Facultäten vorherrſcht. Viele wiſſen ſich daher noch beſſer zu verwahren und nehmen den Examinanden vorher das feierliche Verſprechen ab, daß er ſelbſt im Falle des Durchfallens nie wieder auch nur den mindeſten Anſpruch auf die einmal gezahlten Louisd'ore machen wolle, was ſehr weiſe iſt.

Der wichtige Tag iſt endlich da. Unſer Freund hat vorher noch gewaltig repetirt, namentlich in den Wiſſenſchaften, wo er einige Lücken bei ſich verſpürte, oder die er nicht auf dieſer Univerſität gehört. Seine Freunde ſind zu ihm gekommen und haben ihm Muth eingeſprochen; ihm wackeln, in der Studentenſprache zu reden, die Manſchetten gewaltig und ſein Puls ſchlägt neunzig Mal in einer Minute, aus Furcht vor einem Repuls. Nie hat unſerem Doctoranden die Wahrheit des pauliniſchen Spruches: „Unſer Wiſſen iſt Stückwerk,“ ſo klar eingeleuchtet, wie jetzt. Glücklicher Weiſe ſpricht er ein ziemlich fertiges Latein und weiß, daß das bei derartigen akademiſchen Handlungen ein treffliches Hülfsmittel iſt, um die Blößen zu verdecken, vor Allem, wenn die Examinatoren nicht gar zu ſtreng ſind, was ſich, wenn er ein Ausländer iſt, auch nicht wohl erwarten läßt, denn da denken ſie, ſo ſehr ihnen auch in unſeren Tagen die Regierungen auf die Finger ſehen, doch mitunter noch; sumimus pecuniam et mittimus asinum in patriam, was auf Deutſch heißt: Wir examiniren den fleißigen, talentvollen und gelehrten jungen Mann, und ſenden ihn als promovirten Doctor in ſein Vaterland. — Unſer Jüngling jedoch verläßt ſich nicht darauf, ſondern leert, um ſich Courage zu ſchaffen, noch eine halbe Flaſche Champagner, zieht den Frack an, wenn dieſer ein nothwendiges Requiſit iſt, knöpft denſelben bis oben zu, und begiebt ſich nun mit haſtigen Schritten und wahrer Todesverachtung nach dem Hauſe des Decans, wo ſich das examinirende Collegium verſammelt hat. Hier meldet er ſich bei dem draußen harrenden Pedell, der zugleich Facultätsdiener iſt; dieſer meldet ihn wieder, und erhält den Befehl, ihn einzulaſſen. Er tritt mit einer tiefen Verbeugung, doch ziemlich unſicheren Schrittes ein. Als er ſich wieder etwas geſammelt hat und aufblickt, ſieht er das Collegium um einen Tiſch ſitzen, den Decan als Präſes oben an und um ihn herum die anderen Herren secundum ordinem. Er wird ebenfalls eingeladen, den ihm beſtimmten Platz einzunehmen. Nach einigen vorläufigen Redensarten beginnt nun der Präſes mit milden Worten und ſanftem Ton zu fragen. Dem armen Examinanden ſteht zwar der helle Angſtſchweiß vor der Stirn, aber er ermannt ſich und antwortet ſo gut er kann, nach einigem Beſinnen, wenn auch juſt nicht im ſchönſten Latein. Das recte tu quidem, oder irgend eine andere approbirende Floskel, macht ihn ſchon beherzter, es geht nun mit jeder Frage beſſer, und wenn er ſelbſt auch auf einige abſonderlich ſchwere oder ungewöhnliche — denn ein Decan kann oft mehr fragen, als zehn Doctoranden antworten — die richtige Entgegnung ſchuldig bleibt, ſo kommt er doch allmälig immer mehr hinein, das Latein fließt ihm wie Waſſer vom Munde, und die Furcht und Angſt iſt gänzlich von ihm gewichen. Endlich hat denn der letzte Examinator die letzte Frage gethan, nachdem ihn der Decan mit der Uhr in der Hand höflich erinnerte, daß die beſtimmte Zeit abgelaufen ſei, und der Doctorand wird nun mit artigen Worten erſucht, das Gemach zu verlaſſen, und draußen im Vorzimmer zu harren, bis man ihn wieder rufen läßt. Er ſteht auf, verbeugt ſich und geht hinaus.

Jetzt kommen die peinlichſten Augenblicke für ihn; er hört die Herren drinnen lebhaft mit einander verhandeln, ihm iſt, als entſchieden ſie über Leben und Tod, während ſie oft ſchon längſt einig ſind, daß er nicht abgewieſen werden ſolle, und nur der Form wegen und um der Sache mehr Anſehen zu geben, ihn einige Minuten länger warten laſſen. Unruhig mißt er mit großen Schritten das Gemach; die ſchuldig gebliebenen Antworten fallen ihm jetzt zur Unzeit ein, o könnte er ſie doch noch durch das Schlüſſelloch ſenden oder in das Protokoll hinein zaubern! — Gelaſſen ſieht der Pedell ihm in das Geſicht; den kümmert es nicht, welch Schickſal verhängt wird, denn der Schickſalsſchluß, daß er als Facultätsdiener ſeine beſtimmten Gebühren erhalten ſolle, muß in Erfüllung gehen. Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinae; ob auch der Doctorand durchfalle, ſein Geld bleibt ihm nicht aus. — Endlich ertönt die verhängnißvolle Klingel. Der dienſtbare Geiſt tritt hinein und kehrt gleich wieder zurück mit der Einladung, ihm zu folgen. Es geſchieht. Die Aufforderung, ſich zu ſetzen, ergeht wie vorhin, und mit wohlgedrechſelten Worten erklärt ihm jetzt der Decan, daß die Facultät mit der abgelegten Probe von ſeinem Wiſſen zufrieden ſei, und der Promotion weiter Nichts im Wege ſtehe, als die Entrichtung des für die Feierlichkeit herkömmlich zu leiſtenden Honorars.

Auf einigen Univerſitäten geht noch ein ſchriftliches Examen vorher. Bei verſchloſſenen Thüren und ohne Vorbereitung und Hülfsmittel, ein lateiniſches Lexicon etwa ausgenommen, muß der Doctorand gewichtige Fragen aus den bedeutendſten Disciplinen auf dem Papiere beantworten. Allen Reſpect vor den Doctoren, die auf dieſen Univerſitäten creirt werden!

Wer iſt aber glücklicher als unſer Held? Mit geflügelten Schritten eilt er jetzt, nachdem er ſich bei den geſtrengen Herren in den ſchönſten Redensarten für ihre Nachſicht, Güte und Milde bedankt, und dieſe ihn noch väterlich auf manche Lücke in ſeinem Wiſſen oder dieſen und jenen Fehler aufmerkſam gemacht haben, nach ſeiner Wohnung oder in irgend eine Kneipe, wo ihn die treuen Freunde erwarten. Ausführlich muß er nun berichten, wie es ihm gegangen, denn Mancher iſt darunter, dem der ſaure Schritt bevorſteht und der hier Troſt ſchöpft und oft in ſtiller Selbſtüberſchätzung denkt: „Na, wenn der durchgekommen iſt, wie glänzend mußt du da nicht beſtehen?“ — Ach, gar oft irrt er ſich, und wenn er noch ſo viel gelernt hat, denn er hat nicht bedacht, daß die Herren Examinatoren Menſchen ſind: und daß Schiller ſchon ſehr ſchön ſagte:

Auch Patroklus mußte ſterben
Und war mehr als Du!

Ein kleiner Vorſchmaus beſchließt nun den Tag, denn, wenn auch Papa nur das ſtrict Nothwendige ſchickte, ſo hat doch Mama, falls es ihr nur irgend möglich war, dafür geſorgt, daß das Söhnlein in jeder Hinſicht auf würdige Weiſe ein Doctor werde.

In den nächſten Tagen wird nun die Diſſertation gedruckt, die das Imprimatur des Decans erhalten hat. Aengſtlich überwacht der junge Autor dies Erſtlingswerk, und jagt ſorgſam den Druckfehlern nach, aber es bleiben leider eben ſo viel ſtehen als er ausgemerzt hat, denn es fehlt ihm noch gar zu ſehr am ſicheren Blick für die Setzerſünden. Auch dieſer Kelch geht vorüber, die Abhandlung iſt fertig, die Theſen angehängt, die Dedication, gewöhnlich an den Papa oder einige Profeſſoren gerichtet, vorgeheftet; Alles bereits vom Buchbinder abgeliefert und der wichtige Tag beſtimmt worden. Der Pedell trägt die Diſſertation herum; Curator, Rector, Decan und einige Standesperſonen und hohe Gönner erhalten ſchöne in Saffian oder Saffianpapier gebundene, auf dem Schnitt vergoldete Exemplare, während die anderen Herren mit brochirten fürlieb nehmen müſſen. Der Doctorand und die von ihm gewählten Opponenten üben ſich in elegantem Lateiniſch zu disputiren, arbeiten ſich auch wohl, wenn es mit dem Lateinſprechen etwas wackelig ausſieht, was bei den Medicinern bekanntlich am Seltenſten der Fall iſt, Frage und Antwort genau aus, und prägen ſie ihrem Gedächtniſſe ein, und ſo bricht denn unter dieſen Beſchäftigungen endlich der letzte große Tag an.

Schwarz gekleidet mit feierlichem Antlitz holt kurz vor der feſtgeſetzten Stunde der Doktorand den Decan und die Opponenten in einem eleganten Wagen, auf dem hinten ein für dieſe Feierlichkeit als Diener aufgeputzter Stiefelputzer ſteht, ab, und fährt entweder mit ihnen gleich in die Aula, oder erſt in ſeine Behauſung, wo ſie zuvor ein kleines Frühſtück als Herzſtärkung einnehmen. Dann geht es nach dem Hörſaal, wo ſich einige wenige Profeſſoren und einige wenige Studenten eingefunden haben, um der wichtigen Handlung beizuwohnen. Der Doctorand beginnt vom Katheder herab eine ſehr ſchöne Anrede, und es folgt nun die Diſputation mit oder ohne Präſes, die ſich oft um lana caprina dreht, und wobei gewöhnlich allerlei Späße vorgebracht werden, die deutſch trivial erſcheinen würden, ſich lateiniſch aber ganz excellent ausnehmen, denn darin liegt eben der große Zauber des Latein. Wir wollen, geehrte gebildete Welt! Dich nicht damit langweilen, denn Du biſt doch keine große Freundin des alten Schlendrianus Herkommannus, ſchon aus dem einfachen Grunde, weil Du kein Univerſitätsprofeſſor biſt. Wir erwähnen daher nur, daß, nachdem die Opponenten das Ihrige gethan und am Schluſſe auf beiden Seiten die eleganteſten ciceronianiſchen Complimente gedrechſelt wurden, der Decan nun dem Doctoranden den Doctoreid abnimmt, und ihm feierlichſt alle privilegia, jura et munera eines Doctors verleiht. Damit hat die Herrlichkeit ein Ende, es erfolgen Gratulationen, und der junge Doctor bringt entweder die Herren in ſeinem Wagen nach Hauſe, oder man fährt gleich zum Doctorſchmauſe, zu dem gewöhnlich noch einige Profeſſoren, Doctoren und Studioſen ebenfalls eingeladen wurden, und wo Alles voll Jubel und Freude iſt, bis das letzte Glas geleert und der letzte Ton verklungen.

So iſt denn aus dem hoffnungsvollen Studioſus ein hoffnungsvoller Doctor geworden.

Ich habe manchen vernünftigen Mann über die Doctorexamina, Disputationen u. ſ. w. unſerer deutſchen Univerſitäten, beſonders derjenigen, wo das Latein noch recht florirt, den Kopf ſchütteln ſehen und ausrufen hören: Quantum est in rebus inane! Da ich aber nur eine Naturgeſchichte der Studenten und nicht der Profeſſoren ſchreibe, ſo kann ich mir kein Urtheil darüber geſtatten.

Bei einer Promotion in absentia iſt natürlich Alles weit einfacher; der Doctorand ſendet die erforderlichen Zeugniſſe, Abhandlung und vor Allem das erforderliche

Geld, und erhält, wenn die Facultät Alles genau nach den Geſetzen geprüft und richtig befunden hat, — beſonders das Honorar — das gewünſchte Diplom von dem Decan zugeſchickt. — Von den Menſchlichkeiten, die auf manchen Univerſitäten dabei vorgehen ſollen — was aber gewiß Verleumdung iſt — darf ich hier eben ſo wenig reden, da eine Naturgeſchichte der Studenten Nichts damit zu thun hat.

Ende.

Druck von B. G. Teubner in Leipzig.

Verzeichniß der Illuſtrationen

№ 1. Titelblatt.

№ 2. Chef und Autor zur Einleitung.

№ 3. Darſtellung der verſchiedenen Perſonen welche befragt werden was ein Student ſei; zu Cap. I.

№ 4. Monolog aus Tell in die Studentenſprache überſetzt. Der alte Burſche am Brunnen dem Pedell auflauernd; zu Cap. II.

№ 5. Zug des Rectors; der Decane und die Pedelle voran bei feierlichen Gelegenheiten; zu Cap. III.

№ 6. Das Maulthier das den alten Studenten tractirt; zu Cap. IV. Abth. 1.

№ 7. Fuchsritt (komiſche Feierlichkeit) auf dem Kommers; zu Cap. IV. Abth. 2.

№ 8. Studentenduell; zu Cap. IV. Abth. 3.

№ 9. Liebeserklärung auf einem Ball; zu Cap. IV. Abth. 4.

№ 10. Comitat (feierliche Begleitung) eines abgehenden Studenten; zu Cap. IV. Abth. 5.

№ 11. Abgang von der Univerſität und Abſchied; zu Cap. IV. Abth. 6 und 7.

№ 12. Feierliche Salbung und Krönung des Bierfürſten; zu Cap. V.

8° P. germ. 4676

[Wolff]

Die

Kleinen Leiden

des

Menschlichen Lebens.

Univ. Bibl.
München

Die

Kleinen Leiden

des

Menschlichen Lebens.

Von

Plinius dem Jüngsten.

[illegible] Oskar Ludwig Bernhard]

Illustrirt

von

J. J. Grandville.

Zweite, neu bearbeitete und vermehrte Auflage

Leipzig.

Verlag von Carl B. Lorck.

1846.

AD BIBL.
UNIVERS.
MONAC.

Inhalt.

Ein * bezeichnet die eingedruckten, zwei  die beſonders gedruckten Illuſtrationen.

Seite

Vorwort zur zweiten Auflage.

Schrecken des Autors darüber. * Das Skizzenbuch. * Inniger Wunſch. * Die [illegible] Bewegung. Ähnliches Schickſal eines Schriftſtellers und * einer [illegible] im Theater einer kleinen Reſidenz. [illegible] IX

[illegible] des Jüngſten jüngſte Epiſtel an alle Leidensbrüder auf Erden.

Troſt für [illegible]. Ungefriedenheit der Leſer. * [illegible] Leſern. Menge der Leiden. * Der ewige Jude. Unterhaltung mit demſelben. Die Eitelkeit Urſache aller Leiden. * Der Dämon der Eitelkeit. [illegible] das größte Leid.  Unglück auf einer Kettenbrücke. Die Leiden ſind das Salz des Lebens, mit denen Gott das Daſein würzt. Will man Ruhe haben, muß man ſie auslachen, darum wird der Leſer gebeten, Bekanntſchaft zu machen mit dem Volk der * [illegible] XIII

Einleitung.

* Sommer-Arabeske. Sommermalheurs. Der boshafte Nordoſtwind. [illegible] Schnelligkeit des Autors.  Der rauchende Ofen. Verdorbenes [illegible]. Vom Genuß der ſchönen Natur. * Spitzbuben-[illegible]. Erklärung der Sommer-Arabeske. * Die engen Stiefel. Weitere Folgen des Naturgenuſſes XXIII

Die kleinen Leiden des menſchlichen Lebens.

Die Leiden des Winters. Genrebilder.

Der Commerzien-Generalcalculator Schwefelbein am Wintermorgen in der Kälte. * [illegible] und deren Folgen. * Frau Heinichen mit den erfrorenen Gliedmaßen.  Plaſtiſcher Moment im Schnee. * Die Leiden des Winters. Huſten und Schnupfen in der Oper. Liebhaber und Liebe in der Winternacht. Häusliche Eheſtandsſcene. Beſſer daß der Gemahl erfriere, als daß die Gemahlin verbrenne. 33

Seite

Ein Abend in der französischen Oper. Aus dem Reisetagebuche eines deutschen Kleinstädters.

Im Palais royal. Die Queue. Was heißt das eigentlich? * Leiden in der Queue. Zwischen Engländer und Amerikaner. Louis Philippe. Gelehrte Note über das Wort [illegible]. * Die Sperrsitze, numero et omen. * Der dicke Amerikaner, der alle Aussicht versperrt.  Die gesetzliche Familie aus der Provinz.  Wie man den König nicht zu sehen bekommt, obgleich er im Theater ist. Schreckliche Folgen der Wißbegier eines deutschen Touristen. * Der boshafte Amerikaner noch einmal . . 43

Denkwürdigkeiten einer Nase, erzählt von einem Munde. Nach dem Französischen.

* Zweierlei Nasen. Die Nase spricht. * Nasenstüber. Klein, durch die Nase herbeigeführt. Erstes Erscheinen in der Gesellschaft. * Verwunderliches Wunder der Rhinoplastik.  Die Nase auf einem Balle, ein Schrecken tanzlustiger Damen. * Die Nase an der Pforte einer Grisette. Sympathie für eine Limonade. * Die Nase als Vermittlerin. [illegible]. * La drogue. * Braut und Bräutigam. * Ein Ehemann steckt nicht die Nase in solche Geheimnisse 53

Ueber das Unglück allein zu sein, und besonders allein schlafen zu müssen. Eine von der Akademie der [illegible] beati gekrönte Preisschrift.

* Nächtliche Leiden. Es ist nicht gut, daß der Mensch allein sei. Wie es einem Junggesellen geht. Unerquicklicher Schlaf nach traurig verlebtem Abend. * Alpdrücken. Das ist der Fluch des Alleinseins 66

Die Riesen und die Zwerge. Physiologische Abhandlung aus den Papieren eines hypochondrischen Arztes.

Vom rechten Maaß. Wo der Mensch den größten Theil seiner Zeit zubringt. * Riese und Zwerg im Omnibus. * Der junge Riese aus Pommern im Kleidermagazin.  Der Riese auf dem Balle und der Zwerg im Lampenlicht. Juno und die Kleinste der Grazien 77

Das Capitel von den Freunden und Freundinnen. Bruchstück aus Theophron's Vermächtniß an seinen Sohn.

Nur keinen Freund und keine Freundin! Besuch der Freunde stets zur unrechten Zeit. * Die musikalische Begleitung bei der Arbeit. Der Freundin [illegible]. Der Freunde Dankbarkeit.  Das umgeworfene Cabriolet. Die gelehrte Freundin und ihr Roman. * Der Freunde Eitelkeit.  Ihre Empfindlichkeit. Jerro's Aufopferung für seinen Freund 92

Welche Lust gewährt das Reisen! Ein Artikel für die Beilage der A. A. Z. von Tuttelaffe.

Gebildete Leute müssen reisen. Sie müssen aber auch einen Paß haben. * Das Paßbureau.  Das Packen des Reisekoffers. Der bescheidene Geheimerath und * die kleine Reisetasche. Der zu schwere Koffer. Wie angenehm reist man im Eilwagen.  Der Eilwagen mit seinen verſchiedenen Freuden.  Der Eilwagen iſt eben fort. Treffliche Eigenſchaften der Wanderer. Extrapoſt. 98

Seite

Das Trauerſpiel vom Schuldner. Dem Franzöſiſchen nacherzählt.

Wie man gute Grundſätze einprägt. Väterliche Prophezeihungen. Zahle und Du wirſt verachtet. * So ſchickt man die Gläubiger fort. Täuſchung. Ein Lehnſtuhl in der Nacht. Erſtes Mißtrauen. Man fühlt den Angelhaken. * Tiderente. Der Verfalltag.  Verboten der Niederlage. Vergeblicher Arreſtverſuch. Der Proceß.  Unnütze Bemühungen der Juſtiz. Sonnenuntergang. Die Serenade des Schuldners. * Schuldenjagd. Der Bankerott. Concursum Creditorum. Der Ball der luſtigen Gläubiger. Der Trickſtock für den ernſten Gläubiger. * Nur zu Ihr. 111

Vom Sonntage. Moraliſche Betrachtungen eines feinen Mannes.

* Sonntags ruht der Hebel. * Herr und Madame Brennicke reflectiren. Geſpräch am Sonntag Morgen. * Ja wohl mein Scha-a-atz! * Herr Brennicke im Berliner Muſeum. * Madame Brennicke in der Nacht zum Montage. Ihre Sonntagskleider.  Der junge Berliner Biergott. Peter in Potsdam. * Die beleidigte Wage. 128

Zur unrechten Zeit. Morgenbetrachtungen eines Unglücklichen.

Zur rechten Zeit, eine Zauberformel. Wann es leicht war ein deutſcher Dichter zu werden. Frau von Hermelin. Martha aus dem Fauſt.  Der verhängnißvolle Stock. Die Ungeſchicklichkeiten. * Die Luſtigkeit bei dem kranken Oheim.  Auf dem Ball bei dem Präſidenten — im Jagdkleide. 140

Die Schmerzen eines Tigers oder Einen ablaufen laſſen. Aus einem ungedruckten Roman: „Die Märtyrer der Geſellſchaft“ betitelt.

* Löwe und Tiger. Der Löwe des Tigers Vorleſung. Das Glück eines Tigers. * Er macht der alten Tante die Cour, der Löwe der jungen Nichte.  Des Tigers neueſte Mode. Die verſchiedenen Arten, Jemanden ablaufen zu laſſen. * Deren Verſinnlichung. 148

Der Hausfreund. Schreiben eines Junggeſellen in der Reſidenz an einen Ehemann in der Provinz.

„Ich habe Lorenz fortgejagt“. * Krieg dem Schlummer. Die Scheu vor dem Schmelzen. Uebereinſtimmung nicht des Geſchmackes, ſondern der Liebe. * Gütergemeinſchaft. * Die Spukgeiſter im Weinkeller. Die Saint-Simoniſtiſche Haushaltung.  Die Urſachen des enormen Appetits. Was Lorenz war: verſchwiegen, treu, ſparſam. . . . . * Sardanapal in der Provinz. „Ich will nur einen Herrn nehmen“. . . 155

Die Roſen des Guatimozin. Antwort eines Ehemanns in der Provinz an einen Junggeſellen in der Reſidenz.

Der Herr müſſe es ſchlecht haben, bei dem der Junggeſell in Dienſte

Seite

rohe. Einige Dutzend Köchinnen binnen wenigen Jahren. * Eine ganze Procession. Die [illegible]. Das Weltkind.  Krieg in der Küche. Die Naschhafte. Die Uneigennützige. Der [illegible]. Die Schmutzige.  Der Kamm in der Suppe. Die [illegible]. * Die verstümmelten Namen. Die Tugendhafte. [illegible]. Charity begins always at home 165

Schreckliche Momente. Aus den Papieren eines Psychologen.

Göttliche Verehrung der Furcht. * Der Baum ein Räuber. Allerlei Arten von Angst.  Die [illegible] im Speisesaal. Furcht vor Zukünftigem. Die Furcht langweilig zu werden.  Gallerie des Schrecklichen. 175

Visiten und ihre Erfolge. Aus den Memoiren eines Weltmüden.

Parodie einer Stelle im Faust. Visiten ein Gräuel. * Der Verschmähte. Visiten, Erfindung eines Dämon. — Wer ist Frau von Ziergiebel? — * Die gnädige Frau sind in das Seebad gereist. — Antrittsvisiten als Gutsherr.  Ueberraschung des Herrn und der Frau Majorin. Ein Unglücksvogel.  Der getretene Kater. Noch mehr Unglück. * Der tückische Stuhl. Noch mehr Unglück. Brautwerbungsvisite. * Die [illegible] Tasse. * Großes Malheur in einem Concert. — Gott behüte einen ungeschickten Mann vor einer heftigen Frau. * Der eingeklemmte Rock. * Folgen der Schüchternheit. Visite bei dem Minister.  Der gelehrte Schwätzer. Empfehlung an einen pensionirten Offizier. Folgen der [illegible]. * Hintertreppe.  Drei Viertel auf zwei. Visiten eine Erfindung des Teufels 189

Florentin der Vielgeliebte. Aus einem ungedruckten Manuscripte: „Lebensläufe in absteigender Linie“ betitelt.

Schilderung des Jünglings. Florentinische Blüthen. Jede Dame ist in Florentin verliebt. * Der intolerante Gemahl.  Irrthum und Enttäuschung. Grausame Abweisung. Das Rendezvous. * Die schüchterne Schöne 200

Timon und Sosias. Geständnisse eines Unglücklichen.

Timon! Du hassest mich. Was habe ich Dir gethan? * Die feindliche Miene.  Immer an die Wand! Verfolgung in der Gesellschaft. Der Hauskauf. * Der Doppelgänger. Speculation eines Rechtsgelehrten. * Ein Selbstmord 207

Die nobeln Passionen. Ein didactisches Gedicht.

* Ueberblick. Invocation der Muse. Die nobeln Passionen. Die Fuchsjagd. * Das Pferd als Reiter. * Die gefährlichen Gäule. Ein unfreiwilliges Bad. Das Wettrennen. Der bürgerliche Accent der Jagd. Sultans Ungehorsam. * Verkehrte Strafe.  Das durchgehende Gespann und der boshafte Hase. Der erschossene Hund. Freuden des Fischfangs.  Die glücklichen Angler. * Der fliegende Junge. * Das [illegible] [illegible]. * Die Patriotischen.  Der [illegible]. * Unterricht in der Fechtkunst. Scheibenschießen. Die Künste des Degens. Unterricht in dieser Kunst 215

Seite

Der erste Tag der Berühmtheit. Ein Genrebild.

Der Vorabend. * Dichter und Theaterdirector.  Von den Coulissen aus gesehen. Wir sind berühmt. * Die Welt geht ihren Gang. Wie liest man seinen Ruhm? Die buchstabirenden Journalisten.  Ich hatte es belegt. Freund Theodor. * Die Symptome seiner Krankheit. Die Freundin. Wie heißt der Verfasser? 236

Dick, fett und . . . melancholisch.

Eine grausame Weigandheit. Unmögliche Vorstellung. Die zu kurzen Arme. * Die enge Halsbinde. Das verzogene Kind. Leiden in der Pension. Die Ekelnamen. * Der egoistische Hunger. * Der Eierkuchen.  Die Post. Mittel um mager zu werden.  Das Taschentuch und der magere Nebenbuhler. Traurige Liebe. Grünes Kleidener. Gezwungene Einsamkeit. * Das ungefällige Cabriolet. * Drei Centner schwer 246

Von den Servituten. Eine akademische Vorlesung.

Definition von Mackeldey. Distinctionen. Das active Servitut. * Still zu eben! * Außerordentliche Sorgfalt. * Thränen der Demoiselle Schwere. Die passive Dienstbarkeit. Selbstverläugnung eines Hausfreundes.  Der Sklave des Gemahls. Die fortgesetzte Dienstbarkeit. * Leiden eines Kurzsichtigen. Nicht fortgesetzte Dienstbarkeiten. Gevattersmannsleiden. * Ueberschwemmung von Briefen. Die apparenten Servituten. * Der Platz in der Mitte. Die nicht apparenten Servituten. Fehlende Zähne und Pechpflaster. Das Duell. Die städtischen und die ländlichen Servituten. Die Freunde bei der Villeggiatura.  Der Landtagscandidat. * Die Freuden der Communalgarde. Freund Rehmeyer. * Die Merkwürdigkeiten der Residenz.  Rehmeyer's Ankunft mit seiner ganzen Familie. Der unabhängigste Mensch auf Erden 261

Das Glück taub zu sein.

Philosophische Betrachtungen über die Vollkommenheit der Sinne.  Die ambulanten Musikanten. * Die boshaften Geschwister. * Die zerrissenen Saiten. * Der arretirte Lied. * Die unbarmherzigen Tambours. 284

Vom Wörtlein Aber. Eine philologische Abhandlung.

Aber. Erstes Factum: Der abgewiesene Candidat. Zweites Factum: Der schwiegerväterliche Korb. Drittes Factum: Das gestörte Rendezvous.  Die boshafte Pulldogge. Viertes Factum. * Tapisserie auf einem Balle. Der gichtische Anbeter. Fernere Erfahrungsätze. Portraits. * Aber, ein Zaun, ein Schlagbaum. Gespenstische Aber. . . 293

Der Gast im abgeschabten Rock oder der unglückliche Banquier. Eine moderne Novelle.

Glanz des Reichthums. Anfälle von Wuth. Das Pferd, das vom Besitzer selbst geritten werden muß. Das beklagenswerthe Loos. Geheimnißvolle Erscheinung. * Complimente zur unrechten Zeit. Ein Ball zu viel. Lavoren des Silbergeschirres. Verrätherische Entschuldigungen. Das Brechmittel. Die verunglückte Speculation. Tückische Zuvorkommenheit. Unerklärlicher Schmerz 302

Seite

Die Anti-Thierquäler-Vereine. Eine moralische Betrachtung.
Vereine entstehen aus Langeweile. * Kunstaufe, und andere Schmäuse mit obligatem Vor- und Nachtisten. Vortrefflichkeit des Anti-Thierquäler-Vereins. Es gibt mehrere Arten von Thierquälerei. * Wie die Thiere die Menschen quälen. Aus dem Tagebuche eines vielfach Gequälten. Die Leiden eines Primaners. Der Ankunftsball bei der alten Tante. Demoiselle Antoinette Stange. Die Leiden wachsen. * Wie Zärtlichkeit auch eine Plage werden kann. * Die tägliche Partie nach dem Weinberge. Eine traurige Erscheinung, die mit Schrecken erfüllt. * Die [illegible].  Der tolle Kater. Wen trifft der Zorn? Immer die Unschuldigen. Der Menschen unsinnige Leidenschaft für unverständige Thiere. Love me, love my dog. * Die Wasserpartie. Anti-Menschenquälervereine. * Moralische Betrachtung über unsere Wanderer auf der Bahn des Lebens. Thierquälerei in der Gesellschaft. * Blumenfreunde.  Das Tabakrauchen und die Artigkeit der Herren. * Die fortschreitenden Herren. Ein Ball auch ein Vergnügen. * Madame [illegible] in Gefahr. * Rencontre.  Artigkeit im Regenwetter eine Qual. Aufruf zur Erweiterung der Thierquäler-Vereine 310

Klagen eines Unvermählten. Eine Threnodie.
Zorn des Geschicks. * Der lebendige Springbrunnen.  Der Unvermählte als Schiedsrichter zwischen Mann und Frau. Leiden der Ehe für einen Ehelosen.  Die Kinder unserer Freunde. Das Weib ist [illegible] Herzens. * Unangenehmer Besuch. Tücken der Dienerschaft. Das Weib gleicht dem [illegible], seine Gunst hat [illegible]. * Der neue Jüngling zwischen Mutter und Tochter. Die [illegible] und ihr Einspruch.  Bedenklicher Anblick. Das farblose Leben.  Glücklicher Anblick des ehelichen Glückes, der sich ein neues Nest baut. Grausamkeit des Geschickes 337

Schlußrede Plinius des Jüngsten.
Große Leiden bei diesem Buche. * Der [illegible] Verleger. * [illegible] über einen. * Der Autor in der Presse. Unsere [illegible]. * [illegible] vom [illegible]. Vermächte der Verleger. Das nicht bewusste Gegenstück. * Das Trauerspiel vom [illegible]. * Das Capitel vom [illegible]. Portraits. [illegible] und Tante. * Das [illegible]. * Der Fleck im Vorhange. Leiden der schönen Künste. * Die gesprungenen Saiten. Der ungeschickte Dilettant. * Ein Portrait. * Kriegsdienst in [illegible]. * Ungeschicklichkeiten. Unarten des Autors. * Feder und Griffel im Kampfe. * Ein gewaltiger Mann. * Unannehmlichkeiten in der Dämmerung. * Des [illegible]. * Der [illegible] Saal. * Die Dame auf dem [illegible]. * [illegible] Stellung. * Romantische Gefahren. * [illegible]. * Landleben. * [illegible] Begleiter. * Annehmlichkeit einer Soirée. * Geschichte der Demoiselle [illegible]. * Glück im Unglück. * [illegible] des Autors, von seinem Verleger [illegible]. * Die [illegible]. * Bildergallerie als [illegible]. * Gute 349

An die Recensenten 367

Die

Kleinen Leiden

des

Menſchlichen Lebens.

Geliebter Leſer! Du, der Du Dir die Mühe giebſt dieſe Vorrede zu leſen, Du haſt wahrſcheinlich das Buch, deſſen Ceremonienmeiſter ſie iſt, noch nicht geleſen, denn Du wirſt es ja nicht machen, wie jener Ungar, mein guter Freund, der ſich von Grillparzer's Ahnfrau gleich zwei Exemplare kaufte, weil er gehört hatte: „ſei ein Buch ſehr ſchönes und wolle er es leſen gleich zwei Mal.“ Höchſtens kann ich von Dir vorausſetzen, Du habeſt von der erſten Auflage gehört, ſie ſei Buch ſehr ſchönes und Dir nun die zweite Auflage gekauft. Ich mache Dir nämlich von vorn herein das Compliment, Du gehöreſt zu der kleinen, auserleſenen, heiligen Schar der Bücherkaufenden in Deutſchland und das iſt kein geringes, ſondern ein ſehr großes Verdienſt in den Augen eines Schriftſtellers und noch mehr eines Verlegers, denn ein Verleger theilt bekanntlich alle Menſchen in zwei Gattungen ein, nämlich in ſolche, die ſich Bücher kaufen und in ſolche, die es nicht thun; die Letzteren aber ſind in ſeinen Augen gar nicht Menſchen, exiſtiren nicht für ihn und wenn ſie der liebe Gott geſchaffen hat, ſo geſchah es nur im Irrthum. — Doch kehren wir zu Dir zurück, verehrter Leſer und Gönner, Du wirſt alſo dieſe Leiden noch leſen und erfahren, welche Leiden ſie ihrem armen Verfaſſer bereiteten. (S. die Schlußrede Deines gehorſamen Dieners Plinius des Jüngſten.) Alle dieſe Leiden nun, die Du dort noch leſen wirſt, hatte ich längſt hinter mir und, ehrlich geſagt, vergeſſen, da kommt nun ſchon nach zwei Jahren die Schreckensnachricht, eine zweite Auflage mache ſich nöthig. — Jedem Anderen und mir ſelbſt auch bei jedem anderen Buche würde das eine große Freude bereitet haben, denn das Bewußtſein, drei tauſend Menſchen in Deutſchland — ob drei tauſend Deutſche iſt die Frage — haben dein Buch gekauft und alſo ſechzigtauſend es geleſen — iſt ein erhebendes, und die Hoffnung, es werden es nun in der zweiten Auflage vielleicht noch drei tauſend kaufen und noch ſechzigtauſend leſen — Summa Summarum alſo ſechstauſend und ein hundert und zwanzigtauſend — iſt eine beſeligende — aber ſo geneigt ich auch bin mir Freuden durch Illuſionen zu machen, mich reizte, mich erfreute dieſe Nachricht nicht, mich erſchreckte ſie, denn — die neue Auflage bedurfte einiger Veränderungen, Umarbeitungen u. ſ. w. Manches gefiel mir ſelbſt nicht, ſchien mir oder meinen Freunden nicht gelungen, war nicht mehr zeitgemäß — kurz alle jene in der Schlußrede berichteten Leiden begannen von Neuem. Ich mußte das lange verſchloſſen gehaltene

Skizzenbuch wieder hervorholen und kaum hatte ich es geöffnet, ſo krochen auch alle Dämonen, die ſorgfältig eingeſperrten, wieder hervor und quälten und plagten mich wie früher, und ich erlebte wieder die ganze Schar der kleinen, wie der großen Leiden. Ich war das ſchlechteſte Publicum für mein Buch, denn wenn ich einige Seiten des Manuſcriptes wieder durchleſen, ſo wünſchte ich nie, ſondern ich wäre ſehr zufrieden geweſen, wenn irgend ein Dämon, den ich gewiß als einen guten Genius betrachtet, es ſo gemacht hätte, wie Figura zeigt. Aber es half Nichts, ich mußte die Fortſetzung ſelbſt liefern. — Alle jene Noth, jene Angſt vor den Recenſenten — denn ein gewiſſenhaft ſchreibender Autor wird ſich immer vorkommen, wie eine arme, oder vielmehr reiche junge Dame (ſie iſt nämlich hübſch) aus der Provinz, die das Schickſal in die Fremdenloge einer kleinen Reſidenz geführt und von der nun jeder Reſidenzler Rechenſchaft geben und Rechenſchaft haben, weil er ſie beurtheilen will — ſtieg wieder vor meiner Seele auf. Wie dieſe, ſteht ein armer Schriftſteller, wenn auch nur im Geiſte, die Augen aller Recenſenten, wohlbewaffnet mit Lorgnetten, Jumelles, Brillen, kurz mit Gläſern aller Art, um auch den kleinſten Fehler an ihm zu erſpähen. Aber was half's, ich mußte hindurch und habe es endlich gethan und ſo, geliebter Leſer, liegt denn endlich die zweite Auflage fertig vor Dir, vermehrt, umgearbeitet — vielleicht auch verbeſſert und mit ihr alle jene Leiden hinter mir. Liebe Mitleid nun und Nachſicht, denn das ſind chriſtliche Tugenden, und die Tugend, beſonders die chriſtliche, iſt jetzt Mode. Folgſt Du hier auch nicht Deinem Herzen, ſo folgſt Du doch gewiß der Mode — und ich bin alſo Deiner Güte gewiß.

Ein Leid blieb noch — das Leid eine Vorrede zur zweiten Auflage zu ſchreiben: doch, ſieh' gewiſſe Leiden leben ſich von ſelbſt aus, und ſo iſt es mit dieſem auch; hoffentlich nimmſt Du keine Notiz davon, ſondern biſt ſo eifrig auf das Buch ſelbſt erpicht, daß Du ſie, nach den erſten Worten ſchon, überſchlägſt. — Im Grunde ſteht auch Nichts darin, als daß ſie eine Vorrede zu einer zweiten Auflage iſt: eine captatio benevolentiae, die eigentlich überflüſſig, denn ich bin ja ſchon, aus den oben angeführten Gründen, Deines Wohlwollens gewiß, und wäre das nicht der Fall, ſo halte ich Dich für viel zu klug, geſcheidt und erfahren, um Dich durch die ſchönen Redensarten einer Vorrede, die daher jedenfalls überflüſſig iſt, beſtechen zu laſſen. — Gelt, das iſt die wahre captatio benevolentiae, und mit ſolcher empfiehlt ſich Dir

der Verfaſſer.

Plinius des Jüngſten

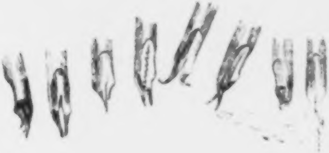
jüngſte Epiſtel

an alle Leidensbrüder auf Erden.

Euch Alle grüß' ich mit einander,
Die Ihr mir trüb die Hand gereicht,
Und deren Leben gleich dem Fluß Mäander,
Ach! nur durch Leidenswieſen ſchleicht.
Ihr ſeid, ich weiß es, nicht zu zählen.
Gering iſt freilich nur die Zahl
Derer, die offen es bekennen;
Wollt Ihr die ſtill Gequälten nennen,
Multiplicirt ſie hundert Mal.
Gar Manchen drückt geheim ſein Schuh,
Und — was ihn ſonſt auch mag beſeelen —
Raubt ihm Gelaſſenheit und Ruh'!
Erlaubt mir Euch den Troſt zu bringen,
Als Gegenſatz der ſteten Litanei:
Daß man trotz vielen böſen Dingen
Doch nicht der größte Leidensbruder ſei.
Nein, rechts und links giebt's manche Leute,
Die mehr gelitten wohl als wir;

Sie leiden Morgen, war's nicht Heute,
Und leiden dort, war es nicht hier.
Wir Alle ſind einmal des Schickſals Beute,
Das, liebe Menſchheit, merke Dir!

Schon hör' ich einen Leſer ſchmälen:
„Herr Plinius iſt nicht recht geſcheidt,
Mir längſt Bekanntes zu erzählen!
O Langeweile! bittres Leid!“
Er braucht ſich nicht ſo zu erhitzen:
War's ihm nicht neu, ſo blieb's doch wahr,
Und wahr iſt gut ſtets, offenbar. —
Mög' er nun ſeine Feder ſpitzen
Und Neues ſchreiben nach Belieben,
Woran ſich Publicus kann weiden.
Ich habe bei den alten Leiden
Schon alle Federn ſtumpf geſchrieben;
Seht hier die Frucht von meinen Werken,

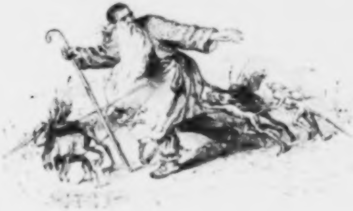


Denn gar zu Viel gab's anzumerken,
So daß ſie mir den Dienſt verſagt,
Nachdem ich weidlich mich geplagt,
Und doch gefunden: hier auf Erden
Kann es einmal nicht beſſer werden. —

Hätten all' dieſe Leiden Leiber
Und zählten in der Menſchenzahl,
Und wären alle Sterne Schreiber,
Nur weiß Papier der Himmelsſaal,
Voll Tinte ſelbſt der Ocean,
So reichte Alles das, o Graus!
Ja, ſelbſt die Ewigkeit nicht aus,
Um deren Namen aufzuſchreiben,
Denen als Leid, Schmerz, Angſt und Qual
Die armen Menſchen unterthan
Und ewig untergeben bleiben. —
Weiß Er es beſſer, ſchreib' er nun
Und laß er mich in Frieden ruhn.
Doch glaub' ich's nicht, Erfahrung lehrt,
Daß Allen Gleiches wird beſcheert.
Das Leiden ſelbſt iſt feſte Norm
Und wechſelt einzig in der Form.
Der hat's als Gicht, den plagt ſein Weib,
Dem Dritten fehlt's an baarem Geld,
Dem Vierten nur an Zeitvertreib;
Doch Jeder wähnt, daß auf der Welt
Sein Leid das allergrößte ſei,
Und macht deshalb ein laut Geſchrei;
Indeß die Leute rings um ihn
Verächtlich doch die Achſeln ziehn,
Und Mancher denkt: Von ſolchen Dingen
Allein gequält, wie der ſie hat,
Wie wär' ich glücklich in der That,
Wie wollt' ich lachen, jubeln, ſpringen!
Dann ſetzt er noch hinzu, erboſt:
„Wo find' ich für mein Leiden Troſt?"

Vielleicht hab' ich ihn. — Kommt heran
Und höret, was ich Euch berichte,
Denn wunderbar iſt die Geſchichte.
Ich traf einſt einen alten Mann
Auf einer Forſchungsreiſe an.
Er war von ſonderlicher Art,
Sein Kleid unmodiſch, lang ſein Bart,
Hatt' keine Ruh' an keinem Ort,
Es trieb, zog, ſtieß und drängt' ihn fort. —
Voll Neugier trat ich flugs herbei,

Um ihn zu fragen, wer er ſei;
Er ſchien ſo ſeltſam mir bekannt,
Und wie mit Jedermann verwandt.
Ich that ihm an nun alle Ehr',
Da ſprach er: „„Ich bin Ahasver,
Den man den ew'gen Juden nennt



Und der ſeit achtzehnhundert Jahren,
Wo er viel Schlimmeres erfahren,
Umher ſtets rings auf Erden rennt.
Ihr würdet höchlichſt mich verbinden
— Fuhr er zu mir ſehr artig fort —
Wenn Ihr mir nennet einen Ort,
Wo ich die Ruhe könnte finden,
Die mir nun ſchon ſo lange fehlt.
Das iſt es, was mich gräßlich quält
Und ob ich gleich bin unbeweibt,
Mich überall von dannen treibt,
Zumal da mich mit ſcharfer Brühe
Hat umgekocht Herr Eugen Sue.
Ich glaubte nicht, daß Neues noch
Nach dieſer langen Reih' von Jahren
Mir Aermſten könne widerfahren,
Und nun trifft mich das Schlimmſte doch,

Ich werde ruhelos gehetzt,
Und mehr als jemals überſchätzt,
Doch noch weit öft'rer überſetzt.““

Ich ſprach: „Eu'r Leid iſt wirklich groß,
Doch Leiden iſt des Menſchen Loos,
Und ich hab' ſchon als Kind gehört,
Ihm lächle ſeine wahre Ruhe
Zuerſt, zuletzt in Holzmeiers Truhe,
Wo weder Gram noch Leid ihn ſtört.
Ob's Euch nun unaufhörlich hetzt,
Ob ſich an mir die Krankheit ätzt,
Ob Jenes Ehre wird zerfetzt,
Ob Dieſer von dem Amt entſetzt,
Der Kaufmann da fallirt zuletzt,
Dem Dieb der Rücken wird zermetzt,
Den Höfling nicht ſein Fürſt mehr ſchätzt,
Im Weltſtaat Die der Regen netzt,
An Dem der Haß die Zähne wetzt,
An Jenem Mißgunſt ſich ergetzt,
Der Neid von Dieſem Böſes ſchwätzt . . .
Das iſt am Ende ganz egal,
Denn Leid bleibt Leid und Qual iſt Qual.“

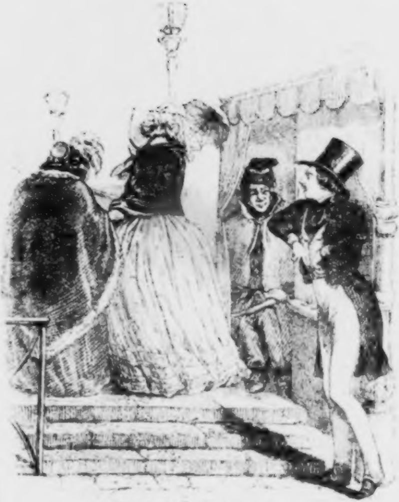
Er aber ſprach: „„So denkt auch Ihr
Bei Euern ewig leeren Klagen
Und Jammern — mit Permiß zu ſagen —
Recht wie ein unvernünftig Thier.
Was Andern groß, das dünkt Euch klein;
Ihr zieht darauf des Tadels Lauge
Und ſeht — Ihr Menſchen insgemein! —
Den Splitter in des Nächſten Auge,
Allein — wie ſchon die Bibel ſpricht —
Den Balken in dem eignen nicht.
So macht Ihr auch es mit den Leiden;
Ihr glaubt ſogar, daß es Euch ziert,
Wenn Ihr damit ſelbſt coquettirt,
Um Eure Eitelkeit zu weiden.
Die Uebel, die Euch die Dämonen,
Die Euch auf Euerm Weg begleiten
Und meiſtens in Euch ſelber wohnen,

Oft täglich, ſtündlich gar, bereiten,
Das ſind ja alles Kleinigkeiten,
Sobald Ihr Euch mit mir vergleicht,
Der unaufhaltſam weiter irrt,
Dem nirgends Ruh' auf Erden wird,
Seit ihn der Fluch des Herrn erreicht.""

„Wie? Kleinigkei" —? rief ich entſetzt,
Das Wort blieb mir im Munde ſtecken,
Er wollte mich — ſo ſchien mir's — necken.
„Ei!" ſprach ich dann: „Wie Ihr nur ſchwätzt!
Das wäre Kleinigkeit, — geſtört
Zu werden bei den beſten Plänen?
Das wäre Kleinigkeit, — bethört
Zu werden bei dem reinſten Sehnen?
Das auch wohl Kleinigkeit, — gekränkt
Zu werden an der eignen Ehre?
Und gar noch Kleinigkeit, — verſenkt
In's Nichts der Welt durch fremde Schwere? ...."

Hier unterbrach mich Ahasver:
„„Ihr ſprecht, mein Herr, in ſchönen Phraſen,
Doch all' ſolch' Leid iſt ja nicht ſchwer,
Mit einem Hauche wegzublaſen,
Wenn Ihr den einen Teufel nur
— Der jetzt die ganze Welt raſiert
Durch unverſtändige Cultur —
Aus Eurem Kreiſe removirt.
Der Dämon iſt's der Eitelkeit,
Der Euch bereitet all' dies Leid.
Laßt ihn bei einem Haar Euch faſſen.

Univ. Bibl.
München



Gleich wird jed' Haar zum Ankertau,
Er ſchleppt Euch fort durch alle Gaſſen,
Treibt Euch zum Lieben, wie zum Haſſen
Und knechtet Euch, ſo Mann wie Frau.““

Drauf ich: „Ganz unrecht habt Ihr nicht!
Wohl iſt der Schalk ein ſchlimmer Wicht,
Doch größ'res Leid giebt's auf der Welt,
Es heißt mit einem Wort: Kein Geld!
Euch winkt das Glück — Ihr könnt's nicht haſchen,
Da es vor Euch vorüberſchwebt —
Entſetzt greift Ihr in — leere Taſchen,
Verwünſchend, daß Ihr das erlebt.
Das iſt des Schickſals wahre Tücke,
Die Euch am innern Herzen zerrt,
Und ſelbſt auf einer Actien-Brücke
Den Weg zum Paradieſe ſperrt.
Kein Geld! das iſt das größte Leid
In unſrer aufgeklärten Zeit.“ —

Der ew'ge Jude rief: „„Kein Geld
Und ſchwer gekränkte Eitelkeit
Das größte Leid jetzt auf der Welt!
O arge Welt! o ärgre Zeit!!““
Dann eilt' er fort und ließ mich ſtehn,
Sagt' nicht einmal: „„Auf Wiederſehn!““

Ich dachte lang' darüber nach,
Was ich erfuhr an dieſem Tag,
Und kam zuletzt auf einen Troſt,
Der Allen mög' zu Theile werden.
Drum, Leidensbrüder! her zu mir,
Denn guten Balſam hab' ich hier:
Ob Ihr Euch frei ob feſt geloost
Zu ſchwerem Sklavendienſt auf Erden,
Bleibt heiter, wenn die Kraft Euch bleibt,
Den innern Menſchen auszubilden!
Ob Euch dann auch das Schickſal treibt
Zu Cultivirten oder Wilden,

Ihr ſtrebt und wirket nicht vergebens, —
Wie das Geſchick Euch auch verkürzt:
Die Leiden ſind das Salz des Lebens,
Mit denen Gott das Daſein würzt.
Klein oder groß, ſie hindern doch
Nicht in dem Alltag zu verſumpfen;
Wahr oder falſch, ſie wehren, noch
Vor unſerm Alter abzuſtumpfen.
Sie führen erſt in's Leben ein,
Uns auf die Höh' des Daſeins ſchwingend,
Die Seele läuternd und durchdringend,
Bis ſie, von allen Schlacken rein,
Von allen Uebeln iſt geneſen.
Drum hab' ich auch mit vielem Fleiß
Der Leiden Heer hier aufgeſtellt,
Und Mancher, der gar viel ſich weiß,
Wird finden, er ſei doch kein Held,
Wenn er ſich niederdrücken läßt
Von dem, was quält und plagt und preßt.
Nein, will man wirklich haben Ruh'
Am hellen Tag, in dunkler Nacht,
So ſei die Loſung: Ausgelacht
Was Leid heißt und ſich ſelbſt dazu.
Wer es darin zur Force bringt,
Kann ſicher ſein, daß ihm gelingt,
Und hätt' er keinen Pfennig Geld,
Sich zu beherrſchen und die Welt

Von dem Geſichtspunkt ging ich aus,
Als ich das Büchlein hier verfaßt,
So bitt' ich denn in dieſem Haus,
Geehrter Leſer, Dich zu Gaſt.
Sei mir gewogen und tritt ein,
Vergiß darob die eigne Pein,
Gieb Deiner Seele neue Schnellkraft,
Du findeſt ſeltſame Geſellſchaft,
Ob der, wenn Du ſie recht beſiehſt,
Du nicht die Stirn in Falten ziehſt.
Vielleicht gefällt am Ende Dir —
Und große Freude wär' es mir —
Das wunderbare Völkchen da,
Das Volk der —

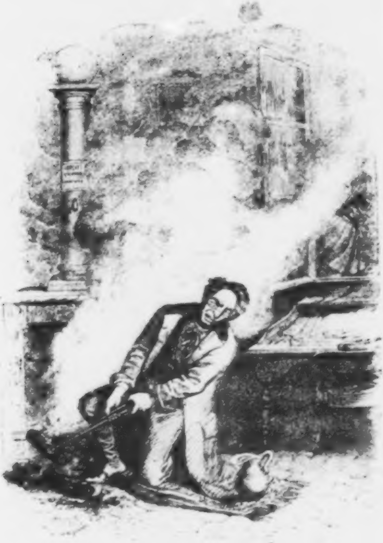
JOCO SERIA

Einleitung.

Plato läßt in ſeinem Gaſtmahl den Apollodoros ſagen: „Theils habe ich Mitleiden mit Euch, Ihr Freunde, daß Ihr bei Eurem nichtigen

Thun ſo viel zu ſchaffen wähnt.“ Ich muß geſtehen, dieſe Worte liegen mir ſtets im Sinne und drängen ſich mir wider Willen über die Lippen, wenn ich nur die Naſe aus dem Fenſter ſtecke. Man ſollte eigentlich das auch gar nicht thun; die Welt wimmelt von Unglück, und man weiß ſich nicht davor zu retten. Pascal bemerkt irgendwo, alles Unglück käme allein davon her, daß die Menſchen ſich nicht ruhig im Zimmer zu halten wüßten. Das iſt allerdings ein ſehr wahres Wort, aber wie Alles unter dem Monde, iſt es kein vollkommener Ausſpruch; denn wie viel Unglück harrt nicht eines armen Erdenſohnes, der ruhig in ſeinem Zimmer bleibt. Ach! unſichtbar, aber darum nicht minder fruchtbar, gedeihen die Dornenranken unſers Daſeins, ſelbſt in der Stubenluft, und wenn man das ganze Jahr auch kein Fenſter öffnete. Das kann ich beweiſen. Recht behaglich hatte ich mir die Lampe angezündet, das Papier zurechtgelegt, die Stahlfedern probirt, ob ſie auch keine ungleichen Spitzen hätten, die Tinte unterſucht, ob ſie auch von Schimmel frei, meinen Stuhl geprüft, ob ſich im Sitze nicht auch verborgene Nadeln fänden, meinen Bedienten weggeſchickt, damit er mich nicht während der glücklichſten Ideenconception mit unnützen Fragen oder am Tage vergeſſenen Beſtellungen unterbräche, kurz alle nur erdenklichen Störungen aus dem Wege geräumt, um ſo recht mit Liebe an dieſem Werke zu arbeiten, das — die Frucht eines bewegten Lebens und reicher Erfahrung — die Menſchen über ihr angeborenes, anerzogenes, angeflogenes Elend unterrichten ſoll, da erhebt ſich plötzlich draußen ein boshafter Novemberſturm, ſo ein recht malitiöſer Nordweſt zu Nord, und ſchlägt an meine Fenſter, daß ſie klirren; zugleich einen feinen, durchdringenden Regen daran peitſchend, gerade ſo wie in jener Nacht zu Eger, als Wallenſtein ermordet wurde. Seelenvergnügt, denn meine Fenſter ſind dicht, die Rouleaux herunter, die Laden vor, und in meinem Zimmer herrſcht die angenehmſte Temperatur, ſchlug ich dem Schickſal ein Schnippchen und ſang recht con amore: Komm nur her, komm nur her, Nordweſt zu Nord! nach der bekannten Melodie: Komm nur her, komm nur her, ſchöner Schweizerbub! und wollte eben, um das Factum recht zu verhöhnen, hinzufügen: Hier ſitz' ich auf Raſen, mit Roſen bekränzt! da bleibt mir plötzlich das Wort Raſen in der Kehle ſtecken, oder viel-

Univ. Bibl.
München



mehr, es überſchlägt ſich rückwärts mir wieder in die Gurgel hinein, und wird halbgequetſcht durch einen gewaltſamen Huſten auf's Neue hinausgeſchleudert, und zur ſelben Zeit treten mir die ätzendſten Thränen in die Augen, verzieht ſich meine Naſe in krampfhaften Zuckungen. Entſetzt, pruſtend, huſtend, ſtöhnend und keuchend ſpringe ich auf, um nach der Urſache dieſer teufliſchen Störung zu ſehen. Aber bin ich das im Stande? Gott bewahre, ein dicker Rauch füllt das Gemach. — Ich Aermſter! Spielball der Schickſalstücken! — Mit allen Winden iſt die Feuereſſe, in die mein Ofen ſeinen Rauch abſetzt, befreundet, nur mit dieſem vertrackten Nordweſt zu Nord nicht, der ſich auf ihr lagert wie Fueßli's berühmter Alp auf der jungen träumenden Schönen, und allen Dampf wieder zurücktreibt, von wannen er kam. Da haben wir nun die Beſcheerung. — Ich reiße das Fenſter auf, nachdem ich Rouleaux und Laden haſtig entfernt und mir dabei noch die Hand verſtaucht habe. Ein eiſig kalter Zugwind durchſchauert mich und treibt noch obendrein den Dampf wieder in das Gemach zurück, anſtatt ihn hinaus zu laſſen; ein feiner Regen ſchlägt mir in's Geſicht und bedeckt mir die Brille mit Tropfen, ſo daß ich gar Nichts ſehe. Inzwiſchen ſchießt mit jedem Windſtoße eine züngelnde, nach meinem eleganten Schlafrocke gierig leckende Flamme wie ein Pfeil aus dem Ofenloche hervor und eine dicke Rauchwolke folgt ihr jedesmal nach, wie der Donner dem Blitz. Es bleibt mir alſo nichts übrig, als ſelbſt Hand an das Werk zu legen und das Feuer zu erſticken. Verzweifelnd knie ich vor dem Ofen hin; alles Waſſer, das mir zur Hand iſt, gieße ich hinein, um das brennende Holz zu löſchen, aber es reicht nicht hin und entwickelt nur noch mehr Dampf und Qualm. Ich greife zur Zange und reiße die glimmenden Scheite aus dem Ofen; doch nun fliegen mir auch Aſche und Funken um das Geſicht; die Luft, die ich einathme, iſt von ihnen und von dem Dampfe voll und zerſtört mir Bruſt und Augen; alle meine Geduld hat ein Ende, und zu welcher Reſignation ich es auch, Dank der Vorſehung, ſchon gebracht habe, mir bleibt doch Nichts übrig, als weinend, huſtend, pruſtend, ächzend, ſtöhnend, frierend und doch vor innerer Erregung ſchwitzend mich und das Zimmer, den Ofen und das Feuer in die

Hölle zu wünſchen und auf dem Eſtrich ſtampfend, taſtend, drückend die einzelnen glimmenden Stücke Holz, Kohlen und Funken auszulöſchen.

Endlich iſt das große Werk vollbracht, aber mein Zimmer kalt, mein Papier vom Regen durchnäßt, weil ich das Fenſter geöffnet ließ, mein Tintenfaß in der Verwirrung umgeworfen, mein Stuhl beſchmutzt, und vor Allem die behagliche Stimmung, in der ich dies unſterbliche Werk beginnen wollte, dahin gefahren, von wannen kein Wiederkehren iſt, wenigſtens ſo lange der verzweifelte Nordweſt zu Nord anhält, und nun frage ich, ob der Apollodoros in Platon's Gaſtmahl nicht Recht habe, weil er Mitleiden fühlt mit ſeinen Freunden, die bei ihrem nichtigen Thun ſo viel zu ſchaffen wähnen?

Ich laſſe mich aber doch nicht irren: dem Schickſal und dem jetzt kalten Zimmer zum Trotz ſetze ich mich mit thränenden Augen und krampfhaftem Huſten, mit halberſtarrten und halbverſengten Fingern von Neuem an den Schreibtiſch, nachdem ich Alles wieder, ſo gut es ging, von Neuem in Ordnung gebracht. So nehme ich denn nun mein Werk und meine Behauptung wieder auf, daß uns im Hauſe eben ſo viele Leiden über den Hals kommen, als im Freien. Wo gedeihen denn die kleinen als Inſecten verkappten Dämonen, die uns ſo entſetzlich plagen, necken, ſtören, beſſer als in unſern Zimmern? Erlaubt, daß ich Euch, nur als einen ſchwachen Beweis, die Arabeske von kleinen Leiden verſinnliche, welche als Dornenguirlande die erſte Seite dieſes Werkes ſchmückt und zu deren Compoſition für einen im Leiden geübten Künſtler nur geringe Erfindungskraft gehörte. Nehmen wir an, das ſei Euch Alles ſelbſt folgendermaßen begegnet, und ich wette, das iſt es ſchon einmal oder wird es ganz gewiß noch einmal. Ihr habt Euch in Gottes freier Natur ergangen, denn Ihr ſeid auch ein Menſch und wollt auch die Natur genießen, weil es Euch ſchon in der Schule gelehrt wurde, wie ſchön die Natur ſei. Da habt Ihr denn einen ganzen Tag daran geſetzt und ſeid über Wald und Berg gezogen, über Waſſer, durch tiefes Thal. O und wie habt Ihr ſie genoſſen: die Sonne hat Euch gebrannt, der Regen durchnäßt, auf den Bergen der Wind Euch eiſig durchſchauert. Aber das ſchadet Nichts, die Natur iſt doch ſchön. — Mücken haben Euch geſtochen, Ameiſen krochen Euch in die Stiefel, Fliegen ſetzten ſich Euch auf die Naſe, Kröten ſpazierten Euch über die Füße, Vögel ſchenkten Euch ſonſt noch etwas, wenn Ihr unter einem Baume ausruhtet, als ihren ſüßen Geſang — aber das ſchadet Nichts, die Natur iſt doch ſchön. — Ueber Wurzeln ſeid Ihr geſtolpert, Dornen haben Euch den Rockſchoß zerriſſen, Aeſte Euch den Hut vom Kopfe geſtreift — das ſchadet Alles Nichts, die Natur iſt doch ſchön. — Mitten im Walde ſind Euch fünf oder ſechs bedenklich ausſehende Kerle begegnet, ungefähr wie dieſe confiſcirte Branntweinsſeele hier, und haben Euch auf eine ſehr unverſchämte Weiſe angebettelt, worüber Eure junge Frau ſich furchtbar entſetzte, was noch ſehr bedenkliche Folgen haben kann. Was kann aber die arme Natur dafür? die iſt doch ſchön. — Die Natur hat ſolche Strolche nicht ſo hervorgebracht, ſondern das ſind ſie erſt durch die civiliſirte Geſellſchaft geworden. Endlich aber, nachdem Ihr alle dieſe Leiden überſtanden, nachdem Ihr mit Eurer ſchwärmeriſchen beſſeren Hälfte einen ganzen Tag im Freien erlebt und die ſchöne Natur wahrhaft idylliſch genoſſen habt, macht Ihr Euch auf den Rückweg. Da ſteigt noch ein Gewitter auf, mit gewaltigem Sturm, der Euch plötzlich Euern Hut vom Kopfe reißt und ihn in das Waſſer ſchleudert. Ihr ſendet Euern wohl dreſſirten Hund nach, den Ihr erſt ſeit einigen Tagen aus ſeiner Erziehungsanſtalt abgeholt, aber die Beſtie gefällt ſich nicht im Waſſer, kehrt wieder um und ſpringt, naß wie ſie iſt, ganz vergnügt Eure junge Frau an, die vor Entſetzen ein lautes Geſchrei erhebt, da ihr ganzer Anzug verdorben wird und ſie noch mit Euch durch die halbe Stadt muß, ehe Ihr Eure Wohnung erreicht. — Ohne Hut könnt Ihr doch auch nicht zurückkommen, denn ein Staatsdiener, der in jetzigen Zeiten ohne Hut durch die Straßen ginge, würde poſitiv ſogleich, aus adminiſtrativen Gründen, als ein Revolutionär abgeſetzt werden, und das geht doch platterdings nicht, wenn man eben erſt geheirathet hat. Alſo Ihr macht Euch ſelbſt an das Werk. Vorſichtig zieht Ihr Strümpfe und Stiefel aus und wagt Euch in das Waſſer, von dem Ihr wißt, daß es nicht tief iſt. Der Sturm hat Euch den Regenſchirm umgeklappt und zerbrochen. Erfinderiſch benutzt Ihr den Stock deſſelben mit dem Griff daran, um Euern Hut zu erfaſſen, der ſich luſtig auf den Wellen wiegt, aber jeden Augenblick unterzuſinken droht. Endlich glückt es Euch, ſiegreich wendet Ihr Euch nun zu der Genoſſin Eurer Freuden in der ſchönen Natur: da ſeht Ihr das Unglück, das Euer Revo mittlerweile in ihrem eleganten Sommeranzuge angerichtet. Und als Ihr nun wieder zu Euern Stiefeln eilt, da hat irgend ein böſer Dämon, gleichviel in welcher Geſtalt, Euch Waſſer hinein practicirt. Die Strümpfe könnt Ihr gar nicht anziehen und die Stiefel — dieſelben Stiefel, mit denen Ihr Euch vor acht Tagen ſo entſetzlich quältet, als Ihr mit Eurer jungen Frau Staatsviſiten bei den Gattinnen Eurer hohen Vorgeſetzten machen wolltet, und — obgleich ſie nicht mehr in der Mode — Eure eleganten aber auch höchſt engen Pantalons bereits angezogen hattet, ſo daß Ihr nicht rück-, nicht vorwärts konntet und im Zimmer umherhüpftet wie ein angeſchoſſener Specht, dieſe Stiefel ſind nun ganz feucht und laſſen ſich nur mit genauer Noth, nachdem Ihr die Füße nicht in die naſſen Strümpfe, ſondern die naſſen Strümpfe in die Taſche ge-ſteckt habt, wieder anziehen. Endlich erreicht Ihr in dem deſolateſten Zuſtande Eure Wohnung. Aber die Natur iſt doch ſchön — ſehr ſchön! ſagt Ihr und denkt: Gottlob, nun hat alle Noth ein Ende. Ja — da müßte man ja kein Menſch ſein. — Nun geht der Jammer erſt recht an. Von dem Fußbade wider Willen habt Ihr pro primo das entſetzlichſte Kopfweh bekommen; Euch iſt zu Muthe, als tanzten Teufel auf Eurem armen Schädel eine Galoppade oder liefen Schlittſchuh darauf, und bohrten ſich mit ihren ſpitzen Stäben gerade an den allerempfindlichſten Stellen recht feſt ein. Ihr wollt etwas eſſen, denn Ihr ſeid bei allem Jammer ſehr hungrig geworden und hofft durch Sättigung die Migraine zu vertreiben, aber die Köchin, die den ganzen freien Tag ſehr fleißig benutzt, um — ſich und ihrem Schatze gütlich zu thun, hat an die arme Herrſchaft gar nicht gedacht und nicht einmal den Reis zu Eurer Suppe ordentlich geleſen, ſo daß Ihr bei dem erſten Löffel Suppe auch gleich einige Steinchen in den Mund bekommt — recht, als ſchöben tückiſche Dämonen ſie Euch abſichtlich hinein — und Euch Eure Zähne beſchädigt. Eure junge Gattin, der es auch den ganzen Tag, trotz aller Schönheit der Natur, recht ſchlecht gegangen iſt, und der — o Grauen! — ein Kleid, ein Shawl, ein Hut und Gott weiß was ſonſt Alles noch verdorben wurde, will es ſich bequem machen und ihrem ſehr durch Sturm und Regen in Unordnung gebrachten Haar durch die ſtarre Haſt der Papilloten während der Nacht wieder die alte Herrlichkeit verſchaffen, um am folgenden Tage mit der Fülle ihrer ſchönen Locken (lauter Netze, in denen ſich Liebesgötter fangen) den zärtlichen Ehemann von Neuem zu beglücken und zu feſſeln, aber — Eure Vorwürfe wegen der kleinlichen Reißſuppe haben die alte verſtockte Köchin ſo aufgebracht, daß ſie mit raffinirteſter Tücke das reiche Haupthaar Eurer beſſeren Hälfte, anſtatt zu brennen, verbrennt, anſtatt es zu ordnen, verwirrt. Bei dem troſtloſen Geſicht Eurer Gemahlin wird Eure Naſe noch einmal ſo lang. Gequält, bedrückt, geärgert, hungrig, frierend ſucht Ihr Euer Lager auf, um in den Armen des Schlafes allen Jammer des Tages — des Tages, an dem Ihr die ſchöne Natur genießen wolltet, zu vergeſſen. — Aber, könnt Ihr ſchlafen? — Aermſter, — nur durch eine Wand geſchieden, hört Ihr, nicht Euer Kind — das ließe ſich noch ertragen, denn was erträgt Aelternliebe nicht — nein, das Kind Eurer Nachbarin, der gattenloſen, die ganze Nacht in den ohrenzerreißendſten Tönen ſchreien und quäken — während Eurer Wohnung gegenüber in der Herberge die Geſellen Freinacht haben und mit türkiſcher Trommel, Drehorgel und Halbmond, welche von kunſtliebenden Dilettanten unter ihnen geſpielt werden, einen Ball improviſiren, der bis zum hellen Tage dauert. Armer Kreuzträger! dieſem infernaliſchen Lärm zum Trotz ſchlaft Ihr endlich ein, aber nun quälen Euch die tollſten Träume: ein wildes Pferd geht mit Euch durch, Diebe haben ſich eingeſchlichen, Mörder zwicken Eure Eingeweide mit glühenden Zangen — ſchreiend wacht Ihr auf, und jetzt tritt die ſchreckliche Wirklichkeit in Geſtalt einer Cholerine mit ihren Folgen, die Ihr Euch durch den Fiſchfang Eures Hutes zugezogen, in Euer Leben und jagt Euch aus dem warmen Lager unbarmherzig hinaus in die dunkle Nacht, dahin, wo Heulen und Zähnklappen iſt. —

Das aber ſind die Dämonen, die Ihr in Euerm Zimmer vorfandet, als Ihr von dem Genuſſe der ſchönen Natur zurückkehrtet. Iliacos muros peccatur intra et extra, das heißt auf deutſch, nicht blos im Freien, ſondern auch im Zimmer quälen und peinigen uns gleich ſehr, unabläſſig, unaufhörlich, unerträglich und unaufhaltſam die tauſend und aber tauſend

Kleinen Leiden
des
menſchlichen Lebens.

Univ. Bibl.
München

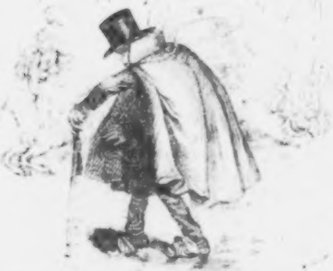
Die Tücken des Winters.

Genrebilder.

Der Winter hat zwei Geſichter wie ſein Schutzheiliger Janus, friedfertigen römiſchen Andenkens. Das eine Antlitz iſt komiſch, das andere tragiſch. Er tödtet und macht ſich luſtig; Beides oft zu derſelben Zeit, nur daß er ſeine Schlachtopfer zu Caricaturen verzerrt.

Herrliches Wetter! ruft der Cammerkaſſencalculator Schiefelbein — ein Junggeſelle in ſeinen beſten Jahren, d. h. über die guten Jahre ſchon längſt hinaus — als er aufwacht. Aber wie täuſcht er ſich. — Ach! was er für Sonnenſchein hält, iſt nur der Wiederſchein des auf den Dächern liegenden Schnees. Unſer Freund, der ſich raſch im Bette aufgeſetzt hatte, fährt mit erſtarrten Schultern wieder unter die Decke und harrt nun auf die Ankunft ſeiner Aufwärterin. Dieſe jedoch, Frau Heinichen genannt, iſt im Winter ſo faul wie ein Murmelthier, und Schiefelbein, der in die Expedition muß, ſteht endlich zähneklappernd auf, den trüben Blick nach ſeinem kalten Ofen richtend, in welchem halbausgebrannte und erloſchene Holzſcheite friedlich neben einander ſchlummern. Während er ſein Phosphorfeuerzeug und ſeine Sammlung alter Zeitungen zur Hälfte conſumirt, um endlich eine Flamme auflodern zu ſehn, betrüben und quälen die finſterſten Gedanken den armen Beamten. Wenn Frau Heinichen gar nicht kommt, ſo iſt er genöthigt, ſich um Haushaltungsangelegenheiten zu kümmern, die ihm ganz fremd geworden ſind, und ſelbſt ſich Milch und Semmel zu holen, um ſeinen beſcheidenen Kaffee nicht ſchwarz wie die Nacht und ohne die nothwendige Begleitung des Frühſtückbrodes hinabſchlucken zu müſſen.

Um wenigſtens etwas Zeit zu gewinnen, beſchließt er mittlerweile Toilette zu machen. Doch vergebens ſieht er ſich nach dem nöthigen Waſſer um: es iſt hart gefroren in dem Waſchbecken und der Caraffe. Beide, die er verzweifelnd ſchüttelt, künden durch einen dumpfen, ſchweren Ton ihm die Dicke des Eiſes an. Die Seife, hart wie Marmor, iſt Eins geworden mit der beſcheidenen Untertaſſe, auf der ſie ruhte. Die am geſtrigen Abende noch feuchten Bürſten ſind vortrefflich geeignet alle Formen der Kryſtalliſation daran zu ſtudiren. Schiefelbein muß aber auf die Expedition und fühlt daher doppelt lebhaft, welch ein Leid es ſei, ſich bei ſolchem Wetter auf die Straße zu wagen



Er betheuert ſich ſelbſt, daß ſeit Menſchengedenken nicht ſolche Kälte geherrſcht habe; aber dieſes hiſtoriſche Zeugniß lindert ſeinen Jammer nicht. Seine Zähne klappern, ſeine Glieder erſtarren, die

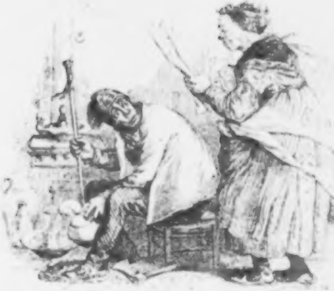
Nägel ſpringen ihm an den Fingern, ſeine Haare richten ſich wie Borſten wieder unter dem Kamme empor. Er trippelt, hüpft und ſpringt, bald vom Ofen an das Fenſter, dann vom Fenſter an die Thür, endlich von der Thür an die Treppe; ungeduldig ruft er dort, da, hier: Frau Heinichen! aber keine Frau Heinichen läßt ſich ſehen.

Endlich kommt ſie .... Ihr aſthmatiſches Keuchen auf der Treppe und das Schlürfen ihrer Pantoffeln erfreut ihn, als ob es die Ankunft eines Gottes verkündigte. Heimlich beglückt, ruft er entzückt mit Schiller, deſſen Dithyrambe ihm gerade als außerordentlich paſſend auf ſeinen Zuſtand, ja, wie recht dafür gedichtet, einfällt:

Nimmer, das glaubt mir,
Erſcheinen die Götter,
Nimmer allein.
Kaum daß ich Bacchus, den luſtigen, habe,
Kommt auch ſchon Amor, der lächelnde Knabe,
Phöbus, der herrliche, findet ſich ein.
Sie nahen, ſie kommen,
Die Himmliſchen Alle,
Mit Göttern erfüllt ſich
Die irdiſche Halle.

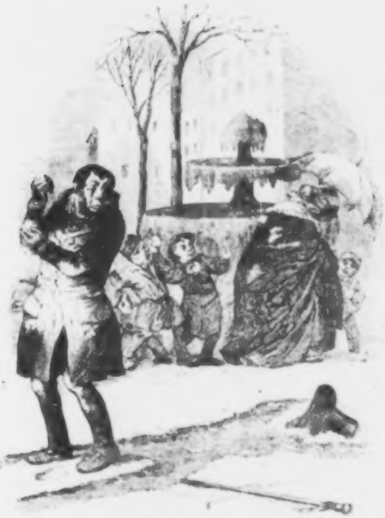
Die Thür öffnet ſich und es kommen herein: Frau Heinichen und eine höchſt unangenehme Zugluft, die die Kälte im Zimmer wenigſtens um drei Grad verſtärkt. Der Kammerkaſſencalculator hält es für gerathener, ſeine Freude zu verbergen und die Aufwärterin mit dem kalten Ernſte eines erzürnten Staatsbeamten zu empfangen. So breit wie möglich ſetzt er ſich vor dem Ofen hin, im Begriff, ihr ein zerſchmetterndes „Nun, kommt ſie endlich?“ zuzuſchleudern; aber Frau Heinichen ahnt das aufſteigende Gewitter und hat ſich, um es zu vertreiben, mit einer mächtigen Entſchuldigung gerüſtet. Es iſt nämlich der Tag, wo Schiefelbein ſeine reine Wäſche erwartet. Sie präſentirt ihm ein Paar geſtern gewaſchener und dem Nachtfroſte ausgeſetzter Strümpfe, die auf ein Haar zwei gedörrten Stockfiſchen gleichen. Die Ueberraſchung, die ihm dieſer Anblick verurſacht, lähmt ihm die Sprache.

Von ſeiner Milde gerührt, iſt die Alte voll der unermüdlichſten Sorgfalt für ihn. Während er ſich zu raſiren glaubt, mit einer



Art von ſtumpfer Säge, die ein Raſirmeſſer heißt und nach dem Kunſtausdruck mehr als einen Draht hat, ſodaß ihm unter heftigen Schmerzen ein Haar ſeines Bartes nach dem andern ausſpringt, hat ſie ihm ſein Frühſtück bereitet. Endlich iſt er ſo weit fertig und eilt nun auf ſein Expeditionszimmer, wo er wenigſtens eine genügende Wärme vorfindet; ungefähr doppelt ſo viel Grad Wärme, als draußen Grad Kälte herrſchen, — denn wenn in unſern bureaukratiſchen Zeiten die Beamten nicht einmal warm ſäßen, wer ſollte es denn thun? da ginge ja nächſtens die Welt unter; aber die geht ſobald nicht unter; jene Herren wiſſen vortrefflich auf Staatsunkoſten für das Beſte des Staates, und das iſt doch gewiß die Erhaltung der Welt, zu ſorgen. Die wärme

Univ. Bibl.
München



ſten Stätten im Winter ſind daher auch immer die Gerichtszimmer, Reiſebureaus, Amtsſtuben u. ſ. w.

Begleiten wir nun den Herrn Kammerkaſſenkalkulator Schiefelbein auf die Straße. Obgleich ihn die Zeit drängt, ſo ſind ſeine Schritte doch ſehr abgemeſſen. Vorſichtig verläßt er das Trottoir jedes Mal überall, wo ſich ein etwas bedenklicher Abhang zeigt. Er hat den Kragen ſeines Ueberrockes ſorgfältig in die Höhe geſchlagen: dieſer, ſowie ſein tief in die Augen gedrückter Hut, deſſen breiter Rand kaum ein Drittel ſeines mageren Geſichtes zeigt, geben ihm ſo ziemlich das Anſehn einer wandelnden Mumie. Indem er ſich einer gewiſſen Straße nähert, wird ſein an ſich ſchon unſicherer Gang immer ſchwankender und ungewiſſer. Ein luſtiges Schreien traf ſein Ohr und er ſieht voraus, daß ſich daſſelbe bei ſeinem Kommen verdoppeln werde. In der That, kaum erſcheint er, ſo ſtimmt ein Dutzend junger Schlingel, mit Backen, die weiß und blau marmorirt ſind, ein Spottlied an. Schiefelbein, der ſie kennt, weiß ſehr wohl, warum die wilde Bande ſich zerſtreut und wem die Schneeballen beſtimmt ſind, von denen jeder dieſer Straßenbuben ſchon einen ziemlichen Vorrath bereit hält. Unſer armer Staatsdiener macht gute Miene zum böſen Spiel und verſucht ſeine Feinde durch ſein kluges Benehmen zu entwaffnen. Vorſichtig lüftet er das gelbe ſeidene Tuch, das er zwei Mal um den Hals gewickelt hat, und macht ſein mageres Antlitz für einen Augenblick frei, um ein gezwungenes Lächeln zu zeigen. Vergebliche Politik, ohne Wirkung auf die unbarmherzigen Gaſſenjungen. Alle ihre Batterieen ſpielen zu gleicher Zeit: von hinten wie von vorn, von der Rechten wie von der Linken treffen ihn pfeifend die unſchuldigen Bomben. Anfangs affectirt Schiefelbein eine ſtoiſche Gelaſſenheit, aber ſein erkünſtelter Muth macht bald natürlicheren Empfindungen Platz. Ein Schneeball trifft ſein Auge: die Geduld verläßt ihn, er zieht ſeinen Naſenwärmer in die Höhe, faßt ſeinen Hut mit beiden Händen und verdoppelt ſcheltend ſeine Schritte. Unglücklicherweiſe hat er die Gefahren einer ſo eiligen Flucht nicht berechnet. Der tückiſche Schnee gleitet ihm unter den Füßen weg und, ehe er ſich deſſen verſieht, gleicht unſer beklagendwerther Kammerkaſſencalculator einem Müllerburſchen auf ein Haar. Er ſteht wieder auf, von unten bis oben gepudert und ſetzt ſchleunig ſeinen Weg fort, froh, daß die kampfluſtige Jugend einen anderen Zielpunkt ihrer Schießübungen gefunden hat. Aber an einer anderen Stelle, die ſo glatt iſt wie polirter Stahl und ſich ein wenig neigt, verliert er von Neuem das Gleichgewicht und legt ſich der Länge nach glorreich auf den Rücken hin. Nehmen wir an, daß in dieſem Augenblicke ſein Präſident vorüberkäme: hätte der Winter nicht Urſache in ſeinen alten, bereiften Bart zu lachen?

Aber nicht an alten Junggeſellen allein, ſondern auch an ganz anderen Leuten läßt der Winter ſeine Tücken aus. Du haſt, lieber, junger, eleganter Leſer, auf dem geſtrigen Balle mit einer jener bleichen zierlichen Sylphiden gewalzt, deren zarten Teint eine durchtanzte Nacht kaum röthet. Iſt ſie es wirklich, die dir heute begegnet, aus der Kirche kommend, ſchwerfällig in dickes Pelzwerk und wattirte Stoffe gehüllt? Dieſes mißgeſtaltete Pack Kleider, das wäre ihre Wespentaille? dieſe blauen, aufgeſprungenen Lippen ihr Roſenmund? Willſt du unter dieſen Augenliedern, roth wie die eines Eskimo, ihren ruhigen und ſchönen Blick ſuchen? Ihr zarter Fuß wenigſtens, unter dem ſich kaum die goldene Aehre beugt, wenn er ſie berührt. . . . um Gottes willen! dieſer ſo leichte Fuß zerbricht eine dicke Eiskruſte und kommt eben nicht im angenehmſten Zuſtand wieder aus einer kothigen Goſſe hervor.

Zeigen wir ein anderes Bild. Funfzehnhundert Perſonen, die Sahne einer großen und glänzenden Reſidenz, ſind verſammelt, um die göttlichſte Muſik von der Welt zu genießen. Nichts iſt verſäumt worden das herrliche Kunſtwerk in ſeiner möglichſten Vollkommenheit vorzuführen. Das Geld — dieſer Herrſcher — hat alle Hinderniſſe aus dem Wege geräumt. Zwei berühmte Tenore geben Gaſtrollen; die Prima Donna und zwar eine wirkliche Prima Donna ſteht ſchon auf der Bühne. Eine Kapelle, deren Ripieniſten ſelbſt Virtuoſen ſind, begleitet mit der genaueſten Aufmerkſamkeit den Geſang. — Still, wenn ich bitten darf. Niemand rühre ſich — Nehmen Sie ſich ja in Acht, mein Herr, daß die feinen Sohlen Ihrer Schuhe nicht knarren. — Um Gottes willen, gnädige Frau, ſtecken Sie die Camelie feſt, die aus Ihren Locken auf die Baluſtrade fallen und durch das Geräuſch unſere Freude ſtören könnte. — Stille! Bitte! kein Wort, keinen Laut. — Da wird der erſte Accord angeſchlagen. . . . .

Die Prima Donna. Crudel tiranno!

Eine Baßſtimme im Orcheſter. Krumm! Krmmm!

Chor der Dilettanten. Scht! Scht!

Die Prima Donna. Pietà di me!

Eine Baronin. Atſchi! Atſchi!

Ihre Nachbarin. Ihr Wohlſein!

Chor in den Logen. Scht! Scht!

Die Prima Donna. Vorrei morir!

Ein Staatsminiſter. Krrrr! tſcht! gbhh!

Ein Präſident. Aber — meiner Treu — das iſt unerträglich! (Er ſchnäuzt ſich.)

Die Prima Donna. Vo - o - orrei morir! Vo - orrei moooooorir!

Allgemeiner Chor. Schſch!

Um dieſe Verſammlung wohlerzogener Zuhörer in ein lärmendes Bacchanal zu verwandeln, bedurfte es nur einer Laune des Winters und einige zwanzig jener antimuſikaliſchen Schnupfen, mit denen er die am ſicherſten verwahrten Kehlen, die am ſorgfältigſten bedeckten Häupter überfällt, ſtellten ſich gehorſam ein.

Die Liebhaber und die Diebe — zwei Claſſen von Bürgern, welche von einander zu unterſcheiden ſehr ſchwer fällt, haben auch ſehr oft einen Zahn auf dieſe grauſame Jahreszeit.

Vermittelſt einer Strickleiter überſteigt Jemand die Mauern eines Parks. Die von dem Froſte gehärtete Erde hallt, zu ſeinem Schrecken, unter ſeinen Tritten wieder. Wenn der Schloßhund aufwachte!! Der Gärtner, der bereits auf den Beinen iſt und die Flinte bereit hält, lauert vielleicht ſchon mit böſem Blicke auf den nächtlichen Beſucher. Dieſer ſchreitet dennoch vor, langſam, mit geſenktem Haupte, gerunzelter Stirn; hinter jedem Baum bleibt er ſtehen und ſegnet ganz leiſe den Himmel, welcher anfängt ſich mit Wolken zu bedecken. Von dieſem beſchützt, erreicht er endlich das Ziel und mit Nachſchlüſſeln oder mit Dietrichen verſehen — je nachdem Amor oder Merkur ſeine Schritte leitet — dringt er in das Schloß ein. — Zwei oder drei Stunden verſtreichen, während welcher der Schnee, in dichten Flocken fallend, eine dicke Decke über die Erde ſchüttet. Unſer geheimnißvoller Nachtwandler — iſt's ein Liebender? — erſcheint wieder auf der Schwelle, die er raſch hinter ſich läßt. O Schrecken und Entſetzen! Wie ſoll er entfliehen, ohne dem Boden verrätheriſche Fußſtapfen einzudrücken? Eginhard entkam einer ähnlichen Verlegenheit durch die Treue ſeiner kraftvollen Geliebten; aber das Blut Karl's des Großen fließt nicht in den Adern jeder hübſchen Dame. Auch könnte die Wohlthat nur einem Liebenden nützen. — Aber der Dieb, der unglückliche Dieb, iſt der nicht zu beklagen? Wie viel Dank iſt nicht die Criminaljuſtiz dem Winter ſchuldig, der ſo geſchickt und trefflich für ſie ſorgt.

Vor der ſtrengen Moral verdienen jene Leute wenigſtens das Schickſal, das ſie trifft. Welches Verbrechen hat aber jener arme Teufel begangen, der in einer lappländiſchen Nacht, an der Seite ſeiner theuern Ehehälfte eben beginnt, ſich der Süßigkeit des Schlafes zu erfreuen?

— Lieber Mann! —

Keine Antwort. Der Ton der Anrede wird ſtärker.

— Auguſt, wach' doch auf!

Auguſt wacht gähnend auf.

— Was iſt? — Was giebt's? was haſt du denn, zum Kuckuk?—

— Haſt du nachgeſehn, als du zu Hauſe kamſt, ob das Feuer im Wohnzimmer auch aus war?

— Das Feuer im Wohnzimmer? .... Nein, meiner Treu .... Haſt du noch Feuer machen laſſen?

— Ja, ich dachte, du würdeſt dich in der warmen Stube ausziehen wollen, wenn du kämſt. —

— Und die Klappe iſt nicht zugemacht? Wie?!

— Mir iſt, als röche es brenzlicht —

Bei dieſer Bemerkung ſteckt der beſorgte Hausherr ein Bein aus dem Bette; aber ehe noch ſein Fuß die Erde berührt, ſagt er vorſichtig:

— Wenn wir Hannen klingelten!

— Ja, wenn der Glockenzug nicht entzwei wäre. Auch würdeſt du den Kleinen aufwecken. —

— Höchſt ſonderbar! So ſpät noch in der Wohnſtube heizen zu laſſen.

— Es war ja zu deinem Beſten. .... Aber geh doch hin und ſieh nach; der Geruch wird immer ſtärker.

— Brrrr. — Wo iſt mein Schlafrock?

— Hanne hat ihn mitgenommen, um ihn auszubeſſern. — Aber geh doch nur .... mir wird ſo entſetzlich bange zu Muth.

— Na, erfroren oder gebraten, das kommt auf eins heraus.

— Meinethalben — denkt die zärtliche Gattin — aber braten muß ich mit dir und erfrieren thuſt du allein.

Das überſetzt ſie aber:

— Geh doch, lieber Auguſt! Ich ſterbe vor Angſt bei deinem Zaudern.

Der beſorgte Ehemann ſpaziert nun ohne Begleitung die Treppe hinab, die nur zweiundzwanzig Stufen hat.

Im Kamin des Wohnzimmers auf einem Haufen Aſche ſieht er noch zwei kleine mattglimmende Steinkohlen, die auch von ſelbſt erloſchen ſein würden. —

Na, die ſollen mir wieder ſo ſpät mit Einheizen kommen' denkt der gute Gatte ärgerlich und beeilt ſich zähnklappernd und frierend, ſein warmes Bett wieder zu erreichen. Als er dort angelangt iſt, findet er ſeine ängſtliche Gattin ſanft eingeſchlafen und auf ſein Brummen antwortet ſie nur mit melodiſchem Schnarchen.

◆

Ein Abend in der franzöſiſchen Oper.

Aus dem Reiſetagebuche eines deutſchen Kleinſtädters.

Mein erſter Gang war natürlich nach dem Palais-Royal. Noch auf dem Wege dahin las ich an einer Straßenecke die Affichen und ſah zu meiner Freude, daß an demſelben Abende die Hugenotten gegeben würden. Welch ein glückliches Zuſammentreffen! So wie ich, der Deutſche, nach Paris komme, begrüßt mich ſogleich das Werk eines deutſchen Meiſters, eines geborenen Berliners. Ja, von Deutſchland aus wird das wahre Heil über Frankreich kommen. — Das fühlte ich nur zu tief, und das ſtimmte mich ſehr freudig. Deutſche Gründlichkeit, deutſche Muſik, deutſche Treue, deutſche Ehrlichkeit, lauter Dinge, die man bisher in Frankreich nicht zu ſchätzen, nicht zu erkennen wußte, ſie werden, ſie müſſen ſich Bahn brechen und die Franzoſen noch erkennen, daß, wenn ſie auch unſern Geſchmack durch ihre Moden, wir ſie ſelbſt dereinſt durch unſere Tugenden beherrſchen werden. Es iſt doch ein wunderbares Gefühl, ein Deutſcher zu ſein.

Das muß man jedoch den Franzoſen laſſen, bis jetzt noch wiſſen ſie die Ereigniſſe und Erſcheinungen des Alltagslebens viel beſſer zu faſſen und zu handhaben als wir. Ich erinnere mich noch ſehr deutlich, als in Rattenhauſen vorigen Winter zum erſten Mal auf ausdrücklichen Befehl Sereniſſimi zum Geburtstage unſerer gnädigſten Fürſtin, ungeachtet aller Beſorgniſſe und Einwendungen des hohen Staatsminiſteriums, die Stumme von Portici gegeben wurde, wie ſich da Alles ſchon um drei Uhr vor dem Schauſpielhauſe lagerte, ſammelte, drängte, ſtieß und quetſchte, ganz ſo wie Seine Excellenz, der weiland großherzogliche Staatsminiſter und Geheimerath, Herr Johann Wolfgang von Goethe in ſeinem unſterblichen Trauerſpiele Fauſt (Siehe den Prolog, Stuttgart, bei Cotta, 1825. S. 7 und folgende) unübertrefflich ſchön dichtet, daß (bei Herrn von Goethe heißt es eigentlich wenn, aber dieſe kleine Variante wird man mir wohl geſtatten, da ich mir weiter keine Aenderung erlaube und es ſo vortrefflich paßt), alſo daß:

— ſich der Strom nach unſrer Bude drängt
Und mit gewaltig wiederholten Wehen
Sich durch die enge Gnadenpforte zwängt;
Bei hellem Tage, ſchon vor Vieren,
Mit Stößen ſich bis an die Kaſſe ficht,
Und wie in Hungersnoth um Brod an Bäckerthüren
Um ein Billet ſich faſt die Hälſe bricht.

Wie ganz anders iſt es dagegen in Paris. Da heißt es, wer zuerſt kommt, malt zuerſt, und wer zuletzt kommt, muß warten, bis ſeine Vorderleute befriedigt ſind. Da werden ſie ordentlich durch Geländer, die man anſetzt, eingepfercht, und Schildwachen ſind dabei aufgeſtellt und dulden nicht, daß ſich Einer vordrängt, und wenn's ein General wäre. Das iſt Gleichheit der Menſchenrechte und da giebt es keine privilegirte Kaſte, wie leider noch in Deutſchland, beſonders in den kleinen Reſidenzen. Eine ſolche Aufſtellung nun, bis zur Oeffnung der Kaſſe, heißt in Paris eine queue.

Ich habe mir den Kopf zerbrochen, um den Urſprung dieſer Benennung zu finden, aber es hat mir nicht glücken wollen, obgleich ich ſonſt gar nicht erfolglos in etymologiſchen Forſchungen bin. In dem ſehr reichhaltigen Lexikon von Wolff und Lenz (Weimar 1836, zweite Auflage) finde ich Seite 1030 zwar unter dem Artikel queue neben einigen dreißig anderen Bedeutungen dieſes Wortes auch die Redensart angegeben: Il y a queue à ce spectacle und erklärt durch „man ſteht in einer Reihe, wenn dies Schauſpiel gegeben wird, es iſt ſehr beliebt, man drängt ſich dazu" — aber das kann mir nicht genügen und giebt mir keine Aufhellung über den Urſprung dieſes Ausdruckes. Ich will es mir notiren, und wenn ich mit Gottes Hülfe wieder zu Hauſe bin, es gründlich zu erforſchen ſuchen und eine kleine Abhandlung für unſere linguiſtiſche und ethnographiſche Mittwochsgeſellſchaft darüber ſchreiben. Für jetzt will ich es aber dabei bewenden laſſen und zu Papier bringen, wie es mir an jenem Abende erging, was gegenwärtig doch das Wichtigſte und Nothwendigſte bleibt.

Ich ſtellte mich alſo auch in die Queue hin; aber meine kleine und ſchmächtige Geſtalt, die mir ſonſt immer bei allen öffentlichen Schauſpielen ſehr zu Statten kommt, war mir diesmal etwas hinderlich. Die Maſſe mehrte ſich mit jedem Augenblicke und bald war ich von meinem Nachbar zur Rechten, einem dicken Engländer, ſo in meinen Nachbar zur Linken, einen ſtämmigen Amerikaner, hineingedrängt, daß ich mir wirklich vorkam wie ein in einen unbeholfenen Bleiklumpen gefaßtes Juwel. Ich ließ mir das eine Zeitlang gefallen, als es jedoch zu arg wurde, lehnte ich mich mit Zunge und Elbogen, die ich beide ſo ſpitz wie möglich machte, gegen dieſes Unterdrückungs- oder richtiger Zerdrückungsſyſtem auf. Nun warfen ſich aber meine beiden Nachbarn argliſtig einen Blick des Einverſtändniſſes zu und, ſich durch eine combinirte Bewegung raſch einander nähernd, ſchleuderten ſie mich plötzlich zurück, ſodaß ich meinem Hintermann zwiſchen die Beine gerieth. Dieſer benutzte, wie ich zu meinem größten Leidweſen mir erſt ſpäter deutlich machte, den Umſtand mit ſeltener Gewandtheit, mein Taſchentuch zu ſtibitzen; ein ſchönes, feines linnenes Tuch, das meine geliebte Henriette, als wir uns verlobten, nebſt fünf andern Tüchern von derſelben Qualität und Feinheit, ſelbſt geſäumt und die Anfangsbuchſtaben meines Namens hineingeſtickt hatte. Dieſer Verluſt ſchmerzte mich ſehr und betrübt mich noch immer, wenn ich daran denke. Damals aber ward ich es nicht gleich gewahr, ſo ſehr waren meine Gedanken auf den mir bevorſtehenden Genuß gerichtet, der noch erhöht werden ſollte dadurch, daß, wie ich von den Umſtehenden in der Queue vernahm, der König mit ſeiner ganzen Familie das Theater beſuchen würde. Louis Philipp war ja für mich die größte hiſtoriſche Merkwürdigkeit in Paris, und da ich nicht wagte mich den Tuilerien oder Neuilly zu nahen, aus Furcht, der Abſicht eines Attentats auf das Leben dieſes Monarchen aus dem Hauſe Orleans, welche ſich damals nur zu oft wiederholten, für verdächtig gehalten und gefänglich eingezogen zu werden, ſo war mir dieſe Gelegenheit, meine geſchichtliche Wißbegierde zu befriedigen, ſehr erwünſcht, und ich betrachtete es als einen beſondern Glücksfall, an demſelben Abende, der noch dazu der erſte ſeit meiner Ankunft in Paris war, gleich ſo zu ſagen zwei Fliegen mit einer Klappe ſchlagen zu können. Sobald ich daher an die Kaſſe kam, nahm ich ſogleich ein Billet für das Parkett, weil ich hoffte von hier aus Alles auf das Bequemſte im ganzen Hauſe zu ſehen, da ich mich mit tüchtigen Binocles bewaffnet hatte*). Aber nur zu bald bereute ich die Wahl, das Haus drohte ſehr voll zu werden; ich hatte den vierten Sitz von der Ecke bekommen und die Hälfte der ganzen Reihe mußte bei mir vorüber. Die Sperrſitze ſind aber entſetzlich ſchmal und eng. Da ich ſelbſt nur ſchmächtig und klein bin, ſo ward ich nach den Geſetzen der Phyſik bei dem Durchdrängen am meiſten gepeinigt; denn

---

*) Für meine des Franzöſiſchen unkundigen Freunde bemerke ich, daß binocle, aus dem Lateiniſchen von bis und oculus herkommend und daraus zuſammengeſetzt, ein Inſtrument bedeutet, welches aus zwei in der Entfernung beider Augen an einander befeſtigten, durch eine Schraube zu ſtellenden Operngucken beſteht. — In der Naturgeſchichte bezeichnet binocle dagegen ein Schalthier, das Doppelauge genannt der Druck, den ein ſolider, compacter, ſchwerer menſchlicher Körper auf mich ausübte, konnte durch den Gegendruck meiner kleinen Figur nicht in eine Art von Gleichgewicht gebracht werden, ſondern erhielt eher noch Verſtärkung. Das Gedränge wuchs und ich litt dadurch faſt an allen Stellen meines armen Leibes, ſo ſehr ich mich auch bemühte, indem ich mich zuſammendrängte und den Athem einzog, das Volumen meines Körpers zu verringern.

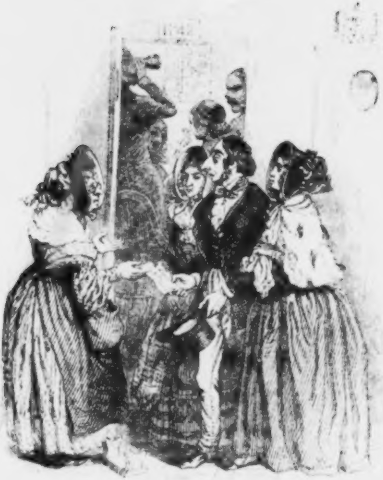
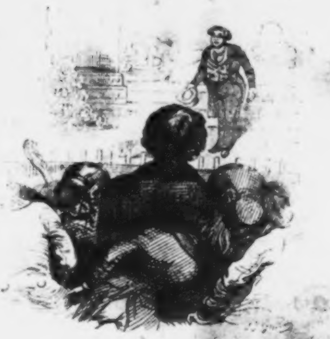
Zwar durfte ich hoffen, daß mit dem Beginne der Oper ſich der Zudrang legen würde, aber mit jedem Zwiſchenacte mußte ſich das Uebel wiederholen und ich lief wirklich Gefahr — ohne alle Uebertreibung geredet — nicht mit ganzen Gliedmaßen das Theater am Schluſſe verlaſſen zu können. Was hatte ich nicht ſchon Alles ausgeſtanren' — Mit der größten Artigkeit und einem ſtereotypen Pardon, Monsieur, das mit den verſchiedenſten Betonungen ausgeſprochen wurde, hatte ſich ein neuangekommener Zuſchauer derſelben Reihe nach dem anderen an mir vorübergequetſcht; bald hatten ſich unſere Uhrketten und Knöpfe verfitzt, wie das Tauwerk und die Steuer zweier Schiffe, die ein Sturm zuſammenſtoßen läßt, bald trat mir Einer auf meine Hühneraugen, bald drängte mich Einer mit ſeinem hinteren Menſchen, daß mir der Athem ausging; bald wieder legte ſich ein Vierter, den die Gottheit mit einem beträchtlichen Bauche geſegnet, dermaßen auf mich, daß ich faſt die Fähigkeit zu hören und zu ſehen verlor und meinte, zu Hauſe in meinem Bette und vom Alp gedrückt zu ſein. Endlich ſtillte ſich der Sturm und ich hatte wenigſtens in ſo fern Urſache, mich über meinen Platz zu freuen, als vor mir ein leerer Sitz war, weßhalb ich auch der feſten Hoffnung lebte, zwiſchen den großen Hüten der rundherumſitzenden Damen hindurch mindeſtens etwas ſehen zu können. Aber weh mir! Wer malt meinen Schreck, als ſich urplötzlich mein Freund, der dicke Amerikaner, durch die gefüllten Reihen drängt und auf dem leeren Sitze Platz nimmt, ſo daß mir jetzt auch alle und jede Ausſicht verſperrt ward. Wie ich mich auch drehn und wenden mochte, um irgend eine Lücke zu erhaſchen, durch die ich meine Blicke nach der Bühne ſenden konnte; es war vergeblich.

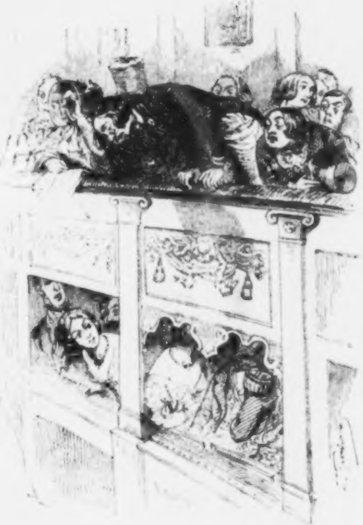
Um das Maß meiner Leiden voll zu machen, hörte ich nun noch obendrein, denn ſehen konnte ich ja Nichts, daß der Regiſſeur vortrat und dem Publicum anzeigte: durch eine plötzliche Krankheit der erſten Sängerin ſei es unmöglich, die Oper zu geben; er erlaube ſich daher das Publicum zu fragen, ob es ſtatt deſſen das Ballet La Juive zu ſehen wünſche. Dieß wurde mit Acclamation von allen Seiten angenommen und brachte mich zur Verzweiflung. Ich haſſe das Ballet, es iſt der Ruin aller Bühnen. Seit Sereniſſimus in Rattenhauſen den Balletmeiſter aus München angeſtellt und die Chorſchüler und Bürgertöchter zu einem corps de ballet hat zuſtutzen laſſen, ſind Schiller, Goethe, Shakeſpeare und Raupach auf immer von der Bühne bei uns verſchwunden und mit ihnen aller Adel der dramatiſchen Künſte. — Für mich war nun kein Intereſſe mehr an dieſem Abende, als der Anblick Seiner Majeſtät, des Königs der Franzoſen, und ich beſchloß die ganze Abend-

Univ. Bibl.
München





zeit dazu zu verwenden, ſein erhabenes Antlitz recht aus dem Grunde zu ſtudiren und mir einzuprägen. — In der Idee Alles daran zu ſetzen, eilte ich zu dem Kaſſirer und verlangte den erſten Platz in einer Loge. Anfangs wollte er nicht, aber ich nahm mich zuſammen und donnerte ihm eine Philippica zu. Das half und er war ſo gefällig, meine Bitte für das Doppelte des gewöhnlichen Preiſes zu gewähren, ſo daß mich der Platz ungefähr acht Gulden im Vierundzwanzig-Guldenfuß koſtete; aber das ſchien mir nicht zu viel, um Louis Philipp ganz à mon aise zu betrachten. — Ich begab mich jetzt nach dem zweiten Range und freute mich im Stillen, noch etwas mehr Glück gehabt zu haben, als eine Familie vom Lande, die ich auf dem Corridor antraf und die unter anhaltendem Regen eine Reiſe von zehn Meilen zurückgelegt hatte, um auch einmal die weltberühmten Hugenotten zu hören, jetzt aber, im Beſitz mühſam erworbener, theuer erhandelter, ungültiger Billets, nicht einmal das Ballet zu ſehen bekam. Mich dagegen nahm ein vortrefflicher Vorderplatz auf. Nachdem ich mich bequem hingeſetzt, ließ ich die Augen umherſchweifen, doch nirgends konnte ich etwas Königliches erblicken. Endlich faßte ich ein Herz und fragte meine Nachbarin, eine Dame, die unaufhörlich durch ihre Binocles (Siehe die Anmerkung auf der Seite 46) nach der Loge gegenüber blickte: „Pardon, Madame, où est la loge du Roi?" — was auf Deutſch heißt: „Verzeihen Sie, Madame, wo iſt die Loge des Königs?" Sie ſah mich verwundert an, erwiederte jedoch kurzweg: Exactement sous celle-ci, Monsieur (Gerade unter dieſer, mein Herr), und rückte etwas von mir fort. Ich ſaß wie vom Donner gerührt. Gedrängt, gequetſcht, getreten zu ſein, acht Gulden im Vierundzwanzig-Guldenfuß gezahlt zu haben, um den König zu ſehn und nun, ſo ſehr ich mich auch über die Brüſtung hinabbeugte, Nichts gewahren zu können, als in ſeltenen Augenblicken die Naſenſpitze Seiner Majeſtät — das ſchien mir doch zu große Tücke des Schickſals — und kein anderer Platz war, wie mir der Kaſſirer verſichert, im ganzen weiten Hauſe mehr zu haben, ſelbſt wenn ich ſechzehn Gulden im Vierundzwanzig-Guldenfuß dafür hätte zahlen wollen. — Unabläſſig legte ich mich nun mit halbem Leibe über die Loge hinaus, um wenigſtens etwas zu ſchauen, aber meine Augen vermochten Nichts zu erfaſſen als beſagte königlich franzöſiſche Naſenſpitze, eine Seitenlocke der Herzogin von Orleans und den Rand der Epauletten des Herzogs von Nemours. Obendrein zürnten meine Logennachbaren unaufhörlich mit mir: Asseyez-vous! Asseyez-vous donc, Monsieur! rief man von allen Seiten, welches hieß: Setzen Sie ſich doch, mein Herr. — Mon Dieu, je crois qu'il a l'intention d'un suicide, flüſterte die Dame neben mir, mich in den Verdacht des Selbſtmordes habend, ihrem Begleiter zu. Dieſer, dem Anſcheine nach ein Offizier von hohem Range, ſtand leiſe auf, ging hinaus und kehrte nach einer Weile wieder. Gleich darauf fühlte ich plötzlich eine Hand auf meiner Schulter; ich ſah mich um; ein Sergent de ville ſtand hinter mir und bat mich, ihm zu folgen. Ich that es. Draußen erklärte er mich für einen Arreſtanten. Alle meine Proteſtationen halfen Nichts; ich mußte ihm in ein unteres Gemach folgen



Univ. Bibl.
München

und dort verweilen, bis endlich nach mehren Stunden ein Commiſſar kam und mich verhörte. Nun klärte ſich Alles auf, man entließ mich mit höflichem Bedauern. Das Theater war aus, die Menge ſtrömte fort. Draußen regnete es entſetzlich. Ich hatte einen weiten Weg zu Hauſe und ſah mich nach einem Fiaker um. Ein einziger war noch da. — Eben will ich einſteigen, da kommt mein Feind, der verwünſchte Amerikaner, ſtößt mich weg, nimmt vor meinen Augen Beſitz von meinem Fuhrwerk und ich muß nun zu Fuß nach Hauſe, wo ich, nachdem ich mich unzählige Mal verirrt und in beſtändiger Angſt geſchwebt, angefallen und beraubt zu werden, endlich bis auf die Haut naß und von Kopf zu Fuß beſchmutzt anlange.

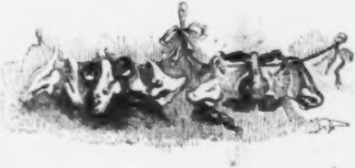
So iſt es mir zum erſten Mal in der franzöſiſchen Oper gegangen. Geſtoßen, gequetſcht, um acht Gulden und ein Taſchentuch ärmer und gar Nichts geſehen. Aber ich weiß nun Beſcheid: das nächſte Mal ſoll es mir nicht ſo gehen.



Denkwürdigkeiten einer Nase, erzählt von einem Munde.

Nach dem Franzöſiſchen.

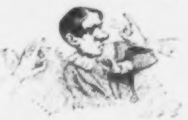
Die Jahre hatten ſie einander nahe gebracht. Seit geraumer Zeit ſenkte ſich dieſe Naſe dem Grabe zu. Seinerſeits ſtrebte das Kinn, das ſich immer mehr ſpitzte, hinauf. Die Zeit geſchwätziger Mittheilung und herzbewegender Erinnerungen war gekommen. Die Naſe ſprach; ſie hatte ſchon die Gewohnheit, es zu thun. Der Mund hörte zu. Das könnte gewiſſe beſchränkte Köpfe in Erſtaunen ſetzen. Nachher wiederholte er es. Das geſchah ihm oft.

Ich war ſchon lange auf der Welt, ſagte ſie, ehe ich zum Bewußtſein meines Selbſt kam. Wir gehören Beide, wie du weißt, demſelben Individuum, das eigentlich gar nichts Frühreifes hat, mich ausgenommen, die ich mich ſchon ſehr früh entwickelte und in die Welt hinausſtrebte; ich gab dem Geſichte, das ich beherrſchte, einen Charakter, deſſen es urſprünglich nicht fähig zu ſein ſchien.

Die Amme meines Herrn bemerkte es zuerſt, und nachdem ſie eine Zeitlang über die Urſachen, die mich ſo unbequem machten, nachgedacht, benutzte ſie den Umſtand, um ſich dem beſchwerlichen Geſchäfte des Stillens zu entziehen. Statt deſſen mußte ein in Milch getauchtes linnenes Bündelchen die Dienſte thun, und wir uns ſo gut wie möglich damit behelfen.

Wir lebten, aber wir gediehen nicht. Schon machte ſich der verderbliche Einfluß, den ich lange um mich her ausgeübt, fühlbar. Ich hatte groß werden wollen und ich war es, aber auf meine und meiner Umgebung Koſten, wie das immer der Fall iſt. Wäre der Himmel gerecht, ſo würde der Ehrgeiz nur ſich allein in's Verderben ſtürzen.

Ich war groß und das, wie ich bereits ſagte, ſchon ſehr früh, daher zog ich auch die allgemeine Aufmerkſamkeit auf mich. Sobald mich meine Wärterin auf einen öffentlichen Spaziergang führte, hatte ich gar viele Naſenſtüber und Spottreden zu erdulden, ſodaß meine Begleiterin es kaum ertrug. Glücklicherweiſe war ſie hübſch und fand viele Leute geneigt, ſie zu tröſten. Ich war ihnen nützlich als Anknüpfungspunkt. Sie begannen gewöhnlich mit irgend einer Artigkeit für ſie, wenn auch nicht für mich.



„Das iſt doch unmöglich Ihr eigenes Kind,' — ſagten ſie — ‚das könnte doch nicht ſolche Naſe haben?"

Oder auch:

„Nie hat eine große Naſe" (dabei zeigten ſie auf mich) „ein hübſches Geſicht entſtellt" (ſie deuteten dabei auf ihr Antlitz).

Auf dieſe Weiſe bediente man ſich meiner, wußte mir deſſen aber keinen Dank; überall zurückgeſtoßen, führte ich die Exiſtenz eines Einſiedlers, in die ich natürlich Alles, was von mir abhing, mit mir hineinzog.

Man ſagt, von der Einſamkeit werden nur die Dummen fett. Ich glaube, mein Herr war dumm, denn ich nahm ganz entſetzlich zu. Wir wurden Beide in die Schule geſchickt, und auch da trafen mich wiederholt unerhörte Beleidigungen. Mein Herr that, was er konnte, um mich zu rächen, ich hätte ihm das gern erlaſſen, denn ſeine Empfindlichkeit trug gar unangenehme Früchte für mich. Ich machte ihm das fühlbar. Er wurde mürriſch, kam nicht mehr zu den Spielſtunden, faßte eine Leidenſchaft für die alten Claſſiker, büffelte für vier und fügte nun zu den Annehmlichkeiten ſeiner angeborenen Beſchränktheit noch die einer ſtöckiſchen und verdrießlichen Pedanterie. Fünf Jahre hinter einander bekam er den Preis im Examen und verdankte nur mir allein jedes Mal den Sieg, obwohl es Niemand ahnte. Später geſchah das freilich nicht mehr.

Mein Eintritt in die Welt hat mir Erinnerungen hinterlaſſen, die in gleichem Verhältniſſe zu meinem Umfange ſtehn. Sie dauern noch fort. Als ich in dem Salon eines ſehr berühmten Arztes erſchien, entſtand plötzlich auf allen Seiten eine merkwürdige Stille. Die Damen machten, erſtaunt, ſehr große Augen; einige Herren lorgnettirten mich mit der unverſchämteſten Ruhe. Dann flüſterte man ſich einander etwas zu und das ſchien meinem Herrn ſo unangenehm zu ſein, daß er mich höher trug als je.

Während das erſte Staunen über meine Erſcheinung ſich allmälig verlor, umgaben zwei oder drei von ſeinen jüngeren Collegen den Herrn des Hauſes.

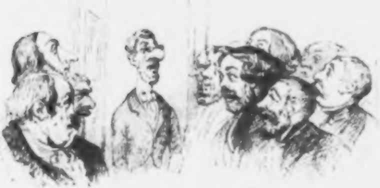
— „Das iſt erſtaunlich!" ſagte der Eine.

— „Wunderbar! Außerordentlich! Pyramidaliſch!" — fügten die Anderen hinzu.

— „Nur" — bemerkte der Vertrauteſte — „iſt die Wahrſcheinlichkeit nicht geſchont werden."

— „Der Stoff auch nicht,“ — ſagte ein Zweiter.

„Und das mit Recht,“ — hub ein Anderer an.



„Aber, meine Herren,“ — rief der Aeſkulap — „mit wem haben Sie es denn eigentlich vor? Wie komme ich denn zu dieſem ſonderbaren Gemenge von Complimenten und Vorwürfen, die mir zu Theil werden? Wovon reden Sie denn eigentlich?“

— „Von der Operation!“ — antworteten ſie im Chor, auf meinen Herrn zeigend.

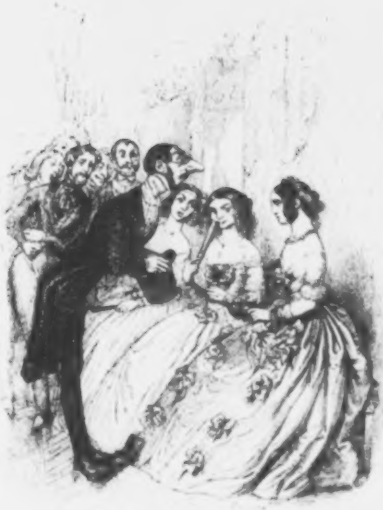
„Ich verſichere Ihnen,“ — ſagte der Arzt leiſer — „daß ich dieſen Herrn nie operirt habe.“

„Warum nicht gar!“ rief der Vorlauteſte von der ganzen Bande. „Wer hätte denn die Nähte ſo außerordentlich geſchickt machen können, daß ſie faſt unſichtbar ſind? Wer wäre im Stande geweſen, dem vorgeblichen Knorpel eine ſo gute Krümmung zu geben, wenn Sie es nicht waren?“

— „Nur die Verhältniſſe ſind übertrieben.“

„Die Verhältniſſe! Welche Verhältniſſe? Zum Kuckuck! . . .“

Univ. Bibl.
München



— „Die Verhältniſſe dieſer Naſe,“ — erwiederte kaltblütig der unbarmherzige Spottvogel. „Die Rhinoplaſtik iſt eine herrliche Sache, aber man muß ſie nicht übertreiben.“

Als ich mich in dem Verdacht ſah, eine jener falſchen Naſen zu ſein, welche die Kunſt der Chirurgen an die Stelle ſchadhaft gewordener ſetzt, erröthete ich bis in meine äußerſte Spitze. Das war die bündigſte Proteſtation, die ich ablegen konnte und die auch das ſtärkſte Vorurtheil hätte beſiegen müſſen. Aber wann hat je die offenbarſte Wahrheit den Sieg über eine glückliche Neckerei davongetragen? Dieſe verbreitete ſich in wenigen Minuten durch die ganze Geſellſchaft und brachte alle Anweſende zum Lachen, einige junge Damen ausgenommen, welche ſie nicht verſtanden. Die Beſchaffenheit des Gegenſtandes flößte ihnen übrigens die Furcht ein, ſich zu compromittiren. Ohne Eitelkeit, ich habe bemerkt, daß eine große Naſe der ſchöneren Hälfte des Menſchengeſchlechtes einigen Reſpect einzuflößen pflegt.

Unglücklicherweiſe iſt Reſpect nicht Liebe. Das wurde ich bald gewahr. Die ſchönen Damen, ja ſelbſt die am wenigſten ſchönen — nahmen eine Einladung zum Tanz von meinem Herrn und mir nur mit Zagen — ich möchte faſt ſagen mit Schrecken an und wenn wir uns, liebenswürdig und galant wie wir waren, zu ihnen hinabbeugten, um ihnen einige geheimnißvolle Süßigkeiten in das Ohr zu flüſtern, ſo warfen ſie ſich ſämmtlich rückwärts, als ob irgend ein blinder von einem brutalen Handlanger auf der Schulter getragener Balken dem leicht zerſtörbaren Bau ihrer Locken Gefahr gedroht hätte. Der Walzer wurde uns übrigens ſeit einem gewiſſen Abende unterſagt, wo eine kleine muthwillige Tänzerin behauptete, daß ich (unwillkürlich) hinter ihrer Schulter eine Bandſchleife aufgezogen hätte. Das Verbrechen war geſchehen, ich will es nicht zu leugnen ſuchen, aber konnte ſie nicht eine ungeſchickte Hand, die wahre Sünderin, dieſes Vergehens anklagen?

Dem Ball entſagen, das heißt bei dem jetzigen Zuſtande der Geſellſchaft, dem Rechte entſagen ſich eine Frau zu wählen. Der Mann, der nicht mehr tanzt, iſt eine Art von bankerottem Junggeſellen, dem die Eheſtandsbörſe verboten wurde. Er kann keine jener Handelsoperationen mehr wagen, die mit dem autoriſirten Anerbieten eines Bouquets beginnen und mit authentiſchen Contracten endigen. Die Freunde ſeiner Familie ſprachen in dieſem Sinne mit meinem Herrn. Er blieb unerſchütterlich. Nur wenn ſie hartnäckiger und heftiger als gewöhnlich in ihn gedrungen hatten, verweilte er am Abend, in der Nachtmütze, etwas länger vor ſeinem Spiegel und verſuchte da mich en face, im Profil und drei Viertel als die erſte beſte Naſe zu betrachten.

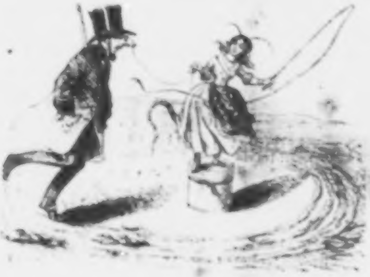
„Sie läßt ſich denn doch präſentiren," ſagte er einſt, aber ſein Gewiſſen ließ ihn die Bemerkung machen, daß der ſteife Zipfel ſeiner Nachtmütze, der ſich mehr als gewöhnlich nach vorn bog, mich ungemein begünſtigte. Dies gab er ehrlich zu und beſiegelte ſeinen feſten Entſchluß, dem Balle zu entſagen, durch einen ungeheuern Fauſtſchlag, den er mir in ſeiner böſen Laune verſetzte. Ich that ihm noch am folgenden Morgen weh davon.

Ich hatte ſeinen Schmerz begriffen und fühlte Mitleid mit ihm, wie ungerecht auch die erſten Aeußerungen deſſelben waren. Um ihm einen Theil des Vergnügens, deſſen ich ihn beraubte, wiederzugeben, erheuchelte ich eine Sehnſucht, die ich gar nicht empfand, als eine Tabacksdoſe eines Tages dicht bei mir vorüberkam. Dieſe unbeſonnene Begebenheit habe ich theuer bezahlt. Man weiß gar nicht, was es koſtet, gefühlvoll geboren zu ſein.

Seit dieſem Tage ſah mein Herr, der es ebenfalls war, ſich darauf beſchränkt in den unteren Regionen der Geſellſchaft eine Dankbarkeit zu ſuchen, die er mit ſeinem Gelde bezahlte und die er ſich bemühte für etwas Anderes zu halten. Ohne weitere Umſchweife, er gerieth unter die Griſetten. Ich war die Urſache davon, denn die Priſe ſpielte bei dieſer Gelegenheit eine weſentliche Rolle. Die Griſette hat Geſchmack für den kitzelnden Tabacksſtaub. Sie macht gern aus ihrer verderblichen Sinnlichkeit ein Syſtem, indem ſie frech erklärt, „daß man thöricht ſein müſſe, ſich ein Vergnügen zu verſagen, das man alle fünf Minuten erneuern könne.“ Dieſe weibliche, in ihren äußerſten Folgen ſo furchtbare Maxime wird jeder redlichen und verſtändigen Katze großen Stoff zum Nachdenken geben.

Die Liebe — ſagen die Dichter — iſt ein Fluß, in welchem das Kind — allmälig ſich demſelben nähernd — zuerſt ſich ſpiegelt, dann ſich wäſcht und endlich ertrinkt. Ich kann nur den letzten Theil dieſes Vergleiches beſtätigen. Wir ertranken mit Leib und Seele in den Manſardenzärtlichkeiten und den Gefühlen, die eigene Meubles haben wollen. Mein Herr ließ ſich ganz und gar von ſeinen herrſchſüchtigen Favoritinnen leiten, die ihn, ich will nicht ſagen woran herumführten.



Von Hauſe aus ſchüchtern, wagte er nun auch nicht mehr, mich in eine anſtändige Geſellſchaft zu bringen, und ich fühlte, daß ich verloren ſei, wenn es mir, der ich der Urſprung des Uebels war, nicht gelänge, die Fortſchritte deſſelben zu beſiegen. Ich dachte (claſſiſche Erinnerung) an die Lanze des Achilles, die die Wunden heilte, welche ſie gemacht hatte: — „Ich bin faſt eben ſo lang," — rief ich aus — „warum ſoll ich denn geringere Kraft haben?"

Das Uebel war groß und drohend; es erforderte ein kräftiges Heilmittel. Meine Vernichtung ausgenommen — eine ſelbſtmörderiſche Naſe würde die Menſchheit empören — war ich zu Allem entſchloſſen.

Zuerſt zwang ich meinen Herrn dem Taback zu entſagen, der ihn in's Verderben geſtürzt hatte. Ich that das unter dem Vorwande, daß ich einen gar zu großen Umfang dadurch erhielt. Er war ſo gutmüthig, in dieſe ganz falſche Idee einzugehn, welche ich ihm durch eine hochmüthige Stickerin zuflüſtern ließ, in deren Augen es mir gelang ungeheuer dick zu erſcheinen.

Nachdem das geſchehen war, zeigte ich mich fortan nur den ſanfteſten und natürlichſten Gerüchen zugänglich. Ich hatte meinen Plan gemacht. Im Erdgeſchoſſe eines an das unſrige ſtoßenden Hauſes bemerkte ich ſeit einiger Zeit ein anbetungswürdiges, ganz ſeinen Tüchern, drei Kätzchen und einigen Blumentöpfen hingegebenes junges Mädchen. Meine Sympathie für daſſelbe hatte einen durchaus philoſophiſchen Grund. Neben vielen anderen Reizen und Annehmlichkeiten beſaß es noch das, in meinen Augen ungeheure Verdienſt, — keine Naſe zu haben. Ich eile, mich deutlich zu machen. Mitten in dem winzigen Raume zwiſchen ſeinen ſchönen Augen und ſeinem roſigen Munde konnte wohl ein aufmerkſamer Beobachter mit unbewaffnetem Blicke ein gewiſſes Etwas bemerken, welches wie mit einem Bohrer von zwei kleinen Canälen durchlöchert war, die zum Athmen für dieſen Engel hinreichten; aber das war Alles und in meinen Augen war es Nichts.

Die Sympathie — man braucht eben keine ſehr feine Naſe zu haben, um das zu bemerken — die Sympathie iſt das Product der Contraſte. Unſere junge Nachbarin wurde meine Sonne und ich war täglich der Zeiger, der ihr die Stunden bezeichnete.

Das Licht kam mir von ihr und ich warf einen ſchwarzen Schatten nach der Seite, wo ſie nicht war. Einer Anziehungskraft gehorchend, deren Urſache er nicht ahnte, ging mein Herr an das Fenſter, ſobald er die allerliebſte Gärtnerin ſich rühren hörte. Der Unvorſichtige! — Aber ſie ſchlug nie die Augen zu uns auf, und ich konnte mich einer Kriegsliſt bedienen, welche ſchon in Marmontel's moraliſchen Erzählungen vorkommt.

Erinnert Ihr Euch jenes Ehemannes, der, um ſeiner Frau zu gefallen, die ſich in die Sylphen verliebt hatte, ſich in ein ſolches luſtiges Weſen umwandelte, ſo gut das eben einem Ehemanne möglich iſt? Vermittelſt einiger akuſtiſchen Täuſchungen und der Zauberkraft einer Art von mobilem Diorama ſchien er bei Tage unſichtbar bis in das Boudoir ſeiner jungen ſchwärmeriſchen Gattin zu dringen, die hier friedlich ihren entzückenden Träumen nachhing. Während der Nacht verſteckt hinter den Vorhängen des ehelichen Alkovens, machte er ſeine Stimme ſo ſanft wie möglich, um ſeiner beſſern Hälfte eine Menge moſchusduftender Schmeicheleien in das Ohr zu flüſtern. Um deſto freundlicher aufgenommen, da er abſichtlich viel Böſes von ſich ſelber redete, erfreute er ſich binnen Kurzem reißender Fortſchritte, die ihm reichen Stoff zum Nachdenken gaben. An der bewegten Stimme ſeiner Frau und der Mattigkeit, welche die mit dem untaſtbaren Liebhaber zugebrachten Nachtwachen auf ihren Zügen zurückließen, ſah er, welche Gefahr ihm drohte, wenn die Sylphen weniger platoniſch liebten. Eines ſchönen Morgens hielt er es daher für paſſend, ſeine materiellen Eigenſchaften wieder anzunehmen. Die Flügel fielen — der Gatte blieb und — das iſt zwar ſehr moraliſch, aber unglücklicher Weiſe eine erdichtete Erzählung — der Zauber verſchwand nicht.

Als nun mein Herr eines Tages einige vor langen Zeiten von ſeiner Großmutter gebrauchte Putzſachen betrachtete, benutzte ich ein Riechkiſſen, aus welchem noch ein leichter Wohlgeruch vergangener Jahre drang, um ihm den Gedanken einzuflößen, bei unſerer Nachbarin die Rolle des Sylphengemahls zu ſpielen. Da er mehr Empfindungen als Ideen hatte, ſo klammerte er ſich hartnäckig an diejenigen, die ihm ungewöhnlicher Weiſe durch den Kopf fuhren, und ſuchte ſie mit einer Halsſtarrigkeit, wie ſie geiſtreiche Leute nie gekannt haben, auszuführen. Das eben iſt, ohne Prätenſionen zu ſprechen, das Geheimniß jenes höheren Geſetzes, welches zu allen Zeiten, vorzüglich aber in unſeren Tagen, den Dummköpfen die Oberhand in menſchlichen Angelegenheiten verleiht.

Wenn ich im Detail erzählen ſollte, wie er ſeine myſteriöſen Huldigungen an den Mann, oder, richtiger an die Dame brachte, ſo würde ich mir eine Arbeit aufladen, ſchwerer als die maſſivſte

Brille. Lieber möchte ich zwanzig Partien des wunderlichen Spiels La Drogue ſpielen und verlieren.

Kurz, ſobald er ſich nicht zeigte, kehrte er in die Claſſe gewöhnlicher Naſen zurück, und das verſchaffte ihm für ſein Gewerbe als Liebhaber die günſtigſten Ausſichten. Die ſchöne Nachbarin machte alle Peripetieen des Erſtaunens, der Furcht, des Intereſſe, der Dankbarkeit, der Rührung und endlich der Sympathie durch. Alle Grade der Kryſtalliſation waren zurückgelegt, und — um die einer Abhandlung über die Liebe entlehnte Metapher beizubehalten — alle Unvollkommenheiten meines Herrn (ich rechne mich beſcheiden mit dazu) verſchwanden, durch eine Unzahl blendender und prismatiſcher Diamanten verdunkelt. Unter dieſer funkelnden Bedeckung konnte die Einbildungskraft unſerer ſchönen Angebeteten die urſprüngliche Wirklichkeit ebenſo wenig wiederfinden, als ſie einen während drei Wintermonate in den Tiefen einer Mine vergeſſenen Zweig unter einer dreifachen Lage von Steinſalz wiedererkannt haben würde. So wirkt etwas vierundzwanzig Stunden in dem Kopfe eines Liebenden, das mehr als vierundzwanzig Tage brauchte, um in dem Kopfe unſerer Nachbarin zur Vollendung zu kommen. Als, ſie jedoch ſo weit war, konnte ich nach einigen redneriſchen Vorſichtsmaßregeln auftreten. Und wäre ich auch ſo groß geweſen wie der Galgen, an welchem König Ahasverus den Haman aufhängen ließ, — ja hätte ich die Länge der Säule auf dem Vendomeplatze gehabt, man würde mich doch — ich ſage nicht erträglich — ſondern niedlich gefunden haben. Wir wurden angenommen; wir vermählten uns und mein Herr war gerettet.

Ebenſo ſehr wie die Junggeſellennaſe der Kritik ausgeſetzt bleibt, erkennt die Geſellſchaft den verheiratheten Naſen das Recht zu, zu ſein, was ihnen geziemt. Nichts ſchützte ſie früher vor den rauhen Stürmen des Spottes; da kommt die Ehe und eine vollkommene Sicherheit und Glückſeligkeit folgt dieſen Ungewittern. Auch hörte ich, als ich mich in meinem neuen Glücke wie in einem bequemen Lehnſeſſel breit machte, viele Leute ſagen: „Ihm ward wohl ſeine Naſe gedrehe?" — „Keine Naſe gedreht?" rief ich, der Zuhörer, den Mund anſehend, ob er nicht lächelte.

— „Keine Naſe gedreht," — antwortete er ganz ernſthaft — „Was fällt Ihnen denn ſo auf bei dieſer ſprichwörtlichen Redensart?"

— „Warten Sie," — ſagte ich nach kurzer Ueberlegung. — „Um Ihnen Nichts zu verbergen . . . hat die bewußte Naſe nie etwas hinzugefügt?"

— „Doch."

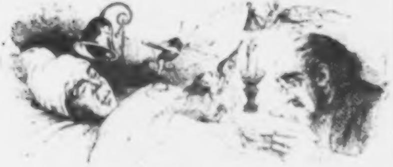
— „Ha ha!"

— „Sie fügte hinzu: „„Wir lebten ſehr glücklich und bekamen viele Kinder.""

— „Und das iſt Alles?"

— „Alles. Was wollen Sie denn noch mehr?"

— „Wahrlich," — ſagte ich heimlich zu mir — „ein Ehemann ſteckt auch nie die Naſe in ſolche Geheimniſſe." —



Ueber das Unglück,
allein sein und besonders allein schlafen
zu müſſen

Eine von der Akademie der Spaß beati gekrönte Preisſchrift.

„Es iſt nicht gut, daß der Menſch allein ſei" — ſagt ſchon die Bibel. Gewöhnliche kurzſichtige Ausleger haben das blos auf den ledigen Stand deuten und eine Ermahnung für jeden Junggeſellen und jede Jungfrau darin finden wollen, möglichſt bald zur Ehe zu ſchreiten. Das iſt aber grundfalſch oder mindeſtens ſehr einſeitig, denn die Erfahrung hat ſchon ſeit Adam's Zeiten, das heißt, gleich nach dem Sündenfall, unzählige Mal bewieſen, daß ſich oft der Menſch gerade dann am meiſten allein befinde, wenn er zu zweien ſei, in der Ehe nämlich. In der Ehe, ſelbſt in der glücklichſten, iſt man übrigens immer allein, denn das Weib iſt ja nur die Hälfte des Mannes, wenn auch, wie Schmeichler behaupten, die beſſere Hälfte. Mann und Weib machen daher erſt ein Ganzes, eine Einheit, und dieſe Einheit fühlt es auch gar häufig, daß ſie allein ſei; wenn man allein iſt, langweilt man ſich mitunter, und daher mag es denn wohl kommen, daß ſo viele Paare eine langweilige Ehe führen und ſich mit einander langweilen. In unſern emancipationsſüchtigen Zeiten könnte ein kühner Exeget, wie wir deren jetzt von allen Farben haben, ſogar die Behauptung aufſtellen, jener berühmte Satz ließe ſich anders deuten und ſchärfe ſogar den Ehepaaren ein, für Hausfreunde und Hausfreundinnen zu ſorgen, um den Fluch des Alleinſeins, oder den Fehler des Alleinſeins, oder auch den Tadel des Alleinſeins, kurz das Alleinſein auf möglichſt bequeme Weiſe zu heben und aus dem Wege zu räumen.

„Es iſt nicht gut, daß der Menſch allein ſei" — aber es iſt doch beſſer, daß er als ein Ganzes allein ſei, denn nur als ein Halbes, beſſer vollſtändig allein als unvollſtändig, beſſer vollkommen allein als unvollkommen, und das Letztere iſt man immer, wenn man nur eine Hälfte iſt, die nach und mit Plato zu reden, ihre andere Hälfte auf Erden bisher vergeblich ſuchte. Eine ſolche iſolirte männliche Hälfte der Menſchheit nun nennt bekanntlich der Sprachgebrauch — einen Junggeſellen — und in dieſer Benennung liegt eine tiefe Weisheit verborgen, wie ſie überhaupt der Genius des Menſchengeiſtes in aller Sprache barg und wenn ſie auch nur von Wilden geredet wird, die nicht weiter als bis drei zählen können. — Ein Junggeſelle, das iſt Einer, der nie Meiſter werden kann, wenn er nicht ſeinen Stand und ſein ganzes Weſen ändert. Hier folge der Beweis:

Ein geiſtreicher engliſcher Schriftſteller, der eine Anweiſung zum Courmachen (Book of Courtship) geſchrieben hat, um auch ſein Theil zu der Beſſerung des Menſchengeſchlechtes, an der ſeit 6000 Jahren vergeblich gearbeitet worden, beizutragen, giebt folgende Schilderung der Leiden eines Junggeſellen, bei der wir uns jedoch, um der Vollſtändigkeit willen, noch einige Zuſätze erlaubt haben. „Der arme Mann kehrt in ſein Logis zurück. Wenn er auch dort Alles findet, wie er es möglicher Weiſe ſich nur wünſchen kann, in der Geſtalt von tauſend großen und kleinen Comforts, welche ſeine alte Haushälterin ihm bereitet hat — ſo wird das doch nur eine äußerliche, oberflächliche Behaglichkeit ſein und ungefähr eine Wirkung auf ihn üben, wie das Mondlicht einſt auf Lord Byron:

Distinct but distant, clear but oh! how cold.

